- With these, on account of the badness of the roads, they could not well be furnished from Persia; whereas the Romans easily supplied them by sea, and at a moderate price, which preserved an intimacy between the nations. On the other hand the Lazi, who were zealous christians, endeavoured to convert the Persians who dwelt among them; by which means they became obnoxious to the magi, who did not fail to insinuate, that difference in religion would everlastingly hinder them from being good subjects to the Persian crown. Chosroes thereupon formed a project of transporting them from their own country of Colchis into the heart of Persia, and to settle a colony of Persians in their stead. Previous however to the execution of this grand project, he determined to build a navy in the port of Petra, which might be able to guard the coasts, and prevent too strict an intercourse between the Lazi and the inhabitants of the Roman provinces; but knowing that this could not be accomplished, if the people were timely apprised thereof, he caused great quantities of timber to be sent to Petra, under pretence of repairing the fortifications, and constructing military machines. However, Gubazes king of the Lazi, taking offence at these preparations, and doubting the safety of his person, besought the protection of the Romans. This was quickly afforded him, and the emperor Justinian immediately dispatched a considerable army to his relief. This army was commanded by Dagistheus, a young man, very indifferently skilled in the art of war. Gubazes kept his word; for as soon as the Roman forces appeared, he joined them, and compelled the Persians to shut themselves up in Petra, the only fortified place in the kingdom. The reduction of this place therefore was the sole point in question; for this once effected, the war was at an end. Gubazes quickly invested it on one side, as the Romans did on the other, to whom Gubazes most pathetically recommended the custody of the streights called Chisura, through which only the Persians, if they sent an army, could enter, if they attempted the relief of Petra. The Roman general, having viewed these difficult passages, conceived them to be so strong in their nature, that he left but a hundred men to guard them. As soon as Chosroes was informed of this strange turn in his affairs, and that Petra was blocked up, he ordered Mermeroes, one of the best officers in Persia, to march with an army to its relief. This took up a great deal of time, and in this space the Persian garison was reduced to the last extremity; nay, the Romans actually entered the city, and might have taken it, if the governor of the citadel had not drawn them into a treaty for rendering that fortress, at the same time with the city, into their hands. Mermeroes, from the time he entered Colchis with his army, directed his march according to his own private intelligence, avoiding any correspondence with the Lazi, who pretended to be in the Persian interest; so that he arrived at the mouth of the Chisura before he was at all expected; and finding how small a guard the Roman general had left there, he caused it to be height, his view was, by the help of engines, to make a bridge of communication, over which he might pass as great a part of his army as he pleased into the place. The inhabitants of Edeffa, perceiving the drift of this design, instantly began to undermine the new raised work, in hopes they might be able to set it on fire; but when they had done this, they found their labour lost, not being able to make the fire burn for want of air, a circumstance they had not before considered. This put them to their wits, and at last they bethought themselves of the miraculous print of our Saviour's face, which he sent to their king Abgarus, and was preserved in their church. Thus they brought into their mine, poured water over it, and then this water upon the fire and the wood, which instantly lighted, and burnt intensely. Then, to prevent the enemy from apprehending whence the smoke came, they threw all sorts of fire-works from the walls. After three days however, the Persians perceived, that the very heart of their mount was consumed. Chosroes ordered water to be poured upon it in vast quantities; but when it was observed, that, instead of slackening, it increased the fire as much as if so much oil had been thrown thereon, he, in despair, suffered the mount to burn on; and having sent away his baggage, demolished his works, and raised the siege (55).

attacked again and again, till, with the loss of a thousand men, he carried the pass, and then, without halting, marched directly to Petra. There he found, of five thousand men, only nine hundred remaining, and of these three hundred and fifty disabled. The dead bodies they had piled up against the narrow walls of the citadel, that the Romans might not be acquainted with their loss, and from thence be encouraged to storm the place. The Romans conceived that this was but a slight reprieve, the walls being every-where broken, and the place, as it were, in ruins; Mermeroes however repaired it in the best manner he was able, and when he had so done, and left a fresh garison in it, he withdrew his troops from thence, having made a truce with the Lazi, though the Roman forces still continued the war. When the place was put into a state of defence, Mermeroes drew his troops towards Iberia, whence he hoped to receive such supplies of provisions, as might be necessary for the occasions of his own army, as well as of Petra. Here incamping with a rapid river behind him, he conceived his forces to be in safety. But it so happened, that Gubazes devised a method of passing this river, and having informed the Romans thereof, and also furnished them with bridges, they fell upon the Persian army, and made a dreadful slaughter. Mermeroes however repaired this mistake, by incamping more cautiously for the future, and so kept the war alive, notwithstanding the great disadvantages he laboured under. It would oblige us to carry this history into an extraordinary length, if we should relate all that passed in this Colchian war, of which we have very large memoirs in Procopius and Agathias. We shall content ourselves therefore with observing, that in the end the Romans were successful, by reason of their having the empire of the sea, which enabled them to supply their armies with provisions and recruits, as often as they stood in need of them; whereas the Persians were obliged to make long and fatiguing marches by land, and to bring all their provisions in carriages. Mermeroes, so long as he lived, preserved the superiority of the Persian power, and a little before his death gave the Romans a signal defeat; but his successor Nachoraganus, a rash and haughty general, fell as far short of him in his performances, as in his boasting promises he surpassed him. His ill conduct was one of the great causes of the success of the Romans; and therefore Chosroes, on his return into Persia, ordered him to be slayed alive; and perceiving that his affairs were on a declining condition on this side, resolved to make peace with the Romans. With this view he sent an ambassador to the court of Justinian, who received him graciously, and entered readily into a treaty with his master, whereby it was provided, that each party should keep what they were possessed of in Colchis at the time of its conclusion; and thus the Lazi were deprived of their liberties, by calling in their too powerful neighbours, Gubazes having been assassinated sometime before, who was extremely careful of his subjects, and who, in all the changes of his fortune, constantly sought their good (Y).

(Y) The history of the Colchian war hath, as we noted in the text, employed the pens of many eminent writers. Procopius, in the second book of his memoirs of the wars with the Persians, enters into a long detail of the causes, why the Constantinopolitan emperors on the one hand, and the Persian monarchs on the other, were so solicitous to maintain themselves in the possession of this country. He also prosecutes the account of the military expeditions on both sides, till such time as Mermeroes was first obliged to retire into Iberia (56). Agathias, who continued the history of Procopius, resumes the thread here, and describes at large all that happened afterwards in this country, till the conclusion of the peace between the Romans and the Persians. To him we owe the character of the Persian general before-mentioned. Mermeroes, says he, was of all the Persian officers the most distinguished for his thorough understanding of the art of war. He died full of years and glory, after having for a long space of time intirely lost the use of his limbs, so that he was carried up and down in a litter; yet was he so dreadful to the Romans, that they never thought themselves in any security, while he was at the head of the Persian troops (57). The curious reader, who will take the pains of perusing the authors I have mentioned, will plainly perceive, that the art of war was at this time extremely well understood, as it appears also the art of negotiating must have been, since the conferences for bringing this treaty of partition to a conclusion afforded matter for the fourth book of Menander's history of embassies. Of this we have yet an abstract remaining, wherein the principal arguments made use of on both sides, the characters of the Roman and Persian plenipotentiaries are elegantly described, and the heads of the treaty, which consisted of ten articles, are briefly set down; but yet with such clearness, as demonstrates the skill of the politicians in those times, not to have been inferior to those who have been most famous for this kind of science in succeeding ages (58). We should have inserted some quotations from these valuable pieces, if we had not been apprehensive of extending the history of this period too far; but we could not avoid writing this note, to shew the carelessness of the former writers of the Persian history, who have slipped over all these things, as if the accounts of them had been buried in utter oblivion.

- a TOWARDS the end of the reign of Justinian, Chosroes fell sick of a dangerous disorder; and depending more on the skill of the Roman physicians than his own, he requested that some should be sent him from Constantinople, which demand of his was readily complied with. On the accession however of the emperor Justin, new troubles arose. The inhabitants of the Greater Armenia, who were subjects to the king of Persia, were by this time become generally christians; and therefore rather inclined to put themselves under the protection of the Romans; to which Justin rashly consented; and having privately encouraged them to revolt, the Armenians, under the command of Varanes, one of their petty princes, suddenly took arms, and having murdered all the Persians amongst them, declared themselves allies and dependents of the emperor of Constantinople. Chosroes immediately complained of this, and the emperor Justin pretended to colour his conduct by his zeal for the christian religion; and being deceived by the intelligence which the bishop of Nisibis sent him, gave orders to his general Marcian to enter the Persian territories with an army, and to lay siege to that city, which was accordingly done. The Persian governor, incensed at the folly and rashness of the action, did not so much as shut the gates, but contented himself with relieving the guards at them twice a day, the Roman army being scarce numerous enough to invest the place. In the mean time Chosroes passed the Euphrates, and marched directly towards Nisibis, having first made a great detachment under Adermanes, who laid waste the Roman provinces with fire and sword. The Roman army before Nisibis being dissatisfied with the emperor's measures, and his changing their commander, suddenly, and without any reason given, broke up, and retired the best way they could; whereupon Chosroes finding no body in the field to resist him, took and sacked all the great cities in Mesopotamia and Syria, and gave the plunder to his soldiers. He also besieged and reduced Dara, a fortress that had always been a curb upon his subjects, and in the fortifying of which the emperor Justinian had expended vast sums. Into this place he put a great garison, knowing its importance, and resolving to make use of it for a barrier against its old masters (Z). But while he was meditating new exploits, Trajan, a senator of Rome, presented to him letters from the empress Sophia, her husband Justin being run mad. In these letters the empress pathetically described the misery of the Roman empire, beseeching Chosroes to remember the kindness of former emperors, particularly the sending him physicians, the uncertainty of all worldly greatness, and the little glory that would result to him from conquests made from a headless nation, and a helpless woman. Chosroes having read the letters, immediately withdrew with his troops from the frontiers of the Roman empire, consenting to a truce for three years, Armenia however being excluded ¹.
- THIS respite was very favourable to the Romans, who quickly saw their affairs absolutely re-established by the diligence and prosperous success of Tiberius, the successor of Justin. He was not only an active and vigilant prince, and one of a martial disposition, but a person well skilled in the art of war, and a horse officer of great expe-

(Z) We are obliged to Evagrius for the history of this war, which he seems to have written very candidly, since it is plain enough from his relation, that hostilities were begun by the emperor Justin, without any just grounds, and that notwithstanding the complaints of Chosroes, he refused to desist from the measures he had taken to gratify his ambition. There is however just cause to believe, that he was a little disordered in his senses, even before this war. During the time it was carried on, nothing could be more wild than his conduct. He fancied all the little advantages that were gained, before the Persians well knew that the Romans were their enemies, so many victories. He commanded his general to lay siege to Nisibis with a small army, badly furnished with provisions; and being informed by the bishop of Amioch, that his affairs in the east took a very bad turn, he dispatched Acaces, an ignorant and assuming man, to demand of his general the keys of Nisibis, as if fortune had been subject to his commands. This man executing the orders of his master with the same temper, that is, with the same stupidity with which he gave them, the consequence was, that the army were afraid to trust either their general, or their distracted emperor, and therefore retired the best way they could. John the son of Timosirates yielded up Dara, either through fear, or from a worse motive; and Chosroes, as soon as he was master of it, put part of the inhabitants to the sword, made the rest prisoners, and having disposed of every thing as he thought fit in the place, put a strong garison therein, it being held the best fortress in all that part of the world. Chosroes also treated all the frontier provinces in the empire with great severity, assigning the emperor's breach of faith for a reason; for, it seems, he could not bear with patience that sort of behaviour from others, which he was himself but too apt to exercise. This however was the last fortunate campaign he made, and indeed his conquests therein were of very great importance (59).

tience. The first thing he did was to put the cavalry into better order than they had ever been before, knowing that the eastern provinces of the empire were better defended by them than by foot; and as he found the treasury full, through the extortions of his predecessors, it was no hard matter to make quick levies, especially for one so well acquainted with discipline. Cbofroes, who had not the least suspicion of these mighty changes, prepared early the next spring to enter Armenia, resolving to penetrate Cappadocia, and to make himself master of Cæsarea, and such other cities in those parts as were of any consideration. The Roman emperor, foreseeing the consequences of such an irruption, sent ambassadors to persuade Cbofroes from this expedition, and to engage him to make a solid and lasting peace; but at the same time that he sent these ambassadors, he dispatched Justinian with directions to assemble all the forces in the eastern provinces, in order, if it was necessary, to repel force by force. When the Roman ambassadors came into the camp of Cbofroes, he was so far from receiving them as he was wont, that he refused to give them any audience, commanding them to follow him to Cæsarea, where he should be at leisure to hear them. Not long after he was informed, that the Roman army was at no great distance, and that they designed to give him battle. He looked upon this as an act of rashness in them, and as an accident favourable to himself; and therefore continued his march with the utmost expedition, that he might not lose this advantage. But when he drew near them, and saw their cavalry extremely numerous, disposed in excellent order, and the soldiers eager to engage, he fetched a deep sigh, shewing by the heaviness of his countenance how very much his mind was affected by this disappointment. On this account therefore he would, in all probability, have retired into some convenient camp, instead of fighting immediately: if Curtius, a Scythian, who commanded the right wing of the Roman army, had not charged the left of the Persians, where Cbofroes was in person. The combat was sharp and bloody, but in the end the Persians were beaten, the royal treasure and the sacred fire, before which the king worshipped, taken in his fight. In all probability things would have gone still worse, had not the night come on, which gave the Persians an opportunity to retiring. The next night, or rather evening, Cbofroes having intelligence that the Romans were incamped in two separate bodies, he fell upon one of them at midnight, routed them effectually with a prodigious slaughter, and having taken and set a village on fire that was behind their camp, he marched directly to the Euphrates, that by repassing that river, he might winter in his own dominions. But Justinian the Roman general, penetrating his design, followed him so closely, that he was himself forced to pass the river on an elephant, and many of those who were immediately about him were drowned.
 After this the Romans wintered for the first time in the Persian provinces, and Cbofroes retiring to Seleucia, was so much affected therewith, that he broke his heart, when he had reigned forty-eight years. This is the account which most of the Greek writers have given us, and the collectors of general history have followed them without scruple; yet there is just reason to believe, that this narration is wide of the truth, and therefore we take the liberty of subjoining what we apprehend comes nearer it. Cbofroes did indeed die of discontent, but not so hastily as most of the Greek writers assert; on the contrary, he lingered on till the following spring, and actually saw a treaty brought to a conclusion, which he had begun with the emperor Tiberius, so that he had a prospect of leaving his kingdom in peace. Of this he was the more desirous on account of the mighty disorders occasioned by the depredations daily committed by the Roman vessels in the Caspian sea, as also from the mutinous behaviour of his soldiers, and the general discontent of the Persians, too prone to murmur when fortune was against their princes (A). Cbofroes, as he had lived, so he died, like a great prince, after enacting

(A) We have more than once observed, that the Greek writers are excessively partial, and we have more than once commended Agathias Scholiasticus for digressing from the customs of his country in this particular. However, with regard to Cbofroes, who was his cotemporary, and with whose character he had many and great opportunities of being fully acquainted, he is at least as faulty as any of the Greek writers; and with a sort of absurd malice, first relates the excellent things said of that monarch by those who were perfectly well acquainted with him, and then endeavours to destroy their characters, as well as that of Cbofroes, by a number of weak as well as ill-natured reflections (60). Procopius, who had still better opportunities of knowing the true character of this prince than Agathias, could have treated him in a quite different manner; for he every-where magnifies his abilities, though he sometimes

- a that none of his successors should expose their persons in any general engagement against the Romans, and after giving his son the most wholesome instructions for the government of his people, for the management of foreign wars, and for the conduct of himself.

Hormisdas succeeded his father in his dominions, but had neither his abilities nor his fortune. Hasty in his temper, haughty in his behaviour, cruel in his disposition, obstinate in all things, he no sooner put on the diadem, than he proclaimed himself unworthy of it. He was always addicted to a silly curiosity as to future events, and his diviners having suggested to him that his subjects were not well affected, he began to conceive suspicions of most of the great men in the kingdom, and to treat them as if suspicion and conviction was with him the same thing. As to foreign princes, he kept no measures with them at all; he never notified his succession to the emperor Tiberius, but left him to learn it from common fame. When that monarch sent ambassadors to compliment him, and to renew the peace, he treated them disdainfully, and refused to grant their request, unless he had a sum of money given him by way of tribute. A demand, considering the circumstances of things, most unreasonable, and which therefore opened afresh those wounds which had been lately healed up, and equally disposed both Romans and Persians to enter on a new war, and which in the end proved very disadvantageous to both (B). At first the military operations were not of any great consequence; an action happened near the river Nymphium, in which neither party had any great advantage. The Persians soon after besieged a fortress called Apbumum, and the Romans invested another fortress called Acbas, which siege however was raised by the Persian general Cardariganus. But when the Roman army had received the recruits from Constantinople, and Philippicus, whom the emperor Maurice sent to command, arrived on the frontiers, the Persians were obliged to withdraw times bears hard upon his morals (61). According to Procopius, Chosroes was a very wise, but a very ambitious prince; according to Agathias, he was very fortunate, and very vain-glorious. That the latter was not his true character, may be made appear from facts. His conduct towards the Roman ambassadors, his harangues, his letters, but above all, his success against the emperor Justinian, are so many incontestable proofs of his skill in the art of reigning. As to his knowledge of war, Agathias himself confesses it in these words: In the field, no man knew better than Chosroes how to contrive; nor did any officer execute his orders with greater alacrity, than Chosroes did his own projects; and what was very wonderful, his activity did not forsake him, even in his old age; but he was as quick, or rather quicker, in his last campaign, than in his first. It was not his reputation, as a soldier, that offended Agathias; but he could not bear, that a barbarous prince should be cried up for a philosopher, and a man of letters. This, we shall elsewhere shew, was however a tribute justly due to the merit of Chosroes; and when we do shew this, it will unquestionably prove, that we were not too rash in censuring the veracity of the Greek writers. The ecclesiastical historians tell not at all short in this respect of the authors of civil history. In the present case particularly, Evagrius tells us, that Chosroes died miserably, over-born by sorrow and grief, and covered with infamy, by the making the law taken notice of in the text (62).

(B) It is to Theophylact we owe the account given in the text of the character of Hormisdas, and his conduct in the beginning of his reign. This author was an Egyptian by birth, a man of letters, and one who proposed to write of things, which either himself was well acquainted with, or of which he had an authentic account from those who were perfectly well acquainted with them. He begins his memoirs with the succession of the emperor Maurice by virtue of his predecessor's nomination, and consequently a good deal later than the times of which we are now speaking. But in the latter end of this third book, he goes back to the succession of Hormisdas, that the remaining part of his history might be rendered clear and perspicuous; which it would not have been, if the death of Chosroes, and the character and succession of his son, had not been made known to his readers. He assures us, that Hormisdas was at once a most ambitious and the most cruel prince that ever held a sceptre; that he loaded his subjects with taxes, at the same time that he had no mercy on their persons; that the severities he was drawn into by his wizards, were not only excessive in their nature, but also spread incredibly wide, since he massacred thousands upon his foolish suspicions (63). Evagrius the ecclesiastical historian, who was contemporary with Hormisdas, though he mentions him often in his history, doth not enter so particularly into his character, but contents himself with saying, that he was the most unjust king the Persians ever had; and that, not content with exhausting their fortunes, he invented new tortures to imbrue the deaths of such as he suspected (64). Theophylact gives us likewise the character of Varamus, whose rebellion proved so fatal to Hormisdas. He observes, that he was a man of great quality, had served for many years in the army, was most successful in his expeditions against the Turks, and by his wisdom and valour rose so high in the favour of this very prince, that he not only continued him general in chief of his troops, but promoted him also to the office of mayor of the palace (65). These particulars would have swelled the text of the history too much, and yet are of too great consequence to be totally omitted; wherefore we have placed them here.

into the mountains, and leave the open country at the mercy of the enemy. Philippicus gratified his soldiers with the plunder of all the places he could take; but the thirst of spoil having drawn them too far into the Persian dominions, they were in the utmost danger of being vanquished, without so much as seeing an enemy, for want of water. This prompted them to a very extraordinary action, viz. putting all the men and women they had made prisoners to the sword, reserving only the children, whom they intended to sell for slaves; but they died in the march, and thereby escaped miseries worse than death. After this Philippicus was more cautious, and though he plundered other provinces, yet he took care not to march far from cities. The next year he had the command again, and defeated Cardariganus in a pitched battle, from which he escaped with a handful of men, rather through the inadvertency of the Romans, than any courage or conduct of his own; and with these he fled to Dara, but the citizens shut their gates upon him, and the Romans at the close of the campaign again made incursions into Persia, burnt the villages, and plundered the people. The next spring the Persians gained some advantages, upon which Philippicus was removed, and Comentolus sent to command in his place, who managed the war rather worse. At length Priscus was sent to restore the ancient Roman discipline; but the army was so far corrupted, that they refused to obey their general; but having chosen Germanus against his will to command them, they threw off all regards to the orders sent them from Constantinople. The Persians, receiving news of this, attempted to take Martyropolis; but the Romans under the command of Germanus, having penetrated their design, marched directly and gave them battle, whereby they saved the city for that time. However, it soon after fell into the hands of Mebodes the Persian general; for he having an intelligence with Sittas, an architect in the place, by his advice sent four hundred men thither, who pretended to desert from the Persian army, and were thereupon readily admitted. These men, by the direction of him who received them, surprised the place; and the Romans making a quick march to recover it, were engaged, and beaten by Mebodes; whereupon Philippicus was again removed, and Comentolus was once more trusted with the army. This man quickly lost his reputation; for coming to a battle with the Persians, he fled at the very beginning of it; but Heraclius, who commanded under him, managed things so well, that the Persians were intirely defeated with the loss of Abraates and Nabades, two of their best generals.

He by his imprudence excites a civil war.

In the mean-time the Persians were engaged in war with the Turks, now first mentioned by the Greek writers, and under the conduct of Varamus had been very successful. To him therefore orders were sent to pass the river Araxes, and to fall on the Roman territories on that side. To oppose him, the emperor sent Romanus; but before he could assemble an army sufficient to take the field, Varamus had done a great deal of mischief. At length, however, Romanus found himself in a condition to give the Persians battle, which he accordingly did; for Varamus presuming on his former success, desired nothing more ardently than an engagement. This proved fatal to his master's affairs; for the Persian cavalry being defeated, Varamus, with all his skill, had much ado to make an indifferent retreat. As soon as Hormisdas received advice of this disaster, he gave a signal proof of his small capacity for government. He sent to Varamus, instead of a vest of honour, a woman's garment, and threatened the troops with decimation; this inflamed their general, and united them to his interest. The issue of this business was, that Varamus wrote a letter to his master, in which he used always the feminine gender, as if he had been writing to a female slave, and prepared at the same time to treat him worse. Hormisdas, who began to see his error, sent Sarames, a man of great quality, to take upon him the command of the army, ordering him to pacify the soldiers at any rate, and to send him Varamus in chains. This Sarames would have done; but as soon as he arrived in the camp, and had declared the nature of his commission, Varamus ordered him to be thrown down from his elephant, and by provoking the beast, caused it to trample him to pieces. He spent the winter preparing for the execution of his purposes, and at the same time took all the care he could to hinder the progress of the Roman arms. The garison of Nisibis declared for him, and the malecontents began every-where to commit such disorders, that when Hormisdas was informed of them, and saw how unable he was to repress them, he began almost to lose his wits, breaking out into such furious fits of passion, as frightened all who were near him, and contributed no less to increase his misfortunes, than the arts of his

a enemies. Pherocanes commanded the troops which were still faithful, and he seemed inclined to attempt the reducing Varamus to his duty by force; but when the two armies were near each other, Varamus sent deputies to harangue the king's army, and to inform them, that his revolt, far from having any tendency to the destruction of the Persian empire, had no other motive than its conservation; that Hormisdas was no longer worthy to rule them; and that he sought only to bring about such a revolution, as the ill conduct of that prince had made necessary for the safety of the state. The general himself made no answer to these representations, but the army, easily debauched from its duty, began visibly to waver; so that in the night, Zoanab, who was of the guard to the general, fearing that he would head the defection, stabbed b him in his tent, and gave the plunder of it to the soldiers.

Hormisdas having intelligence of this fact, and not knowing what consequences it might have, retired out of Persia Proper to Ctesiphon, where he kept his court. The people in the mean time revolted in all the royal cities, and plundered the palaces, which afforded the nobility an opportunity of rescuing their relations from prison; and amongst those who were at this time released, was a person of the royal blood, whom Hormisdas for a slight offence had loaded with chains, named Bindoes. This man making all the haste he could to the troops formerly commanded by Pherocanes, was by them readily received for their chief. In three days they reached Ctesiphon, whither they no sooner came, than Bindoes, well attended, entered the royal palace, and forced
c themselves into the presence of the king. It was after dinner, and Hormisdas was sitting in the hall, clad in his robes of state, and with his tiara on his head. As soon as he saw Bindoes, he asked him, how he escaped out of prison, and wherefore he came thither? He answered by a torrent of injurious language, upbraiding his master with his ill conduct, and exciting all who were present to reject him from their king. Hormisdas ordered some of his servants, who were present, to seize Bindoes; but they were afraid to execute his commands. On the other hand, Bindoes taking the king by the arm, drew him out of his chair, took the tiara from off his head, and ordered some of his soldiers to conduct him to prison; which they did without the least reluctance, though he was their prince. In the midst of this tumult, Cbofroes the son of Hormisdas
d made his escape out of the palace, being apprehensive that his own life was not safe; but Bindoes having intelligence where he was, dispatched a person to assure him, that he was so far from having any intentions against his person, that his design was to set him upon the throne. Upon this Cbofroes returned, and they took their measures together; but while they were consulting, Hormisdas sent a message from his prison, requesting that a great council of the nobility might be called, and that he might have the liberty of speaking to them freely. When the Persian lords were acquainted with this demand, they instantly assembled at the palace, and then ordered that Hormisdas should be brought from his prison, and have liberty given him to say what he pleased. The king, after looking several times round on the assembly, made a long and vehement
e speech, in which he deplored his own calamity much, but the misery of the people more, inveighing bitterly against the authors of this anarchy and confusion, exhorting them to save the state from that destruction with which it was threatened, and to beware of establishing a tyranny, while they endeavoured to avoid it. He then adjured them not to think of making Cbofroes his successor, because he knew him to be of a haughty, turbulent, and cruel nature, prone to all sorts of vices, and equally careless of his own honour, and the public good. His other son, however, he recommended as a young prince of a mild and docile nature, one who was inclined to think right, and to do well. Lastly, he entered into a detail of the services he had himself rendered his country, in subduing many provinces, and in reducing several f of their barbarous neighbours so low, as to pay them tribute. When he had finished all he had to say, Bindoes made a long insulting answer, exhorted the people to have no regard to his words, but to act in such a manner as might best insure their own safety. This language suited well the genius of the people, ever prone either to slavish submission, or to licentious insolence; they followed implicitly the directions of their leader, who caused the young prince Hormisdas had recommended to be murdered in his presence, and afterwards to be cut to pieces. Then they sacrificed the unhappy woman his mother in the same manner; and that fortune might never restore Hormisdas to his former dignity, they ordered his eyes to be put out with a hot iron.

Chosroes II.
Year of Christ

Chosroes, as soon as these objects of popular cruelty were removed, was seated on his father's throne; whence rising up, he came and stood under a golden arch, according to the Persian custom, and having received the homage of the principal persons present, the rest with loud acclamations celebrated the accession of their new king, and made vows for his felicity. At first he treated his father with the utmost lenity, sent him diet from his table, ordered him proper attendants, gave him rich wines, and provided for him many amusements; but this prevailing nothing over the spirit of Hormisdas, who continued to reproach his son with his barbarity, and unnatural baseness, ^b Chosroes doubting what effect his reproaches might have, caused him to be cudgelled to death. Then supposing himself firmly seated on the throne, he gave sumptuous entertainments, and distributed most profusely the royal treasures amongst those he thought most capable of assisting him; mighty largesses he likewise bestowed upon the people, and ordered the prison doors to be every-where set open, that the same of his lenity and liberality might effectually secure the hearts of his subjects. On the sixth day after his accession he wrote letters to Varamus, and sent him also magnificent presents, exhorting him to come speedily and pay his duty to him, promising him, in case he did so, to make him the second man in his kingdom. Varamus refused his presents, and in a haughty letter, at the head of which, among a multitude of other ^c titles, he called himself the friend of God, the glorious conqueror, and the scourge of tyrants, he rejected his proposal, ordered him to lay down the crown, to come immediately and pay his respects to him, on which condition he should have a government given him. Chosroes having exhibited these letters to his council, they were extremely provoked, and gave it as their opinions, that he ought to be punished. Chosroes however wrote again to him, signifying his apprehension that his secretary had imposed upon him, and written rather his own dreams than what was dictated to him by Varamus, exhorting him by his future conduct to redeem his credit, and not to persist in his design of making his country a field of blood. Varamus however prepared for war, and Chosroes, since it could not be avoided, advanced to meet him. ^d
They faced each other near Nisibis, the city being in the power of the king, while Varamus encamped before it. Here a negotiation was begun, but it proved ineffectual; and Chosroes, suspecting some of the nobility about him, put them to death without hesitation, which created him many more enemies than it delivered him from; so that shortly after, when Varamus attacked the suburbs, and put part of the army

(C) It is impossible to read this part of the Persian history without emotion. One may safely number this among those extraordinary revolutions, which appear but rarely in the records of nations; and when they do, strike the judicious reader with an amazement mixed with horror. The Greek historian, Theophylact, relates the whole of this extraordinary transaction very circumspectly, and inserts at large the speeches of Hormisdas and Bindoes (66). One would be apt to think from the many rhetorical turns which are in them both, but in that of the king's especially, that they were not genuine; but when we find the rest of the Greek writers, and which is still more extraordinary, the oriental historians putting the same words into the same persons mouths, one is constrained to banish suspicion, and to admit, that one of the most excellent harangues that was perhaps ever composed, flowed from the mouth of a Persian prince, in a situation, when eloquence would have been least expected. But there seems to be something fatal in distressing majesty, and that the divine character of kings, like the essential qualities of gold, appear most clearly from the severest trials. The speech of Hormisdas, too long to be transcribed, but faithfully abridged in the text, proved a sort of prophecy; for after this sedition the reader will perceive the Persians were never quiet. Chosroes was indeed just such a king as his father foresaw he would be, and the people suffered from his ill conduct much greater evils, than they had ever felt under this unfortunate prince, his father. Authors do not agree about the manner in which Hormisdas was put to death. Some say that he earnestly desired it himself, rather than to have his eyes burnt out with a hot iron, which was thought necessary to prevent his escaping as Carandas had done (67). These add, that his son, provoked by his reproaches, ordered him to be beat to death (68). Others affirm, that Hormisdas refusing food, Chosroes directed him to be slain (69). However it was, the people detested the cruelty of their new king, and he had the mortification to see himself abandoned by those who had lately saluted him with the loudest acclamations. It is probable, that his resentment for this continued with him as long as he reigned.

a quartered therein to the sword, the rest presently joined him, and shewed a strong disposition to treat Cbofroes as ill as they had done his father; to avoid which, he fled, as privately as possible, exceedingly dejected under his misfortune, and the more so, because he had scarce any friends to share it with him. His women, menial servants, and a few of his guards, about thirty persons in the whole, fled with him, they knew not where; sometimes he had thoughts of retiring among the Scythians, at others, he hoped to hide himself in the mountains.

A 1 length, committing himself and his affairs wholly to providence; he came as it were by accident to a frontier post in the Roman dominions; and that too far in the night. Probus, who commanded there for the emperor, received him, and all who b were with him, kindly and courteously, permitting the king to write immediately to the Roman general, who as readily consented to his sending an express with his letters to the emperor. In these he besought Mauritius, who then possessed the imperial dignity, to assist him against his rebellious subjects; preserving in the midst of a most pathetic supplication all the dignity of a king. While Cbofroes was in this distress, Varamus entered the city of Ctesiphon in great splendor. Bindoes he seized, and threw into prison, treating all such as had shewn any affection to the royal family with great severity; but towards the rest of the Persians, he affected the greatest humanity, and a superabundant condescension. He did not fail however to issue his orders for apprehending Cbofroes, if it was possible; and when he found that all his caution in this c respect was vain and fruitless, he turned his thoughts to the securing the frontier garisons, and the most considerable cities in Persia, in which he had better success. He likewise gave great feasts, and very bountifully bestowed that treasure he had so easily obtained; yet in the midst of all this pomp and splendor, he saw with concern, that the nobility were greatly dissatisfied, and the people not to be relied on. He could not however either extinguish or contain the violent desire he had to be a king. On a religious festival therefore, when of course there was a grand assembly of the nobility at the palace, he took upon him to use the royal ornaments and furniture with all the state of a monarch, though he forbore the title with reluctance. The Persian nobility seeing clearly what he intended, and disdaining to become the subjects d of one born their equal, they began to cabal together, in order to concert measures for emancipating themselves and their country, and for restoring the ancient lustre of the Persian empire. In their conferences upon this subject, it was unanimously agreed, that Bindoes was the most proper person to conduct an affair of this kind; and therefore they immediately delivered him out of prison, and acknowledged him for their chief. By his advice they came to a resolution to attack Varamus in the palace in the dead time of the night. This they performed with great courage; but Varamus and his attendants defending themselves gallantly, the engagement was very obstinate; and at last the nobility were vanquished, many of them being slain upon the spot, and the rest thrown to the elephants; only Bindoes, with a few who fought about his e person, escaped, and marching towards Media, endeavoured to raise forces for Cbofroes.

AFTER this victory, Varamus thought fit to send ambassadors to court the friendship of the Roman emperor Mauritius; but they were sent back without answer, the emperor having already made a treaty with Cbofroes, and having ordered the governors of his frontier provinces to furnish him with whatever might be necessary for his restoration. These timely supplies had a proper effect; for the Persians, seeing their king now in a condition to protect them, began almost every-where to acknowledge him, and to open their gates to receive his forces. Among the rest, Nisibis submitted to the king, and Martyropolis was recovered by the Romans, to whom likewise Cbofroes himself f delivered Sittas the architect, who had betrayed the place to his father Hormisdas, for which traiterous act he was now burnt alive. On the other hand, Varamus continued to raise forces, chusing rather to hazard all things, in order to make himself a prince, than to descend again to the condition of a private man. The christian writers suggest, that Cbofroes, during his distress, seemed to abandon the religion of the magi; and not only worshipped God after the christian manner, but also vowed to dedicate a cross of pure gold in the church of a certain martyr, in case he proved victorious against his enemy. Zadesprates, one of Varamus's commanders, having attempted to enter the quarters of one of the lords who had declared for Chosroes, was defeated, ^a and put to death, and his head, and the spoils of his army, sent to the king. The same fate had Anatbonus very shortly after, of which Chosroes advised the emperor his protector by Sarames, one of the principal lords of his party; by whom likewise he signified, that Comentiolus was very backward in assisting him in the recovery of his dominions; whereupon the emperor sent an order, forbidding that general to meddle any more in the king of Persia's affairs, appointing at the same time Narfes to have the command of the Roman auxiliaries destined to the service of the Persian king ^a.

Drives the rebels, and settles himself on the throne.

^b This was very grateful to Chosroes, who early the next spring, with his own forces, and those lent him by the emperor, under the command of Narfes, marched into Persia with an intent to decide the war at once. Most of the frontier places on his approach rendered to Chosroes, as did the great and strong city Dara, formerly the chief bulwark of the Romans on this side. Chosroes in testimony of his sincere gratitude, and cordial affection towards the emperor Mauritius, determined to deliver it into his hands. About the same time the Persian king received from his protector a tiara, richly set with jewels, golden household utensils of all sorts, and a chosen guard to attend upon his person. When the emperor learned that Dara was given up to him, he was so well pleased with the conduct of Chosroes, that he honoured him with the title of his son. In the mean time the Persians, in great multitudes, quitted the service of Varamus, and went to serve under the banners of their prince, who now sought to bring Varamus to a battle. Before this could be brought to pass, several skirmishes happened, and among the rest one, in which Beyzacius, a great officer in the army of Varamus, was taken prisoner; and after his nose and ears were cut off, brought to their king by the Persians, by whose command he was soon after put to death. A short space after, Seleucia, and most of the great cities near the river Eufrates, submitted to the king, and Varamus was forced to retire, and to avoid fighting. His army consisted of about forty thousand men, whereas the Romans and Persians under the command of Chosroes were upwards of sixty thousand. The former, however, often attempted to fall upon the latter in the night, but were prevented through the vigilance of the Roman officers; sometimes also they presented themselves in the field by day, so disposed, as if they intended immediately to give battle; and after harassing and fatiguing the confederates, withdrew at last into their camp. ^c The Roman officers all this time had much ado to restrain the ardor of Chosroes, who was always for attacking the enemy, though on disadvantageous terms. At last, however, an opportunity offered, and the Roman officers consenting, he attacked the army of Varamus, defeated it, and took six thousand prisoners, most of whom he ordered to be put to the sword, or to be thrown to his elephants. The very tent of Varamus was taken, with all his golden furniture, which the Romans presented to Chosroes, who on the other hand, attributed all his success to them, and chose a thousand of them for his body guard, and in every other respect did all he could to testify his gratitude towards them. Chosroes likewise took this opportunity to send to the church of Sergius ^e the martyr the golden cross, set with jewels, which he had vowed, and with it one taken away by Chosroes the son of Cavadas, together with a letter, which is still extant in the history written by Theophylact (D). Chosroes also married a christian woman,

(D) Evagrius, the ecclesiastical historian, assures us, that Chosroes sent back to Gregory, bishop of Antioch, a cross of gold enriched with precious stones, which had been taken out of the church of Sergius the martyr by his grandfather Chosroes, and that he also sent therewith another cross of gold with the following inscription: "It fell out, that when I Chosroes, king of kings, son of Hormisdas, was obliged by the criminal infidelity of the accursed Varamus, and certain troops of horse, who adhered to him, to fly for safety to the Romans, and that I sent some troops of my cavalry to the city of Carcas, under the command of a certain officer, to traverse the designs of the accursed Zadespras, who was come from Nisibis with an intent to debauch the troops I had in that city from my service, I having heard that the most celebrated

"martyr Sergius granted to every one, who sought his protection, whatsoever on their parts was desired, besought him on the seventh day of January, in the first year of my reign, to grant me victory against Zadespras, promising, that in case my troops either killed that rebel, or took him alive, that I would give to his church a cross of gold, enriched with precious stones. On the ninth day of the month of February the troops of horse I had dispatched against him returned, and presented me with the head of Zadespras. Having obtained my petition, and being willing to give the most public as well as sincere marks of gratitude and thankfulness, I have sent to his church this cross, which I caused to be made on purpose, together with one given by the emperor Justinian, and taken by my grandfather Chosroes the son of Cavadas, which

"I found

- a woman, whose name was Sira, and honoured her with the title of queen, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Persian laws, shewing on all occasions such favour to the christians, that many were of opinion he himself was that way inclined; though in a few years after, he gave the strongest demonstrations, not only of his zealous attachment to the religion of his ancestors, but of his peculiar aversion to the faith of Christ ^b.

- FROM the moment he was settled on his throne, he laid aside the foreign customs he had hitherto made use of to ingratiate himself with the Romans, and put on the state and behaviour of a Persian prince, as if he had never experienced what adversity was. The Roman general Narjes intimated to him, before he left his dominions, the vast obligations he was under to the emperor Maurice, and to the Roman people, whose power that general highly magnified, and spoke of them as lords of the universe. Chosroes modestly answered, that he was very sensible of the kindness shewed him by the emperor; but as to the Roman power, he predicted so exactly its declension and destruction, that the Greek writers will needs have it Chosroes was a great astrologer, and drew his knowledge of future events from the skill he had in that science. As to his own subjects, Chosroes treated them with great rigour, or, as others phrase it, with unreasonable severity; he prosecuted without mercy all such as had any share either in the favour, or in the government, while Varamus held the supreme power. By this method he quite extinguished that faction, and by restoring the ancient Persian constitution, he aggrandized himself so as to become terrible to his neighbours; whence it came to pass, that the barbarous prince, with whom Varamus had sheltered himself, and who had at first thoughts of lending him troops to invade Persia, began to grow so apprehensive of the vengeance of Chosroes, that he ordered his competitor to be poisoned ^c.

- WHEN the Persian monarch found all things quiet at home, and himself at leisure to lay hold of any advantages that might offer, he began to threaten the Roman provinces on account of the excursions made by the Saracens into his dominions, by the encouragement, as he pretended, of the Roman generals, who commanded on the frontiers. When the emperor Maurice, whose affairs were already in disorder, was informed of this, he sent ambassadors to Chosroes to set this matter in a true light, and to prevent, if possible, a war on this side, which he knew, as things were circumstanced, could not but be fatal to the empire. On the arrival of the Roman ambassadors, Chosroes treated them but indifferently, suffered them to remain a long time at court without an audience. At last, he who was at the head of the embassy, took an opportunity of speaking to the king, and after a short recapitulation of the favours done him by the Romans, he proceeded to shew the weakness of the grounds Chosroes pretended to have for making war, and the injustice of such a proceeding towards his benefactor; which free representation so affected Chosroes, that far from taking it amiss, he told the ambassador, whatever causes he might have for the measures he meant to take, he would for the present lay aside his resentment for his sake; and thus for this time war was prevented ^d.

- IT was not long, however, before a fresh opportunity offered for the gratifying the ambition of the Persian. This was the murder of Maurice the emperor by Phocas, an impiety which filled the Roman empire with blood shed and confusion, and gave at the same time Chosroes a fair opportunity of taking arms under colour of revengeing the death of his protector and father; for so he was wont to call the emperor Maurice. In vain did Phocas, by his ambassador Bilius, endeavour to appease him with large presents, and larger promises; he regarded neither; but having sent a rude

"I found deposited among my treasures" (70). There is another pompous inscription in the history cited below; but this is sufficient to shew the hypocrisy of Chosroes, who afterwards declared himself the open enemy of Christ, and of christians, not only by persecuting them in his own dominions, but by endeavouring to oblige the Greeks to quit that religion, the principles of which induced them to set him upon the throne of his fathers. We shall hereafter see, that he had reason to say with the emperor Julian, Vicisti ô Galilæ!

answer to Phocas's letters by a messenger of his own, threw the ambassador into prison, ^a making all the preparations possible for entering speedily the Roman frontiers. At first he gave out, that he had no other view than revenging the murder of Maurice, and restoring the empire to his family; but this soon appeared to be only a pretence, since the king refused to send assistance to Narjes, who at this time had taken arms against Phocas. The true intent with which Chosroes made war was the enlarging his own dominions, while the Romans were divided, and in no condition to resist him. In his first campaign he met with some trouble, the Roman troops endeavouring to make the best defence they could; but their general being slain, and themselves indifferently supplied, he at length triumphed over them, and laid all the frontiers under contribution. In the seventeenth year of his reign, he continued the war, and reduced ^b several fortresses. The next year he recovered the strong city of Dara, plundered all Mesopotamia and Syria, and carried off such immense riches, that no computation could be made of them. In his nineteenth year he passed the Euphrates, ravaged Syria, Palestine, and part of Phœnicia, wasting all places, where-ever he came, with fire and sword. The year following, his general Cardaregas wasted Armenia and Cappadocia, defeated the Roman army with a great slaughter, and then meeting no opposition, destroyed Galatia, Paphlagonia, and all the country as far as Chalcedon, burning cities, and putting people to death without any respect to sex or age ^c.

Makes a rapid conquest of its principal provinces.

In the two and twentieth year of his reign, Chosroes took Apamea and Edeffa, and blocked up Antioch. This induced the Romans to hazard a battle, though they were much inferior in strength; wherein they were so totally defeated, that it is said the Persians scarce left any to mourn the death of their companions. The year following he took Cæsarea, and carried away myriads of people into captivity. Syria had in the next campaign the same fate that Cappadocia felt in this. In his twenty-fifth year, Chosroes made himself master of Damascus, to which city the emperor Heracius sent ambassadors, beseeching him to have mercy upon his subjects, and supplicating a peace on any terms he would impose; but Chosroes would not afford his ambassador so much as an answer. The year following he conquered Judæa, took and plundered the city of Jerusalem, carried away the cross on which Christ suffered, and the patriarch Zacharias, into Persia. In this campaign he sold ninety thousand christians for slaves to the Jews in his dominions, who, out of their wonted humanity, cut every one of their ^d throats. These vast conquests served only to increase the ambition of the Persian, and to swell his imagination with mighty ideas of his own power; insomuch that in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, he made an expedition into Egypt, and having divided his forces, with one part of his army he took Alexandria, and subdued all the country towards Libya, while the other was employed in the reduction of the Upper Egypt; wherein he pushed his conquests to the very frontiers of Ethiopia; adding thus the empire of Afric to that of Asia, executing in the space of a few years what all his ancestors from Artaxerxes had been so long endeavouring at in vain. The year following he once more turned his forces against the Constantinopolitan empire, and that with such success, that he reduced the city of Chalcedon, which he had long blocked up. ^e The remaining part of that year, and all the next, was employed in thoroughly subduing and regulating in all respects the government of the conquered provinces. As for the emperor Heracius, incapable of resisting, and at the same time extremely afflicted at the sight of the horrible cruelties every-where practised by the Persians, he resolved once more to make an effort towards obtaining peace. With this view he sent deputies to Chosroes, with instructions to lay before him the miserable condition of Asia, the deplorable consequences of continuing the war any longer, and the earnest desire that himself had to purchase quiet upon any terms. To all this Chosroes made a very short and plain answer; that he would never spare the subjects of Heracius, or grant him peace, till he and they abjured their crucified God, and embraced the religion of the Persians ^f.

Forces the emperor Heracius to take up arms.

In the thirty-first year of his reign, Chosroes besieged and reduced the city of Ancyra in Galatia, and prepared against the next year to carry his conquests farther. Indeed, there was no probability that any check could be put to them, the emperor being so embarrassed in Europe by other barbarous enemies, that he was only able to lament, without having it at all in his power to remedy, the mischiefs suffered by his subajects in Asia. Yet when things were come to this extremity, and nothing could be more apparent, than that Chosroes intended the utter destruction of his monarchy, Heraclius determined to put all to the hazard, and having granted his enemies in Europe what terms they thought fit, began to make the necessary dispositions for turning the whole of his force, such as it was, upon the Persians. This happened in the thirty-second year of the reign of Chosroes, who, far from being displeased, rejoiced at this news, believing that it would afford him the opportunity he had so long sought of conquering all the Roman dominions, without appearing to make war on an unarmed and defenceless people. After Easter, in the succeeding year, the emperor Heraclius marched with all his forces towards the frontiers of his empire. Sarbanazas at that time commanded the Persian forces, and lay incamped in Armenia, where he was every day committing new outrages, having nothing else in view but the amassing money, and plundering the helpless inhabitants of what little they had left. On the approach of the Roman army the Persian general sent out spies to discover its strength; and on their report that it was very numerous, and that the emperor Heraclius had inflamed his men with a sort of religious enthusiasm, he thought it expedient to recal his parties, and to intrench his forces on the summit of a hill, where they could not be attacked, but at a great disadvantage. This he did, supposing that the emperor could not long keep the field, especially in that season. But in this he was mistaken, as he was afterwards in his notion of breaking through the Roman army, which he attempted in the night, but without success. At last, weary of being besieged, he determined at all events to fight. This resolution once taken, he divided his army into three bodies, and attacked the Roman camp in as many different places. Heraclius, who had previous intelligence of what the Persian general intended, suffered the Persians to prevail in every one of their attempts. By this means he effectually divided them, and then falling upon the rear of each corps, cut the far greatest part of them to pieces. This victory was so far from making Heraclius elate, that it served only to encourage him to make new propositions of peace and friendship to the Persians, which were received, as all the former were, that is, with the utmost contempt and indignation.

Chosroes, to repair the mistakes of his former general, appointed Sais, a noble Persian, to command in chief a more numerous army than that which had been defeated the last spring; and to make all things secure, when the season for action drew on, Sarbanazas was sent again to the army with a considerable reinforcement; nay, the king himself went thither soon after in person. However, Heraclius did not fail pressing as hard upon this army, as he did upon that which he had defeated in Armenia; and the Persians, wearied with long service, and corrupted through their neglect of discipline, gave such evident tokens of timidity, when the enemy drew near, and had skirmished against them with some success, that Chosroes thought it high time to provide for the safety of his person; which he did by leaving the army, and thereby increased the general consternation so much, that the Persians were quickly after totally defeated (E). It is said, that no less than fifty thousand persons were taken

(E) There cannot at first sight be any thing more surprising, than this sudden extinction of the Persian power in less than twenty years after it had been carried to a greater height by Chosroes the second, than it had ever attained since the demise of Alexander the Great. A little attention however to the facts preceding this destruction of the Persian empire, will lead us to a satisfactory account of its causes. From the death of Chosroes the Great the minds of the people had never been thoroughly settled. At the very beginning of the reign of Hormisdas, they were prejudiced against his government by the strange measures he took, and the infamous company of diviners, forcerers, and necromancers, that he kept about him. During the time that Varanus was at the head of affairs, who, by the way, is by some authors reckoned one of the kings of Persia, things went still in a worse channel. His title to the crown was very indifferent; and therefore, to support it, he first lavished immense sums among the nobles; but finding this method unsuccessful, he had recourse to its contrary; that is to say, he oppressed the nobility, and turned the streams of his bounty on the lowest sort of people. This answered his purpose better; but it made the condition of the Persians much worse, by spreading the poison of corruption through the mass of the people. The severity of Chosroes, or rather his cruelty, kept up a constant spirit of disaffection, which all his numerous conquests could not allay; though these served to waste his veteran troops, and to exhaust Persia of able men to such a degree, that it was with great difficulty, and not without having recourse to the harshest methods, that he set armies on foot, sufficient to struggle with the Romans, as he did; and yet these struggles put the last hand to the exhausting of Persia, and left it in a deplorable condition, when Siroes came to the crown. If that prince had lived, he would, in all probability, have restored the lustre of the Persian diadem. As it was, he only procured taken prisoners by Heraclius, who when he found it impracticable to maintain them, first distributed amongst them all that could be possibly spared them, and then gave them their liberties, whereby he gained great reputation. Chosroes now found it necessary to exert his utmost strength, and having in the winter gathered as great a number of forces as he possibly could, he sent them under the command of Sarablagas and Perozites, two of his best general officers, into Albania. He likewise took care to recruit his other army in Armenia, and when he understood that the emperor Heraclius was determined to penetrate into the Persian dominions, he sent orders to his forces in Armenia to advance behind the Romans, as they pressed upon the grand army in Albania. This scheme, as it was well contrived, so it was also faithfully and exactly executed; infomuch that the emperor found himself in the deepest distress, and in all probability would have perished with all his army, if the Persian generals had not been jealous of each other, which tempted them to engage the Romans separately; an act of rashness so apparent, that it revived the drooping courage of Heraclius's soldiers, and was the chief cause of gaining such a victory, as left not a Persian officer of distinction at liberty; so that Heraclius was forced to release one of his prisoners to carry the news of the defeat. After this the inhabitants of Albania rose upon the Persians, so that they were obliged totally to abandon Albania, where the Romans wintered^b.

THE two succeeding years the war was carried on in the same way, and with the same success; that is to say, Chosroes made prodigious efforts, which yet were altogether ineffectual, or rather served to increase the power and reputation of Heraclius, who was alike successful in pitched battles, and in long and painful expeditions. For his soldiers, flushed with conquests, and fully persuaded that victory attended them on account of the justice of their cause, and the strictness of their discipline, made no scruple of undertaking whatever the emperor commanded. In this manner he penetrated into Assyria, passed the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, after routing several times the Persian armies, which endeavoured to obstruct his passage. In the mean time Chosroes abated nothing either of his cruelty, or of his haughtiness. The christian churches he plundered throughout his dominions, and compelled all such of his subjects as had embraced the faith, to profess themselves Nestorians. He exhausted likewise all his provinces, in order to form new armies to oppose Heraclius, who defeated them as soon as he met them in the field, proceeding so rapidly in his conquests, that Chosroes saw himself obliged to abandon two of his palaces, burning the rich furniture he could not carry away, and with his wives and concubines to fly first to Ctesiphon, and then to Seleucia. There he received intelligence that his general Sarbarus corresponded with the Romans; which, though a calumny, he easily gave into, and in consequence thereof, dispatched orders to his colleague then before Chalcedon to put him to death, and to march his army back into Persia. The courier, who carried this order, being taken by the emperor's party, they opened his letters, and having read them, sent them to the general, who was intended to be cut off. He, by interpolating these orders, signified the pleasure of Chosroes, that four hundred officers of distinction should be put to death with him, and then caused them to be delivered to his colleague. On the reading these dispatches, the whole army was in a tumult, and great numbers began openly to cry out, that Chosroes was unworthy to reign. Among these, Gundabunas, a principal officer, made the greatest figure; who, to secure himself from the resentment of so blood thirsty a prince, retired with a considerable body of men to the camp of the emperor, where he remained in safety^c.

Attempts to alter the succession, and is deposed.

AGE, fatigue, and sorrow, having by this time much weakened Chosroes, he began to think of settling the succession; but, as he had ever acted on very odd principles, so now, out of some pique to his eldest son Siroes, he determined to transfer the crown to Merdasas, the youngest of his sons. This scheme of his could not be long kept a secret, and therefore, as soon as it reached the ears of Siroes, he immediately projected to hinder it from being carried into execution. With this view he entered into a correspondence with Gundabunas, who, as was observed, remained in the emperor's procured recruits, by the exchange of prisoners, sufficient to keep up such an army, as enabled his general to destroy his family, and to seal the ruin of his empire. The last monarch had visibly no force capable of opposing the mighty armies of the Saracens; therefore we must look on the battles he fought as the last efforts of a languishing people. From whence it follows, that though they might be brisk and vigorous, yet they could not be either lasting or effectual.

- a camp with a body of Persian troops. The issue of this negotiation was, that application was made to the emperor Heraclius to increase the forces under the command of Gundabunas, by setting at liberty the Persian prisoners, on a promise that Siroes would instantly put himself at the head of that army, and march against his father. This proposition was no sooner made than accepted; and, as all the parties concerned therein were alike interested in its speedy execution, all things were quickly ready, and Siroes in a condition to perform his part of the agreement, which he did very effectually. As for Chosroes, his tyranny had rendered him so hateful, that, as he wanted an army to support him, he was not only disappointed in its fidelity, but also found himself so destitute of friends, that to escape appeared as impracticable as to resist. In a word, he was seized by his own soldiers, imprisoned, and deposed by his own son, when he had reigned thirty-nine years. We shall quickly see, that these were but the beginnings of his misfortunes ^k.

- Siroes* having assumed the regal dignity during the life-time of his father, and while he was a prisoner, as his father had done in prejudice to his grandfather Hormisdas, began instantly to endeavour the rectifying those miscarriages, which had brought the flourishing kingdom of Persia into so miserable a condition. In the first place, he ordered his father should have his legs, arms, and neck, loaded with chains, and that he should be exposed in the dungeon, where he lay to all the scoffs and insults of an incensed unthinking populace. These, forgetting the indelible majesty of kings, upbraided him with his insatiable avarice, reproached him with his present abject condition, telling him, that as he had acted like the common enemy of mankind, and the peculiar curse of the Persian people, he now justly tasted that bitter cup, of which he had made whole nations drink, and was deservedly degraded from a throne to a dungeon, who, while he sat on his throne, had filled all the dungeons in his dominions. Five days he languished in this miserable way, having only bread and water allowed him for a subsistence; then his beloved son Merdasas, whom he would have raised to the throne in prejudice to Siroes, was put to death before his face, together with his other sons. After all this, and sustaining a fresh load of indignities, Siroes gave orders that he should be shot with arrows, and left to expire of his wounds ^l. Of all these severities, as well as of the cruel death of his father, Siroes advised the emperor Heraclius by letter, desiring his friendship, and that the league between their empires might be perpetual. As a proof of his sincerity in all his promises, he set the patriarch of Jerusalem, Zacharias, at liberty, and sent him, together with the holy cross, back into Palestine, well attended, and with rich presents. On the other hand, Heraclius received the Persian ambassadors with great kindness, and readily embraced the peace offered him by their master. The next year, in consequence of this league, all the Persians, who were prisoners in any part of the Roman dominions, were set at liberty; and notwithstanding they were many thousands in number, yet in their return to their own country, no ill accident happened; so soon were those nations reconciled, who were inveterate enemies so long. But as there is not any thing so precarious as human happiness, while on the one hand the Romans, and on the other the Persians, promised themselves nothing but peace, plenty, and mutual good offices, from the union which subsisted between their princes; all their hopes were blasted by the death of Siroes, when he had reigned little more than a year, and had scarce effaced, by his mildness towards his subjects, the terror arising from his unnatural treatment of his father ^m.

- Ardeser* the son of Siroes, according to the Greek writers, succeeded his father. They might as well have called him Artaxerxes, since the name they give him is only a corruption of that Persian appellation, which the ancient Greeks, to accommodate it to their own way of speaking, changed into Artaxerxes. We may be indulged this criticism on names, where we have little to say of things. This hapless prince was but seven years old when he was set upon a throne, where he remained but seven months, before he was barbarously murdered by the command of Sarbarazas, who had commanded the armies of Chosroes his grandfather. This ambitious man had still the chief command of the troops, when Siroes died. He thereupon pretended a right of being consulted, before the son of his master was exalted to the throne of his ancestors; and on Sarbarazas, or, as some authors call him, Sarbaras, having seized the diadem stained with blood, found himself immediately involved in new crimes to keep it on his head. An opposite faction had set up Bornarim, a prince of the blood-royal, who for six or seven months had the shadow of royalty, and then lost it, together with his life, leaving the throne once more empty to this Sarbarazas. He held it now about six months, but always in fear, the friends of the royal family, and especially a sister of the deceased Artaxerxes, endeavouring, all that in their power lay, to disturb his reign. These contrivances broke at last out into several insurrections, till the flame of civil war caught almost every province in the kingdom, and all Persia ^b began to swim with the blood of its inhabitants. This opened the eyes of the nobility, who now clearly saw that peace could never be restored whilst this usurper lived. They therefore made choice of the nephew of Siroes, the son of the only one of his brothers, who escaped his rage, when he put his father to death; and having once determined to raise this young prince to the throne, they opened him a passage to it by the death of Sarbarazas, the implacable enemy of his family ^c.

Isdigertes.

Hormisdas, or, as most writers call him, Isdigertes, was by this means raised to the regal dignity, as well by the free election of the people, as in consequence of his right of descent. He did not however enjoy the kingdom long, I may say, scarce at all, in quiet; for by the time that the domestic stir of the late factions in Persia were ^c thoroughly quelled, he found a new and most formidable enemy ready to over-run his country. These were the Saracens under the conduct of the successors of Mohammed. We shall elsewhere treat expressly of these people, their religion, government, and exploits. At present, we shall only remark on such circumstances of their affairs, as have a connection with their conquest of Persia, concerning which we have very different accounts from the several Greek writers, who have mentioned it. Some report, that the emperor Heraclius had a great body of Saracens in his army, when he invaded the Persian dominions; and that after the peace was made, they on their return home, inflamed their countrymen with a desire of making themselves masters of so pleasant a country, as this of Persia was represented to be. Others affirm, that Mohammed ^d himself, when he was thoroughly settled in his principality, made an irruption into Persia in the days of Chosroes; but that this monarch, with the assistance of the Turks, totally defeated the Saracen army, after a very long and very obstinate engagement, which so far broke their spirits, that they did not renew the war till now. But the general opinion is, that the Saracens did not invade Persia till after the reduction of Jerusalem, and that then the war lasted some time, and with variety of success. Some authors represent Hormisdas or Isdigertes as an effeminate and indolent prince, while others again assert, that he defended his country with the utmost intrepidity, till after various defeats the spirits of the Persians were intirely broken; nay, some say, that he was himself killed in the field. However, there appears to be no just cause for ^e censuring either the courage or conduct of this prince, unless it was criminal in him to be unfortunate. He was the last of the line of Artaxerxes, who sat upon the Persian throne; and with him fell that empire, which had subsisted with so much glory for upwards of four hundred years P (F).

(F) As at the opening of this period, we endeavoured in a note to point out the advantages the reader would receive from the method pursued therein, so we judged it necessary to close it, by briefly exhibiting a view of those deficiencies, which have made the following section, not only expedient, but necessary. In the first place, as we have confined ourselves therein to the materials furnished us by the Greek authors, the reader must necessarily observe many wide chasms in the narration, occasioned either by the ignorance or carelessness of the Greek historians, as to such affairs of their neighbours, as did not immediately concern themselves. Secondly, the judicious peruser must have observed very imperfect accounts of very important transactions, and not a few, which carry in themselves the strongest appearances of falshood. These defects flow from the same cause, and there was a necessity of suffering this part of the history to appear in this dress, that the reader might know in what light the Greek writers set these transactions. Thirdly, the proper names, titles of honour, wars and conquests of the Persians, are so disfigured by the mistakes of the authors, from whom we were obliged to take our accounts, that if we had published them alone, they must have tended rather to the propagating of error, than of knowledge; since it is better to know nothing, than to apprehend we know what we know not. All these deficiencies, misrepresentations, and mistakes, will be supplied and corrected in the following history; which will effectually demonstrate the great use of studying the oriental writers, hitherto much neglected, and which is stranger, still despised amongst us.

- ^a THE total subversion of so great a monarchy in so short a space must appear somewhat wonderful in our eyes, who are accustomed to see provinces defended for a much longer time, than was taken up by the Saracens in the conquest of Persia; but we ought to consider, that the successors of Mohammed led vast armies of a needy starving people, who fought for new habitations, and who easily settled themselves in the countries they subdued. In this empire of Persia especially, they had no sooner defeated Isdigerdes, than they began immediately to canton out his dominions, and to make as exact a survey of them, as the Conqueror did of our country, when he framed what we call the doom's day book; such a record, and for the same purposes, being taken here. Besides, the Persian prince, as the best authors assure us, though he laid aside the ensigns of majesty, after the great defeat he had received, yet he sheltered himself in one of the distant provinces of his empire, and died there about the year 640 or 642. As to the condition of the native Persians since, we need not wonder that it hath been always very abject and depressed, since nothing can be more visible, than that it hath been the chief maxim amongst all Mohammedan conquerors, without exception, to break the spirits, and exhaust the substance of the natives of all the countries which fall under their dominion. This they were particularly led to do in Persia, on account of the difference in religion between them and the natives. At this time the Saracens were not only rude and barbarous, but a furious and enthusiastic people; they were therefore incapable of distinguishing the true doctrines of the magian sect, or of reclaiming, by gentle means, those whom they conceived to be idolaters. They therefore persecuted the natives through a misguided zeal, and having stamped on them opprobrious names, transmitted to their posterity the same brutal disposition which they had exercised themselves, as will be shewn in the following, and in several other sections.

The history of the Persians, from their recovering the empire, to their being subdued by the Arabs.

According to the oriental historians.

- ^a THE wide difference there is between the histories of eastern nations, as written by European authors, and by their own, obliged us originally to distinguish the history of Persia into two sections; the first, according to the former; the second, consonant to the memoirs furnished us by the latter. When we last treated of this subject from the oriental authors, we ended with the conquest of the Persian dominions, by Esfander, or Alexander the Great^a. In order therefore to connect this period with that, it is necessary, previous to our account of the kings, who succeeded Ardshir-Babegan or Artaxares, to speak of those who reigned in the intermediate space, between the death of Alexander, and the accession of the before-mentioned Artaxares. The former part of our history contained the succession of the Persian kings of the two first dynasties, and the third dynasty is called by the oriental writers Molouk-al-Thaouaif, i. e. The kings of the nations. In order to have a just idea of the sense and meaning of this term, we must observe, that the word Molouk signifies kings, and that all the oriental historians assure us, there were in the courts of the ancient kings of Persia Aulud-Molouk-Fars, i. e. Children of the Persian kings, or princes of the blood, who were honoured with the chief governments, and when they resided in them, lived like princes. When therefore the captains of Alexander the Great cantoned all his conquests among themselves, and set themselves up for so many independent princes, the eastern writers gave to this new race of monarchs the general title of Molouk al Thaouaif, or kings of the nations^b. Some however of the Persian writers incline rather to call this the dynasty of the vizers, and it must be allowed, that it is by far the darkest and least intelligible period of the Persian history, according to the orientals. This however is no reason, that, like some modern historians, we should hurry over it, and leave it just as dark as we found it; had the great men of the last century been of this lazy disposition, all ancient, nay, and all modern history, had been a chaos. But to proceed, some of the writers of the Persian history split this dynasty into two, and consequently call them the third and fourth dynasties of the Persian kings: the first they distinguish by the name of Ascbkaniens: the latter, by that of Ascbganides. To the first they allow twelve kings, who, according to them, reigned altogether one hundred and sixty-five years. Of the second race, they say, there were eight kings, and that they reigned altogether one hundred and fifty years. The truth seems to be, that these two dynasties were invented to fill up the time between the death of Alexander, and the commencement of the fifth dynasty. Our opinion therefore is, that the Ascbkaniens and Ascbganides are in fact one and the same succession, and no other than that called by the Latin writers Arfacida; Ascbek, whom the eastern writers make the first monarch of this house, being, as we believe, no other than Arfaces the first of the Parthian kings. But as the proof of this proposition, and the shortest detail possible of the princes of this family, would exceedingly embarrass the thread of our narration, the reader will find what we have farther to say on this point in a note. In the mean time we will pass on to the proper subject of this section: The history of the fourth dynasty of the Persian kings, distinguished by the name of Sassanians (A).

(A) The design of this note is to give a short account of the Parthian kingdom from the oriental historians. Previous to this, it is necessary to observe, that though it is an error of a very old date, and an error universally embraced by all the Latin and Greek writers, yet it is still an error, to suppose that there was any real distinction between the Parthians and the Persians. Therefore, notwithstanding the titles of the three last sections, in which, for the sake of conforming to the received history of these times, we have admitted this distinction, yet here we give our readers notice, that it is groundless in itself, and took birth from the ignorance of the western writers, who would make distinct kingdoms of two provinces in the same kingdom.

Khondemir, the Persian historian, very wisely makes but one dynasty of the kings who succeeded after Alexander to the accession of Artaxares. The first of these was Ascbek, or rather Arfach, who is the same with Arfaces. He is said to have been descended from Darius the last king of Persia, and to have taken thence his claim to the throne. He revolted therefore from Antiochus, whom the oriental writers call Anthakash, or rather from the Seleucids his successors, about the year 248 before Christ, in the third year of the hundred and thirty-second olympiad, and from the building of Rome the five hundred and third.

To him succeeded Ascbek the second, whom the Greeks also called Arfaces; but how long he reigned, we find not.

Schabour succeeded his father Ascbek, and was the first of that name who governed Persia. He was surnamed Padischahi Buzurk, that is, The Great King, because he recovered the treasures of the ancient Persian monarchs from the Greeks, and brought them back to the royal palaces at Susa and Persepolis. He reigned fifteen years, and was succeeded by his grandson.

Baharam I. This word is properly the name of the planet we call Mars. The monarch of whom we speak ruled eleven years, and then left the throne to be filled by,

Balas. He governed eleven years likewise, and was succeeded by Fironz, which, in the Persian language signifies, good luck, or victory. He was a very gallant prince, and we meet with various particulars relating to his reign in the eastern histories. Of these the most remarkable is, his discovering, as he was hunting, a cave, wherein Feridoun, one of the ancient Persian monarchs, had buried a great quantity of gold and silver, which Fironz took from thence, and made use of in paying his soldiers. He held the kingdom nineteen years, and then left it to his brother.

Narzi or Narzes, a warlike prince, who made very considerable conquests on the side of Tartary. He held the sceptre fourteen years, and then transmitted it to his nephew.

Fironz II. who was the son of Fironz I. who, after governing seventeen years, incurred some way or other the displeasure of his subjects, and lost his life by a conspiracy. To him succeeded his son.

Balas II. Of whom we find nothing remarkable; only we are told, that he reigned twelve years. He had for his successor

Ardevan, whom the Latins and Greeks call Artabanus. Some writers, as we apprehend, give this prince the title of Khosrow, which, amongst the Persian princes, was both a proper name and a surname; whence hath sprung great confusion. This prince governed thirteen years, and by such of the oriental historians as divide the successors of Alexander into two dynasties, he is held to be the last of the first. He was succeeded by

Ascbek III. but how long he governed is uncertain. Some authors report, that he was descended from the ancient kings of the second dynasty. There are others however who affirm, that he was of the same family with his predecessors, who, instead of Parthians, were Armenians by birth, and only made choice of Parthia for the seat of their empire, because it was in the heart of their dominions. After him reigned

Chosroes II. his son, who governed the empire for twelve years in peace. The eastern writers place the birth of our Saviour under his reign. He was succeeded by

Balas III. his son, or his grandson, the time of whose reign is uncertain; but he left the throne to his son.

Gudarez, who performed nothing of note, but after reigning twenty-one years, left the throne vacant to his son Narzi or Narzes the second.

This Narzes II. was a very warlike prince, and made great conquests in Khorassan, governed with great reputation twenty years, and then left the crown to Narzes III. who reigned ten years, and extended his father's conquests. He was succeeded by

A TABLE of the fourth dynasty of the Persian kings called Sassaniens or Khosronians, according to the Persian historian Khondemir.

- I. Ardeschir Ben Babek or Babegan, who reigned fourteen years after the defeat of Ardevan, the last king of the third dynasty.
- II. Schabour Ben Ardeschir, who reigned thirty-one years.
- III. Hormouz Ben Schabour, who also reigned thirty-one years.
- IV. Babaram Ben Hormouz, who reigned three years and three months.
- V. Babaram Ben Babaram, who reigned seventy years.
- b VI. Babaram Ben Babaram, Ben Babaram, who reigned thirty years and four months.
- VII. Narfi Ben Babaram, who reigned nine years.
- VIII. Hormouz Ben Narfi reigned seven years and five months.
- IX. Schabour Dboulaktbas, who reigned seventy-two years.
- X. Ardeschir, grandson to Hormouz Ben Narfi, who reigned four years.
- XI. Schabour Ben Schabour Dboulaktbas, who reigned near five years.
- XII. Babaram Ben Schabour, surnamed Kerman Schab, who reigned thirteen years.
- XIII. Jezdegerd' Al Atbim, or, The Wicked, who reigned twenty-one years.
- c XIV. Babaram Gour Ben Jezdegerd, who reigned twenty-three years.
- XV. Jezdegerd Ben Babaram Gour, who reigned eighteen years.
- XVI. Hormouz Ben Jezdegerd, who reigned one year.

THOUGH we have followed Khondemir exactly in this table of the Persian kings, yet we do not conceive ourselves bound to submit always to his authority in our subsequent history. We followed him in the table, because he is more consistent and exact in his list of kings than any other writer; but in respect of facts, we must take the liberty of dissenting from him, as often as probability and better authority than his

Ardevan II. who governed long, and in whose days idolatry, or rather polytheism, after the Greek manner, became the prevailing religion of the east. He is said to have had for his successor

Ardevan III. who, after a reign of twenty-three years, was defeated and slain, as we have shewn in the text, by Ardeschir Babegan (1). To have attempted the reconciling all these names and dates to the accounts given us by the Greek and Latin writers, would have required a volume, and perhaps nothing of certainty would have resulted from such an attempt at last. A very learned German hath taken a great deal of pains in this way, whose work the inquisitive may consult (2). Our business was to make this note an introduction to the following history, by connecting it to the last period of the Persian affairs, according to the oriental writers; and this being effected, our end is answered.

shall require it. This being premised, we proceed to speak of these kings, and of the principal transactions in their reigns, according to the order in which they are placed above.

Ardshir Babegan.

Ardshir, or rather, according to our orthography, Ardshir Babegan, according to the most ancient histories, was the grandson of Sassan, the brother of a certain queen of Persia, who, seeing himself excluded from the throne, and being a little apprehensive that his life was not perfectly safe, thought fit to travel; and having spent many years abroad, died at last in exile, and left among other children the father of this Ardshir, who having a curiosity to see his native country, returned thither privately, and entered into the service of Babec, who was governor of a province for Ardavan, or, as the Greeks call him, Artabanus, the last monarch of the Parthians. This nobleman, after some time, perceiving in this youth the evident tokens of an extraordinary genius, resolved to fix him in his family, and with that view gave him his daughter in marriage, by whom he had Ardshir, who, in gratitude to his mother's family, took the surname of Babegan.

He was educated by his grandfather with great care, in all the learning of the Persians, and was also taught by his father all the exercises becoming a person of quality; and being equally assiduous in acquiring both, he became, while a very youth, the wonder of the province; and, in fine, was so much talked of, that his fame reached the ears of Ardavan, who sent for him to court, where he became so highly in his favour, that he ordered him to remain constantly about the young princes his sons, and seemed to love him as tenderly as he did them. One day, however, when the young princes went a hunting, Ardavan followed them privately, that he might have a better opportunity of observing their behaviour; and having by this means an occasion of seeing how much they were excelled in horsemanship and archery, as well as in strength and gracefulness, by their companion Ardshir, he from that moment entertained a jealousy of him, and determined within himself to remove him from court, by bestowing upon him some office, which should require his constant attendance. Accordingly, he gave him the command of his forces in a distant province, whither he went immediately, and remained there till such time as he was informed of the death of his grandfather Babec, which made him return to court, in hopes of procuring his government. Ardavan, far from listening to his intreaties, immediately bestowed it upon the prince his eldest son.

THIS misfortune was quickly followed by another; the king was much disturbed by a dream, and on consulting the most eminent diviners in his court, they told him, it portended, that a certain fugitive from his court would deprive him of his life and crown. It so fell out, that there was in the king's serail, a lady, who was passionately in love with Ardshir, and she being apprehensive that this interpretation might be fatal to him, immediately gave him notice of it, upon which he instantly retired with all imaginable secrecy. His flight alarmed the king, who never thought of him before; but it was too late, for Ardshir was gone into Persia Proper, the province of which his grandfather had been governor. He was met at the city Eshbechar, or Persopolis, by a croud of the nobility of the province, who were all devoted to his family, and who readily offered him their service in any thing he desired. In all probability, the interpretation of the king's dream was what first put it into the head of Ardshir to attempt the recovery of the kingdom of his ancestors; wherefore taking council from ambition on the one hand, and a just sense of the extreme danger he was in on the other Ardshir began to set before the eyes of the Persian nobility the advantages that would accrue to them from an intire revolution, and he was so fortunate in his applications as to bring them over intirely to his interest. From the moment he entered the province, the young prince, who was governor of it, conceived a jealousy of him; but before he could get any thorough information of his designs, Ardshir took the field with a considerable army. The prince presently drew together such of his father's forces as remained faithful, in order to oppose him; but after several engagements, there happened at last one which was decisive; his army being totally defeated, and the prince himself slain upon the spot. The like fate soon after befel Ardavan himself, who, entering the province of Fars with all the forces of his empire, was there presently defeated and slain by the victorious Ardshir, who thereupon immediately assumed the regal dignity, and soon after the swelling title of Shah-in-Shah or king of kings.

- THIS monarch, in the beginning of his reign, very artfully tempered the severity of a conqueror with the mildness of a natural prince. Where-ever he found resistance, he destroyed it by the sword; but, to such as submitted to his government, he shewed all imaginable kindness, without any respect of persons. On this account he spared all the family of Ardavan; and, to do them still greater pleasure, he married the eldest daughter of that prince. This lady however conceived such a hatred towards him, for depriving her family of the empire, that, within a very short space after her marriage, she attempted to poison him, in order to set the imperial crown on her brother's head. Being detected in the fact, Ardschir gave orders to his prime minister to cause her to be put to death. When he came to acquaint the unhappy lady with her sentence, she told him she was with child; upon which the minister, without acquainting his master, concealed her privately, and caused the son of which she was delivered to be brought up with the utmost care, giving him the name of Schabour, i. e. king's son, the same name as the Greek Sapor. The vizir waited a long time for a favourable opportunity of breaking this secret to his master. At length, observing the king to be one day in high good humour, after exercising on horseback with many of the nobility, he brought forth the young prince, introduced him to his father, and, not without some apprehension, entered into the whole detail of his preservation. Ardschir, on the other hand, received the young prince with the utmost tenderness, and, after reflecting severely on himself for his rashness, highly commended the prudence of his minister; and having caused Schabour to be conducted to the palace, declared him not long after his heir, and took all imaginable pains to instruct him in the arts of government.

- THE Oriental historians agree in affirming, that the character of Ardschir was that of a complete hero; one no less distinguished for knowledge and virtue, than for valour and military skill. From the moment he was seated on his throne, he conceived the important design of restoring all the dominions which had belonged to his predecessors in the Persian throne. By arms he recovered large provinces from all his neighbours; and, when he had recovered them, he took care to make the people very sensible of the difference between his government, and that which they had been under before. He erected new cities, where-ever he found inviting situations; he fortified all the considerable towns on his frontiers; he divided the inhabitants of his empire into several classes or tribes, according to their professions, and not only appointed magistrates to govern them, but also counsellors, whose business it was to instruct them in their true interest, to procure for them the redress of their grievances, as also such grants and privileges as might be for their service. Ardschir likewise rebated the edge of the law, taking away the excessive use of capital punishments, in order to make way for milder chastisements, pursuant to a maxim frequently in his mouth, That the sword was never to be employed where the cane might do as well. But the greatest of his performances as a lawgiver was in the literary way. He composed a book, intituled, Adab alaisch, i. e. Rules for attaining a happy life. In this treatise he laid down the maxims necessary to conduct a man in every station, from that of a monarch to that of a mechanic; and this he did with such penetration and perspicuity, that Nouschirvan, the wisest and greatest of his successors, caused this book to be solemnly published throughout all his territories, obliging every family in Persia to have a copy thereof (B).

(B) The true orthography of this prince's name is, Ardeschir Bâbecân. The reason we have not writ it so in the text, is this; all the authorities that we have quored make use of that manner of spelling which is inserted therein, and which consequently became necessary in our text. He was not only the restorer of the Persian monarchy in respect to its civil concerns, by assuming the ancient title, following the ancient customs, and laying claim to all the dominions of the ancient kings; but he was likewise so in respect to the religion of the Persians, which, by this time, was miserably corrupted. For the purging out all idolatry and superstition, the king summoned a general council of all the wise men in his kingdom; the number of these was forty thousand. Out of these were selected four thousand;

from these four hundred; from them forty; and from these seven. Among these was a young man, whose name was Erdâvirâph, of unspotted reputation, and perfectly versed in the writings of Zerdusht. This man, having drank three glasses of a certain odoriferous wine, remained in the presence of the king, and of the other six learned men, seven nights and days in an ecstasy or trance. Then rising up, he dictated to a secretary all that he had seen in his vision, and a very large recapitulation of the magian faith. This miracle, or pretended miracle, wrought so strongly on the king Ardschir, that he immediately cancelled all the laws which had been made from the time of Alexander the Great in favour of idolatry or polytheism, and fully re-established the religion of Zerdusht. This, as the reader will perceive and glory.

He dies in peace

THE wisdom, moderation and success of Ardeshir Babegan, as they made him almost adored by his subjects in his life-time, so they caused his character to be regarded as a model by those who succeeded him in his throne, which he left vacant, after a reign of fourteen years. A certain historian says, he reigned forty; but, if any regard be paid to his assertion; we must suppose that term to commence from his first taking up arms against Ardavan; whereas most of the historians reckon, as they ought to do, from his accession to the throne on the defeat and death of that prince^b.

Schabour I.

Schabour, or Shab-pour, whom the Greeks call Sapor, succeeded his father, having been preserved, as we have related before, by the tenderness of his prime minister. He was very young when he came to the throne, and therefore the nobility thought it necessary to give him a guardian or protector, who was his uncle by the mother's side, and might consequently have pretended to the crown. He not only executed his charge with integrity and reputation; but when the Persian nobility besought him to change his title, and assume that of king, he absolutely refused it, giving up the government to his nephew, as soon as he was of an age capable of ruling his subjects. Schabour was so well educated, that, after he came to the exercise of the sovereign authority, he did not pretend to use his uncle as a counsellor, but rather affected to consult him as a parent; and whenever he had occasion, either to go into the field against the Romans, or to make a progress into any distant province of his dominions, he left his uncle clothed with a royal authority; so that the Persian historians have actually accounted this Ardeshir one of the kings of Persia. There cannot be any thing more different from another than the character of Schabour, as it is drawn by the Oriental historians, and that of Sapor, as it stands in the Latin and Greek writers. We have already seen what the latter say; our business at present lies with the former. They report, that this Schabour was a prince of a magnificent disposition, who sought, above all things, to adorn his country with fine cities and stately public buildings. With this view he made frequent visits to all the provinces of his empire, that he might be the better acquainted with their situation, their trade, and manufactures, and consequently have it more in his power to confer upon them real benefits. In the province of Kboubistan, which we call Susiana, he built a fine new city, restored also its ancient capital to its pristine beauty, and caused a most stupendous dike to be erected, to bear the weight of a river, which he brought to run over it, for the sake of supplying the adjacent country with water. In the province of Fars, or Persia proper, he built the city of Naoubendgian, in one of the finest plains in the universe; which city, in gratitude to its founder, was a long time called Casbah Schabour. But the most famous, and by far the greatest city of all he built, was that Nischa-bour in Korassan. It seems the king was marching his army through that province, and by accident encamped near the ruins of an ancient city, which had been destroyed by Alexander the Great, the remains of which were almost every-where over-grown ceive by our quotations, we have from the very best authorities among the eastern writers (3). It is however very singular and worthy of observation, that a Rabbinical writer also hath conserved the memory of this very fact: "Orschir, the son of Babec, "the first prince of that family, caused it to be proclaimed throughout all Persia, that he had taken away the sword of Aristotle the philosopher, "which had devoured the inhabitants of that empire five hundred years (4)." By the sword of Aristotle are to be understood the political maxims of Alexander and his successors, which, by this reformation, Ardeshir thoroughly extinguished; and on this account the Oriental writers attribute to him the subversion of the third dynasty, which they called Molouk Thaounif, i. e. the kings of the nations; because tho' the Aracida were Persians, yet they adhered to the Macedonian maxims, and suffered all the petty princes, to whom Alexander had given dominions, to retain them; whereas Ardeshir resumed them all, assumed the title of Shah-in-Shah, or king of kings, and transmitted a new set of maxims to his succe-sors, who followed them very carefully. As to the famous book mentioned in our text, it may not be amiss to quote from thence some maxims relating to the conduct of princes, as a taste of that excellent work, which was, and is still, so highly esteemed throughout the east. It begins thus: So long as a prince applies himself with diligence to the administration of public affairs, and the rendering justice to all degrees of people, his subjects continue affectionate to him, and look upon obedience in the light of their own interest. Elsewhere he says, The worst of all princes is he, from whom the wicked have all things to hope, and the good all things to fear. That all the branches of society are inseparably united to the trunk, and that neither can be affected independent of the other; whence it follows, that kings have their cares, and subjects their duties, which reciprocally answer each other, and which, when neglected on either side, produce ruin and confusion to both (5). The Greeks certainly knew nothing of this book, otherwise they would never have styled Artaxares a barbarous prince.

- a by rose-bushes. The king, charmed with the situation of the place, returned thither again as soon as the campaign was over; and after having ordered all the rose-bushes to be cut up, cleared away the ruins, and by sending regular detachments from his army to work upon the foundations of his new city, he, in a short space, saw it in such a forwardness, as invited all the inhabitants of the adjoining country to come and settle in it. On account of the rose-bushes, he called it Nischabour, i. e. the rose of Sapor, nei signifying, in the Persian tongue, a rose. As the Latin and Greek writers are very silent as to his victories, so the Persian historians say as little of his vices, and not a syllable of his ordering the emperor Valerian to be slayed alive¹. Mirkbond is the only writer who gives us any account of his death, which, according to him, b happened in a very surprising manner. His severe justice so much alarmed some rapacious courtiers, that they took the opportunity offered them by a stormy night, to enter the royal tent, where they murdered Schabour and his attendants; which when they had done, they cut its cords, and set it on fire; so that the guards apprehended his tent had been set on fire by lightning. There are different accounts of the years of his reign; but the best writers agree, that he held the sceptre thirty-one years².

- Hormouz*, whom the Greeks call Formisdas, succeeded his father Schabour, and was Hormouz I. a most generous prince; inasmuch that most of the ancient historians call him Hormouz, al Horri, i. e. Hormisdas the liberal. We are told of him, that when one of the governors of his provinces on the frontiers of the Indies sent him an express, to inform him, c that he could purchase a quantity of very fine diamonds for a hundred thousand pieces of gold, the king wrote him back, that he should let them alone. Upon this the governor sent him a second express, to acquaint him, that they might be sold for two hundred thousand, so that his majesty might gain cent. per cent. Hormouz replied, A hundred or a thousand per cent. will not tempt me. If I become a trader, who must take up the trade of being a king? Or what will become of the Persian merchants, if the royal treasures are employed to forestal them? He was one of the handsomest princes of his time, and exceedingly beloved by his subjects, tho' it does not appear, that he was a very martial monarch, or that he made any conquests. It is said, that he shewed a d great deal of favour to the famous heretic Manes, and that he built for him, on the borders of the province of Susiana, a castle or place of retreat, called Dasearab; and it is further reported, that he embraced his opinions. This, we apprehend, ought to be understood in a limited sense, and be construed only as to the notions that arch-heretic had in philosophy; for tho' it be true, that Manes, or, as the *Oriental*s call him, Mani, held very pernicious tenets in theology, yet it is as true, that he was a very great mathematician, and, by constant practice, attained such a facility of drawing geometrical figures, that he would strike circles of any given diameter with a pencil only, without the assistance of compasses. During the reign of Sapor, he was obliged to abscond, that prince being an enemy to the setting up of all new religions e in his country; and on this account it was, that Mani fled into Turquestan. There, by dint of his eloquence, and skill in the sciences, he acquired many disciples. He affected great austerity of life, and used to retire sometimes for a day or two to meditate in the desert. This was very advantageous to him; for it made the people believe him a very holy person, and gave him leisure to study how to confirm them more and more in that belief. Once, as he was rambling in this manner, he discovered a cave, which, tho' it had a narrow entrance, was very large within, and had a fine stream running through it. Thither he privately transported his books and papers, with as much bread and dried fruits as might serve him for a year. These measures taken, he told his disciples, that God would call him for a time up into heaven; but f that, after a year, he would return and meet them in such a plain. Upon this he withdrew into his cave, and, during the twelvemonth that he lived there, he wrote a large book of enigmatical schemes, and pretended revelations; which book, at the end of the year, he produced to his disciples, affirming, that he brought it from heaven. Shortly after, hearing that Schabour was dead, and that his son Hormouz was a very learned man, and a great patron of the sciences, he returned into Persia, and, as we have observed, ingratiated himself so with the king, that he built for him a hermitage, which was so well fortified, that so long as he remained therein, his enemies were not able to do him any hurt. If Hormouz had reigned long, in all probability

Mani would have secured to himself a party strong enough to have supported him; ^a but his protector died before he had reigned two years, with the reputation however of having been an excellent prince, one equally tender of his subjects welfare, and of the prerogative of the crown ^m (C).

Baharam I.

Babaram, the son of Hormouz, succeeded him. This is the name which the Greeks endeavour to express by the several appellations of Varanes, Varbaranes, and Vararanes. At the beginning of his reign he affected to treat Mani with greater deference than ever his father did, and even suggested to him a design of settling his opinions as the national religion of Persia; in order to which he invited him to a conference with his magi, that the people might be the better convinced of their monarch's caution in so important an affair. His vanity engaged Mani to comply with the ^b king's request; so that, leaving his fortrefs, he went, without the least apprehension, to court, in order to dispute with such learned men as he supposed would be assembled there. On his arrival, Babaram ordered him to be seized; shortly after he caused him to be staved alive, and his skin being stuffed with straw, he ordered it to be set on the top of a hill, with a good guard, as a signal to the Manichees of his kind intention towards them. This had the proposed effect; for all the disciples of Mani retired immediately out of Persia, and not believing themselves safe even on its frontiers, they fled into the very heart of the Indies, and some of them as far as Cbina ⁿ. This seems to have been the greatest exploit that Babaram performed, tho' he was a prince of parts, and who earnestly sought the welfare of his people, as we may gather ^c from this saying of his; That humanity was not to be defined, because therein were comprehended all the other virtues. He reigned with great applause three years and three months, at the end of which he was murdered in the basest manner that can be imagined. A tumult happening in his capital, he went in person to appease it; which when he had effected, a kinsman of his took the advantage of the croud and confusion to let fly an arrow, which struck the king to the heart, to the great grief, as well as to the great loss of his subjects ^o (D).

B.haram II.

Babaram II. succeeded his father Babaram I. Some writers say, he was only the adopted son of the last king. However that might be, it is generally agreed, that, at the beginning of his reign, he gave his subjects no great hopes of him. On the ^d

(C) Besides what is said in the text, we shall add here some anecdotes concerning the heretic Manes. The learned Schikard is much mistaken, when he affirms, that his name was not Manes, but Manicheus, quasi manum fundens (6). The great Epiphanius is as much out. He would needs suggest, that this heretic assumed the name of Manes, because, in the Chaldaic tongue, Man signifies a vessel; whereby he would intimate, that he was a pure and chosen vessel. The truth is, he was a Persian by birth, and his name Mani. Had he been a Chaldean, or had he lived on the borders of Chaldæa, when he first vented his heresy, there might have been some ground for this conjecture; but as he spread his heresy first in the deserts towards Truqueslan, what probability is there, that he should assume a name, the etymology whereof could not there be understood (7)? He was by profession a painter; and we are told, that he could draw a line with a pencil twenty yards exactly straight. His excellency in drawing made him convert most of his lectures in religion into emblematical devices, not unlike those of Jacob Boehm. Hence the book he pretended to bring from heaven, was called Ertengh, tengh signifying a picture (8). What we have recorded of him in the text, we have transcribed verbatim from Khondemir, who opens his account with these words: Mani the Sadducee was a man excellently skilled in painting and sculpture, who when he heard that Jesus had promised the Comforter should come, the devil sug- gested to him, that he should pretend to be that Comforter; which accordingly he did, &c. As to the notions of him and his disciples, all the Oriental writers agree, that they were a mixture of the magian and christian doctrines; and that, in a very short space of time, they split into several sects, according as they entertained different explications of their master's principles (9). The Oriental writers likewise agree, that his patron Hormouz was a most learned and beneficent prince; his favourite saying was this, That kings were like fire, they warmed those who stood at a distance, and scorched such as ventured too near (10).

(11) As we often quote the excellent work of D'Herbelot in this history, it is necessary to give the reader notice, to prevent his suspecting him or us of a mistake, that we do not reckon the Babarams kings of Persia in the same order as he does; but so, that his Baharam III. is our Baharam II. his Baharam IV. our Baharam III. and so on. The reason is this: He reckons Baharam of the third dynasty Baharam I. which, his method considered, is very just; but as the periods of Persian history in this work are at a distance one from another, such a mingling of dynasties would occasion confusion; which to avoid, we have taken a contrary method. We likewise take this opportunity of noting, that we cite the Oriental historians as we use them; so that the reader may at all times distinguish on what authority any remarkable fact is built (11).

- a contrary, he acted with such austerity, haughtiness and cruelty, that the people gave him the surname of Kbalef, i. e. the unjust. The nobility of Persia, who were never over complaisant to tyrants, began to think of ridding themselves of so bad a master, by deposing him at least, if not by putting him to death. The magi however checked this design in its birth, offering to risque their own safety for the good of the people, by remonstrating to the king on the folly of his conduct. This they did with such warmth, and at the same time with such an evident display of loyalty, that Babaram acknowledged them for his counsellors and protectors, changed the whole bent of his conduct, and from being a very bad, became a most excellent prince, during the remainder of his reign. A certain christian author affirms, that
- b this monarch vanquished the Romans, and that, having taken prisoner the son of the emperor Galienus, he caused him to be put to death. Of this however the Oriental writers say nothing; and there is reason to suspect, that this author was imposed on. Most authors agree, that this prince reigned but seventeen years¹.

Babaram III. succeeded Babaram II. During his father's life-time, he was governor of the province of Seigistan, which is the reason that the Greek writers call him Seganfaa. He reigned thirteen years, without performing any thing extraordinary; or, if he did, the Oriental historians, as well as the Greeks, have treated him very indifferently; for we find little said of him, even in their most copious authors; and as for Mirkbond, he says nothing of him at all. Hence it is apparent, that the

c Oriental writers are not so fond of fiction, as they are generally represented to be; for, if they were, they would not certainly suffer such chasms in their histories, but rather try to fill them up with inventions of their own, as some of our northern writers have done².

- Narfi Ben Babaram*, that is, Narfi the son of Babaram, succeeded Babaram the third his brother, tho' from his surname, some authors have taken him for his father, and in truth he was the son, not of Babaram III. but of Babaram II. He proved a prince of a mild temper, gracious to his subjects, and desirous, as far as was in his power, of doing them good; but he had the misfortune to attack the Romans, when they had many great generals, and several potent armies on foot; in consequence of
- d which he was defeated, and lost all his frontier provinces; for grief of which, it is said, he broke his heart, when he had reigned nine years³.

Hormouz the son of Narfi, or, according to the Greeks, Hormislas the son of Narfi, succeeded his father. All the Oriental historians agree, that he was a prince endued with all the virtues capable of adding lustre to a crown. Among these his justice was by far the most conspicuous. He saw with regret the ill use that too many of the nobility made of their great power and riches, in oppressing the meaner sort of people, and thereby discouraging industry and trade, the chief supports of all well-governed kingdoms. To eradicate so dangerous an evil, he fixed a particular tribunal or court of justice, wherein the complaint of the meanest man in Persia might be

e heard against the greatest; and for fear that interest or authority might beget partiality even here, he came frequently, and presided in person. He likewise devised many new laws and regulations for the benefit of the middling sort of people, and for the encouragement of trade; out of regard to which he was extremely careful of the maritime coasts, and of all the ports of Persia. He likewise built in the province of Kerman, which the Greeks call Caramania, a very famous city and port, which he called by his own name Hormouz, or, as we pronounce it, Ormus. It was seated conveniently along the sea-shore, and, towards the land, was shaded by groves of palm-trees; so that, in process of time, it became equally remarkable for its being a trading city, and also the market for the commodities of a multitude of industrious people, f who cultivated the fertile plain behind it. In the end however its riches proved its ruin; so that the inhabitants, finding themselves exposed to continual ravages, abandoned it, and transported themselves into an island in the Persian gulf, almost over-against their old place of residence; where they built a new city, which they likewise called Ormuz, the same that was afterwards conquered by the Portuguese, and of which, in the subsequent part of our history, together with its kings, we shall give a particular account. But to return to Hormouz or Hormislas; he is said to have extended his dominions very considerably, and to have been no less fortunate in war, than he was wise and temperate in peace. The province of Susiana was peculiarly favoured by this monarch; insomuch that he built several cities therein, and repaired all such as were fallen to decay: more he would, without question, have done, if he had reigned longer; but having sat on the throne nine years, he gave way to fate' (E).

Schabour II.

Schabour II. surnamed Dhoulafas, i. e. Schabour of the shoulders, succeeded his father even before he was born, the crown being placed on his mother's belly, and the nobles swearing to acknowledge for their sovereign the child she should bring forth. In his nonage the Persians were exposed to many disasters, more especially to the insults and ravages of the Arabs, who, under their king Tbair, broke in vast numbers into Persia, and spread desolation where-ever they came, plundering the royal cities, and carrying off the sister of the late king Hormouz, and the aunt of Schabour, into captivity. When the young king came to attain the age which qualified him for martial exploits, he determined, at all events, to revenge the injuries which had been done him and his subjects during his infancy. With this view he, with a choice body of troops, made a quick march, and surprized Tbair in one of his frontier provinces. The place was indeed invested, before the Arab prince had any notice of it; but it was so strong, and the garison so well provided, that, in all probability, Schabour must have abandoned his enterprize, if Malekab, whom some call the sister, others affirm to have been the daughter of Tbair, had not betrayed the place to Schabour, with whom she fell in love, and thereby put the king, the nobility and the garison, into the hands of their mortal enemy. Schabour took this opportunity of revenging the cruelties committed by the Arabs in Persia, by putting Tbair, and all who were with him, to the sword, assigning this as his reason, that if a king would so far forget his own dignity as to turn robber, he ought not to expect that his enemies should consider him in any other light. This prince was sovereign of Yemen, which province Schabour immediately over-ran, putting numbers of the inhabitants to the sword, and causing the shoulder-bones of all who were able to bear arms to be broke; whence he had the surname of Dhoulafas, as the general opinion is. The Arab writers however give us somewhat a different account of this matter: they say, that, on Schabour's return into Persia, Malek Ben Nasser, one of the ancestors of Mohammed, was deputed by the Arabians to intercede with the king, and to beseech him to treat them with greater lenity, or at least to discover the true cause of his implacable hatred. Malek, in pursuance of this commission, took all the pains he could to soften the inflexible temper of the Persian king, who at length told him, that his aversion to the Arabs proceeded from his being advised by his astrologers, that they would one day subvert the Persian empire, and inflict the greatest cruelties upon his people. Malek Ben Nasser took this occasion of remonstrating against the severity of his proceedings on so slight a pretence, since the predictions of such sort of people were at least as often false as true, and therefore could never be of weight enough to pass for reasons of state. On the other hand he remarked, that if there should be any grounds for believing this prophecy, the king's conduct was the most impolitic that could be; because his treating the Arabs so harshly, could not fail of giving them the most inveterate hatred against the Persians, which must prove fatal to them, whenever they became subject to those whom they had thus maltreated. Schabour having reflected upon this, altered his conduct intirely, and not only put an end to those miseries which he had inflicted on that unhappy people, but also favoured and encouraged them on all occasions; whence, as the Arab writers say, he acquired the surname of Dhoulacnaf, i. e. on the wings; by which the Arabs would signify, that he was their protector, because the eagles are said to carry their young ones on their wings¹.

Schabour, as we have already seen in our former period, was at continual enmity with the Romans; and tho', during the reign of Constantine the Great, he durst not attempt any thing very considerable, yet that did not hinder him from taking all the

(E) The Oriental writers differ among themselves as to the foundation of the city of Hormouz on the continent, some attributing this to Hormouz the first, the son of Schabour; but we incline to think it was erected by this prince, because the most accurate historians are of that sentiment (12). A learned critic suggests, that the planet Mercury in the Persian language was called Hormouz (13); but we are of another opinion, for we apprehend it to have been an attribute or name of the Supreme Being (14).

- a necessary steps to act effectually, whenever an opportunity should offer. The Oriental writers give us an instance of this, of which there is not the least trace to be found in any of the Greek historians, tho' it be more singular than any thing they have recorded: Schabour was so desirous of being thoroughly acquainted with the state of the Roman empire, that he went to Constantinople himself, under colour of being an ambassador from Persia. He had not however been long there before he was suspected, and thereupon imprisoned; during which time the Romans made several incursions into the Persian provinces, and treated the people with great severity. At length Schabour having corrupted a lady of the court, she not only procured him his liberty, but fled with him. They were obliged to travel with great circumspection, and not without much-ado, and after many dangers passed, they arrived at a little hermitage in Media; which place hath ever since been called Schabbouran. It is not very clear, whether the religious Persians, who resided here, were of the christian, manichean or magian religion; but, whatever they were, their chief was very loyal, acquainted the king with the present situation of things, took pains to convey his orders wherever he directed; so that, by degrees, Schabour assembled a very considerable body of troops, and with them fell so opportunely on the Roman forces, that they gave them an intire defeat. The king's stay in Media gave him an opportunity of observing the situation of that country, and the improvements of which it was capable: This determined him to build a new city not far from the hermitage, where he had reposed himself after his return from Constantinople, hoping, that when it became considerable, and was thoroughly peopled, it would serve as a barrier, and protect the open country from the insults of neighbouring nations".

- As soon therefore as the circumstances of the times would permit, Schabour laid the foundations of the city of Cazvin, which we call Casbin. When he first began this work, he found himself excessively annoyed by the Delemites, who began to be jealous of his undertaking. Schabour, who was a very wise prince, perceiving that it was not at all in his power to carry on the building of his city, and a war with these people, at the same time, resolved to bribe them; which accordingly he did, by considerable gifts for the present, and promises of still greater things hereafter. When Casbin was finished, and the Delemites began to renew their incursions, Schabour, who was by this time at peace both with the Romans and the Arabs, turned his whole force upon them, and easily subdued them, adding thereby the province of Deilem to his empire, which had been an ancient and independent kingdom till then, and which became so again after the Arabians made themselves masters of Persia. This monarch also beautified and enlarged the ancient city of Scheusfar in the province of Kboufistan, where he likewise re-edified another ancient city, called Corkb, and which he afterwards called by his own name. He was one of the greatest and most fortunate monarchs of this dynasty, and, during his long reign of seventy-two years, not only made great conquests on all sides of his dominions, but also wonderfully improved his territories, by building of cities, and encouraging the trade of his subjects * (F).

- Ardshir* succeeded Schabour, and governed the Persian kingdom for twelve years. Ardshir II. One author assures us, that he was uncle by the mother's side to the last king; another, that he was only his cousin; and a third, that he was brother by the mother's side to Schabour Dhoulaetaf. However it was, he assumed the government at first as tutor only, or protector to Schabour III. tho' afterwards the nobility prevailed upon him to take the title of king. The reader will easily perceive, that the Persians take all the kings of this dynasty preserving this appellation. The history of Schabour's being crowned in his mother's belly, is not only to be found in the Oriental writers, and in the Greek historians, but also in the writings of the Rabbins; and therefore, tho' the fact is an odd one, yet it cannot be called incredible (18). We thought it unnecessary to load this reign with recapitulations of facts mentioned in the former period, or with such immaterial circumstances, as might have swelled this part of our history beyond its due bounds.

were afraid of nothing so much as of being governed by a child, which was the true cause that they were desirous of conferring the regal dignity on him, whose birth and abilities made him the most proper for discharging its essential functions. It may be, the miseries the kingdom had endured under the minority of the last king, might the more strongly incline them to make use of this expedient to prevent their falling under the like misfortunes a second time. It is also very remarkable, that the nobility did not suffer this Ardjibir to transfer the crown to his family, though they gave it him for life; but immediately upon his demise called his kinsman the son of Sababour II. to the succession, who was by this time become a man, and capable of taking the reins of government into his own hands.

Schabour III. Schabour III. the son of Schabour Dboulafas, governed the kingdom of Persia five years and four months in great tranquillity. He was cotemporary with Theodosius the Great, with whom he made a strict alliance, and lived in the greatest friendship during his whole reign. As he was a very pacific prince, and sought nothing so much as to keep his kingdom from feeling the plague of war, that his subjects might have leisure to repair all their former losses, we ought not to wonder, that the account we have of his reign is very succinct, and amounts to neither more or less than we have recorded ^a.

Baharam IV. Baharam IV. succeeded his father Schabour, whom he very much resembled in his disposition. He had in his father's life-time been governor of the province of Kerman, and according to the privilege of the royal family was styled Kerman-Sbab. This the Greek writers converted into a surname, which is the reason, that in their histories, he is called Varanes Cermanfas. He governed the kingdom eleven years, in which space of time the Persians grew so extravagantly rich, that their pride inclined them to frequent revolts; in one of which the king, presenting himself suddenly amongst the rebels, and expostulating with them on the folly and madness of their behaviour, was basely shot with an arrow behind his back, and died upon the spot ^b.

Jezdegerd. Jezdegerd succeeded his father Baharam, and proved a very bad prince. Equally cruel and avaricious, he distressed his subjects alike in their persons and their properties. This was the more grievous to the Persians, because in the life-time of his father he had affected so much modesty, humanity, and condescension, that never any monarch promised more at his accession, or performed less during his administration. Hence he was surnamed Al Atchim, i. e. The Wicked, or, The Abandoned. There is some reason to suspect, that his character hath been injured through the malice of the magi, who could never forgive him his strong inclinations to the christians, and his keeping so strict a hand on the clergy of the established religion. This king had the misfortune to see all his children die within a month after they were born. This made him very uneasy; and therefore he consulted not only the Persian physicians, but also all the travellers who visited his dominions, as to the wholsomest air they were acquainted with, in order to try whether, by removing a child as soon as possible thither, he might not conserve the succession in his family. The result of this inquiry was, that the province of Hirab was recommended to him as that where the best air was to be found. This country was a part of Chaldea, which, on the falling out of Alexander the Great's successors among themselves, an Arab prince had seized, and having built a city therein, called it Hirab, and made it the capital of a little principality, which in process of time became tributary to the Persians. The name of the present possessor of this small sovereignty was Nooman, for whom Jezdegerd sent as soon as his son Baharam was born. When he came to court, the king put the child, who was then about a month old, into his hands, acquainted him how unlucky he had been in the rest of his children, and told him, that what he expected from him was the education of his son, after the manner of the Arabs, in all those exercises which usually increase the strength of the body, and render men healthy and robust. Nooman on his part promised to take all imaginable care of the child, whom he immediately carried home with him; and Jezdegerd, being now at ease in his mind, governed his dominions according to his own maxims, and little to the satisfaction of the magi, twenty-one years. At the end of this space, as he was looking upon a horse extremely beautiful, and which he much valued, the beast suddenly struck him with one of its hind feet on the stomach with such force, that he immediately fell down dead, and thereby delivered the discontented part of his subjects from a master, whose government they hated, and whom yet they were not able to depose. As soon as he was a dead, those who were so much disaffected to him, having taken advantage of the absence of the prince his son to transfer the regal dignity to another family, accordingly, they fixed on Kerfa, a nobleman of fair qualities, and great fortune; from whom having drawn many advantageous concessions in their own favour, they saluted him king, and actually put him in possession, not only of the royal robes and ornaments, but also of the royal treasure, procured the submission of the forces then on foot, and the consent of the greatest part of the provinces of that extended empire^c.

Babaram V. surnamed Gaur, or rather Jur, for a reason that will appear in the course of our history, was, as we have seen, sent in his infancy to the court of an Arab prince for the sake of establishing his constitution; which end was perfectly answered by the care his guardians took of his education. Nooman Ben Mondir, to whose care he was committed, caused two palaces to be built for his reception in the capital city of his dominions. These were built by the greatest architect of the east, whose name was Sennamar. These castles or palaces were called Sedir and Kbaouarnak, and the Arab writers tell us, that amongst other singularities, the stones of which they were built, were hewn in such a manner, as to change their colour several times in a day, by their different reflections of light; and that they were so contrived, as to lean upon a single stone, which, if removed, the whole building would have fallen to the ground. Nooman most bountifully rewarded Sennamar for his care and skill; but that unfortunate person having indiscreetly given out, that he could have performed still greater things, if he had expected to have been paid in such a manner, Nooman began to doubt his fidelity, and whether he might not be induced by money to divulge the secret of the supporting stones in the palaces he had built; and therefore ordered him to be thrown from the top of one of them to the bottom, whereby the miserable man lost his life. In process of time, Nooman, the tutor of Babaram, became a convert to the christian religion, and, in consequence thereof, thought fit to retire from the world, and to spend the rest of his days in a hermitage in the desert, resigning the crown, and the care of the young Persian prince, to his son Hendu. This prince was no less careful of Babaram than his father had been; he provided for his health both in body and mind; he took care to have him taught all the exercises, and to be instructed in all the learning, with which a person of his high quality ought to be acquainted. He gave him lessons himself in the art of governing, and at the same time that he discharged the duty of a governor, shewed himself on all occasions his friend in the circumstances of private life, as he was his constant companion in all his diversions. By this means Babaram, who had an excellent genius, grew one of the most accomplished princes of his age, and had a sagacity and resolution almost incredible considering his tender years^d.

WHEN the news of his father's death reached Hirab, the young prince could not help expressing not only his amazement at the conduct of the Persian nobility, but his resolution not to part with the crown on such easy terms. He therefore addressed himself to Hendu, and besought him to furnish him with some troops, that he might endeavour by force to recover what was undoubtedly his right. The king of Hirab, who owed him his allegiance as being dependent on the Persian empire, promised him all the assistance in his power. When he was thus imbarqued in the business, he thought proper to invite all the Arabian princes his neighbours to a council, wherein he exposed the right of Babaram to the Persian throne, and the indignity offered them in his exclusion on account of his being bred up among them. The petty princes, to whom he addressed himself, easily received the impressions he sought to make upon their minds, and with great alacrity, promised to support the pretensions of his pupil with their utmost force. This point gained, Babaram, at the head of ten thousand Arabian horse, entered the Persian territories, and was shortly after followed by Hendu, and the confederate princes, with thirty thousand more. The Persian nobility, obstinate in their rebellion, drew together a great army, in order to maintain the king they had made choice of, upon the throne. Things being in this situation, a general and decisive battle was daily expected, the armies being within half a day's march of each other; but by the wisdom of Hendu, a negotiation was set on foot. Both parties were desirous of deciding the business without blood, and yet neither of them would recede in the least from their pretensions. In this critical juncture, Babaram proposed an expedient, which was instantly accepted. It was this; that the crown of Persia should be placed on a cushion between two hungry lions, and that the prince, who would fetch it, should wear it. On the day appointed the experiment was made, and the crown placed between the lions. Then Babaram turning to his competitor, said, Kersa, Why don't you go and fetch the crown? I need not, answered he; I am in possession of it already; you desire it, therefore do you go and take it. Babaram instantly fell upon the lions, killed them both, and took up the crown. Upon which Kersa immediately ran towards him, embraced him, and did him homage. His example was followed by all the Persian lords; and thus this controversy, which had armed all the east, was determined without bloodshed, and to the satisfaction of all parties, the Persians being charmed with the generosity and valour of their new king; and Hendu and his Arabian confederates were no less pleased with the success of their undertaking, and with the vast presents, and other marks of gratitude, which were given them by Babaram at parting^e.

Babaram, on taking possession of the throne, treated his subjects with such lenity, and excused them from so many duties and taxes, that the oriental historians say, he turned the heads of the whole nation; insomuch, that computing the hours between sun-rising and sun-set, they divided these into equal parts: the first for business, the second for diversion. The king was so far from disliking this, that he sent for twelve thousand musicians from India, not only to divert his subjects, but to prevent their becoming fidlers and dancers themselves; and it is said, that those who follow this profession at this day in Persia, are descended from these Indians. The khacan, for so the orientals call the sovereign of Turquestan, having intelligence of the merry disposition the Persians were in, conceived that a better opportunity would never offer for invading that rich and fertile country. Without therefore any previous declaration of war, he assembled a mighty army, some historians say, of three hundred thousand men, with which he broke into Persia like a torrent, spreading fire and sword, destruction and desolation, where-ever he came. Babaram, as soon as he had intelligence of this, knowing well that it was impossible for him to raise any forces sufficient to repel them, left his capital, and with a thousand chosen horse fled to the mountains, leaving the government in the hands of his brother Narsi. The Persians instantly concluded, that the king had abdicated the government, and endeavoured to make the best terms they could with the conquerors; and thereupon sent deputies to acquaint the khacan with the desertion of their prince, and to implore his mercy. The khacan did not however take things upon trust; he sent out parties to observe the motions of Babaram and his horse; and these on their return, having reported that they had followed the Persian king two days march into Armenia, their master concluded from thence, that he was fled into the Roman territories, and that Persia was absolutely subdued^f.

They are defeated and destroyed.

Babaram in the mean time pushed with his thousand horse through the streights of Derbent, and keeping close by the Caspian sea, came quite round into Turquestan; and having there refreshed, and remounted his troops, he suddenly and silently stole into Persia; surprized the forces of the khacan, who no longer kept any discipline, in the dead of the night; advanced in person to that monarch's tent, where he found him scarce awake, huddling on his cloaths, so that he struck off his head without any resistance; and the Persians rising every-where upon the flying army, scarce a man of this huge multitude returned again into Turquestan. This wonderfully raised the reputation of Babaram; his subjects began to look upon him as a person inspired, and he on the other hand, being better satisfied with his brother's administration than his own, resolved to travel for a time, and leave to him the settling the affairs of Persia. This unaccountable vivacity in otherwise so great a prince, cannot be accounted for any other way, than by considering where he received his education. This roving disposition is the very character of an Arab chief, and indeed all the accounts we have of this monarch shew, that his manners were exactly those of that nation. As for instance, the word Jur signifies a wild ass, and this prince was called Babaram Jur, because he spent the greatest part of his time in hunting that creature, a diversion he had learned among the Arabs. But to return to the current of our history, leaving the government of Persia in the hands of his brother, he appeared in the habit of a private person at the court of an Indian prince; where he quickly distinguished himself so far as to merit the notice of the king, whose favourable inclinations towards him he greatly improved,

^a improved, by killing a monstrous wild elephant, which had done a prodigious deal of mischief. At length, the king sent him at the head of an army to oppose a very potent neighbour of his, who, notwithstanding he had offered him tribute, invaded and plundered his country. This prince Babaram was so fortunate as to defeat, and he made so prudent a use of his victory, that he put it out of the enemy's power to think of renewing the war for a considerable number of years at least. On his return to court, the Indian king thought himself obliged to promote him to the office of prime vizier, and to give him his daughter to wife; which he accordingly did, with an immense fortune ⁸.

BUT as the graces of kings usually produce envy in the minds of their subjects ^{He returns into his dominions from India.}
^b against those on whom they are conferred, so here the promotion of Babaram drew upon him the hatred of the Indians, though he had rescued them from oppression, and by his wife administration procured them as great felicity as a people could enjoy. When therefore he perceived this, he resolved to bear no longer with their ingratitude, especially when he found their whispers had pierced the king's ear, and inclined him to alter his conduct towards him, though on his side not the least occasion had been given. This resolution once taken, Babaram soon after discovered himself to the king, who was exceedingly alarmed, when he knew that the person, to whom he was so much indebted, was the king of Persia, his potent neighbour, and one whose ancestors had deprived him of a part of his dominions. The Persian monarch, to rid ^c him of all apprehensions, acquainted him with his resolution of returning forthwith into his own territories; and that as well out of tender affection for his wife, as in return for the many favours he had received, he was content to yield up the places in dispute. The Indian king received this declaration with the utmost joy, and Babaram conceiving that no time was to be lost, quitted his court immediately, and returned with his wife and family, with all the immense riches he had acquired, into Persia. His subjects received him with all the demonstrations of loyalty and cordial affection; and the king on his part promised to apply himself more assiduously to public affairs, than the vivacity of his disposition had hitherto allowed him to do ^h.

THE first step of importance he took after his return, was to send his brother Narfi ^{Turns his army on the Greeks and Arabians.} ^d with a great body of troops into Rumestan, so the Persians call the dominions of the Greek emperor; and being informed that his forces met with no great opposition on that side, he ventured to make an expedition in person into Arabia, where he reduced the kingdom of Yemen, with all its dependencies. After this he returned into Persia, and reigned the rest of his life in peace, beloved by his subjects, and revered by his neighbours. Authors differ very much concerning the manner of his death. Some, and indeed the most considerable, say, that being exceedingly addicted to hunting, and passing full speed through a wood, his horse fell with him into a deep pit, where he was stifled before any body came to his assistance ⁱ. Others affirm, that being engaged in a war with a neighbouring prince, and having defeated his army in ^e battle, Babaram, in the pursuit, was so unlucky as to plunge his horse into a morass; whence being unable to extricate himself, he was either suffocated, or perished with hunger. The reason this point remains so full of doubt and uncertainty, is this; the body of Babaram was never found, and consequently all accounts of his death must be conjectural only ^k. It is however generally agreed, that this accident arrived in the twenty-third year of his reign, and that, notwithstanding the many irregularities in his conduct, he left behind him the character of being one of the bravest and most generous, as he was evidently one of the most fortunate princes that ever swayed the Persian sceptre ^l.

Jezdegerd II. succeeded his father Babaram Gour. As he had been chiefly educated ^{Jezdegerd II.}
^f by his uncle Narfi, he became a prince of great knowledge and experience, though but a young man, when he ascended the throne. He followed his father's example, in placing his uncle at the head of all his councils, yet without neglecting business himself, or deserting any branch of it, to give himself up to another more agreeable to his temper. He was peculiarly strict in doing justice, especially between the great, and such as depended upon them. He restored all the excellent constitutions of his ancestors, which in process of time were sunk into dissuetude; where he found these insufficient, he framed new laws, by the advice of his council. The care of seeing these executed he took wholly upon himself. The army on the other hand he rendered more affectionate to himself, than they had ever been to any of his predecessors; for he caused it to be excellently paid, and though he took care to preserve discipline amongst his soldiers, yet he caused their duty to be so thoroughly explained to them, and when he was obliged to punish, did it so gently, and with such visible reluctance, that he acquired the surname of Sifabdoft, or the lover of his soldiers. There is however but one expedition of his mentioned, and that is against the Greeks, who, in his opinion, had broken the terms of their alliance with the Persians. In order to convince them of the folly of this proceeding, Jezdegerd marched with a very numerous army into the Roman territories. Far from suffering his troops to live, as in an enemy's country, he obliged his soldiers to pay for every thing they had, to treat the inhabitants with the greatest civility, and to behave rather like strangers, who came to see the country, than like enemies, disposed to destroy it. The Greek emperor, fearing the consequences, in case his subjects should come to change their opinion as to the Persian government, sent to acquaint Jezdegerd, that he was ready to accept the terms he had formerly refused, and that he would pay the arrears of the tribute which he demanded, upon which the Persian retired with his forces into his own country, without committing the smallest disorder, which gained him more reputation than all their conquests had done his predecessors^a.

THIS great prince had two sons, the eldest called Fercuz, and the younger Hormouz. The latter was the favourite of his father, who took all imaginable care of his education, and also very assiduously promoted his interest with the nobility, that upon his own demise he might succeed him in the throne. This naturally induced great disturbances in the kingdom, the elder brother taking all possible measures for defeating the project of his father in favour of his brother. To cool these heats, as also to pave the way to his own designs, the king thought fit to make his eldest son governor of Nimrouz, an ancient province of the Persian empire, comprehending the greatest part of those countries which are now called Sigistan and Makran, obliging him also to go and reside in his government. This had a fair appearance, but was so far from answering the purpose of Jezdegerd, that it proved the means of defeating all the other precautions he had taken. This however did not happen in his life-time; for the good king, after a reign of eighteen years, died suddenly, to the great grief, as well as to the inexpressible loss, of his subjects, who saw themselves plunged upon his death into a miserable situation, out of which they were not extricated, till they had felt almost all the various calamities by which providence chastises offending nations^b.

Hormouz III.

Hormouz III. being upon the spot, having a great interest through his father's solicitations, and being himself a person of so great merit, as to have deserved the name of Firzaneb, i. e. The Sage, seated himself upon the throne, and was acknowledged by almost all the nobility. As he reigned but a very short time, most of the Persian historians are silent as to his character. One of them however assures us, that his conduct, after his accession, was very unlike his behaviour during the life-time of his father; for that he no sooner found himself possessed of the sovereign authority, but he began to tyrannize over his subjects, and to treat the nobility with equal contempt and severity, though his title to the crown depended in a great measure upon their choice. However it was, he did not long enjoy that dignity, which it had cost him so much pains to acquire. His brother Fercuz no sooner heard of his accession, than he determined in himself not to lose tamely what he looked upon to be indubitably his right. It so happened, that the province of which he was governor lay on the frontiers of the country of the Haiathelites, who in the works of the Greek historians are called Nephtalites, and by the translator of Mirkbond Eutbalites. To the king of this nation, whose name was Khaschnaouar, he applied himself, offering him a part as least, if not the whole, of his province, if he would assist him in taking the crown from his brother's head to set it upon his own. This proposition was readily accepted, and Fercuz furnished him with a body of thirty thousand horse. With these auxiliaries he entered Persia, and was quickly joined by such as had a good opinion of his title, and such as had not been well received at his brother's court. Hormouz was no sooner acquainted with this step taken by his brother, than he immediately marched towards him with all his father's forces. But it so fell out, that part of the Persian army being disaffected, and the other part afraid of the Barbarians Fercuz had brought along with him,

Ferouz being now exalted to the regal dignity, could not think himself safe, while his brother lived, tho' in a prison ; and therefore the first act of his reign was the cutting off the head of Hormouz, together with the heads of three of his chief counsellors. As to his conduct afterwards, it was pretty much of a piece with this extraordinary severity, which darkened the very dawn of it : neither was it long before the Persians began to perceive that heaven visibly punished them, as well for their own offences, as for the great wickedness of their prince. The rod by which they were chastised was a most severe drought, all the brooks and small rivers being every-where dried up, the earth parched, and its fruits withered. It lasted six years, and in that space destroyed such multitudes, and brought the remainder into so miserable a situation, that we are told the king and the nobility consented to do open penance to avert the wrath of the Almighty. This they performed, and in the seventh year all the seasons were wonderfully kind and pleasant ; the earth being thoroughly moistened, bore the next year as it was wont, and the scourge being removed, Ferouz and his people returned to the old manner of living ; that is to say, the king ruled according to his will, and his subjects, as soon as they had the utensils of luxury, plunged themselves into all sorts of excesses. The obligations conferred upon the Persian monarch by the king of Haia-theletes were so great, that one may easily judge of the disposition of Ferouz, by his behaviour towards his benefactor. The people were no sooner recovered from that misery and consternation, which had been spread amongst them by the late famine and drought, but presently Ferouz was for turning his arms against him who had set him on the throne. It is true, that some Persian authors alledge, that the subjects of this prince entered the frontiers of Persia, and plundered them in a hostile manner ; but there is little reason to believe this, because the same writers confess, that the Persians were out of comparison more powerful, and that the misfortunes they afterwards met with could not possibly have befallen them, but by their own temerity, and ill conduct p.

- d Ferouz was not long in executing his project ; he drew together as numerous an army as the circumstances of the Persian affairs would allow, and as soon as he had drawn them together, he marched northwards in order to invade the country of the Haia-theletes. The king of that people was under the greatest amazement, when he heard of the preparations Ferouz had made. An officer in his troops, as some historians say, but, as others affirm, his grand vizir took upon him to revive his courage, by promising him a victory without fighting, if he would listen to his advice. This man had, as some say, a hand wanting by an accident prior to this event ; but others assure us, that when his master had promised him to be intirely guided by his counsels, he cut off his nose, his ears, a hand and foot. In this mangled condition, he caused himself to be laid in a wood, through the skirts of which he knew that the Persian army must pass. When the van-guard of Ferouz's army reached him, they took him up, and carried him to their king, who, struck with the miserable condition of the man, received him kindly, asked him, Who he was, and by whom he had been so cruelly mangled ? The artful Haia-thelete readily answered, that he had been thus treated by his king for having exhorted him to give any kind of satisfaction to the king of Persia, rather than engage in a war, the more, because he was so excessively hated by his own subjects. Ferouz rejoiced at this account, inquired narrowly into the strength of the enemy, and where the king of the Haia-theletes was incamped ? The wounded man answered, that the king had with him the flower of all his people, and that they lay in ambuscade behind certain mountains, which were but a few days march from thence, if the king took his road through the woods ; but if he continued in that wherein he now was, he would be obliged to pass on the other side of those mountains, and thereby give the Haia-theletes an opportunity of falling upon his rear. Ferouz, not in the least suspecting the fidelity of his wounded guide, listened readily to the advice he gave him ; and without more ado turned out of the ordinary road, and suffered himself to be led, sometimes through thick woods, at others through wide deserts, till at length his army was on the very point of being famished for want of necessary provisions. Then the Haia-theletes appeared on all sides, and in such vast numbers, that Ferouz seeing it alike impossible to defend himself, or to escape, surrendered with the small remains of his army, throwing himself intirely on the mercy of his injured benefactors. The king of the Haiathelites, supposing that this disastrous expedition would prove a sufficient warning to Ferouz, offered to send him, and those that were with him, safely back into their own country, provided they took an oath never to invade his dominions any more. This they readily consented to do, and as soon as they had done it, were permitted to return without the least injury done them ^a.

THE first thing Ferouz projected after his return into his own kingdom, was the attacking the Haiathelites a second time in breach of the solemn oath which he had so lately made. The chief reason which induced him to apprehend that he should be more successful in this expedition than his first, was the observation he had made of the number of forces about the king of that people, when he had assembled the whole force of his nation. The Persian army appeared to Ferouz capable of beating twice the number of Haiathelites he had seen, if they had not been circumvented by the policy of the wounded vizir. This fault therefore he determined to repair by marching directly into the heart of the country without turning either this way or that. Accordingly, as soon as the necessary levies could be made, he appointed Saouk, a prince descended from the ancient kings of Persia, regent in his absence; and with a prodigious army marched once more against the people, by whose assistance he was seated on the throne. There is no need of repeating here the same story which hath been already inserted in the history of this prince's life under the name of Perozes in the former period. Let it suffice that he and his army were by a new stratagem buried all together in a pit, and the Haiathelites delivered from all apprehensions of suffering any more by the incorrigible disposition of Ferouz. The oriental historians differ however widely from the text in the accounts they give us of the consequences of this war; for they affirm, that Saouk the lieutenant of Ferouz, as soon as he received the news of his master's defeat, marched with a considerable body of horse he had drawn together from an apprehension of this disaster, and incamping with them on the borders of the Haiathelites, prevented their invading Persia, and even obtained from their king, who was a prince of great wisdom and justice, a peace upon honourable terms, on a suggestion that the Persians were by no means well affected to the measures of Ferouz, but were constrained to follow that unhappy prince, because he was their sovereign. The king of the Haiathelites, on this consideration, not only made peace, but sent back all the Persians he had taken prisoners without ransom, as thinking the death of Ferouz a sufficient satisfaction for the injuries he had done him. According to the best of the eastern historians, Ferouz reigned thirty, though some say, not above twenty-seven years. ^b

Balafch II.

Balafch succeeded his father Ferouz or Firouz, and was not his brother, as the Greeks give out. His accession to the throne was very grateful to his subjects, but his younger brother Cobad was so dissatisfied therewith, that he instantly retired from court, and fled to Turqueslan with the son of Saouk, who was his friend and counsellor. It does not appear that Balafch either ordered his brother to be pursued, or attempted by any means to take away his life; but on the contrary, left him at full liberty to live abroad at his ease, since he would not live at home. This however had no effect upon Cobad; his heart was full of ambition, and his head as full of sinister contrivances. His friend had prevailed upon him to marry his daughter, who is represented by the Persian historian, from whom we have these particulars, as a woman of exquisite beauty, and of as exquisite parts. By her Cobad had a son, whom he left with his mother, that he might return again to the court of the Kbacan, in order to solicit his assistance against his brother. Having prevailed in his suit, and orders being issued for raising an army, at the head of which he was to make an irruption into Persia, Cobad thought fit to make a visit to his father-in-law's family, in order to have his sentiments of this expedition; and while he was there seeking to draw the best intelligence he could from his friends in Persia, he first received advice that his brother was so extremely beloved by his subjects, that any attempt to dethrone him would be vain; and while he was afflicting himself with the thoughts of being defeated in all his schemes, he received another courier, who brought him advice that Balafch died suddenly a few days before, and that there required no army to set him on the throne, his subjects being very ready to receive him. Upon this he set out with his father-in-law, his wife, and young son ^c.

Nouschirvan,

- a Nouschirvan, to receive that crown by succession, which he sought to have seized by force, or to have acquired by his intrigues. Authors are not agreed how long Balafsch reigned, some giving him fourteen years, and others little more than four *.

Cobad ascended the throne with all the advantages possible : He was in his person one of the handsomest men in Persia, very adroit in his exercises, of a very generous disposition, and of quick parts ; but as to his morals, they were exceedingly depraved, and he had in his exile sucked in such false notions of politics, as served only to make himself uneasy, and to put him upon oppressing his subjects. The first wrong step he took was the putting to death Saouk, his wife's grandfather, because that under his father and brother he had had the chief direction of all things, which Cobad supposed he would expect during his reign, a thing he did not care to grant, and which ; considering Saouk's great power, he thought it might not be safe to refuse. He therefore made use of one Schabour ; a soldier of fortune, who offered him his service on his accession to the throne, and to whom he gave orders to take off Saouk in such a manner, as might least reflect upon his government. Having this commission, Schabour went to pay his respects to Saouk ; and having drawn him into a conversation, quarrelled with him, and cut his throat. In the tenth year of the reign of Cobad a certain impostor appeared, whose name was Mazdek †. He followed the steps of Mani pretty closely ; for he set himself up for a prophet in the desert, and having drawn together a multitude of people by his specious pretences, firmly persuaded them of his having revelations from heaven. The drift of these revelations was to the old purpose, viz. the establishing a more pure and holy religion, than had been hitherto made known to mankind. But as aulterity and self-denial were never very popular doctrines, he invented some new notions of purity ; and in order to take away the lust of wealth, and of women, he proposed rendering them both common. This suited well with the disposition of Cobad, who, as we observed before, was a very dissolute prince ; and therefore he countenanced this impostor, brought him to court, treated him with respect, and under pretence of promoting purity in religion, fell to plundering his nobility, and debauching their wives and daughters. This is that decree for the rendering women common, which the Greek writers speak of, and which they make the pure effect of the corruption of the king's heart, and represent as an action which lost him the hearts of all his people. But this is so far from being true, that the bulk of the people were more attached to this prince than any of his predecessors. The poor hoped to have a share in the treasures taken from the rich, and the youth were so transported with the thoughts of having all the women they pleased, that the nobility found it a very difficult matter to do what they did. Cobad had a sister, who was wonderfully beautiful, and of whose adventures the oriental romance writers have written very largely. This sister Mazdek gave him a dispensation to marry, which is the clearest proof in the world, that the Greek writers are altogether in the wrong in suggesting that such marriages were conformable to the magian religion ; had it been so, Cobad needed not have turned heretic to have obtained such a dispensation, nor would his making use of it have alarmed the nobility as it did. It was this that put the finishing stroke to his ruin ; for the Persian lords looked upon it now as a thing certain, that he would stick at nothing. Coming therefore in great numbers to court, with such of their dependents as they could trust, they seized the person of the king, committed him to prison, and appointed one Giarnasp, a person of great wisdom and integrity, regent of the kingdom ‡. As to the impostor Mazdek, they would likewise have secured his person, if they could ; but he was too circumspect to put it in their power. His disciples were very numerous, and he failed not to keep a sufficient number of them about him to repel any attempt of this sort ; and he likewise took care not to trust himself in cities or fortresses, where the nobility might shut him up as in a cage §.

THE account the oriental writers give us of the manner in which Cobad escaped from his prison, differs so little from that given by the Greeks already inserted at large in the life of Cavades, that, to avoid prolixity, we shall repeat nothing of it here. The eastern writers assure us, that it was some time before the king of the Hiatbelites could be prevailed on to raise forces, in order to re-establish Cobad on his throne. At length he sent thirty thousand horse into the frontiers of Persia to try the disposition of the people; and it appearing that they were well affected to Cobad's interest, that prince ^a followed in person, and was shortly after peaceably restored, Giamasp readily resigning all title to the imperial throne, which procured him a very favourable reception from Cobad, who treated him with much respect as long as he lived. After his restoration, it is said, he altogether reformed his conduct, and became in every respect an excellent prince, equally careful of extending his empire by arms, and of improving it by the encouragement of arts. It appears not however that he quitted the sect of Mazdek, though he durst never attempt to carry his notions into practice after his return; and in all probability he was the less inclined to attempt any thing of this sort on account of the trouble he had with one of his own sons, who embraced the opinions of Mani, and in whose favour all the Persians infected with that heresy, discovered an inclination to revolt, in order to have placed him on the throne before the death of his father, had they not been prevented by the diligence of Cobad, who was of a most active disposition, and preserved his activity even in old age. Authors are not very well agreed as to the length of his reign; some giving him more years, some less. The best historians, however, agree, that he reigned forty-three years with great variety of fortune, and that he died beloved by his subjects, and revered by his neighbours, after having restored peace and order throughout Persia, repaired such cities as were falling to decay, and erected many new ones to serve as monuments of glory to his posterity* (G).

Nouschirvan.

To Cobad succeeded his son Khosrou or Chosroes, so famous throughout all the east ^c under the surname of Nouschirvan, i. e. the magnanimous. This word, literally taken, signifies a soul candied in honey, and metaphorically a mind equally distinguished by sweetness of temper, and great abilities. He was by very far the greatest prince of this dynasty, and, in the opinion of most of the oriental historians, the most glorious monarch that ever reigned in Persia; happy in his genius, more so in his education, excelling in all royal virtues, deficient in none requisite to distinguish a man in private life. The dawn of his government promised much felicity to his people, and he reigned long enough to make good to them much more than that promised. The first act of sovereignty with which he distinguished himself was full of severity, though he was naturally the mildest prince in the world. He found means to cause the impostor Mazdek to be seized, and to be brought prisoner into his presence. On this occasion Nouschirvan made a long oration, in which he explained the many and great mischiefs brought on mighty kingdoms by such deluders, declared his settled resolution to extirpate all this new sect, and as an earnest thereof, he ordered Mazdek to be immediately put to death. That deceiver, desirous of keeping up some reputation, addressed himself to Nouschirvan in these words, as the officers were about to take him out of that prince's presence: Providence, O king! appointed thee to rule over us, that thou mightest protect, and not destroy. True, thou son of corruption, answered Nouschirvan; but dost thou not remember that thou didst once impudently demand of Cobad my father permission to lie with my mother, and that thy followers have pillaged all the rest of my subjects? I do not therefore seek to destroy thee and thine, but to preserve myself, and the people committed by providence to my care. After the execution of Mazdek, Nouschirvan did not proceed to any farther severities. The death of their chief struck such a damp ^d

* Mirkhond ubi supra. KHONDEMIR. SHARISTANI de religion. orient.

(G) There are some varieties in the relations we have of the reign of Khobad, which deserve to be remarked. Khobad, according to Mirkhond, married Zarmehar, the grand-daughter of Saouk, who had governed the kingdom after the miserable defeat of his father; but of this we find no distinct account in any other historian. What is stranger still, Mirkhond makes this lady the mother of Nouschirvan. As to his sister, whose beauty and accomplishments tempted him to accept of the impostor Mazdek's disputation, Mirkhond assures us, that she was taken prisoner at the time her father Feronz was killed, a circumstance we did not insert in the text, because it seems to be altogether improbable. The march which Feronz made into the enemy's country was in itself attended with great difficulties, and who can imagine that he would expose a young lady, the only daughter he had, in such a manner? All the oriental historians agree, that during his reign there were prodigious numbers of Jews settled in his dominions, especially in Chaldea, where sometimes he treated them with great lenity, and at others he loaded them with heavy taxes. It does not appear that he ever had any good opinion of the Manichees, though they had been in favour with his father, and though the impostor Mazdek had concurred with them in some of their notions. The truth seems to be, that he was far from being nice in religion himself, and only pretended a high zeal for the sect of Mazdek, because it gave him an opportunity of filling his coffers, and gratifying his passion for his sister (19).

(19) Mirkhond sect. xxxiii. Lebnarikh Sharistani de religion. orient.

- a to the hearts of his followers, that they willingly laid hold of the alternative offered them by the king's edict, viz. either to restore what they had wrongfully taken from others, or to suffer capital punishment as thieves. Thus the peace and properties of the people of Persia were secured against the attempts of these debauched enthusiasts, without any extraordinary effusion of blood *.

- Nouschirvan* also removed at the very beginning of his reign such officers of his court, as by their conduct in his father's life-time had rendered themselves disagreeable to his people. Among these there was one particular person whom he forbade ever to come into his presence, and who by this sudden and total disgrace fell into extreme poverty. On the birth-day however of the king, when all the Persian nobility came to make presents, and to pay their duty to their sovereign, this officer appeared amongst the rest, and after having dined at the royal table, put one of the golden plates into his bosom, unperceived by any but Nouschirvan. When the plate was missed, and the servants began to make some stir, the king bid them be at quiet; For, said he, the man who took it will not bring it again, and he who saw him take it will not discover him. On the next birth-day the officer came to court again, clad in a new robe, upon which the king calling him, whispered in his ear, Did my plate go to buy that fine robe? The man readily answered, Yes; and then drawing it aside, shewed him a pair of ragged breeches: But you see, Sir, said he, that it would go no further. Nouschirvan was so charmed with the frankness of the man, that he restored him to his place as well as favour, and the Persians were so delighted with the generosity and good-humour of their prince, that in all their histories this story is preserved as a monument of his beneficence and clemency. For the better dispatching of justice, and the more easy management of all public affairs, the king in the second year of his reign divided all the Persian dominions into four vizirships: the first consisted of the frontier provinces towards Tartary and India: the second included Parthia, Armenia, and the provinces bordering on the Caspian sea: the third comprehended Persia Proper, and all the provinces between it and the gulph: the fourth was composed of Mesopotamia, Chaldea, the countries taken from the Arabs, and those conquered from the Greek emperors. Over each of these he appointed a governor of the royal blood, who, in all ordinary cases, judged without appeal: But in all extraordinary cases, and where judgments were capital, they could not proceed, till they had instructions from court *.

- EARLY also in his reign he made an expedition into Rumestan, or the territories of the Greek emperor, of which we have given a long account in the foregoing period. In this war, however, he did not so much endeavour to augment the bulk of his territories, as to increase the number of his subjects. It was with this view that he transported all the inhabitants of the great city of Antioch into the province of Irak, where he gave them the city of Mabouza for their habitation, the name of which, to oblige them, he changed for that of Antioch. This city lay at no great distance from Babylon; but the new name conferred upon it by Chosroes did not remain with it long; for after his decease the old one of Mabouza came again into use, and it is so called even at this day. After this he resolved to restore the Persian frontier on the other side of his empire, on which the Haiathelites had trespassed exceedingly, supposing they could never be too well rewarded for the assistance they had given to his father Cobad. At first Nouschirvan endeavoured to proceed by way of negotiation, representing to these people, that the wide-spread countries of Thebet, Candabar, and Brantolah, suited better their way of life, than the provinces they had usurped from Persia; but the Haiathelites having treated these representations with contempt, Nouschirvan was constrained to have recourse to force; whereby he answered his purpose better, and obliged this barbarous people to repass the mountains; by which means his subjects were delivered from those apprehensions with which the neighbourhood of this mighty nation had tormented them for upwards of fifty years. This manner of proceeding alarmed all the neighbouring princes, and more especially the khacan, who immediately raised a great army, and while Nouschirvan was on the borders of India with his troops, broke like an inundation through the Persian provinces into the very heart of the kingdom. Nouschirvan, as soon as he was acquainted with what had happened, resolved to send his son Hormouz against this formidable invader, being afraid to leave his frontiers towards India uncovered, lest some advantages should be taken by his enemies on that side ^a.

Hormouz discharged his duty to his father, and to the Persian nation, not only with great fidelity, but with great capacity also. Though but a young man, he had been a soldier from his childhood, and therefore wanted not experience, as he naturally abounded with courage. The troops he had about him were daily augmented by the country people, who looked upon the army as the surest asylum, and prudently chose to hazard their lives in the service of their country, rather than to fly and hide themselves from the enemy with equal hazard. Hormouz judged perfectly well of the strength of his own forces, and did not, because they were numerous, pretend to give the enemy battle, which, if he had lost, must have lost Persia; but by harassing the unwieldy army of the khacan by continual skirmishes, by withdrawing all sorts of provision out of the open country, by garrisoning strong cities, and by abandoning weak ones, he obliged that monarch to think of retiring, as by burning all the country behind him, he had rendered his retreat almost impracticable. The khacan, ignorant of this, began his march back, and was amazed when he found a desert before him, and the Persian forces behind, and on every side. In this miserable situation himself, with the principal nobility, and a great corps of the best horse, deserted the rest, and precipitately escaped into their own country, leaving to the young prince of Persia the glory of having defeated him, and of having defeated him by his conduct. Nouschirvan on the other hand having completed his designs in respect to his Indian frontiers, made an offensive war on the khacan, and pushed his conquests so far, that he obliged him to accept peace on the terms he thought fit to give him; after which Nouschirvan married his daughter. This remarkable event happened in the twelfth year of his reign, and as it delivered him from any apprehensions of danger from foreign enemies, so he laid hold of this opportunity to settle the boundaries of his vast dominions, and then to return to Madain his capital city; where he gave audience to the ambassadors of the greatest potentates of the world, who came to compliment him on his victories, and to penetrate, if possible, any new designs he might have formed ^b.

The bounds of the Persian empire.

It may not be amiss to take notice here of the boundaries which Nouschirvan gave to his empire, because the reader will from thence perceive with how great justice the Persian writers acknowledge this prince for the greatest monarch that ever ruled in their country. The city and country of Farganab, which lies along the river Sibon or Jaxartes, was the limit of Persia on that side; the river Indus separated his territories from those of the independent Indian princes. Arabia, to the frontiers of Egypt, acknowledged him for its sovereign, and in Syria he had pushed his conquests as far as the sea would permit. While Nouschirvan enjoyed in peace an empire of such an extent, he formed two projects highly commended by the eastern writers, and which, it may be, would not have gained him so much honour, had he reigned in another part of the world. The first was the bringing out of India a certain book, intitled Homaoun Nameh, i. e. The Royal Manual, the work of the famous Pilpai, containing a multitude of parables relating to the art of government. This, by the care of his chief minister Buzurge Mibir, he procured, and caused it to be translated into the Persian language for his own use. His other project was of the same sort, but undertaken for the sake of his people. It was the publication of his predecessor Ardschir's instructions for all degrees of men. Of this he caused a multitude of copies to be made, and obliged every family in Persia to receive one ^c.

Nouschizad the son of Nouschirvan rebels against him.

We must not however suppose, that the life of Nouschirvan was spent without meeting with any troubles: For what prince, what private man, ever spent his life so? The source of his uneasiness was his own family, and the enemy who gave him most trouble was his own son. In one of his expeditions into Rumestan, or the dominions of the emperors of Greece, he had taken a female captive, by whose beauty he was subdued himself. This woman was a christian, and very devout. Nouschirvan espoused her, and had by her a son, whom he dearly loved. The name of this young prince was Nouschizad. His mother took care from his cradle to educate him in her religion, and impressed the truths thereof so strongly on his mind, that when he grew up, he was not to be moved by the arts of the magi, or by the threats or promises of his father. Nouschirvan perceiving this, and being afraid of the consequences, confined him. For, as we have seen, religious disputes were dreadful to ^d

- a this wise prince, who thought he could not be master of the hearts of his subjects, if they were not united amongst themselves. The prince's custody was easy enough, the king designing, not so much to punish him, as to prevent any thing which might deserve punishment; and therefore, when he found himself obliged to visit the frontiers of his empire towards India, he did not think fit to alter Nouschbizad's condition, but left him under the same gentle restraint, wherein he had lived for some years. During his absence from his capital, he had a fit of sickness, whereupon a report was spread that he was dead. Nouschbizad hearing this, took instantly an opportunity of making his escape; and as there were many christians in Persia, he quickly drew together a considerable force, and continued to increase his army, even after he was informed, that his father was alive and well. The news of this revolt greatly afflicted Nouschirvan, who did not however immediately send an army against his son, but suffered things to remain as they were, that the young prince might have time to consider the condition he was in, and to return to his duty. But when he saw this delay produced nothing, but that on the contrary, many of the grandes, who were discontented at the severity of the king's justice, took this opportunity of fortifying themselves against his resentment Nouschirvan, resolved to wait no longer; and therefore instantly dispatched a body of forces under the command of Ram Berzin, one of his principal generals, to reduce the rebels. However, when that officer took his leave of him, he gave him these instructions: "I understand that my son hath not
c " only taken arms, but hath also possessed himself of my treasures, opened the prisons, augmented his army with those he found in them, and by the help of my money, and his own promises, hath drawn abundance of my officers to his party. My commands therefore are, that you advance with all possible diligence towards him, yet without attacking him, or those of my subjects, who are about him, till
" you have advised him of your arrival, and exhorted him to return to that obedience he owes me; which if he inclines to do, I expect that he should send back to " their prisons those whom he has released; that he should put to the sword the officers who have deserted to him; and disband his army. If he refuses to execute d " these things, do your utmost to reduce him by force, even though it should be at the expence of his life. But if the young man falls alive into your hands, do not offer him the least indignity, nor so much as reproach him with his want of duty; his consciousness thereof will be a sufficient punishment". Ram Berzin followed his instructions exactly, but the prince proving obstinate, a general engagement ensued, in which Nouschbizad was defeated, and received a mortal wound, which when he perceived, he said to those who were about him, Tell the queen, my mother, that it is my last request, that my body may be buried amongst the christians. Nouschirvan succeeded no less happily in his Indian war, than he had done in this domestic one; he compelled all the princes on his frontiers to do him homage, and to pay him tribute. After e this he marched with a great army into Arabia, where he was fortunate in the highest degree, and used his fortune to the best purpose imaginable. He found the country distressed by tyrants, whom he dispossessed of their power, restored the lawful sovereigns, whom they had driven from their dominions, and did so many kindnesses to the people in general, that Mohammed himself was wont to boast, that he was born under the reign of this monarch, surnamed by the Arabians Al-malek, i. e. The Just b.

After this he returned to Madain, his capital, and began to adorn it with a multitude of new and sumptuous buildings; amongst the rest with a palace, which was accounted one of the wonders of the east. It was called Tbak Kbojrou, i. e. The dome of Chosroes. It had a beautiful cupola, and underneath strong and large vaults, in which were deposited all the mighty treasures of this powerful monarch. In order
f to have a just idea of this wonderful building, the reader must be informed, that the caliph Almanzor ordered this palace to be pulled down, in order to employ its materials in adorning the citadel of Bagdat; but after working some time thereon, he found the expence so great, that he was forced to abandon the enterprize, and leave the greatest part of the palace of Chosroes undemolished, on which a Persian poet wrote the following distich, alluding to the founder of this glorious edifice:

After all his victories Nouschirvan adorns his capital.

Thy works, like thee, eternity enjoy;
Nor rage, nor time, can thy designs destroy.

If we were to mention a twentieth part of the acts recorded of this prince, which ^a have come even to our hands, it would take up much more room than we have allowed to this period; we shall content ourselves therefore with giving the reader an account of his last expedition and death, and a short view of his character, according to the Oriental writers, in a note, that we may not be condemned of negligence, amidst such immense materials. The last war, which Nouschirvan made against the Constantinopolitan emperor, was occasioned by his supporting the petty princes of Armenia against the Persian prince, who was their sovereign. At first Nouschirvan had the same good fortune in this as in his other wars; but trusting it too far, he was defeated, and constrained to pass the river Euphrates on the back of his elephant, and not without great danger of being drowned. On his return to his capital Madain, which is either ^b the same with Ctesiphon, or a city built upon its ruins, he began to find himself extremely weak, and not a little indisposed. He therefore judged it time to think of making peace, and then of settling the succession; for being now eighty years old, and having reigned forty-eight, he had not either cause to hope for much longer life, or to repine at his approaching decease, after having so long and fully enjoyed the good things of this world. When therefore he heard, that the Greek emperor was willing to conclude a treaty on reasonable terms, and saw that the nobility were well inclined towards his son Hormouz, he disposed himself chearfully to submit to fate, having first delivered in writing the following instructions, or political testament, to his son ^c:

“ I Nouschirvan, the possessor of the kingdoms of Persia and India, address these “ my last words to Hormouz my son, that they may serve him as a lantern in the “ days of darkness, as a path when he shall enter the deserts, and as a pole-star
 “ when he navigates through the seas of this tempestuous world. When my eyes are “ closed, which are already unable to bear the light of the sun, let him be seated on “ my throne, and let his lustre be equal to that glorious planet; but let him remem“ ber, in the midst of his greatness, that kings rule not for themselves, but for their “ people, and that they are, with respect to them, what the heavens are to the earth.
 “ Can the earth be fruitful, if it be not watered, if it be not cherished by the heavens?
 “ My son, let all your people be sensible of your benefactions; those who are nearest ^d
 “ you first; by degrees those who are at the greatest distance. If I durst, I would “ propose to you my own example; but I will rather put you in mind of that which “ hath been example unto me. Behold the sun, it visits all parts of the world; and “ if it is sometimes visible, and at others removed from our sight, it is because the “ universe partakes of its splendor, and is cherished by its beams. Enter not any “ province but with a prospect of doing good to its inhabitants; neither quit it with “ any other view, than to do good elsewhere. Ill men must be punished; to them
 “ the sun of majesty is eclipsed: the good deserve the utmost encouragement, and “ ought to experience the morning beams. As that glorious luminary answers all “ the purposes for which it was created at all times, be thou careful to act always ^e
 “ like a king, since you will desire at all times to be revered as a king. My son, “ present thyself often before heaven, to implore its aid; but be sure that thou “ approach it not with an impure mind. Do thy dogs enter the temple? If thou “ shalt observe exactly this rule, thy prayers shall be heard, thy enemies shall be “ struck with terror, thy friends shall be ever faithful; thou shalt be the delight of “ thy subjects, and thou shalt have reason to delight in them. Do justice, abase the “ insolent, comfort the unhappy, love your children, protect learning, follow
 “ the advice given you by ancient counsellors, suffer not the young to meddle in “ affairs of state, and let the good of your people be the sole and supreme end of “ your designs. Farewel: I leave you a great kingdom, which you will keep, if ^f
 “ you will follow my counsels; and which it will be impossible for you to keep, if “ you follow others.” Such was the end of Nouschirvan, the most beloved prince of his age, and whose reputation survives to this day in the works of all the eastern historians, in the writings of their moralists, and more especially in the works of their poets ^g (H).

(H) Khondemir closes his account of the reign of Nouschirvan with this observation: “ Princes in suc“ ceeding times ought to place him, of whom we “ have been speaking, as a model before their eyes,

- a Hormouz, whom the Greeks call Hormisdas, and who was the fourth of that name Hormouz IV. of this dynasty, ascended the throne with the fairest prospect that ever any Persian prince had. He was naturally of a very indifferent disposition, addicted to his pleasures, haughty, and cruel. His father, who was too wise a prince not to perceive these defects in his son, endeavoured to correct them by education. With this view he put him under the care of the celebrated Buzurge Mibir, the wisest man in Persia, and the first minister of Nouschirvan. This excellent person took such pains with Hormouz, and knew so well to set folly and vice in their lights, that he vanquished his natural proneness to evil, and made him, in spite of himself, a great and a good man. For the first three years of his reign, while his old tutor remained about his person, he as far transcended Nouschirvan, as Nouschirvan had all his predecessors. His discourses were fraught with wisdom, his actions were all beneficent. He carried so far his respect for Buzurge Mibir, that he would not wear his royal ornaments in his presence; and when some of his courtiers intimated, that his reverence to him was excessive, since it was more than was due to a parent, he answered, Tou say well, my friends; but I owe more to him than I do to my father. The life and kingdom I received from Nouschirvan will remain with me but a few years; but the reputation I shall acquire, in virtue of his instructions, will survive to latest times. Happy had it been for this prince, had he always adhered to these notions; but when old age had rendered Buzurge Mibir unfit for the great employments he possessed, he requested, and
- b had leave from Hormouz to retire; and with him retired the happiness and fortune of his master (1). The young courtiers who were about Hormouz, began, from that moment, and make his conduct the rule of theirs, since he possessed, in a sovereign degree, as well the good qualities which render amiable a private man, as the exalted virtues which add lustre to a diadem; but, above all, just as without bias, liberality without any other bounds than those assigned by reason, contributed most to his high reputation while living, and have preserved his fame fresh to posterity to this day. We have seen, in the foregoing history, many instances of the grandeur of this prince's soul, in undertaking the most stupendous works for the benefit, and for the ornament, of the several parts of his dominions. There is one however of which we have not spoken; and as it makes a great figure in all the Oriental histories, it is requisite to take some notice of it here: this is the wall of Jagouge and Alagouge, or a thick and high rampart commencing at Derbent, and running from mountain to mountain, so as to secure the frontiers of Persia from the northern nations. It was projected by Alexander the Great, and, as some say, begun by his command. However, it remained unfinished, tho' not altogether unperfected, till the reign of Nouschirvan, who undertook, and happily concluded it (2). The court of Nouschirvan was one of the most magnificent that the world ever saw. The deputies from all the provinces of Persia constantly attended therein, as did the ambassadors of all the great princes in the world. The expence of their entertainment was defrayed by Nouschirvan, who, in the midst of all this prosperity, preserved a mind so equal and undisturbed, that he was never surprized into any expression unworthy of a philosopher. A courier coming hastily into his presence, cried out, God is just! God is just! the implacable enemy of our king is taken away by death. Nouschirvan answered without the least emotion, Far be it from me to rejoice at the death of my enemy. There can be nothing more ridiculous than for mortals to be pleased with instances of mortality (3). When he had been hunting, and was desirous of eating some of the venison in the field, some of his attendants went to a neighbouring village, and took away a quantity of fat to season it. The king suspected it, ordered that they should immediately go and pay for it; then turning to his minister, he said, This is a small matter in itself, but a great one as it regards me. A king ought ever to be just, because he is an example to his subjects, and if he swerves in trifles, they will become disolute. If I cannot make all my people just in the smallest things, I can at least show them that is possible to be so (4). The same way of thinking induced him to put the following inscription on his diadem, after he had settled the immense dominions he had acquired, and was revered at home and abroad, as the mightiest of all monarchs:

What is long life? or what a glorious reign?

Since our successors close upon us tread.

My fathers left this crown, and I again

Must leave it too, and mingle with the dead (5).

These are sufficient specimens of the solidity of his understanding, and of the strength and rectitude of his sentiments. We have therefore all the reason in the world to believe, what all the Oriental historians positively affirm, that he was one of the most learned men, not only in his own dominions, but in his age; that he was the most beneficent patron of the sciences, and of those who cultivate them; and that his court was the asylum of merit in distress. He held regular assemblies for the promoting real, that is, useful knowledge, at which he assisted himself, with his ministers of state, as will be seen in the next note; and he was so far from being a smatterer, that not only in the polite branches of learning, but even in the business of mechanics, he knew as much as the artists themselves. With all this, he was the most debonnaire man in his court, and tho' he never said a light or trivial thing himself, yet he would laugh at the jests of others, and never took ill any poignant expression that escaped a man in a flow of humour (6). No wonder then that the wits of his own time loved him; that the wits of succeeding ages have done their utmost to embalm his character. The facts related of him must strike all generous minds; and therefore we make no excuse for so long a note.

(1) The character of Buzurge Mibir makes so great a figure in the Oriental histories, that it is but just we should moment, to have a visible ascendancy over him, and to influence him to do many a things alike contrary to his interest, and injurious to his reputation. Such of his old counsellors as were about his person, and had still some share in his esteem, these sycophants found means to remove, either by misinforming their king, or by treating those they disliked in so rude a way, that they made it their choice to retire from court. It had been the policy of Nouschirvan to provide the shortest and speediest methods of distributing justice throughout his wide empire. Every little village had its judge, and, in all courts of judicature, care was taken that decrees should not cost either more time or money than they were worth. At the time of his death he left thirty thousand persons in judicial offices in his dominions. Numbers of these were removed, when Hormouz fell into the hands of bad counsellors; and the mischiefs b which followed on this rash step were so great, that the inspectors of justice in the several provinces of the empire joined in a remonstrance upon that head; which Hormouz was so infatuated as to conceive a libel on his government, in resentment of which he persecuted this whole useful and venerable race of men with implacable hatred, and, by a new strain of tyrannical madness, would be the sole judge of his people himself. On this pretence he wore every day the tiara or royal diadem, which his predecessors never put on, but when they were about to administer justice to their subjects. Hence his people gave him the surname of Tagedar, i. e. the crown-wearer &c.

IT is impossible for a bad prince to maintain himself in the possession of the hearts c of his people, as well as of their obedience; and it is as impossible for a nation universally disaffected to hinder their prince from perceiving the dislike they have of his measures. This quickly became the case of Hormouz and his subjects. His jealousies induced him to murder by thousands. His people, believing themselves in continual danger, could not avoid betraying an earnest desire of seeing themselves safe, which begat further inclinations of revenge in their prince. To complete the misfortunes of both parties, the frontier provinces towards India and Arabia threw off the Persian yoke, and set up princes of their own; and the khakan, who long waited for such an opportunity, entered Persia with an army of three hundred thousand men, tho' he was uncle by the mother's side to Hormouz. The Persian monarch, in this d should bestow a note upon it here. In the first place we must remark, that this is the surname only of the prime minister of Nouschirvan, and that it signifies, in the Persian tongue, well beloved. We have taken notice in the text of his being appointed governor to Hormouz; and that, with great difficulty, he triumphed over the evil disposition of that prince. It cannot be improper to give an instance of his address in this respect: he saw with regret, that his pupil slept till noon, spent the afternoon in dressing, and the night in debauches; he reproved to no purpose, he expostulated to no end; yet he continued to expostulate and reprove, hoping, that importunity might effect what was unattainable by reason. Hormouz, at length, quite tired out, devised a method to rid himself of these lectures: he ordered some of his favourites to disguise themselves, and to strip his preceptor quite naked, as he came in the morning from his father's court to wait upon him. This being accordingly done, when Buzurge Mihir related his misfortunes, You see, said the young prince, what comes of all this diligence; if you had not been up so early, you had not been robbed. You mistake, Sir, said the preceptor, the thieves were more successful than I, because they rose earlier. Vigilance, Sir, is a copy of the divine activity; it is the torch by which science becomes visible, the great treasure of virtue and true pleasure, and the key of victory in all things. Rise then, my dear prince, that the sun of good fortune may display his beams on thy head, and that the fresh air in the morning may dispose thy mind to receive those graces from heaven, which may in time make thee a blessing to the whole earth (26). One day Buzurge Mihir being with his master Nouschirvan at one of the assemblies of the learned, the king proposed for the subject of debate this question, What is the extreme degree of misery? A Greek philosopher, who was esteemed one of the most learned men of his age and country, answered, Poverty in extreme old age. An Indian sage also, of great reputation, gave it as his opinion, That great pain, attended with dejection of mind, was the most unsupportable of evils. And what say you? said Nouschirvan, turning to his minister. My judgment is, replied he, that he is the most miserable of men, who begins to repent, when he finds his life is at an end (27). He had no sooner said this, than the other two sages came immediately over to his opinion. It would take up a great deal of room to insert a tenth part of the examples we have met with of this man's wisdom: One instance however of his ministerial virtues may not be amiss. One day at council, after a great deal had been spoken by others, it was observed, that he remained silent. Upon which Nouschirvan asked him, Why he did not speak his sentiments, as well as the rest? Because, answered he, a statesman ought to give his advice, as a physician does medicines, that is, when there is occasion (28). At this the king smiled, and the rest of the counsellors testified their satisfaction at so well turned a compliment. This great man was privately a christian, which chiefly induced him to retire from court, and for which the cruel Khosrou Parviz caused him to be put to death, when he had arrived at an extreme old age (29).

- a distress, called a general council of the nobility about him; and after hearing, without following, the advice of most of the great lords present, he suffered himself to be guided on this important occasion by the council of an old man, who had been ambassador for Nouschirvan in the country of the khakan, at the time that prince demanded the mother of Hormouz in marriage. This old nobleman assured him, that, on this occasion, an astrologer predicted, that, under the reign of a Persian king to be born of a princess then chosen for Nouschirvan's queen, a certain khakan should invade, and almost conquer his dominions; but would be at length vanquished himself by a Persian general, whose face should resemble that of a wild cat; that the astrologer being further intreated to endeavour, by his art, to discover the name of
- b this general, he, by degrees, placed several letters on a tablet, which, taken together, composed these words, Babaram Tchoubin. One cannot conceive any thing more visibly absurd than this story, which was certainly invented to amuse Hormouz, who was excessively addicted to the occult sciences, and thereby to engage him to place this officer at the head of his armies, of whom otherwise he would probably not have thought, tho' he was the most capable of that command of any man in his dominions. He was at this time governor of Media, from whence the king sent for him, and offered him the supreme command of all the troops in Persia; which Babaram declined, and, to the amazement of his master, chose only twelve thousand men, at the head of whom he marched instantly against the khakanⁱ.
- c He moved with such diligence and secrecy, that he attacked the enemy upon their march, with such a fortunate vivacity, that the khakan was constrained to advance against him in person at the head of his guards. This poised the scales for some time; but at length the khakan being killed, and his son taken prisoner, their army fled in such confusion, that they left their baggage behind them; so that the Persian collected two hundred and fifty camels load of treasure. The most precious of the spoils, together with the captive prince, Babaram sent to the king his master, with a very dutiful letter, and an exact account of the advantages he had gained. At first Hormouz was extremely well satisfied with his general's good fortune, gave the highest
- d commendations to his valour, and proposed to bestow on him mighty rewards. His favourites however suspecting, that Babaram might not have any great complaisance for them, in case he arrived at the chief employments in the state, resolved to secure themselves at his expence. With this view they insinuated to the king, that, under pretence of sending the richest of the spoils, Babaram had only given him a small share thereof, and kept the rest for himself; that it was to be feared he might make an ill use of this, and that it was a dangerous thing to trust so ambitious a man at the head of the army. The suspicious temper of Hormouz rendered any proof in support of these conjectures quite unnecessary. Insinuations were with him always sufficient evidence; and therefore, on no better grounds than these, he not only distrusted his
- e general, but most imprudently and shamefully disgraced him, by sending him, instead of a habit of honour, the usual present of Persian kings, all the necessary apparel of a woman. This so far provoked Babaram, that, in his own mind, he resolved to dethrone his master; and therefore having arrayed himself in the woman's habit the king had sent him, he came out and shewed himself to his soldiers; and having asked them, whether they thought he deserved such treatment? he, by a premeditated harangue, drew them to concur with him in his resentments, and to assist him in his project of depriving the son of Nouschirvan of the regal dignity^k.
- f THE Persians however retained such a respect for the royal family, that Babaram saw there was a necessity of making choice of some other prince of the same line. Accordingly he proclaimed Khosrou Parviz, the eldest son of Hormouz, king. That young prince, being persuaded by his uncles, retired from court, and countenanced the rebellion, causing money to be coined in his own name, and practising in other respects as if his father had been dead. Hormouz having intelligence of these proceedings, seized Hindouiab and Bolbam his wife's brothers, whom he knew to have encouraged his son to desert him. Their confinement however did not last long; for the whole mass of the people, having contracted an irreconcilable aversion to their king, broke open their prison, released these lords, and assisted them in seizing Hormouz; and notwithstanding the excellent speech made by that prince, at the motion of Hin-

doniab, put out his eyes. Kbofrou, who was at this time in Media, returned with all a imaginable speed to his capital, where, as the Eastern writers unanimously agree, he went and comforted his father, assured him, that his uncles had acted intirely without his permission or consent, and besought his forgiveness in the most humble terms. The old blind king, sufficiently humbled by his misfortunes, and having no hopes but in his son, promised to forgive him, provided he punished those who deposed him, and put out his eyes; which Kbofrou promised to comply with, as soon as he should be thoroughly settled on the throne. In the mean time Babaram having insinuated to the principal officers of his army, that Kbofrou, notwithstanding he owed his crown to them, had yet a stronger affection to his family than to his people, whereby they had no hopes left, in case he should have it in his power to punish them for the revolt, b they determined, for their own sakes, to support their general, and to hazard all things rather than his and their safety under a settled government. With this view they suffered him to lead them to Madain; before which city when they arrived, Kbofrou drew out his forces in a plain called Niberjan, and offered them battle. The engagement was long and bloody; but Kbofrou was at length beaten, and forced to retire into the city, where going to visit his father, the poor old man advised him not to suffer himself to be shut up in the place, but to retire into the territories of the Greek emperor, till his affairs should take a happier turn. Kbofrou, having indeed no other measure to take, followed his father's advice, and disposed all things for his retreat. When he was about to withdraw, or, as some writers say, when he was actually out of the city, his uncles came to him, and represented the danger of leaving his father alive, even tho' he was blind, on a supposition that Babaram might re-instate him, and govern under his name; wherefore they very humanely proposed to go back, and put him to death. Kbofrou opposed all he could this detestable project; but his uncles however turned back, and, to secure themselves, strangled the old unhappy prince with a bow-string, when he had reigned fourteen years. This is a very different account from that given by the Greek historians, and yet all the Oriental writers concur therein; and their authority seems at least to be of as much weight as that of strangers, in a point regarding their own history¹.

Babaram Tchoubin.

Babaram Tchoubin, on the flight of Kbofrou, assumed the regal authority, tho' without the title. He was descended of the ancient princes of Rei, and was the tallest d man in the Persian dominions. He had served, when a youth, as a volunteer in the armies of Nouschirvan, and had risen gradually, and purely through merit, to the government of Media. As he was an excellent officer, and mightily beloved by the soldiers, so he was naturally loyal to his prince, and, in all probability, had maintained him on his throne, notwithstanding his ill conduct, if Yezdan Baksebe, who was his first minister, had not instigated Hormouz to treat him as he did. When he had once taken the resolution of rebelling against the king, he resolved also to dethrone him, and to transfer the empire to his own family; but not daring to declare this, he made use of the name of Kbofrou, till his scheme was ripe for execution. When he was informed of the flight of that prince, he sent a great detachment of horse e in pursuit of him, under the command of Siaonschan the captain of his guards, with orders to re-take him, if it was possible, and to bring him prisoner to his camp. This officer executed his orders so punctually, that he came up with Kbofrou and his uncles at a certain hermitage; whereupon Hindouiab, to preserve his nephew, put on the royal robes, and looking out of a window, which was very high, told the soldiers, who had already invested the place, that as soon as their commanding officer came up, he would surrender. On the arrival of the captain of the guards, Hindouiab resumed his own cloaths, appeared at a window, and, in the name of the king, besought that officer to grant him some respite for his repose; which was accordingly allowed, a strong guard being posted round the place. At evening Hindouiab came again to the window, told the captain of the guards, that the king was very sensible f of the civility shewn him, and besought him to lie there that night, that he might recover his spirits a little, and be the more able to bear the fatigue of travelling next day, where-ever they should think proper to carry him. This likewise was allowed; but the next morning Hindouiab acknowledged the fraud, and confessed that he did it to save his nephew, whom he personated when the place was first invested, that they might not pursue him any farther. Upon this he was made prisoner, and conducted

- a to Babaram, who ordered him to remain in confinement; but did not put him to death, because he affected to govern with greater lenity than his predecessor. He also gave out, that he would follow the example of Nouschirvan, and restore the lustre of the Persian diadem to its ancient splendor. A while the nobility remained faithful, and the people loved him; but, by degrees, they became dissatisfied with his conduct; and hearing that Khosrou was powerfully supported by the Greek emperor, they began to shew less inclination to his service. Babaram however set a great army on foot, and for a time maintained himself in possession. At last, after having been defeated in a general engagement, and finding himself quite borne down by numbers, he determined to retire to the khakan, by whom he was at first well received, and to whom he rendered great services by his military skill; but, after having been put off for many years with fair promises, he was at length poisoned, at the solicitation of Khosrou, who could never be easy so long as he lived ^m.

- Khosrou*, the son of Hormouz, was surnamed Perviz or Aperviz; concerning which Khosrou II. appellation the *Oriental*s are by no means agreed. Some say, that, in the ancient Persian tongue, it signifies victorious; others, the most glorious king. A great critic in that language affirms, that it signifies fish; and that Khosrou had this surname given him, because he was a great lover of fish. If we durst offer our own judgment amongst so many great opinions, we should say, that, as Aperviz in the ancient Persian tongue signifies a violent mover forwards, whence it is understood to signify fish, we should apprehend it ought here to be taken allegorically; and that, as a surname, it implies Khosrou the impetuous, which, we think, was well justified by the whole current of his conduct. We have seen, in the foregoing period, how he was set upon his throne by the assistance of the Greek emperor, whose forces, in conjunction with those of Khosrou, defeated Babaram Tchoubin in a pitched battle. Mirkbond relates this matter differently; he says, that when the two armies were drawn into order of battle, it was proposed by three general officers belonging to Babaram, that three others should be chosen by Khosrou, and that, to spare the effusion of blood, the issue of the business should be decided by these six champions; which being accepted, Khosrou put himself at the head of his troops, and, notwithstanding all that his uncles could do, fought Babaram's three generals one after another, and slew them all on the spot; whereupon the army of Babaram saluted him king, and Babaram himself, with a few of his friends, were forced to place their safety in flight. The eastern writers agree with the Greek historians in this, that Khosrou married a christian, and made her queen; but then they differ exceedingly as to the quality of this lady, most of the oriental writers affirming, that she was the daughter of the emperor Maurice; whereas the Greek authors alledge, that she was a woman of ordinary birth, with whom Khosrou fell in love for her beauty. This woman, whatever her quality was, by the Greek writers is called Mary, or Irene, and by the oriental historians Schirin, a name which signifies soft or agreeable. They report, that Khosrou loved her to distraction; and that, on the other hand, she despised him, and was in love with one Ferbad, a person of no great quality. They celebrate exceedingly the sweetness of her voice, and her skill in music; which, together with her amour, renders it improbable that she was the daughter of a Greek emperor, but that she was rather a dancer or music-girl. For her sake Khosrou was for a long time very kind to the christians; but in process of time, either from his jealousy of her, or from some other cause, he conceived a most implacable hatred against them; and finding a fair opportunity on the accession of Phocas to the Greek empire, he began to enter its provinces, to besiege its fortified cities, and to plunder all its subjects, without mercy, as hath been largely shewn in the former period. In the invasion of Judæa, and the sacking of the city of Jerusalem, he was assisted by the Jews, who made high professions of loyalty to this prince, that, under his protection, they might exhaust the christians by usury, and when they were totally despoiled of property, enslave their persons. Arabia, Egypt, and the islands in the Mediterranean, fell under the power of this victorious prince, who, as we before noted, might well deserve the surname of Impetuous, from the rapidity of his conquests ⁿ.

On his return to Madain, he wonderfully embellished the palace of his grandfather, disposing the upper part thereof in the form of a throne, which was supported by

forty thousand silver columns, and the concave over them was adorned by a thousand globes of gold, wherein all the planets and great constellations were seen to perform their natural revolutions, all the walls of this sumptuous place being covered with tapestry, wrought with gold flowers, and enriched with pearls and other precious stones. Underneath he had a hundred vaults filled with treasure. In the apartment of his women he had three thousand ladies, who were free, and twelve thousand slaves, the most beautiful that could be found throughout his dominions. His household troops were composed of six thousand men. In his stables he had six thousand horses and mules for his own riding; twelve thousand large mules, and eight thousand of the ordinary kind, served to carry his baggage. He had also nine hundred and sixty elephants, which he made use of in his armies. In the midst of all these fine things, the mind of Khosrou was very little at ease; for, not to enter into his family concerns, and the uneasinesses he had on account of his mistress Schirin, it is sufficient for us to know, that, as he grew in years, he grew excessively covetous, lost all manner of tenderness and compassion, and plundered his subjects in such a manner, that he alone was rich in all his vast dominions. He grew also excessively suspicious, and so jealous of the wealth he had amassed, that he made himself a slave in guarding it. His avarice likewise made him excessively cruel, insomuch that he put numbers of persons to death, without any visible cause. This was the rock on which his father split, and which proved no less fatal to him. His nobility, finding themselves absolutely unsafe while he remained upon the throne, determined to secure themselves at all events; and therefore addressing themselves to an officer of his, who was then at the head of the army, they prevailed upon him to seize the person of Khosrou, whom they instantly deposed, and elevated to the throne his eldest son (K).

Schirouieh.

Khobad Schirouieh, whom the Greeks call Siroes, was no sooner possessed of the diadem by the choice of the nobility, than he resolved to secure it, by depriving his father of life. To this purpose he sent for Mibir Hormouz, a nobleman, whose father Khosrou had caused to be put to death, and dispatched him instantly to the prison where Khosrou lay in chains. As soon as the king saw him, he rose up, and looking

(K) The character of Khosrou, both in this and in the former period, hath been so fully treated, that it might seem unnecessary to add any thing more concerning him; but if it be considered, that this prince was more terrible to his neighbours than any of his predecessors, his grandfather Nouschirvan not excepted, and that he really possessed greater dominions than any monarch of this dynasty, it will not seem strange, that we have so much to say about him. He promised, as we have seen in the text, to do justice on his father's enemies, of whom the principal were his own uncles; and in this he kept his word, for when they had established him upon the throne, he caused them to be put to death; and, by his example, his son first directed him to be murdered, then buried him splendidly, and lastly slew the person who executed his own commands. He was so excessively covetous, that, in his wars, he acted more like a partizan than a great prince; for, throughout all Syria and Mesopotamia, he first plundered the churches of all that was valuable in them, and then he ordered them to be demolished, that he might carry away the best of the materials employed in building them. He was likewise an outrageous persecutor, not certainly from any religious principle, but that he might maintain himself in the good opinion of the magi. It was impossible he should keep his conquests, because he stripped the people of all things that they possessed, and thereby drove them, if they escaped slavery, into other territories; whence if ever they returned, it was in quality of soldiers, to revenge themselves of so barbarous an enemy; whereas Nouschirvan treated all his new subjects in the frontier provinces with such extraordinary lenity, that there was nothing they feared so much as changing their master. All these devastations and plunderings were merely to fill those vaults, which, with so much care, he had built under his palace, and wherein he greedily desired to lay up the treasures of the whole earth. Indeed, if what the Persian historians say be true, he did amass more riches than any of his predecessors had ever seen. They tell us likewise, that when his protector, the emperor Maurice, and his family, were in distress, and had put all their jewels and riches on board two or three vessels, these ships coming on the coasts of Persia, he caused them to be seized, and confiscated all the treasure on board them, which he ordered to be brought and placed in one of the vaults under his palace, of which he had an hundred; and having sealed the door, placed over the head of it an inscription, signifying, that these treasures were brought him by the winds. When his subjects had deposed him, they could not find any prison so safe, or so proper, as one of those vaults, where, it is said, he was loaded with chains of gold, and had several days leisure to consider to how little purpose he had oppressed so great a part of the world; since neither power nor wealth could hinder his feeling as excessive a load of misery, as he had ever inflicted on the meanest of his subjects (30). Besides the account of his death given in the text, we have in another historian that which follows: Siroes his son sent for him into his presence, and having entered into a long detail of his cruelties and maladministration, he concluded thus: You cannot think it unjust or unnatural in me to order you to be put to death, since, for less than this, you pronounced the same judgment on your own father (31).

- a upon him with an air of wildness and fury, Man, said he, I caused your father to be put to death, and I bold him to be a bastard, who takes not the life of his father's murderer, when he has it in his power. Hormouz upon this drew his scymiter, and plunging it into the bowels of Kbojiou, left him wallowing in his blood. Returning to Kbobad, he gave him an exact account of what he had done, repeating also the strange salutation he had from Kbojiou, to which the king at that time made no answer; but having caused his father to be sumptuously interred, he sent for Mibir Hormouz, and having repeated to him the words of his father, said, You see how justly you are put to death, and ordered him to be slain in his presence. After this, Kbobad ordered all his brethren to be seized and put to death. He had eighteen in all, and two sisters.
- b Of these seventeen were murdered, and the eighteenth, whose name was Scheberiar, was concealed in the ancient city of Persepolis, and so escaped. As for his sisters, Kbobad spared them on account of their sex, and treated them with all imaginable kindness; but these ladies, when they saw their country invaded by pestilence and famine at once, and observed the general disaffection of the people, could not help reproaching their brother with his cruelty, charging on him the miseries of his people, and exhorting him, if it was possible, to repent. These discourses made such an impression on his mind, that he began to grow extremely melancholy, and at last the disposition of his mind inducing a fever, the plague seized him, and he died after a reign of six or eight months. He was succeeded by his son ^P (L)
- c Ardshir II. a youth of seven years old. His sisters and the nobility promised themselves great blessings under his reign, hoping they might have time to settle the affairs of the kingdom, and to ease the people of the excessive taxes with which they were burdened; but in this they were mistaken, for Scheberiar, the general of the army, who had seized and deposed his father, taking umbrage at the setting up of the son of his master without his participation, or rather making use of this and other frivolous pretences to colour the detestable scheme he had formed of seizing the crown, and extirpating the royal family, he marched with his forces to the capital city; and having easily vanquished those who remained faithful to their infant monarch, he put the child to death, with all the nobility who were strictly attached to him, and filled the palace with blood; after which, in pursuance of his project, he seized the sovereign authority, which he had so dearly bought. Authors do not agree as to the time Ardshir reigned; most of them allow him a year and a half; but Mirkbond is positive, that he reigned no more than fifty days ^q.
- d Scheberiar, as he attained the sovereign authority by treachery and cruelty, so Scheberiar. he governed by all the arts of a tyrant, and made the people know the difference

(L) The name of this prince is so differently written, that many mistakes and great confusion have arisen therefrom, not only among the Greek writers, but also among some of the moderns. Khondemir, Mirkbond, and the rest of the Persian historians agree in calling this prince Kbobad; but then they distinguish him by the surname of Schirouieh; whence the Greeks form their Siroes, tho' if they had followed their usual custom, they should rather have called him Carades. He was certainly well inclined to the christian religion; and that is the reason we have such different accounts of him. The Greek writers, and indeed the christian authors, in all languages, speak of him very tenderly, and either drop the story of his father's murder, or endeavour, tho' that be a hard thing, to palliate it. The oriental historians again draw him in the blackest colours, and say, that he broke his heart on account of the reproaches of his sisters, and of the terrible judgments from God, which fell upon his realm and people (32). There is however a circumstance relating to this prince, which, tho' it happened long after his death, deserves to be taken notice of, since it is one of the most curious passages in the eastern history, and is perfectly well attested. The caliph

Montaser having caused his father to be put to death, some small time after looking over the rich furniture in the palace, and causing several rich pieces of tapestry to be opened before him, that he might examine them the more exactly, amongst the rest he met with one, which had in it the figure of a very beautiful young man, mounted on a Persian horse, with a diadem on his head, and a circle of Persian characters round himself and his horse. The caliph, charmed with the beauty of the tapestry, sent for a person who understood the ancient Persic, and desired him to explain to him that inscription. The man read it, changed colour, and, after some hesitation, told the caliph, it was a Persian song, that had nothing in it worth hearing. That prince however would not be so put off, he readily perceived, that there was something in it extraordinary; and therefore he commanded the interpreter to give him the true sense thereof immediately, as he valued his own safety. The man then told him, that the inscription ran thus: I am Siroes, the son of Chosroes, who slew my father to gain his crown, which I kept but six months. This affected the caliph so much, that he died in two or three days, when he had reigned about the same space of time (33).

between a natural prince, and one raised to empire by his sword. The army, as it ^a assisted him in his enterprize against the young Ardjibir, so they expected, on his succeeding him, that he should pay the wages of their infidelity. This he was desirous enough to do; but as they not only demanded money, but insisted likewise on setting a price on their labour, he found it not very easy to content them; and this drove him upon extortion and oppression, the exercise of which did not hinder them from being guilty of the most notorious rapine. The eldest princess of Persia perceiving, that the nobility were generally dissatisfied, secretly influenced their minds, and intigated them to set their country free, by putting to death this usurper. Her arts had their effect, the people began universally to detest a monarch, whose conduct was as offensive, as the method by which he gained his crown was unjustifiable; ^b yet still there was nothing done; the cruelty of Scheberiar, and the madness of the army, restrained all things but complaints. Every one readily confessed they should be glad to be delivered from the miseries they were under; but nobody durst undertake this deliverance, lest so great a work should miscarry in their hands. At length Touran Docht fixed upon three brothers, all young men of great quality, and distinguished courage. She explained to them the present situation of affairs, the miserable condition of their country, and the impossibility there was of removing these grievances any other way than by the death of Scheberiar. She likewise observed, that however dangerous this might appear, it was as easily accomplished as projected; and that as he was not of the royal family, but an upstart, and generally hated, his death ^c would be agreeable to the people, and the man regarded as a hero, from whose hand he should receive it. These lessons had their effects; the brothers fixed themselves one day at the palace gate, and as Scheberiar came out, and was about to mount on horseback, they fell upon him, and killed him before he could receive any assistance from his adherents, when he had been called a king little more than two years. He was no sooner dead, than all the inhabitants of the city of Madain assembled to protect those who had killed him. In this assembly it was resolved to restore the crown to the royal family, and since there was not an heir male, to elevate the eldest of the princesses to the throne.

Touran Docht. Touran Docht, as soon as she received the crown, made choice of the eldest of the ^d three brothers, whose name was Ferokbzad, to be her prime minister, and general of her armies. This nobleman discharged his trust perfectly well; for he not only reduced the army to the obedience of his mistress, and engaged them to live peaceably among their fellow-subjects, but he also disappointed the Arabs, who, in the reign of this princess, made a vigorous effort to conquer Persia. Ferokbzad, with a considerable body of horse, was quartered in Chaldea, when he received advice, that Abou-Obeidab, general of the forces of caliph Omar, had thrown a bridge over the Euphrates, in order to come and attack the Persian army quartered in the vicinity of Babylon. Ferokbzad sent orders to the Persians to act on the defensive, while he, with the horse under his command, marched directly to the bridge, forced the Arab ^e guard, and having filled the vessels of which it was composed with combustible matter, set them on fire; then following the enemy's camp, he cut off their provisions, till a fair occasion offered of fighting, and then, having given a signal to his Persians to charge the Arabs in front, he, while the battle was hot and doubtful, fell upon them in flank and rear, so that they were totally defeated; and this vigilant general pursued the remains, that not so much as their leader escaped to carry the news of their defeat. In the mean time the queen acted in civil affairs with a firmness not to be expected from a woman; for having in vain endeavoured, by fair means, to engage some of the nobility to forbear plundering the people, she had recourse at length to harsher methods, causing them to be suddenly seized, and as ^f suddenly put to death. This endeared her to the commonalty, and so humbled the nobility, that they durst neither oppress their vassals as they were wont, nor undertake any thing against their sovereign, as they designed. But this peaceable situation of things lasted but a very short time; Ferokbzad being marched into the frontier provinces, in order to oppose the attempts of the Greek emperor, his mistress was seized with a violent distemper, which, in a little time, hurried her out of the world, not without strong suspicions, that she died a martyr to that love which she had shewn for the people. On her decease the public affairs fell into the greatest confusion: the a nobility began to see, that there was no trusting to the weakness of a woman; and therefore they fixed upon Giban Schedab, a prince of the royal blood, but a man of very mean parts, and declared him king, that they might govern as they pleased themselves. But when he came to be inaugurated, he said, That the imperial diadem was very heavy, and that it did not fit him. This the nobility would needs understand metaphorically, and as the effects of his modesty; but the people either saw, or fancied they saw, such evident simplicity in his looks, that, after a few days, they deposed him, and seated the youngest daughter of Khosrou Perwez on the throne (M).

Azurmi Dokht had as much sense as her sister, and is said to have surpassed her very much in beauty. On her first accession to the throne, she gave the people the strongest hopes of a mild and happy reign; but when the news of her becoming queen reached the province of Khorassan, Feroz Hormouz, who had been long governor thereof, conceived a violent desire of marrying her; and therefore, intrusting the province with his son of the same name, he set out for Madain, in order to carry his scheme into execution. The queen, knowing the restless disposition of the people, and the great power of this nobleman in his province, received him with great civility, and did him all the honours in her power; but all this had no effect; his passion or his ambition was so very strong, that nothing could possibly satisfy him less than being made the partner of her bed and throne; a thing she could not grant. Upon her refusal, her lover had the insolence to threaten her, and even to have recourse to force; upon which, in her own defence, she was constrained to seize him, and put him to death. His son, when informed of his father's catastrophe, forgetting the duty he owed his sovereign, and that his father had drawn this evil upon himself, marched immediately with an army to revenge what he held a disgrace; and having forced the city of Madain, stormed the palace, made the queen prisoner, and afterwards, notwithstanding all the tears and intreaties of her subjects, caused her in cool blood to be put to death. This enormous crime rendered him so obnoxious to all who had any sense of humanity, that, distrusting the army he had brought with him, he immediately retired back into Khorassan. After his departure, it was discovered, that when the children of Khosrou Perwez were put to death, a boy, his grandson, had been preserved by his aunts. This young man therefore the nobility brought from the place where he was hid, and resolved to bestow upon him the crown, the rather perhaps, because, excepting his birth, he had nothing that could recommend him. The name of this young prince was Ferozkhad. He was esteemed a good-natured, inoffensive lad, and, in quiet times, might very probably have made a very gracious prince. As it was, he had not time to give any signs either of ability, or of want of it; for before he had reigned a month, he was, on what account we know not, poisoned by one of his slaves, and the kingdom thereby thrown once more into confusion.

We are now arrived at the last of the Persian kings, whose name was Jezdegerd III. Ben Scheberiar, of whose pedigree it is necessary that we should give a clear account.

(M) The confusion of this country could not be greater than that of all its historians, in respect to its princes, or those who were called its princes, at this time. We have followed the catalogue of Khondemir, because he was an author of great judgment, and did not adhere implicitly to those from whom he wrote. The Spanish copy of Mirkhond hath a prince called Foonfchir, who is called the twenty-second monarch of this dynasty; and it is said, that he was nephew to Baharam Tchoubin; and this surname is said to signify a young lion, or a beautiful lion; but we acknowledge, that we are able to give no account of this matter, or to divine who this man should be. It is true, some christian writers mention one Khosrou or Chosroes, the grandson of the last Chosroes; but this is unintelligible, unless we suppose, that they meant Ardashir, who might be called Chosroes, because all the Persian kings were so called; which however is improbable. Perhaps after all, this Foon- fchir might be the same with Giban Schedab, of whom we have spoken in the text; and whose reign of a few days Khondemir hath omitted in his list. We must acknowledge, that there is little affinity between the names; but all the names in Teixera's version are so strangely written, that at least half the German critic's observation on the Persian kings are spent in reconciling them to the Arabic. There is, we know, a strong objection to this account of the matter; and that is, that Teixera also mentions this monarch, and likewise a son of his, whom he calls Kesere, by which doubtless he meant Khosrou. But to all this it may be answered, that, as we find these kings no-where else, we may safely suppose them to be but one and the same person; and that, instead of Foonfchir, Fasancedab and Kesere, we ought to read, Khosrou Giban Schedab. but all this is left to the decision of the reader (34).

(34) Teixera, c. 41. Schikard Tarich. Khondemir. Eben Batrich. Lebtarich &c.

Some of the Greek writers call him the son of Siroes; which is absolutely impossible ^a he should have been. Others, acknowledging this, say, he was the descendant of that prince in a remote degree. This however only carries the mistake a little further out of sight; for it is just as impossible that he should be his descendant, as that he should be his son. Mirkbond gives us the following account, which, tho' it hath something in it of the marvellous, yet, as it hath manifestly a mixture of truth, the reader must take it, till our acquaintance with the oriental histories procures him a better: Khosrou Perviz, towards the latter end of his reign, had a very odd dream. He fancied he saw the city, in which he then was, surrounded with a strong wall, adorned with eleven fine towers, and that these, while he was looking upon them, fell, one after another, to the ground; so that the city was left quite open and ^b defenceless. In the morning the king sent for some of the magi, told them his dream, and besought them to explain it; which they did to this purpose: That, by the fortified city, was represented the kingdom of Persia; by the towers, the princes who should succeed him; and by the open and defenceless condition in which it was at last left, the final subversion of the monarchy. The king, strangely alarmed by his dream, and quite distracted with its interpretation, began to cast about in his mind how to prevent its taking effect. Amongst other notions that came into his head, one was, that the number of his sons might cause great disturbance; for he had no less at that time than eighteen. He therefore ordered, that they should be all committed to custody, and so strictly kept, as not to have the permission of seeing their wives or ^c children. One of them, Scheberiar, having lately married a lady, whose name was Schirin, and being passionately fond of her, he first contrived a means of writing to her, and then of seeing her. The stratagem he made use of was this: he pretended to be seized with a fever, and desired that he might be let blood. Schirin, upon this occasion, personated a surgeon; and from this interview she became with child. When it was known, the historian tells us, that Khosrou ordered the child to be made away with, as soon as it should be born; but being at last mollified by the tears and passionate intreaties of the mother, he directed, that it should be exposed in the woods; which was accordingly done: but, by the care of its parents, it was soon taken from thence, and privately educated. If this be true, then the reason why ^d Siroes put his brethren to death will no longer remain a secret, but serve as a sufficient warrant to distrust all interpretations of dreams, which, we see, are often fatal, and almost always delusive. However, we think, that the dream of Khosrou might have been better interpreted; and, if it had, none of these bad consequences would have followed. It appears, by the age at which Jezdegerd mounted the throne, viz. sixteen, that this dream happened to Khosrou in the twenty-seventh year of his reign. The eleven towers therefore might have been understood to be the years he was still to sit upon the throne; and the desolate condition in which he saw the city, after they were fallen down, expressed perfectly well his own miserable circumstances at the end of that period. But to proceed: ^e

Jezdegerd the third, who appears to have been the grandson of Khosrou Perviz, ascended the Persian throne, and made choice of Ferokhzad, who had been his aunt's general, for his prime minister, and commander in chief. He was scarce arrived at man's estate, before he found the crown totter on his head, being attacked on all sides of his dominions by powerful enemies. Authors are extremely divided as to the beginning of his wars; for some alledge, that the Turks, that is, the inhabitants of Turquestan, the inveterate enemies of the Persians, invaded the frontiers of his dominion next them, and that, while he marched to make head against them, the Arabs invaded Chaldea; whereupon he was forced to return to oppose these. Others affirm, that the Turks did not invade his dominions; but that he sent for them to his assistance, but was so unfortunate as to be obliged to fight before they could come up. In this confusion, all that we can do is to report facts, as clearly, and as methodically as we can. It seems then, that the caliph Omar, being extremely desirous of reducing Persia under his dominion, sent a part of his army, under the command of Sâd, to penetrate into that country through Chaldea. Ferokhzad, who was upon the spot, took all imaginable pains to harass the Arabs in their march; and having an army superior to them in numbers, employed them continually in skirmishes, which were sometimes favourable to him, and sometimes otherwise. But Sâd perceiving ^f clearly,

- a clearly, that this lingering war would destroy his army, and that to very little purpose, determined to push forward, and force the enemy to a general engagement. The Persians declined this as long as they could; but at length finding a convenient plain, where all their forces might act, near the city of Cadesia, Ferokhzad drew up there in order of battle, and resolved to wait for the Arabs. It was not long before Sâd and his forces appeared, who seeing how advantageously the Persian army was posted, rejoiced thereat, as hoping that he should now be able to fight, which was all he sought; since a long war, at so great a distance from his own country, would have destroyed him, even if he had been successful in slight engagements. He therefore disposed his troops in the best order he could, and attacked the Persians with
- b great fury. There never was a battle more famous in history than this, not one that deserved it better, either on account of the resolution with which it was fought, or of the consequences that followed thereupon. It lasted three days and nights, the Persians retiring continually from one post to another, till at length they were intirely defeated; and, by this defeat, the capital city, and the greatest part of the dominions of Persia, fell into the hands of the Arabs. Most of the oriental writers call the Persian general Rostam; but we believe that was rather a title of honour, or a common name for all the champions of their country. The first thing they did was to seize on the treasures of Kbofrou, which were so immense, that some Mohammedan writers tell us, their prophet, to encourage his disciples, carried them to a rock,
- c which, at his command, opened, and gave them a prospect through it of the treasures in the vaults of Kbofrou!

On the loss of this battle, Jezdegerd retired into Chorassan; and, tho' he had not reigned above three years, lost, from that time forwards, all the rest of his domi-

He retires into Chorassan.

- nions, except the two dependent provinces of Kerman and Sigestan, which he held as long as he lived, partly by force, keeping up a considerable army about his person, and partly because the Arabs were not at leisure to carry on a war at such a distance. But tho' the king retired so early, some of the governors of his provinces maintained themselves longer, hoping to turn them into little kingdoms for their own benefit:
- d Among these Hormozan possessed himself of Khoubistan, and held it for some time; but being at length reduced to great extremities, he surrendered it up, and went in person to pay his duty to the caliph Omar, who received him kindly, and at whose request he embraced the Mohammedan religion¹.

- WHEN Jezdegerd had possessed the royal title about nineteen years, a new misfortune fell upon him; for one of the governors of the few towns he had left, betrayed it, and called in the Turks. This place was called Merou, seated on the river Gibon or Oxus, and therefore called Merou al Roud, or Merou of the river, to distinguish it from another Merou, lying, as well as this, in the province of Chorassan. Jezdegerd immediately marched with his army to give battle to the rebels, and their allies the
- e Turks. In this engagement he was defeated, and having, with much difficulty, reached the river, he found there a little boat, and a fisherman to whom it belonged. To him the king offered a bracelet of precious stones; but the fellow being equally brutal and stupid, said his fare was five farthings, and he would not take either more or less. While the king and he disputed, a party of the rebel horse came up, and knowing Jezdegerd, killed him. This happened in the year after Christ 652² (N).

(N) There hath been a great deal of dispute as to the settling the commencement of the æra Jezdegerica, so called from this last king of the Persians. It would be needless to cite what several chronographers have advanced upon this head, many of them, tho' great men in other respects, having shewn little skill on this subject, and at the same time not a little arrogance, in expecting that their decisions should be implicitly yielded to, even by those who were better informed; and therefore Dr. Hyde (41) had great reason to testify his amazement, that Peravius should assign three years for the reign of Jezdegerd; whereas there is no fact more certainly established, that that he died about the close of his twentieth year. The true state of this question is not, as most writers put it, whether the commencement of this æra ought to be fixed to the accession, or to the death of Jezdegerd? but where it is really fixed by the best Oriental authors? since our conjectures can have no effect upon their computations, and the utmost we can expect from them is to know how to regulate our own. The best of the Oriental writers fix the commencement of this æra very precisely at the 16th of June, in the eleventh year of the Hegira, and in the year of Christ 632 (42). Now, it is certain, that this date coincides family.

THE common opinion is, that, with this unfortunate prince, the majesty of the Sassanian line sunk irretrievably. But this, like many other common opinions, is far from being strictly true. Jezdegerd left behind him a son and a daughter. The name of the son was Firouz; and of the daughter Dara. The latter espoused Boshtenay, whom the rabbinical writers qualified with the title of head of the captivity. In fact he was the chief or prince of the Jews settled in Chaldea. As for Firouz, he still preserved a little principality, and dying, left an only daughter, whose name was Mab Afrid, who married Valid the son of the caliph Abdalmulek, by whom he had a son named Jezid, who became caliph, and consequently sovereign of Persia; who was so far from thinking himself above claiming the title derived to him by his mother, that he constantly styled himself the son of Khosrou king of Persia, the descendant of the caliph Maroan, and among whose ancestors, of the side of the mother, were the Roman emperor and the khakan. This end had the dynasty of the Sassanians, according to the Oriental historians; and consequently here ends this section ^b.

cides not with the death, but the accession of Jezdegerd; and if any are of opinion, that this æra ought to begin at his death, then it must begin in the thirty-first year of the Hegira, and in the year of Christ 652. Why the Eastern authors made choice of the accession, rather than the death of Jezdegerd, is a question that we can easily resolve. It is before shewn, that Jezdegerd had lived as a private man, as his father always did, till the Persians, understanding how just a title he had thereto, set him up on the throne. Now, the Arabs say, this was done with the consent of their khalif, who therefore looking upon him as his tributary, reckoned the kingdom of Persia among the rest of his dominions thenceforward, regarding the subsequent reduction of that country not as a conquest, but as the re-uniting a part of his empire torn away by a rebel. This is plainly the cause why the commencement of this æra is and ought to be fixed at the accession of Jezdegerd; which was what we undertook to prove.

The ancient state of Italy, to the building of Rome.

Description of Italy.

A^a S the several petty states and kingdoms, which we are to write of in this place, were anciently comprehended under the common name of Italy; for the better understanding of the present history, we shall premise a general description of that country, following therein the best guides of antiquity, and considering this beautiful region in its most flourishing condition, that is, in the times of the Roman republic, and in the reign of Augustus, that prince having introduced a new partition of the Italian provinces, which continued, without any considerable alteration, to the division of the empire.

Italy, a country once revered, and still admired, by all nations, was, in more ancient times, known by the names of Saturnia, Oenotria, Hesperia, and Aufonia. It^b was called Saturnia from Saturn, who, being driven out of Crete by his son Jupiter, is supposed to have taken refuge here. The names of Oenotria and Aufonia it borrowed from its ancient inhabitants the Oenotrians and Aufones; and that of Hesperia, or Western, given it by the Greeks, from its situation with respect to Greece. The name of Italia, or Italy, which in process of time prevailed over all the rest, some derive from Italus king of the Siculi; others from the Greek word Italos, signifying an ox, this country abounding, by reason of its rich pastures, with oxen of an extraordinary size and beauty^c. All these names were originally peculiar to particular provinces of Italy; but afterwards applied to the whole country.

THE limits of Italy have been fixed by nature itself, which seems not only to have^d taken more than ordinary care in supplying this happy region with every thing necessary both for the support and pleasures of life, but in parting it from all other countries, and defending, by strong barriers, its native riches from foreign invaders. Thus it is divided from Africa, Greece, the ancient Dalmatia, and Liburnia, by the Tyrrhenian, Ionian and Adriatic seas; and from Transalpine Gaul, and Rætia, now part of Germany, by a long ridge of steep mountains, called the Alps. The country comprised within these boundaries, is, according to Cluverius, about nine hundred miles in length; for such is the distance between Augusta Prætoria, now Aosta, at the foot of the Alps, and cape Leucopetra, now Capo del Armi, in the country of the Bruttii, or the Farther Calabria, as it is called by the present inhabitants. In shape it resembles a man's leg, rather than the leaf of an oak, to which the ancients compared it, and is consequently very unequal in breadth, being, at the foot of the Alps, according to the above-mentioned writer, five hundred and sixty miles broad; in the middle parts, that is, between Ancona and the mouth of the Tiber, an hundred and thirty-six; and in some places scarce twenty-five.

Italy, taking that word in its most extensive signification, was, in ancient times, like most other countries, parcelled out into endless petty states and kingdoms, which we shall have frequent occasion to mention in the sequel of this history. In after-ages, ^a when the Gauls settled in the western; and many Greek colonies in the eastern provinces of this country, it was divided, with respect to its inhabitants, into three great parts; viz. Gallia Cisalpina, Italy properly so called, and Magna Græcia. This division, as it has been generally adopted by the ancient geographers and historians, we shall follow in our present survey of Italy, after having acquainted our readers, that we do not design to describe in this place the many towns and cities of note, which ancient Italy contained, being well apprised, that such an undertaking would prove tedious to them, and at the same time oblige us to exceed the limits we prescribe to ourselves. On these two considerations, we shall at present take only a cursory view of them, such as may give our readers a clear idea of their situation with respect to each other, and reserve a more distinct account of them for the particular countries to which they belonged.

Cisalpine Gaul.

To begin with the first member of the above-mentioned division: The most western and northern provinces of Italy were in great part possessed by the Gauls, and thence called Gallia, or Gaul, with the epithets of Cisalpina and Citerior, because they lay on the side of the Alps next to Rome, and Togata, with relation to the Roman gown or dress, which the inhabitants used; but this last epithet is of a much later date than the former ^b. Plutarch ^c and Pliny ^d call the country we are speaking of Italia Subalpina, or Italy at the foot of the Alps; and Polybius simply Italy ^e. In like manner Brutus, in one of his epistles to Cicero, and Cicero in his answer to him ^f, give the name of Italy, without any epithet, to that tract at the foot of the Alps, where the ancient city of Epoedia, now Ivria, stood. Whence it is plain, that the large and fruitful provinces formerly possessed by the Gauls, were, strictly speaking, part of Italy, and called Gaul, only because inhabited by the Gauls, who first settled there in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus. This appellation was antiquated in the reign of Augustus, when the division of Italy into eleven regions, introduced by that prince, took place. And hence it is, that the name of Cisalpine Gaul frequently occurs in the authors who flourished before, and scarce ever in those who wrote after the reign of

Augustus. As to the boundaries of this country, it extended from the Alps and the river Varus, parting it from Transalpine Gaul, to the river Aesis, according to Livy ^g, or, as Pliny will have it ^h, to the city of Ancona in the ancient Picenum. Cicero ⁱ, Suetonius ^k, and Plutarch ^l, make the river Rubice, between Ravenna and Ariminum, the eastern boundary of Cisalpine Gaul. But these writers are to be understood as speaking of Gaul, after the Romans, under the conduct of M. Lepidus, had made themselves masters of Picenum and Umbria, and reduced them to the form of a Roman province, there being nothing more certain, than that these countries were anciently possessed, in great part, by the Senones ^m, and consequently comprised within the limits of Cisalpine Gaul; nay, they retained the name of Ager Gallicus, or Gallicanus, even after they were become a Roman province ⁿ. On the north, Cisalpine Gaul was divided from Rætia by the Alps, called Alpes Ræticae, and from Illyricum by the river Formio; but on this side the borders of Italy were, in Pliny's time, extended to the river Arfia in Istria ^o. On the south it reached to the Ligurian sea, and the Apennines parting it from Etruria; so that, under the common name of Cisalpine Gaul, were comprehended the countries lying at the foot of the Alps, called by Pliny and Strabo the Subalpine countries, Liguria, Gallia Cispadana, and Gallia Transpadana.

The Subalpine nations.

The countries bordering on the Alps were inhabited by the Vediantii, or Vestiantii, as Ptolemy calls them, the Vagienni, the Taurini, the Segusiani, the Salassi, the Leontii, the Libicii, and the Canini. The Vediantii inhabited the small tract lying on the east bank of the Varus, and extending from the Alpes Maritimæ, to the territory of Nicæa. Next to them, on the north side of the Alpes Maritimæ, and near the source of the Padus or Po, were the Vagianni. Cemelum, or Cemenelum, was the metropolis of the Vediantii; and Augusta Vagiennorum, now Saluzzo, of the Vagienni. The Taurini were parted from the Vagienni by the Po, on which river stood their metropolis, called first Taurasia ^p, and afterwards, from a colony sent thither by Augustus, Augusta Taurinorum ^q. Forum Vibii, another city of the Taurini, is placed by Pliny ^r at

- a a small distance from the head of the Po. North of the Taurini, and among the Alps, lay the kingdom of Cottius, from whom the neighbouring mountains were called Alpes Cottiae. The Segusiani were subject to him; and Segusio, Secusia, or Segusium, now Susa, on the Druria, was the metropolis of this small kingdom. The Salassi possessed the country lying between the Alpes Graia on the north, and the country of the Libicii on the south. Their chief cities were, Augusta Prætoria, and Eporedia, now Aosta and Ivrea, both on the Great Druria. For in this country there were two rivers, as Pliny observes^t, bearing the same name; the one, called the Great Druria, springing from the Alpes Graia, the other, which he styles the Little Druria, rising on the Alpes Cottiae. Augusta Prætoria was so called from a colony of three thousand Prætorian soldiers sent thither by Augustus. Eporedia, built about an hundred years before the christian æra, was first a Roman colony, and afterwards a municipium^a. The territory of the Lepontii lay between the Salassi, and the Lacus Verbanus, now Lago Maggiore. Their metropolis was Osceia, called by the modern inhabitants Domo d'Oscia. Next to them were the Libicii, or Libui, who possessed that tract, which was watered by the Sessites, now the Sessia. Their chief cities were Vercellæ and Laumellum, which still retain their ancient names. The country of the Canini lay between the lakes Verbanus and Larius. The Alpes Maritimæ, or maritime Alps, which we have mentioned above, extended from the mouth of the Varus to mount Vesulus, now Vesò in Piedmont, and were so called from their situation. The Alpes Graia, or Greek Alps, reach from mount Cenis to the ancient Mons Jovis, at present known by the name of The Great St. Bernard. Some ancient writers suppose, that Hercules passed these mountains at the head of an army of Greeks on his return from Spain, after he had subdued Geryon, and derive from thence the appellation of Alpes Graia. But Livy^w looks upon this expedition of Hercules as altogether fabulous.
- c

THE countries, which we have hitherto described, are by Strabo and Livy placed within the confines of the ancient Liguria, and the inhabitants counted among the Ligurian nations, with the epithets of Montani and Comati, to distinguish them from those who inhabited Liguria, properly so called. Some ancient writers, quoted by Pliny^x, derive the Lepontii from the Greeks, whom they suppose Hercules to have left in these countries after he had passed the Alps, by reason of their being disabled by the hardships they had suffered on that occasion from pursuing their march with the rest of the army. But this opinion has no other foundation than the similitude between the name of that people, and the Greek verb leipo to leave.

- Liguria*, properly so called, was bounded on the east by the river Macra; on the west by the Varus; on the south by the Liguric sea; and on the north by the Po. Cities of note in this country were, on the coast, Nicæa, now Nizza, built by the Maffilienses as a barrier against the Ligures Montani^y; Portus Herculis Monæci, now Monaco. Portus Herculis, and Portus Monæci were, according to Ptolemy, two distinct cities; for that writer speaks of a place, which he calls Tropæa Augusti, lying between them. But herein he was certainly mistaken, since all the ancient geographers and historians call the same place sometimes Portus Herculis, and sometimes Portus Herculis Monæci. This city is spoke of by Virgil^z, and described by Lucan^a. Albintemalium or Albium Intemelium, Albium Ingaunum, or Albingaunum, Vada Sabata, Genua, Portus Delphini, and Portus Lunæ; now Vintimiglia, Albenga, Vado, Savona, Genoa, Porto Fino, and Golfo delle Spezie, were all on the coast now called La riviera di Genoa. Cluverius supposes Vada, and Sabatia or Sabata, to be one and the same city, which he calls Vada Sabatia, but is therein contradicted by the learned Lucas Holstenius. Genua was in ancient times, as it is at present, the chief city of Liguria, and an emporium, as Strabo styles it^b, to which merchants resorted from all parts. The modern writers call it Janua, and pretend that it was built by Janus; but the ancients constantly write it Genua. It was destroyed by Mago the Carthaginian, and rebuilt by the Romans. Portus Lunæ is placed by all the ancients in Liguria, but the city of Luna, which stood on the east bank of the Macra, in Etruria^c. The inland cities of Liguria were Pollentia, Alba Pompeia, Asta, Aquæ Statiellæ, Forum Fulvii, or Valentium, Industria, Dertona, and Iria, now Pollenza, Alba, Asti, Acqui, Valenza, Tortona, Voghera. Industria was called by the ancient Ligurians Bodincomagum, because it stood on the Po, which was known to them by the name of Bodincus, that is, ^a the bottomless ^d. Some writers make the river Iria the eastern boundary of Liguria; but as Livy ^e places the cities of Calistidium and Litubium in that country, Cluverius extends its confines on this side to the river Trebia.

dana.

NEXT to Liguria lay Gallia Cispadana, extending from the Trebia to the city of Ancona, and bounded on the north by the Po, and part of the Adriatic, and on the south by the Apennines, parting it from Etruria. It was called Gallia from its inhabitants, and Cispadana, because it lay on the side of the Po next to Rome. This country was possessed by the Boii, the Lingones, and the Senones. The chief cities of the Boii, were Placentia, Parma, Mutina, and Bononia; of the Lingones, Ravenna, Forum Corneli, Faventia, Solona, Forum Livii, Forum Popilii, and Cæsena; now Ravenna, ^b Imola, Faenza, Citta di sole, Forlì, Forlino, Popoli, Cæsena; of the Senones, Ariminum, Pisaurum, Fanum Fortunæ, Sena Gallica, and Ancona; now Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, Ancona.

Gallia Trans-
padana.

Gallia Transpadana extended from the countries of the Lepontii, Libicii, and Canini, mentioned above, and counted by Strabo and Pliny among the Subalpine nations, to the Adriatic sea, and the river Formio, now Il Risano, parting it from Istria, being bounded on the south by the Po, and on the north by the Alpes Rætica, and Carnica; the former separating it from Rætia, now the Trentin, and the latter from the country of the Carni, now Carniola. This part of Cisalpine Gaul was inhabited by the following nations, the Orobii, the Insubres, the Lævi, the Cenomani, the Euganei, ^c and the Veneti, and contained many cities of great note. Of these, Comum, Bergomum, and Forum Licinii, now Como, Bergamo, and Pieve d'Incino, or, as others will have it, Berlasina, belonged to the Orobii; Mediolanum, Laus Pompeia, and Forum Inturnorum, now Milan, Lodi, Crema, to the Insubres; Novaria and Ticinum, now Novara and Pavia, to the Lævi; Brivis, Cremona, Mantua and Verona to the Cenomani; Sabium, Voberna, Edrum, and Vannia, cities long since demolished, to the Euganei; Patavium, Vicetia, or Vicentia, Ateste, Forum Allieni, Tarvisum, Ceneta, Aquileia, Forum Julii, and Tergeste, near the Formio, now Padua, Vicenza, Este, Ferrara, Treviso, Ceneda, Aquileia, Civitas di Friuli, Trieste, to the Veneti, by whom all that tract, which extends from the territories of the Euganei to the Formio, was anciently ^d possessed; but in after-ages the Carni made themselves masters of the country lying between that river and the Tilaventum, now the Piave.

so called.

Italy, properly so called, extended on the coast of the Adriatic from the city of Ancona to the river Frento, now the Fortore, and on the Mediterranean from the Macra to the Silarus, now the Sele, and comprehended Etruria, Umbria, Sabinum, Latium, Picenum, the countries of the Vestini, Marruccini, Peligni, Marssi, Frentani, Samnites, Hirpini, Campani, and Picentini.

Etruria.

Etruria, inhabited by the Etrurians, Tuscan, or, as the Greeks style them, Tyrrhenians, was bounded on the east by the Tiber, on the west by the Macra, on the south by the Tyrrhenian sea, and on the north by the Apennines. The inhabitants are divided ^e by Livy ^f and Dionysius of Halicarnassus ^g into twelve different nations, or rather tribes, each of which had their peculiar city, whence they borrowed their names. The cities were, Volturni, Clusium, Perusia, Cortona, Aretium, Falerii, Volaterra, Vetulonium, Rossellæ, Veii, Tarquini, and Cære, now Bolsena, Cbiusi, Perugia, Cortona, Arezzo, Civitas Castellana, Volterra, Grosseto, Cerveteri. The cities of Veii, Tarquini, and Cære, lie at present in ruins. Besides these, the following cities were in ancient times of great note in Etruria; on the coast, or at a small distance from it, Luna, Pisæ, Portus Herculis, Labronis, or Liburni, Populonia, Telamon, Cosa, Cosa, or Cossa, Centumcellæ, and Alsi, now Perice, Pisa, Livorno, Telamone, Ansidonia, Civitas Vecchia, Palo. The ruins of Populonia are to be seen near Piombino. In the inland ^f country stood Nepete, Sutrium, Falerii Faliscorum, Fanum Voltumne, Hortanum, Herbanum, Suana, Saturnia, Sene Julia, Florentia, Asulæ, Pistoria, Luca, called by the modern inhabitants, Nepe, Sutri, Civitas Castellana, Viterbo, Orti, Orvieto, Saturna, Saona, Fiorenza, Fiesoli, Pistoia, Lucca.

Umbria.

Umbria was bounded on the south by the Nar, now the Nera; on the north by the Adriatic sea; on the east by the Æsis, now Fiumicino; and on the west by the Tiber on the side of the Apennines next to Rome, and on the other side by the Bedefis, now il Ronco, which falls into the Adriatic at Ravenna. So that this city, Ariminum,

The other places of note in this country were, Sarsina, Urbium, Metaurense, and Hortense, Sentinum, Æfis, and Camerinum, or Camers, now Sarsina, Castel Durante, Urbino, Sentino, Jesi, Camerino. These cities stood between the Adriatic sea, and the Apennines. On the other side of these mountains were, Iguvium, Mevania, Spoletium, Tifernum, Nuceria, Camellaria, Afissium, Hippellum, Fulginium, Tuder, Interamnium, or Interamna, Narnia, Ameria, and Otriculi, or Oriculum, known at present by the names of Ugubio, Bavagna, Spoleti, Citta di Castello, Nocera, Affisi, Ispello, Feligno, Todi, Terni, Narni, Amelia, Otricoli.

b THE country of the Sabini lay between the Nar and the Anio, now the Teverone, the former separating it from Umbria, and the latter from Latium. Cures, whence the Romans were called Quirites, was at first the metropolis of the Sabini, and in after-ages Rcate, now Riete. The ruins of Cures are still to be seen at a place called Vecorio di Sabina. The other cities in this country worth notice, were Nursia, Eretum, Nomentum, Cutilia, and Amiternum, now known by the names of Norcia, Monte Rotondo, Lamentario. The cities of Cutilia and Amiternum have been long since destroyed; but there are still remaining some ruins of the former at Civita Ducale, and of the latter near the city of Aquila.

NEXT to the country of the Sabini was Latium, comprised at first within very narrow limits, viz. the Tiber, the Anio, and the Circæan promontory, now Monte Circilli; but after the reduction of the Æqui, Hernici, Volsci, and Aufones, reaching to the river Liris, called by the present inhabitants il Garigliano. And hence the distinction that frequently occurs in the ancients between Old and New Latium. In Old Latium stood the following cities; Rome, once the most powerful, and still the most stately and beautiful city of the world, Tibur, Prænestæ, Gabii, Tusculum, Aricia, Lanuvium, Alba Longa, so called from its length, and to distinguish it from another city of the same name in the country of the Marsti, Lavinium, Laurentum, Ostia, Antemna, Collatia, and Ardea, the metropolis of the Rutuli, a Latin nation. Of Gabii and the four last-mentioned cities there are now scarce any footsteps remaining; but the others are still known by the names of Tivoli, Palestrina, Frascati, l'Aricia, Citta Lavina, Albano, Patricia, Paterno, Ostia. Carseoli, or Carfula, Valeria, Sublaqueum, Algidum; now Arfuli, Vico Varo, Subiaco, belonged to the Æqui. Of Algidum some ruins are to be seen near an inn, which the Italians call l'Osteria dell' Aglio. Anagnia, Alatrium, Verule, Ferentinum, now Anagni, Alatri, Veroli, Ferentino were the chief cities of the Hernici. In the country of the Volsci stood Antium, Circæi, or Circæum, Tarracina, called also Anxur, Suessæ Pomelia, whence the neighbouring marsh was named, Palus Pomelina, or Pomptina, Velitræ, Cora, Norba, Privernum, Satia, Signia, Sulmo, Frusino, Fabrateria, Aquinum, Casinum, Atina, Arpinum, Arz, Sora, Fregellæ, and Interamna. The ruins of Antium, Circæi, and Suessæ Pomelia, are still to be seen at Capo d'Anzo, Citta Vecchia, and in the neighbourhood of Veletri. The other cities bear at present the names of Terracina, Veletri, Cora, Norma, Piperno, Sezza, Segni, Sermoneta, Frusinone, Falvaterra, Aquino, Monte Casino, Atina, Arpino, Arce, Sora, Ponte Corvo, l'Isola. In the country of the Aufones were Cajeta, Fundi, and Formiæ, at present Gaeta, Fondi, and Mola.

Picenum, the country of the Picentes, lay between the Æfis and the Alernus, now Pescara, extending from the Adriatic to the Apennines, where it joined Umbria, and beyond them reaching to the country of the Sabini. Their chief cities were, Ancona, once possessed by the Gauls, Castrum Novum, Castellum Truentinum, so called from the river Truentum, now the Tronto, Auximum, Septempeda, Tollentinum, Firmum. Picenum, Aſculum Picenum, Interamnium, and Atria, at present Ancona, Flaviano, Torre Segura, or, as others will have it, Porto d'Ascoli, Osimo, S. Severino, Tolentino, Fermo, Ascoli, Teramo, Atri. East of the country lay the country of the Vestini, which contained the following cities; Angulus, Pinna, and Avia, or Avella, now called Civita di S. Angelo, Civita di Penna, Aquila. Next to the Vestini were the Marrucini, whose small territory had but one city, viz. Teate, now Cbiati. The Peligni inhabited a small tract lying between the countries of the Vestini and Marrucini to the north, and the Apennines to the south. Their chief cities were, Corfinium and Sulmo; the ruins of the former are still remaining about eight miles from Sulmo, now known by the name of Sulmona. The Marsti were seated in an inland country, having the Peligni and Vestini between them and the Adriatic sea; on the other side the Apennines they they bordered on the countries of the Sabini and Æqui. They had only two cities, ^a viz. Alba Fucens, so called from the lake Fucinus, now Lago di Celano, near which it stood, and Marrubium. The former still retains the ancient name of Alba; but the latter is now called Morrea. Next to the Marrucini on the coast were the Frentani; in the inland country the Samnites between the Frentani and the Campani; and the Hirpini seated between Samnium, and the river Silarus, having Apulia Daunia on the north-east, and Campania on the south-west. The cities of Ortona, Anxanum, and Istionium, now Ortona, Lanzano, Guasto d'Amone, belonged to the Frentani; Bovianum, Æfèrnia, Sepinum, Allifæ, and Telesia, now Boiano, Isernia, Sepino, Alifi. Teleso, to the Samnites. Beneventum, Equus, Tuticus, Abellinum, and Compsa, now Benevento, Ariano, Avellino, Conza, to the Hirpini. b

Campania extended from the Liris to the promontory of Minerva, called still il capo di Minerva, being bounded on the north-east by Samnium, and on the south-west by the country of the Hirpini. In this tract, which was the most pleasant and fruitful of all Italy, stood the following cities; on the coast Liternum, Baja, Misenum, Puteoli, Neapolis, or Parthenope, Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Surrentum, now Torre di Patria, Baie, Monte Miseno, Puzzuolo, Napoli, Torre di Greco, Scafati, Sorrento; in the inland country, Capua, the ruins of which are still to be seen about two miles from the present city of the same name, Suessa Aurunca, Venafrum, Casilinum, Teanum Sidicinum, Calatia, Cales, Atella, Acerra, Nola and Nuceria, known at present by the names of Sessa, Venafrò, Nova Capua, Tiano, Cajazzo, Calvi, Aversa, Acerra, ^c Nola, Nocera. The small tract, lying between the promontory of Minerva, and the river Silarus, was inhabited by a colony of Picentes planted here by the Romans; Pliny ^b and Ptolemy call them Picentini to distinguish them from the Picentes, who inhabited Picenum on the Adriatic sea. The Picentini had but two cities, viz. Picentia, called by Strabo ^d the metropolis of the Picentini, but at present demolished, and Salernum, now Salerno.

Picentini.

Magna Græcia.

Magna Græcia comprised Apulia, Lucania, and the country of the Brutii. This country was called Greece, because most of the cities on the coast were Greek colonies, and spoke the Greek tongue. The inhabitants gave it the epithet of Great, not because it was larger, or near so large as Greece, properly so called; but merely out of ostentation, as Pliny informs us ^e. Apulia extended from the river Frento quite to the straits, parting Italy from Greece; but was divided into three parts, viz. Daunia lying between the Frento and the Aufidus, now l'Ofanto, Peucetia, extending from the Aufidus to the isthmus between Brundisium and Tarentum, and Messapia, called also Calabria and Iapygia, comprehending the peninsula. In Apulia, by which name the ancient geographers understand both Daunia and Pucetia, were the following cities; Teanum Apulum, Geryon, Sipuntum, Luceria, Æquulanum, Arpi, the ruins of which are to be seen near the present city of Foggia, Asculum Apulum, Venusia, Acherontia, Canusium, Cannæ, Salapia, Rubi, Butuntii, Barium, and Egnatia, now Civitate Tragonara, Siponto, Lucera, Troia, Ascoli, Venosa, Acirenza, Canosa, Canna, Salpe, ^e Ruvo, Bitonio, Bari, Terra d'Anazzo. In Calabria, Brundisium, Hydruntum, Castrum Minervæ, Callipolis, Tarentum, Neritum, and Aletium, now Brindisi, Otranto, Castro, Gallipoli, Taranto, Nardo, Lezze. Near Aletium stood in ancient times the city of Rudiae, the birth-place of Ennius.

Pucetia.

Lucania.

Lucania lay between the Silarus and the Laus, now the Laino, the former parting it from the country of the Picentini, and the latter from that of the Brutii. It was divided from Pucetia by the river Bradanus, now the Brandano, and from Calabria by the upper part of the Sinus Tarentinus, or gulf of Taranto. On the Mediterranean or Tyrrhenian sea stood the cities of Pastum, called by the Greeks Pesidonia, Velia, Buxentum; on the gulf of Tarentum, Metapontum, Heraclea, anciently called Siris and Sybaris, afterwards known by the names of Thurii and Copiae; in the inland country were situated Potentia and Grumentum. These cities are called by the present inhabitants, Pesto, Pisciotta, Policastro, Terre di Mare, Policore, Potenza, Clarimonte. The city of Thurii or Thurium was destroyed soon after the second Carthaginian war. f

THE Brutii possessed that peninsula which extends from Lucania to the straits, separating Sicily from Italy. In this corner of Italy, as we may call it, stood the following cities; on the western coast, Cerilli, Clampetia, Temsæ, Terina, Lametia, Scyllæum, and Rhegium, now Cirella, Amantea, Torre Loppa, Nocera, Sant' Eufemia, Sciglio,

These are the chief cities of Italy, which we shall describe, as we shall have occasion to speak of them in the sequel of the history.

- THE rivers, which it may be proper to take notice of in this place, are the Po, ^{Rivers.} called by the Latins Padus and Eridanus, which springs from mount Vesulus, now Vevo, one of the highest among the Alps, and discharges itself into the Adriatic sea by seven different streams, after having received into its channel above thirty rivers. On the Alps likewise rise the Druria, the Sessites, the Ticinum, the Addua, the Ollius, the Mincius, the Tanarus, the Trebia, and the Rhenus Bononiensis, now the Dora, Sessia, Tesino, Adda, Oglio, Mincio, Tanaro, Trebia, and Reno di Bologna. The Atbesis, now the Adige, has its source, like the others we have mentioned, in the Alps, waters the cities of Trent and Verona, and is the only great river in Lombardy that does not fall into the Po; which it must have done, had it run but a little further before its entering the Adriatic. The Arnus, and the Tiber, which receives the Clanis, the Nar, and the Anio, now la Cbiana, la Nera, il Teverone, spring from the Apennines, and fall into the Mediterranean. The Liris, which separates Latium from Campania; the Volturnus in Campania; the Silarus parting the Picentini and Lucani; the Sybaris and Crathis in Lucania; the Aufidus in Apulia; the Aternus and Metaurus in Picenum, now the Garigliano, Volturno, Silaro, Cochile, Crati, l'Osanto, Pescara, Metauro, were all rivers of great note, and are much spoke of by the ancients.

- THE chief mountains of Italy are the Alps and the Apennines, the former parting ^{Mountains.} it from Gaul, Vindelicia, Noricum, and Pannonia, taking Italy in its greatest extent, and the latter dividing it into two, almost equal, parts. Festus is of opinion, that the Alps borrowed their name from the Latin word Albus, which the Sabines pronounced Alfus, signifying white, because they were almost always covered with snow. But Isidorus ^a and Servius ^b, tell us, that in the language of the Celts all high mountains were called Alps: others derive the name of the Alps from one Albion, the son of Neptune, who, they say, was killed by Hercules in disputing his passage over these mountains. But not to lose time in such trifling etymologies, the Alps are a long chain of mountains, which begins at the mouth of the Varus, and after a great many irregular turnings of about eight hundred miles, ends at the river Arfia in Istria. The maritime Alps reach from Vada or Vado to the source of the Varus, the Cottia from the source of the Varus to the city of Susa, from thence the Graia to Little St. Bernard, and the Pennina from that mountain to Monte St. Gottard, or St. Gotthard; to the Pennina are joined the Alpes Rhæticae, which extend to the spring of the river Piave: those, which reach from thence to Istria, and the head of the Savus, are called Norica and Carnica. The Apennines extend from the maritime Alps, where they take their rise, quite to the straits, which separate Italy from Sicily. The mountains Maficus near Suessu, Gaurus between Puteoli and Baia, Fifata at a small distance from Capua, Vesuvius in the neighbourhood of Nola, and Garganus in Apulia, are much spoke of both by the ancient and modern writers ^c.

- Italy* lies between the thirty-eighth and forty-sixth degrees of north latitude, in the ^{Sail.} sixth and seventh north climate. We need not here enlarge on the fruitfulness and various productions of this happy region, it being well known, that whatever desirable things nature has dropt frugally here and there in other countries, are found in Italy, as in their original seminary; whence some call it the parent of plenty, others, the fountain of earthly bliss, the incomparable region of this globe, the garden of Europe, the epitome of the world, or rather a little world itself. The inhabitants of this country were once the triumphant lords and conquerors of the world; but at present the softer arts prevail; and in these they are generally thought to be as much superior to the modern, as their ancestors were to the ancient nations, in war and military exploits. But the ancient inhabitants of Italy shall be the subject of the following section.

Of the ancient state and first inhabitants of ITALY.

The inhabitants of Old and New La-
tium.

Aborigines.

Pelasgi.

Arcades.

THERE is such a disagreement among the ancients in what they have wrote concerning the first inhabitants of Italy, that we cannot pretend to give any satisfactory account of the primitive state of that country. We shall therefore only relate in this place what has been transmitted to us on so perplex and intricate a subject by the most creditable writers of antiquity, without taking upon us to prefer the authority of one to that of another, since they may be all, for ought we know, and as the most judicious among them seem to insinuate, equally mistaken. We shall begin with Latium, which rose by degrees to be the seat of a mighty republic, and of an empire, which had no other bounds than those of our hemisphere. Old Latium, which from the banks of the Tiber extended no farther southward than to the Circæan promontory, being bounded on the north by the Anio, and to the east by mount Algidus, only eighteen miles distant from Rome, was at different times inhabited by the following nations; viz. the Aborigines, Pelasgi, Arcades, Siculi, Aurunci, and Rutuli: New Latium, which reached to the Liris, by the Volsci, Osce, Aufones, Coriolani, Fidenates, and Sicani. Some historians are of opinion, that the Aborigines had that name given them, because they had been in Italy from the beginning, and did not derive their origin from any other: others changing the name of Aborigines into Aber-rigines, hold, that they were a wandering people, such being the import of that word, who coming from different countries, met accidentally in Italy, and there lived by rapine. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who was persuaded that they came from Arcadia, proposes two other opinions; viz. that they were styled Aborigines, because they lived on mountains, in which the Arcadians took great pleasure (A); or because they gave origin to the Latins (B)^r, who being descended from them, called them Aborigines, that is, the people from whom they derived their origin. The appellation of Aborigines in the first acceptation is derived from the Greek words Oreos Genos, that is, natives of the mountains, in the second from the Latin word Origo, which imports origin. The above-mentioned writer takes them to be one and the same people with the Oenotrii, who leaving Arcadia, their native country, crossed the sea, and settled in Latium above four hundred years before the Trojan war. The Pelasgi were originally Peloponnesians, who, being driven out of their country by the Curetes and Leleges, settled first in Theffaly, and removed from thence into that part of Italy, which is watered by the Po, and built there the city of Spina. Some of them crossed the Apennines, joined the Aborigines, and having made themselves masters of great part of Umbria and Hebruria, drove the Siculi out of those countries, and obliged them to fly for refuge into Sicily. They likewise took several cities of Campania from the Aurunci: but at length being afflicted with many calamities, they abandoned their conquests, and returned to Greece. From them the Aborigines borrowed many customs of Greece. About sixty years before the Trojan war another colony arrived from Peloponnesus in a part of Latium under the conduct of Evander the Arcadian, who being kindly received by Faunus, at that time king of the country, and suffered to settle on a small uncultivated hill near the Tiber, introduced the worship of the gods of his own

(A) Virgil speaks of the Aborigines as living dispersed on the mountains before the arrival of Saturn:

Composuit, legesque dedit* (1).

(B) This was, according to Servius, Virgil's opinion, which he takes to be plainly expressed in the following verses:

(1) Virgil. Æneid. 8. v. 321. Vid. Suid. in Aborigines.
l. iv. sub finem.

*Quin etiam vesterum effigies ex ordine arum
Antiqua ex cedro, Italusque, paterque Sabinus, Saturnusque senex, Janique bifrons imago, Vestibulo astabane, aliisque ab origine reges* (2).

By the last words Virgil meant, says Servius, the kings of the Aborigines, that is, the kings of the nation, from which the Romans derived their origin. In like manner Pliny calls the Tyrians, Aborigines Gaditani, because that city was founded by them (3).

(2) Virgil. Æneid. l. vii. v. 177. (3) Plin.

- a country, and taught the inhabitants the use of the Greek letters (C), and of stringed instruments of music. By this means he reformed the customs, and softened the manners of the Aborigines, who at the time of his arrival, still lived after a savage manner, and without any regulation of laws¹. Not long after another colony of Arcadians and Eleans arriving in Latium with Hercules, are said to have settled there, and made one people, with those whom Evander had brought with him.

THE Siculi were, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the first inhabitants of Siculi. Latium, but being driven from thence by the Aborigines and Pelasgi, and by other nations from all the countries of Italy, they took refuge in Sicily. As to the origin of the Siculi, *Pliny*² takes them to be one and the same people with the Sicani. If this opinion be true, they came originally from Spain, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Thucydides, and Philistus, an ancient Sicilian writer; but, according to Diodorus Siculus, from Sicily, that author being of opinion, that the Sicani inhabited Sicily from the first ages of the world. Sophocles says, they were called Siculi from one Siculus their king. The Aurunci or Arunci were originally *Aufones*³, of whom hereafter. Virgil speaks of them as a Trojan colony⁴. The Rutuli were descended from the Aborigines. These were the various nations, which at different times had been masters of all, or great part of Latium before the arrival of Aeneas. Rutuli.

- IN New Latium the Volsci were a very warlike people; but ancient authors give Volsci. no account of their origin. They only tell us, that they had a language peculiar to themselves. Their territory comprehended one of the most considerable portions of Old Latium. The Osce, Opici, or Obsci, were descended from the Aufones. From Osce. their name the etymologists derive the Latin word Obscænus, obscene; for they had the character of being licentious in their discourse, and leud in their manners, above the rest of the inhabitants of Italy. Their language was different from that of the Romans; for Ennius used to boast, as Gellius informs us, that he could speak Oscean, Greek and Latin. The Fidenates were a colony of the Albani, and the Coriolani of the Volsci.
Of the Sicani we have spoke above. As to the Aufones, they came originally from Greece, and were one of the most ancient colonies that settled in Italy. They first planted themselves in New Latium, but being driven from thence by new adventurers, they retired to that part of Campania, which lies between Teanum and *Capua*⁵.
They were called Aufones, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, from Aufon the son of Ulysses by Calypso, whom he supposes to have reigned over them while they were in Latium. But that writer is herein certainly mistaken, since they had the name of Aufones, long before the arrival of Aeneas, and consequently before the supposed king Aufon could be born. From them first the countries, where they settled, and afterwards all Italy, took the name of Aufonia. Fidenates. Coriolani.

- NEXT to Old Latium lay Heturia, which was inhabited by the Tyrrhenians, Hetrusci. called also Hetrusci, Etrusci, Tusci, and sometimes Thusci. The name of Tyrrhenians they borrowed from their leader Tyrrhenus, that of Hetrusci from one of their kings, and the last from the Greek word Thuo, to sacrifice, the Hetruscans having been skilled above all other nations in the ceremonies that were used in the performing of sacrifices⁶. They came originally, according to the common opinion both of the Greek and Latin writers, from Lydia, under the conduct of Tyrrhenus, as we have related in the history of *Lydia*⁷, and arriving in Italy, settled first in that tract, which lies between the Adriatic sea and the Apennines, after having driven out the Umbri, and taken from them, as Pliny informs us⁸, three hundred cities. Being animated by the success that attended them on their first arrival, they extended their conquests beyond the Apennines, and made themselves masters of the territories of Nola and Capua, and almost of the whole coast of that sea, which from them took the name of Tyrrhenian. These countries they held till the invasion of the Gauls, when they were driven from the coast of the Adriatic sea by that warlike nation, and from Campania by the Latins; so that ^a they were obliged to take refuge in that country, which lies between the Macra and Tiber, and is called by all the ancients Hebruria.

Ligures.

THERE is a great disagreement among authors about the origin of the Ligures. Dionysius of Halicarnassus owns, that he cannot determine whether they were descended from the Gauls, or from some of the ancient nations inhabiting Italy. Strabo speaking of the various tribes living among or near the Alps, says, that they were all originally Gauls, except the Ligures ^d; and elsewhere seems inclined to believe, that Liguria was first peopled by Greek colonies. Some carry up their origin to the fabulous heroes of antiquity, and others, led by the ^e similitude of names, to the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus ^f, as attending Xerxes in his expedition into Greece. The Ligyes are ^b placed by some ancient geographers in Colchis, by others in Albania. Sextus Pompeius will have the Ligures to be descended from the Siculi ^g. But the most common opinion is, that they came originally from Celtic Gaul. Of this origin Cluverius ^h discovers some traces in the word Bodencus, which was, according to Polybius and Pliny, the name the Ligures gave to the Po to express the depth of that river. The word Boden as the same writer observes, is still used by the Germans, and signifies bottom; whence he concludes, that the Ligures had the same origin with the inhabitants of Germany, who were, without all doubt, so many branches of the ancient Celtae. But when or on what occasion these Gauls removed from their native country, we find no-where recorded. However, it is past doubt, that they were some of the most ancient inhabitants of Italy, and consequently that they crossed the Alps many ages before those Gauls, from whom Cisalpine Gaul took its name. ^c

Umbri.

THE Umbri are counted by the Roman writers among those nations, of whose origin we have no records, and therefore styled the Aborigine of Italy. The name of Umbri or Ombri Pliny ⁱ derives from the Greek word Ombros, signifying a show, because they had escaped a deluge occasioned by violent showers, which had laid their lands under water. Before the arrival of the Tyrrhenians, they possessed great part of that country, which was afterwards known by the name of Cisalpine Gaul; but were driven from thence by the Tyrrhenians, as the Tyrrhenians were in their turn by the Gauls. ^d

Sabini, Picentes, Frentani, &c.

THE Sabini were, according to some ancient writers, a colony of Lacedaemonians, according to others, the offspring of the Aufones. The name of Sabini they took, if Portius Cato is to be credited, from Sabinus, the son of Sancus or Sabus, whom they worshipped under the name of Dius Fidius. From the Sabini were descended the Picentes, Frentani, Marrucini, Peligni, Vestini, Marfi, Æqui, Hernici, and the Samnites; from the Samnites, the Ilirpini, Lucani, Bruttii, and Campani.

OEnotrii.

THE OEnotrii were, according to most of the ancient writers, originally Arcadians. Dionysius of Halicarnassus says, that they were the first Greeks who passed the Ionian sea, and settled in Italy under the conduct of OEnotrus and Peucetius, two sons of Lycæon king of Arcadia. Peucetius landed at the Iapygian promontory, made himself ^e master of Apulia and Calabria, and from his own name called the inhabitants Peucetii; and hence that tract was named Apulia Peucetia. OEnotrus landed on the opposite coast, and possessed himself of Lucania and Brutium. From him this tract was called OEnotria, and not from the Greek word Oinos, as Servius ^h pretends, because this country produced great plenty of excellent wines. The OEnotrians spread themselves afterwards into Umbria, and, according to some writers, as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabini. A modern writer is of opinion, that the OEnotrus of the ancients was Noah, who, to avoid the insults and evil designs of Ham, came with Japheth and Gomer into Italy, and reigned in Latium under the name of Janus, which he derives from the Hebrew Jain, and the Chaldee Jaino, signifying wine, because he first planted ^f vines, and discovered the secret of pressing grapes, and making their juice potable ^l. For this reason the Greeks called him OEnotrus, which in Greek answers the surname of Janus. But after all, these are only conjectures, which every one may adopt or reject as he pleases. Some are of opinion, that the OEnotrii were the first inhabitants of Italy; but most of the ancients tell us, that the country, where they settled on their arrival, was first possessed by the Aufones, whom they drove out.

a THE Crotoniates, Locrenses, Tarentini, Messapii, Apuli, Salentini, Calabri, and Iapyges, were, without all doubt, of Greek extraction, and settled in that part of Italy, which from them was called Great Greece, many ages after the Umbri, Siculi, and Aufones, which three nations are reckoned by most of the ancients among the Aborigines, or natives of Italy, as if they had been there from the beginning, and did not derive their origin from any other nation. Of the Gauls, and their different transmigrations into Italy, we shall have occasion to speak in a more proper place.

Thus far we have related what we find in profane historians concerning the first inhabitants of Italy. But Eusebius and Cedrenus ^m, looking upon their accounts as fabulous, tell us, that Italy was first peopled by the descendants of Kittim, the fourth son of Javan, who, being planted in that part of Greece, which has been since called Macedon, spread themselves, as their numbers increased, as far as Ætolia, and from thence advanced in quest of a more fertile soil to the coasts of the Adriatic sea, which they crossed, and settled at last in that fruitful and pleasant country, which was afterwards known by the name of Italy. The opinion of these writers is in some degree confirmed by what we read in Suidas, who tells us in express terms, that the Latins were anciently called Ketii. Besides, Dionysius of Halicarnassus mentions a city in Latium called Ketea, and Aristotle speaks of a lake near Cumæ, named Ketus ⁿ. Reineccius, falling in with Eusebius and Cedrenus, is of opinion, that Italy did not take that name from Italus king of the Ænotrians, but from Ætolus, and a colony of Ætolians, that is, of the descendants of Kittim, who under him settled in that country. He observes, that by only throwing out the first letter of Ætolia, and changing the o into a, which change is found in the name of Æthalia, an island near Italy, peopled by the Ætolians, it becomes Italia. So that Italy, according to these writers, was first peopled by the descendants of Kittim, who had settled in Ætolia, or, as the Greeks write it, Aitolia. The way into so pleasant a country being once shewn, it was not long before the Pelaëgi, the Arcadians, and other Greek nations followed their countrymen, and settled in the eastern and southern parts of Italy, while the Tyrrhenians from Lydia, and the Celtae, afterwards called Ligurians, from beyond the Alps, planted themselves in the western and northern provinces. Thus was Italy, before the arrival of Aeneas, possessed by Greeks, Lydians, and Celtae.

SECTION III.

Of the ancient kings of Hetruria, Latium, and Alba.

e T HE Hetrurians and Latins are the only two nations in Italy, of which we find any thing recorded worth mentioning before the foundation of Rome. We are told indeed, that the Umbrians and Ligurians made once a great figure; that the former were masters of the best part of Italy, and that the latter were governed by their own kings, princes of great power, many ages before the arrival of Aeneas in Latium; but this is all we know of them, till their wars with the Romans rendered them more famous. We shall therefore confine ourselves to the Hetrurians and Latins, though we can give even of them but a very indifferent account, what authors tell us of those distant ages being so blended with fables, as to leave us no way of coming at the truth. However, it seems past all doubt, that the Hetrurians or Etrurians were for many ages the most powerful people of Italy: for Livy ^o tells us in express terms, that they not only possessed a great share of the inland countries, but were masters of all the coast of the Tyrrhenian sea from the Alps quite to the straits of Sicily. The cities of Capua, Nola, Mantua, Bononia, first called Felsina, Adria, and Ravenna, are said to have been built by them. Virgil ^p calls them a nation renowned in war, and most of the ancients speak of their kings as mighty princes, and lords of extensive dominions. As to their form of government, it was at first monarchical, the whole nation being subject to one prince. But in process of time this great state was divided into twelve cantons, called leucumonies, which were governed by twelve chiefs styled leucumomes. Over the leucumonies was placed one, vested with a kind of sovereign authority, and chosen by the people, who gave him the name of lars, a title borrowed,

it seems, from the Egyptian tongue; for Manetho gives that title to some of the ancient kings of Egypt. Sometimes we find one leucumony carrying on a war by itself, and at other times all the leucumonies joined in one national body in defence of their common liberties; which plainly shews, that their government under the lartes was not monarchical, but rather aristocratical. When the war was undertaken by the unanimous consent of all the leucumonies, the general, or commander in chief, was attended by twelve lictors carrying the fasces before him, it being customary for each leucumony to send one; so that it was easy to judge from the number of the lictors, how many leucumonies were engaged in the war. We have enumerated above the capital cities of the twelve leucumonies, and shall only add here, that each of them was empowered to chuse a king peculiar to themselves, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. As to the religion of the Ettrurians, it is well known, that most of the Roman ceremonies were borrowed from them, especially the use of sacrifices, divinations, and auguries, and that Ettruria was looked upon by the Romans as the mother of all politeness and learning, before they subdued Greece. For thither they sent their children to improve their knowledge, and cultivate their minds. The gods worshipped by the ancient Ettrurians were, Janus, Jupiter, Vertumnus, Volumnus, Volumna, Voltumna, Viridianus, Curis, Nurtia, Fortuna, Pallas, &c. Their language was different both from the Greek and Latin, as is manifest both from Dionysius of Halicarnassus^a, and from some ancient monuments, which are still to be seen in the cities of Florence and Arezzo. The accounts of their kings transmitted to us by the ancients, are so interwoven with fables, that in our opinion they deserve little or no credit. We find a great many of those princes occasionally mentioned by the writers of the Roman history; but as to the time, in which they reigned, and the order of their succession, we are quite in the dark. Janus is said to have been the first who reigned in Ettruria^b; but who this Janus was, we find no-where recorded. Some take him to be Tyrrhenus, the Lydian; others will have him to have reigned many ages before the arrival of the Lydian colony. The kings sprung from him are styled by the ancient writers Janigenæ; and among them are counted the following princes; Tiberinus, Vertumnus, Aunus, Anus, Debeberis, and Tiber. Tiberinus is said to have killed his father Janus^c. Aunus is mentioned by Silius Italicus^d. Anus is said by Strabo^e to have been drowned in the river Parentius, which was thenceforth from him called Anio. Debeberis and Tiber were both drowned in the river Albula, which from them borrowed the names of Debeberis and Tiber, as Sextus Pompeius informs us^f. Besides these, we find mention made of Coritus, Aeolus, Etruscus, Tuscius, Rasena, Tarcon, Ocnus, Mezentius, Astlas, Abas, Massicus, Osinus, Morrius, Clusius, Vicinus, Olenius, Porfenna, or Porfenna, Tolumnius. Cotirus had Jasius and Dardanus by Electra the daughter of Atlas king of Mauritania. Upon his death, the two brothers falling out about the succession, Dardanus killed Jasius, and being on that account obliged to abandon his native country, he took refuge first in Samobrace, and afterwards in Pbrygia, where he married the daughter of Teucer, and became the parent, as Virgil styles him, of the Trojan nation^g; for he succeeded Teucer, and built Dardania, afterwards called Troy. From him the Trojans were named Dardanidæ. Aeolus is mentioned by Plutarch^h as reigning over Ettruria, and the islands of the Tyrrhenian sea. Etruscus and Tuscius, from whom the Ettrurians took the name of Etrusci and Tusci, are spoke of by *Servius*ⁱ and Sextus Pompeius^j, as are Rasena and Tarcon by Dionysius of Halicarnassus^k, and Virgil. Tarcon was contemporary with Aeneas, and is said to have built the twelve cities, which afterwards became the capitals of the twelve leucumonies. Ocnus, Mezentius, Astlas, and Abas, are well known from Virgil's Æneid. Of the other kings, we shall have occasion to speak in the history of Latium. The emperor Claudius is said by Suidas and Suetonius to have wrote the history of Ettruria in twenty books; but as neither that performance, nor the works of Sostratus, often quoted by Strabo, when he speaks of the Etruscan affairs, have reached our times, we know but very little of the ancient state, government, and laws, of that once powerful nation.

The kings of Latium.

THE kings we find mentioned as reigning in Latium before the arrival of Aeneas, are Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Picus is supposed by Virgil^c and others to have been

- a the son of Saturn; but Vossius is of opinion, that there never reigned any king of that name in Latium, and looks upon all that is said of Picus as quite fabulous^d. The next king is Faunus, supposed to have been the son of Picus. In his time Evander landed with a colony of Arcadians in a port of Latium, and being allowed by him to settle with his followers on a small uncultivated hill near the Tiber, built there a city, which he called Pallantium, that being the name of the capital of his dominions in Arcadia, which he had been constrained to leave for having accidentally killed his father Echemus. Faunus was succeeded by Latinus his son, according to Virgil^e, by a nymph, named Marica; according to others, by one of the mistresses of Hercules; for that hero is said to have arrived in Latium during Faunus's reign. Faunus had married
- b to his first wife his own sister Fauna, a famous prophetess; but as she brought him no children, and a son was born to him after his marriage with Hercules's mistress, it was thought that the child was rather Hercules's son than his. But however that be, the name of Latinus is very famous in history, not on account of any military exploits performed by him, but for the arrival of Aeneas in Latium, which happened in his reign. Aeneas arrives in Latium, near after the flood 1822. Before Christ 1177.
- c This prince was engaged in a war with the Rutuli, in which he was attended but with very indifferent success, when news was brought him that a foreign army had made a descent on his coasts, pillaged the maritime parts of his dominions, and were fortifying themselves in a camp at a small distance from the sea. Hereupon he marched against them with all his forces, hoping to oblige them to reimbarque and abandon his dominions, without meeting with any great resistance from a band of vagabonds, as he supposed, or pirates, come only to seek for plunder. But finding them, as he drew near, well armed, and regularly drawn up in battalia, he thought it adviseable to forbear engaging troops that appeared so well disciplined, and instead of venturing a battle, to desire a parley. In this conference, Latinus understanding who they were, and being at the same time struck with terror, and touched with compassion, for those brave, but unfortunate men, entered into a treaty with them, and assigned them a tract of land for a settlement, on condition that they should employ their arms, and exert their valour in defence of his dominions, and look upon the Rutuli as a common enemy. This condition Aeneas readily accepted, and complied with his engagement so faithfully, that
- d Latinus came at length to repose an intire confidence in the Trojan, and in proof of it gave him Lavinia, his daughter, and only child, in marriage, securing to him by that means the succession to the throne of Latium^f. Aeneas, to testify his gratitude to Lavinia, and affection for Lavinia, gave her name to the camp he had pitched, and instead of Troy called it Lavinium. The Trojans followed the example of their leader, and by marriages making alliances with Latin families, became in a short time one and the same people with the Latins. Marries Lavinia.

- In the mean time Turnus, the queen's nephew, who had been brought up in the palace under the eye of Latinus, and entertained hopes of marrying Lavinia, and succeeding to the throne, seeing the princess bestowed on a stranger, and all his views defeated, went over to the Rutuli; and by stirring them up, brought on a battle between them and the Latins, in which both he and Latinus were killed. Thus Aeneas, by the death of his father-in-law, and by that of a troublesome rival, came into the quiet possession of the kingdom of Latium, which he governed with great wisdom, and transmitted to his posterity^g (D). Succeeds to the kingdom of Latinus.

(D) The genealogy of the kings of Latium we have here mentioned, is given by Virgil in the following verses:

Rex arva Latinus & urbes
Jam senior longa placidas in pace regebat.
Hunc Faunus & nymphæ genitum Laurente Marica
Accipimus. Fauno Picus pater; isque parentum
Te, Saturnus, refert; is, sanguinis, ultimus auctor (5).

But other writers, disagreeing with Virgil, speak of a long series of kings reigning in Latium before Picus, the grandfather of Latinus. Among these they mention two Saturns, and two Faunus's, and suppose the elder Faunus to have lived two hundred years before him, who was the father of Latinus. He is said to have been the first who civilized the inhabitants of Italy, and introduced a kind of religion among them, and was on that account honoured as a god. Vossius, as we have hinted above, believes that there never was in Latium a king bearing the name of Picus, and ascribes this common notion to a fabulous tradition reported by Dionysius Halicarnassus, viz. that in a certain province of Latium the god Mars had delivered his oracles by a mysterious bird, called in the language of the country, Picus, that is, woodpecker. Other writers count Faunus, OEnotrus, and four kings bearing the name of Latinus, among the ancient princes of Latium. Virgil

(5) Virgil. Æneid. l. vii. v. 45, & seq.

Aeneas is said to have reigned three years, during which time he established the worship of the gods of his own country, and to the religion of the Latins added that of Troy. The two palladiums (E), which had been the protectors of that city, became the tutelary deities of Lavinium, and in after-ages of the whole Roman empire. The worship of Vesta was likewise introduced by Aeneas, and virgins, from her called Vestals, appointed to keep a fire continually burning in honour of that goddess. Jupiter, Venus, and many other deities, who had been revered in Troy, became, in all likelihood, known to the Latins by means of Aeneas; which gave occasion to the poets of representing him under the character of a pious hero.

Aeneas.

WHILE Aeneas was thus employed, the Rutuli, ancient enemies of the Latin name, entering into an alliance with Mezentius, king of the Tyrrhenians, took the field with a design to drive out those new-comers, of whose power they began to conceive no small jealousy. Aeneas marched out against them at the head of his Trojans and Latins. Hereupon a battle ensued, which lasted till night, when Aeneas, being pushed to the banks of the Numicus, which ran close by Lavinium, and forced into that river, was there drowned. The Trojans concealed his body, and pretending that he had vanished away on a sudden, made him pass for a deity among his credulous subjects, who, accordingly, erected a temple to him under the title of Jupiter Indiges (F)¹. Such was the end of Aeneas, the Trojan prince so much celebrated by the Greek and Latin poets. Of his progenitors, birth, and behaviour, during the siege of Troy, and adventures after the fall of that city, till his settling in Latium, we have spoke at length elsewhere², and therefore shall not break off the thread of our history to give in this place any farther account of that hero.

Ascanius.

UPON the death of Aeneas, his son Euryleon, called also Ascanius and Iulus, ascended the throne (G). But as the young prince did not think it advisable to venture a battle in the very beginning of his reign with a formidable enemy, who promised himself great success from the death of Aeneas, he had the prudence to confine himself within the walls of Lavinium, and to try whether he could by an honourable treaty put an end to so dangerous a war. But the haughty Mezentius demanding of the Latins, as one of the conditions of a peace, that they should pay him yearly, by way of tribute, all the wine produced in the territory of Latium, Ascanius rejected the proposal with the utmost indignation, and having caused all the vines throughout his dominions to be consecrated to Jupiter, and by that means put it out of his power to comply with the enemy's request, he resolved to make a vigorous sally, and try whether he could, by force of arms, bring the insulting Tyrrhenian to more reasonable terms. The main body of the enemy's army was incamped at some distance from Lavinium; but Lausus the son of Mezentius, with the flower of their youth under his command, lay intrenched at the very gates of the city. The Trojans, who had been long accustomed to make vigorous sallies, marching out in the night, attacked the post where Lausus commanded, forced his intrenchments, and obliged the troops he had with him to save

Virgil himself owns, that the inhabitants of Latium were called Latins long before the reign of king Latinus, who received Aeneas; for he introduces Juno addressing Jupiter in favour of the Latins, and intreating him not to suffer the ancient name of Latins to be changed into that of Trojans. His words are;

*Pro Latio obtestor, pro majestate tuorum, &c.
Ne vetus indigenas nomen mutare Latinos,
Nem Troas fieri jubeas, Teucrosque vocari* (6).

(E) These were two statues, whereof one was the original, and the other the copy; so that, properly speaking, there was but one true Palladium, of which we have spoke at length in the history of Troy, to which we refer our readers (7).

(F) The inscription, according to Aurelius Victor, was conceived in these words, Patri Deo indigenti. The word Indiges in the Latin tongue signified one of those gods who had been of the race of men, and at length were deified. The temple or tomb of Aeneas, in the time of Dionysius Halicarnassus, was nothing but a rising spot of ground set round with trees. Perhaps, says that writer, it was the tomb of Anchises, who died but a year before his son (8). Livy likewise tells us, that Aeneas had divine honours paid him under the name of Jupiter Indiges (9).

(G) Euryleon was, according to some, the son of Aeneas, by Crensa, according to others, by Lavinia. He was called Ascanius from a river in Phrygia bearing that name, and Iulus, which name was afterwards changed into Iulus, from Ilium or Troy. Cato, as quoted by Servius (10), derives Iulus from the Greek word ιουλος, signifying the soft and tender hair which first appears on the face, and pretends that this name was given to Ascanius, because he killed Mezentius in a single combat, when he was very young. But herein he contradicts all the ancient historians, who speak either of Iulus or Mezentius.

a themselves by flight to the main body of the army incamped on the plain. But the unexpected arrival and overthrow of their advance-guard struck them with such terror, that instead of stopping the flight of their companions, they fled with them in great disorder to the neighbouring mountains. The Latins pursued them, and in the pursuit Lausus was killed, whose death so discouraged Mezentius, that he immediately sued for peace, which was granted him upon condition, that for the future the Tiber should be the boundary between the Latin and Hebrurian territories^k.

In the mean time Lavinia, who had been left with child by Aeneas, entertaining a strong jealousy of the ambition of her son-in-law, retired to the woods, and was there peaceably delivered of a son, who from his father was named Aeneas, and from the place of his birth had the surname of Sylvius. But as the queen's flight, who had disappeared on a sudden, raised suspicions at Lavinium prejudicial to the reputation of Ascanius, he used all possible means to remove them, caused diligent search to be made after Lavinia, calmed her fears, and prevailed upon her to return to the town with her son, whom he ever after treated as a brother. Lavinium grew every day more populous; but as it was in reality the patrimony of Lavinia, and the inheritance of her son Sylvius, Ascanius resolved to resign it to them, and build elsewhere another city for himself. This he made the place of his residence, and the capital of his new kingdom, calling it Alba Longa; Alba, from a white sow, which we are told Aeneas had found in the place where it was built, and Longa, to distinguish it from another

c town of the same name in the country of the Marsi, or rather, because it extended, without having much breadth, the whole length of a lake near which it was built^l (G). It was thirty years after the building of Lavinium, that Ascanius fixed his abode at Alba, and there he died after a reign of about thirty-eight years, twelve of which he had resided at his new settlement. He left a son, called Iulus; so that between him and Sylvius lay the right of succession to the Latin throne; the latter being the son, and the former the grandson, of Aeneas. The Latins not thinking it for their interest to continue divided, as it were, into two states, resolved to unite Alba and Lavinium into one sovereignty; and as Sylvius was born of Lavinia, the daughter

d whereas the other, after all, was but the son of a stranger, the Latins bestowed the crown on Sylvius, and, to make Iulus some amends, decreed to him the sovereign power in affairs of religion, a power which thenceforth continued in his family. Sylvius was succeeded by thirteen kings of the same race, who for near four hundred years reigned at Alba. But we scarce know any thing of them besides their names, and the years of their respective reigns. Aeneas Sylvius died after a reign of twenty-nine years. His son, called also Aeneas Sylvius, governed Latium thirty-one years. Latinus Sylvius, who succeeded him, swayed the sceptre for the space of fifty-one years. Alba reigned thirty-nine; Capetus, called by Livy Atys, twenty-six; Capis twenty-eight; and Capetus thirteen. Tiberinus, who succeeded him, engaged in a war, which proved

e fatal to him; for in a battle, which was fought on the banks of the Albula, he was forced into that river, and drowned. From him the river took the name of Tiber, which it has bore ever since. Agrippa succeeded Tiberinus after a reign of eight years, and left the throne, which he had held forty-one years, to Alladius, who reigned nineteen, and was succeeded by Aventinus, who left his name to the hill Aventinus, where he was interred. Procas, who succeeded him, and reigned twenty-three years, was the father of Numitor and Amulius, and at his death bequeathed the throne to his elder son Numitor. But Amulius, who surpassed his brother in courage and understanding, drove him from the throne, and to secure it for himself, murdered Agestus, Numitor's only son, and consecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the worship of Vesta, f by which she was obliged to perpetual virginity. But this precaution proved ineffectual; for as the Vestal was going to a neighbouring spring to fetch water for the performance of a sacrifice to Mars, she was met and forced by a man disguised in a military habit, like that in which the god Mars was represented. Some authors think that this counterfeit Mars was a lover come thither by her appointment; others charge Amulius with using this violence to his niece himself, not so much to gratify his lust, as to have a pretence to destroy her. For ever after he caused her to be carefully watched, till she was delivered of two sons; and then exaggerating her crime in an assembly of the people, he prevailed upon them to sentence her to death, and to condemn the fruit of her criminal amour to be thrown into the Tiber. The sentence against Rhea was, according to some authors, changed by Amulius, at the request of his daughter Antia, into perpetual confinement, but executed against the twins, who being laid in a wooden trough, and carried to the foot of mount Palatine, were turned there adrift on the Tiber, which at that time overflowed its banks. But the wind and stream proved both so favourable, that at the fall of the water the two infants were left safe on the strand, and there happily found by Faustulus, the chief of the king's shepherds, and suckled by his wife Acca Laurentia, who for her disorderly life was called Lupa. And this probably gave rise to the fabulous miracle of their being nursed by a wolf ^m.

(G) The place which Ascanius chose for his new capital was pleasant, fruitful, and easy to be fortified, being covered on one side by a mountain, and on the other by a deep lake, which rendered it inaccessible. It was built at an equal distance from the lake and the mountain, probably between the present city of Albano, and the lake of Castel Gandolfo, and peopled by a mixed colony of Latins and Trojans. The inhabitants of this city were called Albani, to distinguish them from those of the other Alba, who were called Albanenses (11).

As Faustulus was probably well acquainted with the birth of the twins, he took more than ordinary care of their education, and sent them to Gabii to be instructed there in Greek literature ⁿ. As they grew up, they appeared to have something great in their mein and air, which commanded respect; and the ascendant, which they assumed over the other shepherds, made them dreaded in the forests, where they exercised a sort of empire. A quarrel happening between the herdsmen of Amulius and those of Numitor, the two brothers took the part of the former against the latter; and some blood being shed in the fray, the adverse party, to be revenged on Romulus and Remus, for so the twins were called, on the festival of the Lupercalia (H), surprised Remus, and carried him before Numitor to be punished by him, according to his deserts. But Numitor, either by instinct or compassion, feeling himself touched in the prisoner's favour, asked him where he was born, and who were his parents. His answer immediately struck Numitor with a lively remembrance of his two grandsons. Their age, which was about eighteen years, agreed with the time when the two infants were exposed upon the Tiber; and there needed no more to change his anger into tenderness ^o.

In the meantime Romulus, eager to rescue his brother, and pursue those who had carried him off, was preparing to be revenged on them; but Faustulus dissuaded him from it, and on that occasion disclosing to him his birth, awakened in his breast sentiments worthy of his extraction. He resolved at all adventures to attempt the delivering of his mother and grandfather from oppression. With this view he assembled the country-people, over whom he had assumed a kind of sovereignty, and engaged them to come to the city on an appointed day, and enter it by different gates, provided with arms,

(H) Valerius Maximus pretends, that the festival of the Lupercalia was not older than the foundation of Rome. But he is therein contradicted by Livy (12), Dionysius of Halicarnassus (13), and Plutarch (13), who tell us in express terms, that this festival was brought by Evander out of Greece. The ceremonies observed in it were these: In the first place, two goats and a dog were killed; then the foreheads of two young men of distinction were touched with the bloody knife, and they were to laugh when they were thus touched. This being done, the skins of the victims were cut into thongs, and whips made of them for the young men, who scoured the streets and the fields all naked but their middle, and struck those they met. The young women offered themselves to their strokes, fancying they contributed to fruitfulness (15). They ran naked, because Pan, the god of the shepherds, was commonly represented so. They sacrificed a goat, because that divinity was supposed to have goats feet. A dog was added as a necessary companion of a shepherd. Some have thought with Plutarch, that these Lupercalia were instituted in honour of the wolf that suckled Romulus and Remus. But most other writers tell us, that they were appointed in honour of Pan, from whom they borrowed their name, Pan being called in Greek Λύκος, perhaps from λύω, which answers the Latin word Lupus, a wolf, because the chief employment of Pan was to drive away the wolves from the sheep he protected. This festival was celebrated the fifteenth of February. The priests, who presided at these sacrifices, were called Luperci; and were divided into two companies or colleges, viz. the Fabiani and Quinctiliani, one for Romulus, the other for Remus. They took their names from Fabius and Quintilius, their chief priests (16). Dion Cassius tells us, that afterwards a third college was added by the senate in honour of Julius Caesar (17).

- a which they were to conceal. While Romulus was thus disposing every thing for the execution of his design, Numitor made the same discovery to Remus, concerning his parents, and the oppression they groaned under, which so fired him, that he was ready to imbarque in any enterprize. But Numitor took care to moderate the transports of his grandson, and only desired him to acquaint his brother with what he had heard from him, and to send him to his house. Romulus soon came, and was followed by Faustulus, who took with him the trough or skill, in which the twins had been exposed, to shew it to Numitor. But as the shepherd betrayed an air of concern and earnestness in his looks, he was stopped at the gate of the city, led before Amulius, and examined concerning his burden. It was easily known by its make and inscription,
- b which was still legible; and therefore Faustulus owned what it was, and confessed that the twins were living; but in order to gain time, pretended that they were feeding flocks in a remote desert. In the mean time the usurper's death being resolved on, Remus undertook to raise the city, and Romulus to invest the king's palace. The country-people came at the time appointed, and formed themselves into companies, each consisting of an hundred men. They had no other ensigns but bundles of hay hanging upon long poles, which the Latins at that time called Manipuli; and hence came the name of Manipulares, originally given to troops raised in the country (1). With this tumultuous army Romulus beset the avenues of the palace, forced the guard, and having killed the tyrant, after he had reigned forty-two years, restored his grandfather Numitor to the throne? They destroy Amulius, and restore Numitor.
- c AFFAIRS being thus settled at Alba, the two brothers, by the advice of Numitor, undertook the founding of a new colony. The king bestowed on them those lands near the Tiber, where they had been brought up, supplied them with all manner of instruments for breaking up ground, with slaves, and beasts of burden, and granted full liberty to his subjects to join them. Hereupon most of the Trojans, of whom there still remained fifty families in Augustus's time, chose to follow the fortune of Romulus and Remus; as did also the inhabitants of Pallantium and Saturnia, two small towns. For the more speedy carrying on of the work, it was thought proper to divide those who were to be employed in the building of the city into two
- d companies, one under the command of Romulus, the other of Remus. But this division, which was designed purely with a view to the public welfare, and that the two parties might work by way of emulation, gave birth to two factions, and produced a jealousy between the two brothers, which broke out when they came to chuse a place for the building of their new city. For Remus was for the Aventine, and Romulus for the Palatine mount. Upon which the matter being referred to their grandfather, he advised the contending parties to have recourse to the gods, and to put an end to the dispute by augury, to which he was himself greatly addicted. The day appointed for the ceremony being come, the brothers posted themselves each upon his hill; and it was agreed, that whoever should see the first sight, or the greatest number of vulturs,
- e should gain his cause. After the two rivals had waited some time for the appearance of a favourable augury, Romulus, before any had appeared, sent to acquaint his brother that he had seen some vulturs. But Remus, having actually seen six, while his brother's messengers were yet on their way, hastened on their arrival to mount Palatine, to examine the truth of what they had told him. He had no sooner got thither, than by an unexpected good fortune, twelve vulturs appeared to Romulus. These he immediately shewed to his brother, and, transported with joy, desired him to be judge himself of the truth of what his messengers had told him. However, Remus discovered the deceit, and being told that Romulus had not seen the twelve vulturs till after he had seen six, he insisted on the time of his seeing them, and the other on the number of the birds he had seen. This widened the breach between the two brothers; and their parties being divided, while each man espoused the cause of his leader, the dispute grew so warm, that from words they came at length to blows. The shepherd Faustulus, who was equally dear to both the brothers, endeavouring to part the combatants, was by an unknown hand laid dead on the spot. Some writers tell us, that Remus likewise lost his life in the fray; but the greater number place his death later, and say, that he was killed by one Fabius, for having, in derision, leaped over the wall of the new city; but Livy says, the more common report was, that Remus fell by the hand of his brother * (K).

Romulus being now head of the colony, by having got the better of his brother's party in the late engagement, applied his thoughts wholly to the building of the city, which he proposed to call after his own name. He chose mount Palatine for its situation, and performed all those ceremonies, which the superstition of the Hebrurians had introduced. He first offered sacrifices to the gods, and ordered all the people to do the same; and from that time decreed, that eagles should be the auspices of his new colony. After this great fires were kindled before their tents, and all the people leaped through the flames to purify themselves. When this ceremony was over, they dug a trench round the spot, where the assemblies of the people were afterwards held, and threw into it the first-fruits of whatever they were allowed to make use of for food; every man of the colony was ordered to cast into the same trench a handful of earth, brought either from his own, or some neighbouring country. The trench they called Mundus, that is, The World, and made it the centre round which the city was to be built. Then Romulus yoking a cow and a bull to a plough, the coulter whereof was brass, marked out by a deep furrow the whole compass of the city. These two animals, the symbols of marriage by which cities are peopled, were afterwards slain upon the altars. All the peopled followed the plough, throwing inwards the clods of earth, which the plough-share sometimes turned outwards. Where-ever a gate was to be made, the plough was lifted up and carried; and hence came the Latin word Porta, a gate, derived from the verb Portare, to carry (L). As mount Palatine

(K) Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who is of opinion, that Remus was killed before the foundation of the new city, adds, that he was buried in a place called after his own name Remuria, about thirty furlongs from Rome; which situation seeming to him the most convenient for building a city, he went thither, according to some writers, and, according to others, to mount Aventine, to observe the flight of the birds. Festus says, that the summit of mount Aventine was called Remuria from the time Remus resolved to build the city there. But Dionysius of Halicarnassus speaks of mount Aventine and Remuria as two different places. Stephanus will have Remuria to have been a city in the neighbourhood of Rome.

(L) The Hebrurians had, as Festus informs us (20), a sort of ritual, wherein were contained the ceremonies that were to be observed in building cities, temples, altars, walls, and gates. Fabius Pictor says, that Romulus sent for a priest or augur out of Hebruria, to preside at the building of his new city, and Plutarch tells us, that men from Hebruria taught the founder every rite he was to observe. The meaning of the ceremonies we have mentioned was as follows: they leaped through the flames, being persuaded that so religious a ceremony required great purity. The bull and cow were both white.

Alba jugum nives cum bove vacca sulis (21), says Ovid. Their whiteneſs was a symbol of that purity of manners and innocence, which should be the character of every citizen. Isidorus (22) tells us, that a cow and an ox yoked together, represented the foundation of cities, and settlement of colonies. By throwing the first-fruits, and a handful of earth into the trench, they admonished the heads of the colony, that it ought to be their chief study to procure for their fellow-citizens all the conveniences of life, to maintain peace and union amongst a people come together from different parts of the world, and by this means to form themselves into a body never to be dissolved. By the care which the people took to throw the clods of earth back towards the city, they were instructed, that plenty in cities is owing to the fruitful product of the lands about them, and that they ought to bring every thing from abroad, that could contribute to the welfare of the inhabitants.

The whole length of the ground where the plough had passed, was by the ancients looked upon as sacred and inviolable; and for this reason they thought themselves obliged to spend the last drop of their blood in the defence of their walls; and to break through them was a crime of the highest nature.

In speaking of the foundation of Rome, we have followed the account which Livy, and after him most of the Latin historians give us of that memorable event; but Plutarch tells us (23), that there is a great disagreement among authors both as to the founder of Rome, and the reason why it was so called: Some were of opinion, as that writer informs us, that the Pelasgians, who had over-run the greater part of the habitable world, fixed there; and from their power and strength in arms, in Greek Ρωμα, called the city by that name: others thought the city was built by some Trojans, who, escaping from Troy, were driven upon the coasts of Hebruria; among them was a woman of distinction, named Roma, whose name was given to the new city: others pretended that Roma was the daughter of Italus

- a Palatine stood by itself, the whole was inclosed within the line made by the plough, which formed almost the figure of a square; whence it is called by Dionysius Halicarnassensis Roma Quadrata. Plutarch seems to make a distinction between Roma Quadrata, and the city of Rome; for he says, that Romulus had built the former before he marked out the plan of the latter. But the authorities of Fabius Pictor, Cato, and Dionysius Halicarnassensis, are of greater weight with us.

As to the exact year of the foundation of Rome, there is a great disagreement among historians and chronologers. Varro, whose opinion is, according to Petavius, the most agreeable to the rules of chronology, places it in the third year of the sixth olympiad; that is, according to the computation of the learned Usher, whom we chuse to follow, four hundred and thirty-six years after the destruction of Troy, and seven hundred forty-eight before the christian æra (M). The Romans, if we may so call them, began to build, as Plutarch^a and others inform us, on the twenty-first of April, which day was then consecrated to Pales, goddess of the shepherds; whence the festival of Pales, and that of the foundation of the city, were afterwards jointly celebrated at Rome (N).

When Rome had received the utmost perfection, which its poor and rude founder could give it, it consisted of about a thousand houses, or rather huts, and was, properly speaking, a beggarly village, whereof the principal inhabitants followed the plough, being obliged to cultivate, with their own hands, the ungrateful soil of a barren country, which they had shared among themselves. Even the walls of Romulus's palace were made of rushes, and covered with thatch (O). As every one had chosen his ground to build upon without any regard to the regularity and beauty of the whole, the streets, if we may so call them, were both crooked and narrow. In short Rome, till it was rebuilt, after the burning of it by the Gauls, was rather a disorderly heap of huts, than a city built with any regularity or order^c. From this mean and contemptible beginning, Rome, in process of time, became the metropolis and mistress of the whole known world, as we shall see in the sequel of this history.

Tealus and Lucaria, or of Telephus the son of Hercules, and that she was married to Æneas. Some will have her to have been the daughter of Ascanius, Æneas's son. The same writer speaks of Romanus, the son of Ulysses by Circe, of Romus the son of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent from Troy, and of Romus, a king of the Latins, who drove out the Hetrurians; to each of these the building of Rome has by some authors been ascribed. Solinus bestows that honour on Evander, and adds, that Rome was first called Valentia; while others, as St. Augustin informs us (24), pretend that its ancient name was Febris, borrowed from Februa the mother of Mars.

(M) Timæus of Sicily thinks that Rome and Carthage were built much about the same time, that is, thirty-eight years before the first olympiad. Q. Cincius places the foundation of Rome in the fourth year of the twelfth olympiad; Fabius Pictor, in the first year of the eighth; Polybius and Diodorus Siculus, in the second year of the seventh olympiad; Portius Cato, and others, in the first year of the same olympiad; Marcus Verrinus Flaccus, the supposed author of the Capitoline tables, and Livy, in the fourth year of the sixth olympiad. But the most exact Roman writers follow Varro's calculation, according to which the foundations of Rome were laid near the end of the third year of the sixth olympiad. Plutarch, from the testimony of some ancient writers, tells us, that an eclipse of the sun happened the first day that Rome was founded, which was seen by Antimachus at Teos. Dionysius Halicarnassensis mentions another eclipse (25), which happened the same day that Romulus died. From these astronomical observations several writers have attempted, by the help of the tables of eclipses, to fix the true æra of the foundation of Rome; but the fruit of their labours has been nothing but endless disputes, in which every one is at liberty to chuse what side he pleases.

(N) The Palilia, or feast of Pales, is sometimes called Parilia, from the Latin word Parere, To bring forth, because prayers were then made for the fruitfulness of the sheep. Ovid mentions a very tedious course of superstitious ceremonies, which the shepherds went through on that occasion. They had always a great feast at night, and when they were pretty merry, they concluded the whole with dancing over the fires they had made in the fields with heaps of straw (26). As the Romans celebrated at the same time the festival of the foundation of their city, no victims were slain, because they judged the shedding of blood unsuitable to so extraordinary a festival, which was designed only for public rejoicings.

(O) The hut of Romulus was long preserved on the Capitol, according to Vitruvius, Macrobius, and Seneca, as a venerable monument of antiquity; and it was a point of religion with the Romans never to make use of any other materials but rushes and straw to repair it, till it was at length destroyed by fire in the time of Augustus. But after all, this hut on the capitol could not be the house of Romulus, it being certain that he dwelt on mount Palatine.

C H A P. II.

The Roman history from Romulus to the Commonwealth.

Romulus chosen king.

AS Romulus had taken upon himself the chief command of the colony only for the time the city was building, as soon as the work was finished, he assembled the people, and gave them liberty to chuse what kind of government they liked best. They, without hesitation, gave the preference to monarchy, and unanimously proclaimed Romulus king of Rome. But the prince elect, before he ascended the throne, begged leave to consult the will of the gods by auguries. It is said, that after he had offered sacrifices to the gods in an open place, a flash of lightning was seen to gleam from the left, which was, according to the augurs, a lucky omen. From this time it became an established custom to have recourse to augury upon raising any one to the royal dignity, the priesthood, or any public employment. In process of time this came to be only a matter of pure ceremony, though the custom introduced by the example of the founder, subsisted above seven hundred years^a (P). Romulus being thus declared king by the election of the people, and approbation of the gods, applied all his thoughts to the establishing of good order in his new city, and a due subordination among his subjects. He himself put on a habit of distinction, and appointed twelve lictors to attend him as guards, each of them bearing an ax stuck in a bundle of rods, which was the usual symbol of sovereignty among his neighbours the Hetrurians (Q). He divided the three thousand three hundred men, of which his colony consisted, into three equal parts, called Tribes or Thirds, each being commanded by its præfect or tribune. The tribes were divided into ten curiæ, and these subdivided each into ten decuriæ: over the former was appointed officers, named Curiones, and over the latter Decuriones, each curiæ and decuriæ having their peculiar commander. After this Romulus divided his small territory, not above five or six miles in extent, into three parts, but not equal. One was consecrated to the expences of religious worship; another reserved for the king's revenue, and the exigencies of the state; and the third, which was the most considerable, divided into thirty portions, to answer to the thirty curiæ^u (R). The next thing which Romulus did was to distinguish the people, according to their birth and dignity, into Patricians and Plebeians. The former, as being of a more noble extraction, were to take care of the religious rites and ceremonies, and to bear all the civil and military dignities; the latter to till the ground, feed cattle, and follow trades, but not to have any share in the government, to avoid the inconveniencies of a popular power. But to prevent the seditions, which such a distinction might produce, and to bind them to each other by reciprocal ties and obligations, every plebeian was allowed to chuse out of the body of the patricians a protector, who was obliged to assist him with his interest and substance, and to defend him from the oppressions of the great. These protectors were styled

(P) This practice continued from the time of Romulus to the end of the republic, and was sometimes used even under the emperors. Those who stood for employments, went out early on the day which was appointed for their election, made a public prayer, and consulted the augurs. When their answers proved favourable, as they generally did, the augurs being commonly well paid for their pains, the candidates gave out that the gods were not against their having the office, which they solicited. Upon this they were said to obtain and bear it auspicato.

(Q) Some think that he chose twelve lictors, because he had seen twelve vulturs, a number, which had given him the superiority over his brother.

(R) Dionysius Halicarnassensis expressly affirms, that each decuria was undivided into ten decuriæ, and that these lesser bodies were governed by decuriones. And upon the strength of his authority, most compilers of the Roman history give the same account. But the learned Gravins is of opinion, that Dionysius by a mistake ascribes such a division to the curiæ, as was peculiar to the turma in the army (27).

(27) Vide Gravium in præf. ad 1. Vol. Thef. antiq. Rom.

- a patrons, and the protected clients. It was the duty of the patron to advise his clients in point of law, to manage their suits, to take care of them as of their own children, and by all ways and methods to secure their peace and happiness. The clients on the other hand were to assist their patrons with money on several occasions, to ransom them or their children, when taken in war, to contribute to the portions of their daughters, to defray in part the charges of their public employments, &c. They were never to accuse each other, or take contrary sides; and if either of them was convicted of having violated this law, the crime was equal to that of treason, and any one was allowed to kill the offender with impunity. This patronage was as effectual as any consanguinity or alliance, and had a wonderful effect towards maintaining
- b union and concord among the people for the space of six hundred years, and upwards; during which time we find no dissensions nor jealousies between the patrons and their clients, even in the times of the republic, when the populace frequently mutinied against those who were most powerful in the city *.

- AFTER this Romulus formed a senate, which consisted of a hundred persons chosen out of the patricians; but the choice was not made by the king himself; each tribe chose three senators, and each of the thirty curiæ the like number, which made in all the number of ninety-nine; so that Romulus named only the hundredth, who was the head, or prince of the senate, and the chief governor of the city, when the king was in the field. They were called patres or fatbers, either on account of their age, or
- c their fatherly care of their fellow-citizens. Their descendants, to whom alone some appropriate the name of patricians, were the prime nobility among the Romans. The senate being thus established, Romulus ordered the curiæ to chuse him a guard of three hundred young men, ten out of each curia; and these he called celeres from their activity, and the expedition with which they executed the orders they received. They were all horsemen; but fought either on foot or on horseback, as occasion required, or the ground would allow. They were commanded by a tribune called Tribunus Celerum, three centurions, and other inferior officers. Romulus in the next place proceeded to settle the respective powers and privileges of the king, senate, and people. The king's office at home was to take care of religious affairs; to be guardian of the laws and customs; to decide the weightier causes between man and man, referring those of less moment to the senate; to call together the senators, and assemble the people, first delivering his own opinion relating to the affairs he proposed, and then ratifying by his consent what was agreed on by the majority: abroad, and in time of war, he was to command the army with absolute authority, and to take care of the public money †. The senate were not only to be judges in causes of small importance, but to debate and resolve upon such public affairs as the king proposed, and to determine them by the plurality of voices. To the people he committed three things, viz. to create magistrates, enact laws, and resolve upon any war that was proposed by the king; but in all these things the approbation of the senate was necessary.

- WHEN order was thus established in political affairs, Romulus thought it his duty to make some regulations in matters of religion. He did not indeed give it that form, to which it was afterwards brought, but contented himself with establishing some sort of regularity in the priesthood, and in the worship of those deities, which Evander had introduced, or Aneas brought from Troy, or the Aborigines worshipped in their time. He appointed that each curia should have its own temple, and its peculiar gods and priests, that the people should assemble on certain stated days in cænacula, or public halls, and that they should there feast in common on the victims that had been offered to the gods. He likewise established festivals, whereby religion became an
- f ease and relief to the labouring people. The chief ministers of the gods were chosen out of the patricians, and the inferior priests out of such families only as were honourable. They were to be at least fifty years old, and none but their wives were allowed to perform the functions of priestesses. Their sons were to wait at the altars to the age of puberty, and their daughters so long as they continued virgins. The sons were called camilli, and the daughters camillæ. When a priest had no children of his own, he might chuse the handsomest in his curia to attend him in the sacrifices. As the sacerdotal families were exempted from paying taxes, and bearing arms, and besides, their employment was for life, Romulus prohibited the seeking of it by intrigues and cabals, the purchasing of it by money, and even the trusting of it to the hazard of lots. He left to each curia the free choice of their priests, auspices, and augurs. The aruspices inspected the intrails of the victims; and the augurs foretold future events by the flight and singing of birds (S).

The asylum.

THUS was the colony founded; but, as it was thin of inhabitants, Romulus, to attract strangers from the neighbouring countries, opened an asylum or place of refuge for fugitive slaves, homicides, outlaws, and persons plunged in debt. These he did not at first receive within the walls; but allotted them the hill Saturnius, afterwards called Capitolinus, for their habitation. Nor was the appearance of religion

(S) As we shall frequently have occasion, in the course of this history, to speak of Augurs and Haruspices, or Auspices, it may not be improper to give some account in this place of that kind of divination. The art of divination, and foretelling future events, by the flight, chirping or motions of birds, came from the Cushidians to the Greeks, from them to the Etrurians, and from the Etrurians to the Latins and Romans (28). The name of Augur is derived by some ab avium gestu; by others ab avium garru, that is, either from the motion and actions, or from the chirping and chattering of birds. As Romulus himself was well versed in this art, after he had divided the city into three tribes, he appointed an augur for each tribe (29). A fourth was added some time after, probably by Servius Tullius, who increased the tribes. These four were all chosen out of the patricians; but in the year of Rome 454, at the solicitation of the tribunes, five persons were added to the college, elected out of the common people (30); and in the year 672, Sylla increased their number to fifteen (31). The eldest of these presided over the rest, and was honoured with the title of magister collegii (32). Their office, which we find comprised in the augural law mentioned by Tully (33), was to interpret dreams, oracles, prodigies, &c. and to tell whether any action should be fortunate or prejudicial to particular persons, or to the whole state. Thus they were the interpreters of the will of the gods, with respect to the making of war or peace; and all were obliged to obey them in so important an article. We find five sorts of auguries mentioned by the ancients; 1. From the appearances in heaven, as thunder, lightning, comets, and other meteors. 2. From birds, whence they had the name of Auspices, from the Latin words avis and conficio. Some birds furnished them with observations from their chattering or singing; others, from their flying. The former were called Oficines, and the latter Præpetes. For the taking of both these sorts of auguries, the augur went up to some high place, took the augural staff, which was bent at one end like a crozier, and marked out with it the four templa or quarters of the heaven. Then he turned to the east, and, in that situation, waited for the omen, which was of no signification, unless confirmed by another of the same sort. 3. From birds kept in a coop for that purpose. The manner of divining from them was as follows: Early in the morning the augur that was to make the observation, after having commanded a general silence, ordered the coop to be opened, and then threw in a handful of crumbs or corn. If the chickens did not eat greedily, scattered their food about with their wings, let a great deal of it fall from their mouths to the ground, or, above all, refused to eat, the omen was reckoned unlucky, and some great misfortune portended; but if they fed greedily, and let none of their food drop out of their mouths, there was all the assurance that possibly could be wished for of happiness and success (34). This sort of augury was called tripudium, from the ancient

Latin word pavire, to strike, and terra, the earth; because the birds, in eating greedily, struck the ground with their beaks. The 4th sort of augury was from beasts, viz. wolves, goats, foxes, hares, asses, rams, hares, weasels and mice. The general observations about them were, whether they appeared in a strange place, or crossed the way; whether they ran to the right or left, &c. The last sort of divination by auguries, was from what they called Dira, or unusual accidents happening to any person, as stumbling, seeing apparitions, hearing strange voices, meeting a wolf, a fox, a hare, &c. Any augur was allowed to take an observation; but the judging of the omen was left to the decision of the whole college.

As to the Auspices, they were so called ab avis aspicendis, that is, from looking on the altars. The Roman aruspices were all taken at first from Etruria, where their art was in great request; but afterwards the senate ordered twelve of the sons of the chief men in Rome to be sent into that country, to learn there the rites and ceremonies of the Etruscan religion, of which this science was the chief part (34). The business of the aruspices was to look upon the sacred victims, and by them to foretell the success of any enterprize. They took their observations from the victims before they were cut up; from their intrails after they were cut up; from the flame that used to rise while they were burning; and lastly, from the flour, bran, frankincense, wine or water used in the sacrifice. Before the victims were cut up, it was an ill omen when they would not come to the altar without being dragged, when they broke the rope, fled away, avoided the stroke, struggled much after it, made a great howling, were long a dying, or bled but little. When the victim was cut up, they observed the colour of the parts, and whether any were wanting: a double liver, a little or lean heart, were counted very bad omens. If the heart was wholly missing, nothing could be thought more dreadful and fatal; if the entrails fell out of the priest's hands, or were more bloody than usual, or of a pale colour, they portended sudden danger and ruin. As to the flame of the sacrifice, it furnished them with a good omen when it was pure and clear, rose up in a pyramid without noise, and did not go out till the victim was consumed. The smoke likewise was considered, whether it whirled about, or spread itself to the right or left, or yielded a smell different from that of broiled meat. If the incense they burnt melted all at once, and had an agreeable smell, it was a lucky omen. There were several other signs which supplied them with conjectures too insignificant to be mentioned here. The business of the aruspices was not restrained to the altars and sacrifices; but they had an equal right to the explaining of other portents and monitions. Hence we find them often consulted by the senate on extraordinary occasions. If the Roman aruspices lay under any disrepute, others were sent for out of Etruria, where this science had most credit.

- a wanting to cover the king's policy: he erected a temple to a new sort of divinity, called by him the Afylæan god (T), under whose protection all criminals were to live securely. Afterwards, when Romulus enlarged his new city, the asylum was inclosed within the walls, and those, who had fled to it, being brought under some regulation, became citizens of Rome: (U). Nothing was now wanting, but women, to secure the duration of the state; but as the neighbouring people refused to give their daughters in marriage to such a crew of vagabonds, Romulus, by the advice of his grandfather Numitor, and the consent of the senate, proclaimed a solemn feast and public games, in honour of Equeſtrian Neptune, called Consus. This occasioned a great concourse of people, who flocked from the adjacent places to behold those pompous shews, together with the new city; but in the midst of the solemnity, the Romans, upon a signal given by Romulus, rushing in with their drawn swords among the strangers, seized their daughters, and by main force carried them to their houses, where they were kept till the next day, without any further insult being offered to them, agreeable to the express orders of Romulus. They were in all six hundred and eighty-three, and Romulus chose so many husbands for them, marrying them after the same manner that was ever after used in Rome (W).

- c This violence was highly resented by the neighbouring people, especially by the Sabines; but as they were unwilling to engage in a war, their country being open on all sides, and defenceless, they first sent to demand the restitution of their daughters, promising to enter into an alliance with the Romans, whereby they should have liberty to intermarry with them; but Romulus was inflexible, demanding, on his part, that the Sabines should confirm the marriages of his Romans. While the treaty, which went on slowly, suspended hostilities on both sides, Acron, whom the historians style king of Canina (X), being provoked at the late audacious rape, and jealous of the growing power of the new city, took the field; and being joined by the inhabitants of Crustumium and Antemna (Y), made an incursion into the Roman territories. Romulus instantly marched out against him, and having engaged the enemy in the open field, challenged their leader, according to the custom of those times, to a single combat, killed him, put his army to flight, and pursuing the fugitives to their town, made himself master of it without opposition. He spared the blood of the conquered; but razed their city, and carried the inhabitants to Rome, where he allowed them the same privileges as the most ancient citizens*. For this victory Romulus decreed himself the honours of a triumph; and bringing home the spoils of king Acron, consecrated them to Jupiter Feretrius, so called, according to some, from the Latin word ferire, to smite, because he had killed the king with his own

(T) Plutarch tells us, that the asylum was put under the protection of the Afylæan god; but who this god was, is unknown to us. Dionysius Halicarnassensis tells us, that, in his time, the place where the asylum had been, was consecrated to Jupiter; whence some have conjectured, that the Afylæan god was no other than Jupiter, worshipped by Romulus under the title of Afylæus, that is, the protector of asylums.

(U) To this Juvenal alludes in the following verses, addressed to a Roman citizen boasting of his original and noble extraction:

*Attamen us longe repetas, longeque revolvus,
Nomen; ab infami gentem deducis asylo.
Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut latro fuit, aut illud, quod dicere nolo* (35).

(W) The form used in marriage was, Partake you of your husband's fire and water. This communication of fire and water between the husband and wife, was the symbol of conjugal love and union, and insinuated, that their goods were in common between them. The virgins seized on this occasion were all called Sabines, because the greater number was of that nation. The common opinion is, that they were in all six hundred and eighty-three; some say five hundred and twenty-seven, and others reduce them to thirty only, deriving the word curia from Cures the name of the town, of which the women were for the most part natives. But no historian of any account is of this opinion. Romulus found but one married woman among all those who had been seized. Her name was Herfília; and we are told by Zenodotus, quoted by Plutarch, that Romulus married her, and had a daughter by her, named Prima, because she was his first child, and a son, called Abilius; but other historians say, that Herfília was married to a noble Roman, named Hostus; and that Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, descended from her.

(X) Canina was situated on the confines of Latium, and the country of the Sabines; whence some geographers make it a city of the Sabines, and others of ancient Latium. Claudian thinks it stood on the banks of the Anio next to Rome; but Holstenius places it on the opposite bank, in the neighbourhood of the present Monticelli.

(Y) Crustumium and Antemna were either subject to the Sabines, or in their neighbourhood. Some geographers think the former stood where Marcigliano Vecchio now stands, and place the latter on the Tiber, between the Tiburine and Nomansine ways.

hand; or from the word ferre, to carry, because Romulus had himself carried thither ^a the armour of the king he had killed. A name of distinction was likewise given to the spoils; for they were called opima spolia (Z), because they were more honourable than any other, on account of their being taken by the general of the Roman army from the enemy's general, after he had killed him with his own hand. Romulus, elated with this victory, marched with one legion (A), levied in haste, against the Antemnæ and Crustumini, who had joined the king of Cænina; and having, without much ado, overcome them, and taken their cities, at the request of Herfiliæ, who was a native of Antemna, he not only pardoned the inhabitants, but transplanted them to Rome, where they were admitted to all the privileges of Roman citizens. By this conduct, the reputation of his clemency, as well as bravery, became so great, ^b that several cities of Hebruria voluntarily submitted to him. Calius, an Hebrurian leader, led all the troops under his command to Rome, and settled on a hill near the city, which, from him, took the name of mount Calus ^b. And now Romulus, being obliged to enlarge the compass of his city, took in the hill Saturnius, called afterwards the capitol; and on the top of it built a citadel, which he committed to the government of a noble Roman, named Tarpeius. The citadel was surrounded on all sides with ramparts and towers, which equally commanded the city and country. From the foot of the hill Saturnius a wall was carried on quite to the Tiber, and a gate opened in it, which they called Carmentalis, from Carmenta, the mother of Evander, who either lived there, or had in that place some altar or chapel erected to her. ^c

NOTWITHSTANDING this increase of the Roman forces, the Sabines sent a second deputation to Romulus, to demand back their daughters; and, upon his refusal, began hostilities, and marched towards Rome with an army of twenty-five thousand foot, and one thousand horse, under the command of their king Titus Tatius. Romulus, having received supplies from his grandfather Numitor, and from Hebruria, marched out against them, at the head of twenty-thousand foot, and eight hundred horse. Romulus posted his army between the hills Esquilinus and Quirinalis, while the Sabines encamped at the foot of the hill Saturnius, in the plain afterwards called Campus Martius. Tatius finding the Romans too well fortified to be attacked, was very uneasy about the success of the enterprize. But an unforeseen accident extricated him ^d out of his difficulties; for Tarpeia, daughter to the governor of the citadel, being greatly taken with the bracelets and rings of the Sabines, called to them from above, and promised to betray the place into their hands, provided they gave her what they wore on their left arms. The Sabines readily agreed to grant her what she required, and being by her admitted into the citadel, made themselves masters of that important place. We are told, that the Sabines crushed Tarpeia to death with their bucklers, which they threw upon her, thinking they discharged their promise by thus giving her what they wore on their left arms. From her the hill Saturnius took the name of Tarpeius, till the building of the capital; and even then the steepest part of it, whence criminals were thrown down headlong, continued to be called the Tarpeian ^e rock. The Sabines, now masters of the citadel, had the advantage of being able to continue the war with more security. For a long time only light skirmishes passed between the two parties; but at last, as they both began to be tired with the charges of the war, they resolved to put the whole to the issue of a general engagement, which was fought with great resolution on both sides, and renewed, for several days together, with almost equal success. In the last contest the Sabines were at first put in disorder, and obliged to take refuge in the citadel, which the Romans, who pursued them, expected to have re-taken. But the enemy rolling great stones from the top of the hill, wounded Romulus on the head, and stunned him so, that falling down sense-

(Z) Festus derives the word opima from ops, which signifies the earth, and the riches it produces; so that opima spolia, according to that writer, signify rich spoils. But Plutarch derives it from the word opus; so that opima spolia, are spoils hard to be obtained, are, in his opinion, one and the same thing. This name was given, as Plutarch informs us, only to such spoils as the general of the Roman army had taken from the general of the enemy's troops. Of the order, laws and pomp of the ancient triumphs we shall speak hereafter.

(A) The word legion is derived from the Latin word legere, to choose, the legions consisting of chosen men. The number of men in a legion was different at different times, as we shall occasionally observe in the sequel of this history. In the times we are now speaking of, a legion consisted of three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, as we read in Plutarch (36).

- a lets, he was carried out of the field into the city. This accident inspired the Sabines with new courage, who falling upon the Romans, put them to flight in their turn, and pursued them to the very gates of Rome. In the mean time Romulus, coming to himself again, returned to the battle, encouraged his routed troops, and having made a vow to Jupiter in order to obtain his favour (B), drove the enemy back to the citadel. Some writers tell us^c, that, in the heat of the engagement, the Sabine women, at the persuasion of Herfília, rushing out of the city with their hair dishevelled, and their children in their arms, threw themselves desperately into the midst of the darts and dead bodies, and, by their tears and intreaties, put a stop to the fury of their husbands and fathers. But this is an adventure too wonderful not to be thought fabulous. What part the Sabine women acted in the reconciling of the two people, will appear in the sequel of the history.

- Titus Tatius* being in possession of the citadel, and Romulus continuing shut up in his city, neither party was very forward to hazard another engagement. The Sabines were doubtful, whether they should raise the siege, and content themselves with ravaging the Roman territory. The Romans, on their side, were no less undetermined what to do. They considered, that the Sabines were a powerful people, and that the late victory had neither been complete nor decisive; but, on the other hand, they could not with honour restore the Sabine women; for that would have been an acknowledgment of their weakness, which would have made the enemy more haughty, and more difficult to treat with. But while the men were thus deliberating, the women, at the persuasion of Herfília, demanded an audience of the senate; and being admitted, laid before them a design which they had formed, without the privity of their husbands. This was to mediate between the contending nations, and try whether they could put an end to the war, which had been undertaken for their sake. Their proposal met with no opposition in the present conjuncture of affairs. A decree was immediately passed, permitting the women to go upon the negotiation they proposed. All the security that was required of them was, to leave one of their children at Rome; the rest they were allowed to carry with them in their arms, in order to raise the compassion of their grandfathers. The women, being thus authorized, laid aside their ornaments, and putting on mourning, advanced to the camp of the Sabines, where, by throwing themselves at the feet of their fathers and relations, they raised a general compassion. King Tatius having assembled his chief officers, ordered the women to declare on what purpose they were come; which Herfília is said to have done in a long and pathetic speech: after which she begged a truce, that the chiefs of the two armies might have an opportunity of conferring together. As the Sabines wanted only an honourable pretence to put an end to the war, they were easily prevailed upon to accept the proposal. Accordingly a truce was granted, during which the two kings had a conference, which ended to the satisfaction of both parties; for a treaty of union was made, and confirmed by oath, the articles whereof were, 1. That the two kings should reside, and jointly reign, at Rome. 2. That the city should still, from Romulus, be called Rome; but the citizens Quirites, a name till then peculiar to the Sabines (C). 3. That the two nations should become one; and that the Sabines should be made free of Rome, and enjoy all the privileges of Roman citizens^d. Three Sabine families of great distinction are particularly said to have settled at Rome on this occasion, with their relations and dependents. The head of one was Valerius Volesus; of another Talus Tyrannus; and of the third Metius Curtius, who had signalized himself in the last battle (D). To Valerius Volesus Plutarch ascribes the honour of negotiating the peace.

(B) We are told, that while the Romans were flying before the enemy, Romulus made a vow to Jupiter, in order to obtain his assistance for the speedy rallying of his troops, and that they unexpectedly stopped at the sight of their general, on his return to the field of battle. Being therefore fully convinced, that this was a particular blessing of heaven, he erected a temple to Jupiter, whom he called Stator, in memory of the happy moment, when the Romans, recovering from their fright, made a stand, and faced the enemy (37).

(C) The word quiris, in the Sabine language, signified both a dart, and a warlike deity armed with a dart. 'Tis uncertain whether the god gave name to the dart, or the dart to the god; but however that be, this god Quiris, or Quirinus, was either Mars, or some other god of war, and continued to be worshipped in Rome, till Romulus, who, after his death, was honoured with the name Quirinus, took his place (38).

The comitium.

The creation of
man knights.

THE two nations being thus united, Tatius, in imitation of Romulus, formed a council of an hundred senators of his own nation, who were also styled fathers, and enjoyed the same privileges with those who had been instituted by the founder. The two councils assembled first at the houses of their respective kings; but afterwards met at the same place, which from thence was called comitium (E). After this union of the two nations and senates, were instituted, according to *Livy, the three bodies of Roman knights, called Ramnenjes, Tatenses, and Luceres. The first body had its name from Romulus, the second from Tatius, and the third from the lucus or grove where the asylum stood, this order being formed out of those who had peopled it. These three bodies of horse were incorporated into the Roman legions, which, from this time, consisted, according to the most common opinion, of four thousand men each; whence a legion was called quadrata. As Rome was chiefly indebted to the Sabine women for this happy increase of wealth and power, honourable privileges and marks of distinction were allowed them; every one was commanded to give way to them; all immodest and too free discourses were forbidden in their presence; no indecent objects were to be brought into their sight; in capital causes they were exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary judges; and lastly, their children were allowed to wear a golden ball hanging from their necks, and a particular robe, called prætecta, to distinguish them from the vulgar (F).

and rallying his countrymen, who had been put in disorder, turned the scale in their favour. But Romulus meeting him, and engaging him in single combat, obliged him, as he was already wounded, to quit the field. Curtius being surrounded on all sides by the enemy, chose rather to throw himself into a pool, made by the inundation of the Tiber, than to go a great way about. As the pool was deep, and full of mud, Romulus thinking his enemy was lost, left him, and rejoined his army; but the Sabine was taken out of the water, and the place ever after called Lacus Curtius, even when it was dried up, and almost in the centre of the Roman forum (38). Proculus says, that the earth having opened, the aruspices declared it necessary for the safety of the republic, that the bravest man in the city should throw himself into the gulf; whereupon one Curtius, mounting on horseback, leaped armed into it, and the gulf immediately closed. Before the building of the common sewers, this pool was a sort of sink, which received all the filth of the city. Some writers think, that it received its name from Curtius the consul, colleague to M. Genucius, because he caused it to be walled in by the advice of the aruspices, after it had been struck with lightning (39).

(E) The word comitium is derived from the ancient Latin verb cumire, which signifies to meet. The comitium was at the foot of the hill Palatinus, over-against the capitol. Not far from thence the two kings built the temple of Vulcan, where they usually met to consult the senate about the most important affairs.

(F) Authors are divided in their opinions about the form of this ornament, which the Sabine women were allowed to hang about the necks of their children. It was called bullæ; and Plutarch says (40), that it was like the little bubbles which the drops of rain make, when they fall upon running water. It is therefore probable, that these little golden balls were hollow and light. Others think they were but half globes, being on one side flat, and on the other globular. Macrobius says, that Tarquin the elder extended the right of wearing this ornament to all the children of the patricians, and that he began with his own. The young men, when they attained the age of manhood, quitted the bullæ, and made an offering of it to the diis lares, or household gods. As to the prætecta, it had a border of purple round its edges; whence it took its name. This robe was wore by girls till their marriage, and by boys till they were seventeen, when they took the toga virilis, or manly robe. But what in the time of Romulus was a mark of distinction for the children of the Sabine women, became afterwards very common; for even the children of the liberti, that is, of those who were made free, wore robes bordered with purple in their youth. In process of time the gravest magistrates wore them, not only at Rome, but in the colonies and municipia. This prætecta was not only a mark of the quality of the person that wore it, but was besides looked upon as a sacred habit, and a kind of guard or defence against the injuries to which children are exposed. Thus Persius calls it culus purpureus (41); and Quintilian, in one of his declamations, styles it, the sacred habit of the prætecta, the robe, which raises in us a holy reverence and veneration to the helpless condition of childhood. In process of time the bullæ became as common as the prætecta, all the sons of the ingenui or free-born being allowed to wear it; but with this distinction, that their bullæ was not of gold, but of leather, as Juvenal insinuates in the following verses:

— *Etruscum puero si consigit aurum,
Vel nodus tantum, & signum de paupere loro* (42).

The poet calls the bullæ aurea, Etruscan gold, because that sort of ornament was used by the Etruscans long before it was introduced among the Romans. In the account we have given here of the bullæ aurea and prætecta, we have followed Diomysius Halicarnassensis and Livy; but Macrobius, on the authority of some writers, relates the matter in a quite different manner; for he says, that Herfilius being carried away with her daughter, fell in marriage to Hofius, an officer of great distinction, and was the first who bore a child to Rome. To this child alone, who was called Hofius Hofilius, Romulus granted the privilege of wearing the bullæ aurea. Some say, that Tarquinus Priscus, in a triumph for a victory gained over the Sabines, first honoured his own son with the prætecta and bullæ aurea, for killing one of the enemy's chief commanders with his own hand. Others, without mentioning this victory, pretend, that Tarquin, among other wise constitutions, took particular care to assign the proper habit both to the boys and

The Sabines settled on a hill, called by them Quirinalis, either in memory of their city Cures, or in honour of their god Quiris. The place between the hills Palatinus and Tarpeius became a common market-place for the two united nations, and was called the forum. The union of the two nations soon produced a mixture of manners, customs and religion. The Sabines adopted the Roman gods, and the Romans those of the Sabines. They unanimously instituted the festival called matronalia, in memory of the peace concluded by the mediation of the women (G). As to martial affairs, the conquest of Cameria, a city in the neighbourhood of Rome, was the only
- b military achievement under the two kings. Four thousand of its inhabitants were transplanted to Rome, and a colony sent from thence to Cameria. In the sixth year of Romulus and Tatius, the latter having provoked the Lavinians, by protecting some of his friends who had ravaged their territories, was by them murdered at the foot of the altar, while he was offering a sacrifice, together with Romulus, in the city of Lavinium, to the tutelary gods of the state. Romulus conveyed the body of his colleague to Rome, with great pomp, and caused it to be honourably interred on mount Aventine. The Lavinians, fearing the resentment of Romulus, delivered up the assassins into his hands; but he sent them back unpunished, which gave occasion to suspect, that he was not at least displeased at the death of his colleague¹.
- c Not long after, a cruel plague, attended with a great famine, breaking out at Rome, the Camerini laid hold of this opportunity to shake off the yoke, and lay waste the Roman territory. But Romulus marching out against them, gave them battle, killed six thousand of them on the spot; and returning to Rome, entered the city in triumph, as he had done after the defeat of Acron. The like success attended him against the Fidenates, whose city, standing about forty furlongs from Rome, he took, and made it a Roman colony. This drew new enemies upon him; for the Veientes (H), reclaiming Fidene, as a city within their jurisdiction, laid siege to it; but their forces being defeated in two battles, and a great number of them taken prisoners, together with their commander, they were forced to prevent their total ruin by a timely submission. They therefore sent ambassadors to Rome to sue for peace; and Romulus granted them a truce for a hundred years, upon the following conditions, viz. that they should deliver to him seven small towns on the Tiber, some salt-pits near the mouth of that river, and send fifty of their chief citizens to Rome, to be kept there as hostages. A war thus advantageously ended, procured Romulus the honour of a third triumph, which, as the city was much increased both in riches and inhabitants, exceeded in all likelihood the two former. The prisoners were all sold for slaves; and what was done at this sale, gave rise to a custom, which prevailed ever after; for when they returned thanks to the gods for any victory, they used to dress an old man in a purple robe, with a child's bulla about his neck, and cry round him, Sardians to sell. By this ceremony they alluded to the old king or governor of the Veientes, who, in this war, had behaved like a child; and to the Veientes, who, with the other Ettrurians, were a colony of Lydians, whose metropolis was the city and girls, and appointed the prætecta and bullæ aureæ for the sons of the senators and patricians, and the prætecta alone for their daughters, and also for the sons of those who had served among the horse the full time the law required. The figure of a man's heart was sometimes impressed on the bullæ aureæ, to put those who wore them in mind of this moral truth, that men are only valuable for the qualities of their hearts. In like manner the purple colour of the prætecta was to remind them of the modesty which became them at that age (43).

(G) This festival was celebrated on the first of March. Ovid (44) gives other reasons for the institution of it, viz. to obtain of Mars the blessing of bearing good children; a blessing which he first bestowed on Rhea Sylvia. But, at the same time, the poet owns, that the matronalia were chiefly instituted in memory of the benefits the Romans had received from the Sabine women. During this festival, the Roman women, such as were married, served their slaves at table, and received presents from their husbands, as the husbands did from their wives in the time of the saturnalia. As the festival of the matronalia was consecrated to Mars, and, as some will have it, to Juno Lucina, sacrifices were offered to both these deities. This feast was the subject of Horace's ode,

Martius calebs quid agam calendis, &c.

(H) Veii was situated on a craggy rock, about one hundred furlongs from Rome, and is compared by Dionysius Halicarnassensis to Athens for extent and riches. Cluverius places it in the neighbourhood of the present Scrofa.

of Sardis ^a. Other writers date this custom from the time of the conquest of Sardinia by Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, when such a number of slaves was brought from that island, that nothing was to be seen in the markets but Sardinians.

The laws of Romulus.

THIS was the last war in which Romulus engaged. He employed the remaining part of his life in settling the government on the surest foundations. He made many good laws; but we have only some fragments of them remaining. The first relates to marriages, and forbids a wife to leave her husband upon any pretence whatsoever; but, at the same time, allows the husband to put away his wife, and even to punish her with death, in case she were convicted of adultery, poisoning, making false keys, or only of drinking wine. Each husband was confined to one wife, their goods being in common between them; but under the administration of the husband. In relation to children, Romulus gave their fathers an absolute power over them; so that they could, by their own private authority, imprison them, sell them for slaves, and even put them to death, of whatever age they were, and whatever dignity, office or employment they held ^b. He appointed no punishment for real parricide; but called all murder so, thinking the latter a detestable crime, but the former impossible; and indeed it was unknown in Rome for near six hundred years, as divorces were, notwithstanding the power granted to husbands, for five hundred and twenty years ^c.

He provokes the senate by his arbitrary

Romulus, in the latter end of his reign, whether elated with his former successes, or carried away with some pleasing notions of arbitrary power, began to enlarge his prerogative beyond the bounds he had formerly set to it, and to pay no longer any deference to his great council. The senators were assembled indeed; but merely for form-sake, and to ratify his commands. But what most of all provoked the fathers, was his sharing the conquered lands among his soldiers, as he pleased, without consulting them, and his restoring to the Veientes their hostages, against their opinion. This haughty and arbitrary carriage they could not brook, and therefore conspired his destruction; which they soon after effected. Romulus having appointed a review of his troops on a plain without the city, the senate attended him thither. While he was haranguing them, a sudden storm of hail and thunder dispersed the army; and the senators remaining alone with the king, thought this too favourable an opportunity to be neglected. The king was therefore slain, and his body conveyed out of sight in an instant. Some writers tell us, that the better to conceal the fact, the senators cut him in pieces, each of them carrying away one under his robe (I). However that be, the senators took occasion, from the secrecy of the fact, and the concealment of the body, to persuade the multitude, that the king was all on a sudden surrounded by a flame, and snatched up into heaven; but this stratagem did not appease the soldiery, till Julius Proculus, a senator of great distinction, having assembled the curiæ, told them, that Romulus had appeared to him, and enjoined him to acquaint his people, that it had pleased the gods he should return to heaven, from whence he originally came; but that he would be always a propitious god to them, under the name of Quirinus. As Julius Proculus, who was esteemed a man of great probity, and had been always thought a friend to Romulus, swore to the truth of this story, all suspicions were laid aside, and divine honours decreed to the new deity ^d. His death happened on the seventh day of July, in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, and sixtieth, or, as others say, fifty-fifth year of his age. Such was the end of Romulus, the founder and first king of Rome. He was thought to be the son of Mars, and it does not appear, that he ever acted unbecoming that character, having, in a short time, made his small colony formidable to all the neighbouring nations. (I) Historians differ about the place where Romulus lost his life; some saying he was killed in the open field, while he was haranguing his troops; others, that he lost his life in the temple of Vulcan, or in the senate. Neither do they agree about the manner in which he was assassinated; some say, he was murdered by the people, for shewing more favour to those who were newly come to Rome from the conquered cities, than to the ancient inhabitants;

while others pretend, the senators stabbed him in full senate, and having cut his body in pieces, every one carried a part of it away under his robe. However that be, his death gave rise, according to Plutarch (45), to the caprosine nones, or populifugium, that is, the flight of the people, a festival in the Roman calendar, on the nones of July. But other authors give another origin to this festival; of which we shall speak in a more proper place.

- a was his wisdom and policy inferior to his courage; for, in a few years, he increased his subjects from three thousand three hundred men, to forty-seven thousand; and what is still more surprising, formed a people out of a gang of slaves and profligates, who in process of time became masters of the world, and yet were long more renowned for their virtue, than for their courage or conquests. After the death of his grandfather Numitor, the sovereignty of Alba devolved upon him; but he reserved to himself no other power over it, than that of naming annually a magistrate, with the title of dictator, to govern it in form of a republic; which is somewhat surprising in a prince, who was so eagerly bent on extending his dominions, and subjecting all the states around him.
- b Romulus dying without issue, the city was greatly divided about the election of a new king. The Romans did not judge it by any means adviseable to resign the regal authority to the Sabines; and on the other hand the Sabines thought it was but just that the king should be chosen out of their nation, since they had peaceably submitted to Romulus, and contributed, as much as the Romans, to the raising of the city to its present pitch of wealth and power. During these disputes, the senators, to prevent anarchy and confusion, took the sovereignty into their own hands. The two hundred senators divided themselves into decuries or tens. These decuries drew lots which should govern first, and the decury, to whose lot it fell, enjoyed the supreme authority for five days, yet in such manner, that one person only of the governing decury had the badges of sovereignty at a time. To these another decury succeeded, each of them sitting on the throne in his turn, wearing the crown, &c. This form of government, which was called inter-regnum, lasted little more than a year, when the people, growing weary of such frequent change of masters, obliged the fathers to resolve on the election of a king. The inter-rex therefore for the time being, having summoned the people, addressed them thus: Elect yourselves a king, O Romans; the senate gives their consent; and, if you chuse a prince worthy to succeed Romulus, the senate will confirm your choice. The people were so well pleased with this condescension of the senate, that they remitted the choice to them. But as the old difficulty still remained, whether the king should be a Sabine or a Roman, this occasioned long disputes, till at length they came to this agreement among themselves, that the Romans should chuse the king, but should be obliged to elect a Sabine. There was at this time an austere Sabine philosopher, who led a solitary life, and was wholly taken up with the worship of the gods. His name was Numa Pompilius, and he was the fourth son of Pompilius Pompo, an illustrious Sabine. He had married Tatia, the daughter of king Tatius, and, together with her, remained in his native country, preferring the tranquillity of a private life to the splendor of a court. Upon the death of his wife, with whom he had lived thirteen years, he gave himself up intirely to the study of wisdom; and leaving the city of Cures, confined himself wholly to the country, wandering from solitude to solitude, in search only of those woods and fountains, which religion had made sacred. This gave rise to the fable, which was very early received among the Sabines, that Numa lived in familiarity with the nymph Egeria (K). This man both the senate and people pitched upon to be their king; and, without delay, dispatched Julius Proculus and Valerius Volesus, two senators of distinction, to acquaint Numa with their resolution, and make him an offer of the kingdom. The Sabine philosopher rejected at first their proposal; but being at last prevailed upon by the arguments and intreaties of the deputies, joined with those of his father, and of Martius his near relation, he yielded at last; and having offered sacrifices to the gods, set out for Rome, where he was received by all ranks of people with loud shouts of joy. Spurius Veltius, the inter-rex for the day, having assembled the curiæ, he was elected in due form, and the election was unanimously confirmed by the senate¹.

His death is followed by an inter-regnum.

(K) Numa's inclination to solitude, and his custom of retiring into the secret places of the forest of Aricia, gave rise to several popular opinions. Some believed, that the nymph Egeria herself dictated to him the laws, both civil and religious, which he established. Of this persuasion he took advantage, when he was on the throne, to bring about a reformation of Rome. Others, less favourable to Numa's reputation, have thought, that, under this affected passion for woods and caves, was concealed another more real, and less chaste. This seems to have been the opinion of Juvenal, who, in speaking of this grove, known to the Romans by the name of Lucus Egeria, or the grove of Egeria, says,

Hic ubi nocturna Numa constituebat Amica (46).

Janus.

THIS king's reign was no-ways memorable for battles or conquests; for he made it his chief study to quiet all contentions at home, to reform the manners of the Romans, and to establish good policy in the city. The first thing he did, was to dismiss the royal guard of three hundred celeres, saying, He would not rule over a people, of whom he conceived the least distrust. In the next place, he applied himself to quiet the dissensions at Rome, to bring all the citizens to a perfect concord and harmony among themselves, and to moderate the warlike ardour of the Romans, by impressions of religion. Plutarch tells us ^a, that he had true notions of the deity, that is, of a first principle of all things, impassible, invisible, incorruptible, and purely intelligible; and therefore prohibited the representing of God in the resemblance of man or beast. The same author adds, that, for the space of one hundred and sixty years, ^b there were no painted nor graven images in the Roman temples or sanctuaries. But tho' Numa had, according to Plutarch, right notions of the deity, yet he did not introduce the true worship of the Supreme Being; but authorized both the Sabine and Alban superstitions, introducing only order and decency in the performance of them. With this view he divided the ministers of religion into eight classes, viz. Curiones, Flamines, Celeres, Augurs, Vestal Virgins, Salii, Feciales, and Pontifices. The Curiones were the particular priests of each curia. The Flamines, so called from the fashion or colour of their caps (L), were priests, whose ministry was confined to some particular god, from whom they took their name, as the Flamen Dialis, the Flamen Martialis, &c. The Celeres were inferior ministers, whose duty it was to take care of the sacrifices, under the direction of the tribunes, who had commanded them when they were guards to Romulus. The Augurs not only foretold future events by the flying of birds, but had many other kinds of divination under their province. The Vestals were wholly devoted to the goddess Vesta, and obliged, under the severest penalty, to keep the sacred fire in her temple perpetually burning. The Salii were the guardians of the ancilia, or twelve shields, hung up in the temple of Mars. They took their name from their dancing in the celebration of the annual festival instituted in memory of a miraculous shield, which, Numa pretended, fell down from heaven. The business of the Feciales was to demand satisfaction for the injuries Rome received from her enemies, to proclaim war against them, in case of refusal, and to take care ^c that all treaties with the neighbouring nations were faithfully observed. The Pontifices (M) were the most venerable of all the classes; their office was, to give judgment in all causes relating to religion, to inquire into the lives and manners of the inferior priests, and to punish them, if they saw occasion; to regulate the feasts, sacrifices, and all other sacred institutions; to determine what works should be deemed lawful, and what unlawful, on festival days. They had a president over them, with the title of Pontifex Maximus, whose office was one of the most honourable in the commonwealth. Some say, that Numa reserved this eminent dignity for himself; and others, that he conferred it on his relation Numa Marcius.

Numa's view, in thus multiplying the ceremonies of religion, was the more effectually to divert the Romans from pursuits of ambition, and violence of arms. For the same purpose, or, at least, to put a check to the hasty temper of so fierce a people, ever ready, upon the slightest occasions, to begin a war, he dedicated a temple to Janus, the symbol of prudence, which looks two ways, and examines what is past, and what may come. This temple was to stand open in time of war, and to be shut in time of peace. He likewise erected an altar to Bona Fides, or Good Faith, in order to bring the republic to be faithful to her treaties; and the private citizens to their private

(L) These priests were first called, as Plutarch informs us, Pileamines, from the Greek word πῖλος, or the Latin pileus, which signified a sort of cap which was peculiar to them. Others think they took their names from the flame-coloured tufts they had on their caps. They were chosen by the people, and inaugurated by the pontifex maximus. The Flamines could not be deposed but for very great reasons. Their wives, who were called Flaminica, partook of the priesthood of their husbands, and shared with them the care of the sacrifices. A Flaminica could not be divorced on any account; and, upon her death, the Flamen lost his sacerdotal dignity.

(M) The word Pontifex is by most authors derived from pons and facere, the repairs of the bridges, which were deemed sacred, being committed to the Pontifices. But Plutarch finds fault with this etymology, and tells us, that the word Pontifex was in use at Rome before there were any bridges there. He derives it from the word potis, which, in old Latin, signified powerful. Others take it to be a compound of potis and facere, where facere signifies to sacrifice. We shall have occasion to speak of the functions of each class of priests in the course of this history.

- a contracts with one another. The same spirit of equity made him introduce another kind of deities, under the name of Termini, or Boundaries, which he caused to be placed on the borders of the Roman state, and of each man's private lands. In honour of these deities he instituted a festival called terminalia, which was annually celebrated on the twenty-second or twenty-third of the month of February. To remove the Dii Termini was deemed a sacrilege of so heinous a nature, that any man might kill with impunity the transgressor ^a.

THE reformation of religion was followed by an improvement of the laws, in which he had a particular regard to the preserving of modesty in women; nevertheless he permitted husbands to lend their wives after they had had children by them.

- b This was a kind of temporary divorce in favour of those men, whose wives were barren; but the husbands still continued to have the same power over them, and could call them home, or lend them to others, as they pleased. He reformed the law made by Romulus, with relation to the power of parents over their children; for he would not suffer a father to sell his son after marriage, thinking it unjust, that a woman, who had married a freeman, should be obliged to live with a slave.

- FOR the encouraging of agriculture, Numa shared the lands, which the late king had obtained by conquest, among those who had no other occupation. And the better to keep them constantly attentive to the improvement of their farms, he distributed them into pagi or villages, over each of which he appointed a chief or superintendant, whose business was to keep a watchful eye over the husbandmen, to encourage them when diligent, to punish them when slothful, and to make a report of the progress of agriculture in his district to the king, who often advanced the industrious husbandmen to the first dignities in the state. By this means the lands were cultivated, and the city disburdened of the idle soldiery, who had been accustomed, under Romulus, to live by rapine ^c.

BUT the master-piece of Numa's policy, was his distributing the citizens of Rome into distinct bodies of tradesmen. The city had been hitherto rent into two factions, occasioned by the union of the Sabines and first Romans; and nothing could be more dangerous than such a division of the state as it were into two different nations.

- d Numa therefore, to take away all distinction of Roman and Sabine, divided all the inhabitants according to their several trades and occupations, making every profession a particular company and society, and appointing to each their respective courts and privileges. In this division the musicians had the first rank, because employed in the offices of religion. The goldsmiths, carpenters, curriers, dyers, tailors, &c. formed also distinct communities, and were all allowed to make by-laws among themselves, to have their own festivals, particular sacrifices, &c. By this means the Romans and Sabines, being intermixed in the same societies, forgot their party-names, and were brought to an intimate union ^e.

- THE last reformation which Numa undertook, was that of the calendar. Romulus had divided his year into ten months, which, according to Plutarch, had no certain or equal number of days, some consisting of twenty, some of thirty-five, and some of more ^f. But Macrobius tells us ^g, that he settled the number of days with more equality, allotting to March, May, Quintilis and October, one-and-thirty days; to April, June, Sextilis, November and December thirty, making up in all three hundred and four days. Numa was better acquainted with the celestial motions, and therefore, undertaking to reform the calendar, in the first place added the two months of January and February. To compose these two months, he added fifty days to the three hundred and four, in order to make them answer to the course of the moon; he then took six more from the six months that had even days, adding one odd day more than he ought to have done, merely out of superstition, to make the number fortunate (N). However, he could get but eight-and-twenty for February; and therefore that month was always counted unlucky. Besides this, he observed the difference between the solar and the lunar course to be eleven days; and, to remedy the inequality, he doubled those days after every two years, adding an interstitial month after February, which Plutarch calls in one place Mercidinus^a, and in another a Mercidonius^b (O). As Numa was sensible that the solar year consisted of three hundred sixty-five days, and six hours, and that the six hours made a whole day in four years, he commanded, that the month Mercidinus, after every four years, should consist of twenty-three days; but the care of these intercalations being left to the priests, they put in or left out the intercalary day and month, as they fancied it lucky or unlucky, and, by that means, created such a confusion, that the festivals and solemn days came, in process of time, to be kept at a season quite contrary to what they had been formerly^c.

Numa had now reigned near forty-three years, and was in the eighty-second of his age, when he died of a distemper, which gradually wore him away, without impairing the vigour of his mind. During the time of his long reign, peace had so softened the warlike temper of the Romans, that it might be literally said of them, that their weapons were changed into instruments of husbandry. No intestine seditions, no ambitious desires of the throne, not so much as any murmurs against the person of the king, or his administration, appeared among them. When he died, he was as sincerely lamented by the Romans, as if every man had lost his dearest friend, or his own father. Strangers, to whom he was equally dear, upon the news of his death, flocked from all parts to Rome, to celebrate his obsequies, bringing along with them perfumes and crowns to be used at his funeral. As he had forbid the burning of his body, it was put into a stone coffin, and buried, pursuant to his own orders, with the greatest part of the books he had writ, at the foot of the hill Janiculus (P); whither he was carried on the shoulders of his senators, and followed by all the people, who, with tears and lamentations, bewailed the loss of so good a prince. He left behind him but one daughter, named Pomilia, who was married to Numa Marcius, by whom she had Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome^w (Q).

THE death of Numa was followed by an inter-regnum, which proved very short, Tullus Hostilius being unanimously chosen by the people, and accepted by the senate. Hostus, the grandfather of Tullus Hostilius, was originally of Medulia, a city of Latium, but had settled at Rome about four years after its foundation. (O) Festus speaks of certain days, which he calls mercidonius dies, because they were appointed for the payment of workmen and domestics. Perhaps the intercalary month was for the same reason called mercedonius, from the Latin word merces, signifying wages. As for the other months, January had its name from Janus; February was so called from the expiations, signified by the word februa, which were performed in this month; March, the first month of Romulus's year, had its name from Mars, his supposed father; April, from Venus, called by the Greeks Αφροδιτη; May, from Maia the mother of Mercury, according to Plutarch (47); tho' Macrobius makes the Maia, to whom May was consecrated, the same with Rhea, Ops, or the Earth, and different from Mercury's mother (48); Ovid brings it from the word maiores or elders (49). June either comes from juvenens, because this is the youthful and gay part of the year (50); or is a contraction of Junonius, and dedicated to the goddess Juno (51). The other months had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, and December. Only Quintilis and Sextilis afterwards changed their names into July and August, in honour of Julius Cæsar and his successor Augustus.

(P) The books, which he ordered to be buried with him, were dug up again four hundred years after his death, and burnt by a decree of the senate. He therein explained his reasons for the novelties he had introduced into the Roman worship. We are indebted to Varro for this account (52). One Terentius, says he, had a piece of ground near the Janiculum; and a husbandman of his, one day accidentally running his plough over Numa's tomb, turned up some of the legislator's books, wherein he gave his reasons for establishing the religion of the Romans on the foot on which he left it. The husbandman carried these books to the prætor, and the prætor to the senate, who, after having read his frivolous reasons for his religious establishments, agreed, that the books should be destroyed, according to Numa's intentions; and it was accordingly decreed, that the prætor should throw them into the fire. St. Austin thinks there were some footsteps of magic in these books, of which Numa had been in his life-time suspected. Aurelius Victor assures us, that Numa's motives for the religion he established at Rome, were found to be so trivial, that the senate thought fit to suppress them.

(Q) Some writers have given Numa four sons, who, they say, were afterwards the stocks of four illustrious families. But the common opinion is, that he had only one daughter, named Pomilia; and she is said to have been born to him of a second wife, by name Lucretia, whom he married after his election to the crown. Ancus Martius, his grandson, was only five years old when his grandfather died; and therefore passed by in the next election, as not being of an age fit to govern.

- a Hoflus Hofilius, the father of Tullus Hofilius (R). Tullus began his reign, by distributing certain lands, which were the demesnes of the crown, among such of his subjects as had no lands of their own. This act of generosity immediately gained him the hearts of his people. As he was of a bold and fiery temper, he was more inclined to tread in the steps of Romulus than of Numa; and it was not long before he had a favourable opportunity of seconding his martial inclination. Caelius, or, as Livy styles him, Clulius, who was at the head of affairs in Alba, being jealous of the growing greatness of Rome, privately commissioned some of the most indigent among his subjects to lay waste the Roman territory, not doubting but this would soon give occasion to a war between the two nations: nor was he disappointed in his expectation;
- b for a Roman army, entering the territories of Alba, attacked the robbers, slew many of them, and took a great number of prisoners. Clulius, having now a plausible reason for engaging his people in a war with the Romans, convened an assembly; and by exaggerating the losses which Alba had sustained, brought them to this resolution, that an embassy should be first sent to Rome, to demand satisfaction; and, in case they refused it, that war should be declared. When the ambassadors arrived at Rome, Tullus, guessing at their errand, made use of various pretences to defer giving them audience; and in the mean time sent an embassy to Alba, with orders to require satisfaction on the part of Rome. A fecialis was at the head of the ambassadors, who finding Clulius in the midst of the public forum, discharged his commission, and put him in mind of the ancient treaty between the two nations, whereby it was stipulated,
- c that they should never make war upon one another, till a reparation of injuries on either side had been previously asked in a friendly manner. To this Clulius answered, That he had already sent ambassadors to Tullus, but to no effect; and therefore declared war against him. Hereupon the fecialis, calling the gods to witness, that the Romans had been first refused their demands, and that they might therefore declare war without any infraction of the treaty, left Alba, and set out for Rome. Upon the return of the Roman ambassadors, Tullus sent for the Alban deputies; and being told by them, that their errand was to demand satisfaction of him, and, in case of a refusal, to declare war, the king replied, Go, tell your master, that the king of Rome
- d calls the gods to witness which of the two nations first refused the other satisfaction, that they may cause all the miseries of this war to fall upon those who first broke the treaty. Thus did Tullus reduce to bare appearances that sincerity, which his predecessor had laboured to establish in Rome *.

His war with the Albans.

- THE Roman fecialis had allowed Clulius the space of thirty days before hostilities were to begin; which was no sooner elapsed, than both armies took the field. But when they came in sight of each other, whatever was the cause of it, their ardour cooled, neither party caring to come to an engagement. This inaction raised great murmurs in the Alban army against Clulius, as the author of a mock war; insomuch that, not being able to bear their reproaches, he resolved to offer the Romans battle,
- e or, if they declined it, to force their intrenchments. But the next morning he was found dead in his tent in the midst of his guards, without any signs of violence; which occasioned various conjectures, some imputing his death to the friends of Rome, others to the anger of the gods, who, they said, had thus punished him for beginning an unjust and unnecessary war; but the greater part looked upon it as a common accident, and therefore chose in his room one Metius Fuffetius, or, as others call him,

* Liv. l. i. c. 22.

(R) Hoflus had signalized himself under Romulus in his wars with the Sabines and Fidenates. He was the first who entered the breach at the taking of Fidena, and was on that account rewarded by Romulus with a mural crown. This was the reward bestowed by generals on the person who first scaled the walls of a besieged city. In the second battle with the Sabines, Hoflus was killed, and his death occasioned the flight of the Romans (53). Nevertheless he had distinguished himself, before the Roman army was put to flight, in so eminent a manner, that the remembrance of his gallant behaviour was preserved by an inscription on a pillar erected on the field of battle (54). As for Hoflus Hofilius, the son of Hoflus, and father of Tullus, we find nothing worth mentioning said of him. But Tullus Hofilius appeared both to the Roman people and senate to be possessed of all those qualifications, which could be desired in a successor to Numa. What some historians say of his education, has no appearance of truth (55), viz. that he was brought up in woods, and there kept sheep, as a common shepherd; it being no-ways credible, that one of the first and most wealthy of the Roman citizens should employ his son in that mean office.

Suffetius,

Suffetius, a man no less famous for his hatred to the Roman name than Clulius. He had been one of the chief promoters of the war; but whether he distrusted his own skill in the management of it, or did not care to venture an engagement, he continued, under various pretences, in the same inactivity which he had blamed in his predecessor. In the mean time he received certain advice, that the Veientes and Fidenates were preparing to fall upon both armies, when they should be weakened by a battle. This intelligence still increased his delays, and he now thought of nothing but coming to a conference with the king of the Romans, and changing the preparations of war into a sincere reconciliation. With this view he marched out of his intrenchments; and Tullus, not doubting but his design was to offer him battle, went out to meet him: but he was greatly surprized to find that the Alban, instead of coming to an engagement, demanded an interview. However, he readily granted him his request, and the two commanders came to a parley at the head of their respective armies. After reciprocal salutations and protestations of friendship, as if it had never been interrupted, Fuffetius acquainted the Roman king with the conspiracy of the Veientes and Fidenates, and produced the letters he had received from his friends in Fidenæ. Tullus acknowledged that he had received the same intelligence, which had induced him to keep within his camp, and prevented his undertaking any thing against the Albans. Both consented to end the quarrel in an amicable manner, and expressed a willingness to unite the two nations; but in order to make the union more durable and perfect, Tullus proposed, that all, or at least the chief, families of Alba, should remove to Rome; or in case they were unwilling to leave their native city, that one common-council should be established to govern both cities under the direction of one of the two sovereigns. Fuffetius took aside those who attended him, to consult with them about this proposal; but they, though willing to come to an union with the Romans, absolutely refused to leave Alba; so that the only difficulty remaining was to settle which city should have the superiority. Fuffetius spoke in favour of Alba, alledging that she was the metropolis, or mother-city, whereas Rome was but a colony. Tullus urged in behalf of Rome her superiority in wealth and power, and in the close of his speech proposed to terminate the dispute by a single combat between himself and Fuffetius. The Alban general, not caring to enter the lists with Tullus, declined this offer, and made a new proposal, which was, that three champions should be chosen out of each camp to decide the difference; and to this Tullus agreed. The agreement was no sooner known in the two armies, than it excited a strong emulation among the young warriors, for the honour of being chosen to this important combat. But while the choice of the champions was yet in suspense, Fuffetius cast his eyes upon three Albans, whose birth had something wonderful in it. Dionysius Halicarnassæus gives us the following account of it: Sequinius, an illustrious citizen of Alba, had two daughters; one he married to Curatius, a citizen of Alba, and the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome. These two sisters were brought to bed on the same day, each of three male children, who were now in the flower of their age, and remarkable for their strength and dexterity. The Alban general therefore, imagining that the gods had brought them into the world on purpose to determine the fate of their respective countries with their swords, communicated his thoughts to the king of Rome, and exhorted him to pitch upon the three Horatii, as he had fixed his choice on the three Curatii. Tullus accordingly proposed the matter to the Horatian family, but would lay no restraint upon them. The three young heroes answered, that they could not dispose of their lives without his consent, from whom they had received them. Old Horatius, the father of the three brothers, was under no small apprehension of a combat, wherein much of the blood of his family would be spilt; and as an additional matter of concern, one of his daughters was betrothed to one of the Curatii. However, the love of his country getting the better of all other considerations, he left his children to their own choice; and when he understood that they, following the example of the Curatii, preferred a glorious death, or important victory, to an inglorious life, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and embracing his children, cried out, I am a happy father; and then commanded them to declare his consent to the king.

The dispute between Alba and Rome decided by them.

AND now the combat of the Horatii and Curatii being proclaimed in both camps, Tullus led the former, and Fuffetius the latter, the people strewing the way, as they passed, with flowers, and putting garlands on their heads; for they were looked upon

- a as victims, which had voluntarily devoted themselves for their country. A great plain lying between the two camps was chosen for the place of the combat; and the two kings advanced with their champions and feciales to the middle of it; and before the engagement began, concluded a treaty, which served as a pattern for most of the treaties that were ever after made by the Romans (S). This done, the Roman and Alban champions advanced with a slow pace, each towards his antagonist. But when the people expected to see them engage, they quitted their arms, and flew to embrace one another with all the marks of the most tender and sincere friendship. At this moving sight the spectators, not able to refrain their tears, began to complain of their kings for engaging so near and affectionate relations to shed one another's blood. But the
- b tenderness of the young heroes did not abate their courage: Each of them returned to his arms, and chose his adversary. The eldest of the Horatii engaged the eldest of the Curatii, and the other two chose their adversaries, in the same manner, according to their age (T). The noise of their arms was already heard at a great distance, and the air rung with a confused mixture of shouts and acclamations from both camps, as either of the combatants appeared to have the advantage. The skill and dexterity of the champions kept the victory long in suspense. At length the eldest of the Horatii received a mortal wound, and fell. At this sight the Albans triumphed, and their joyful acclamations threw the Romans into the utmost consternation, which was soon after changed into despair, when they saw the second Horatius, being run through
- c by another of the Curatii, expire on the body of his brother. But the three Alban brothers were all wounded, and the remaining Horatius unhurt and vigorous. However, not thinking himself a match for the three brothers together, he made use of a stratagem to separate them: he cunningly retreated, as if he fled; and the Curatii pursuing him, but at unequal distances, as their wounds allowed them, the Roman champion turning short upon them, slew them all before one could come up to the assistance of the other; and big with this victory, seized the spoils of the vanquished,

(S) Of this treaty Livy gives us the following account: First, one of the college of the feciales, named Marcus Valerius, asked king Tullius, Whether he gave him orders to conclude a peace with the pater patratus of the Albans? The king answered, He did. Give me then, replied the herald, the sign of my commission: this sign was to be some vervain plucked up by the roots. Yes, answered the king, bring me some vervain that is pure. At these words the fecialis went and gathered some vervain on a little hill, brought it, and went on thus: Do you then appoint me to be fecialis and plenipotentiary of Rome to the Albans, and engage to protect my equipage and residue? Yes, replied the king, so far as is consistent with my interest, and that of the Roman people. Then Valerius, the fecialis, appointed Spurius Fufius to be pater patratus of the treaty, by crowning him with vervain. His office, as such, was to pronounce aloud the words of the oath in the name of the Roman king and people, and to repeat the whole form of the treaty. After this ceremonial, which passed only among the Romans, the new pater patratus read the articles of the convention in the presence of the Albans, and then expressed himself thus: Hear, O Jupiter; hear, O pater patratus of the Alban people; hear, O Alban people; of these articles, as I have just now read them out of those waxen tablets, without fraud or deceit, and as they have been from one end to the other clearly understood, the Roman people will never be the first violators. If they should violate them by public authority, and by fraud, may Jupiter as this instant strike them, as I shall now strike this victim! May thy stroke, great Jupiter, be as much heavier, as thy power is greater. At which words he killed a fow, which was to be offered up as a sacrifice, in confirmation of the treaty, by a blow on the head with a flint. The heralds of the Albans took the like oaths, and also offered their sacrifices (56).

As to the pater patratus, it is not easy to determine whether he was a constant officer, and chief of the feciales, or only a temporary minister elected for the denouncing of war, or making a peace, which were both done by him. Rosinus makes him the constant governor, or head of the feciales (57); Festus looks upon him as a distinct officer (58). Pomponius Latius (59), and Polydore Virgil (60), are of opinion, that he was only chosen by one of the feciales upon such occasions as we have just now mentioned. No person was intrusted with this office, but who had a father and a son both alive, and therefore pater patratus is no more than a more perfect sort of father, as they imagined him to be, whose own father was still living after he himself had been a father for some time. That a pater patratus, that is, one, who had both a father alive, and was himself father of children still alive, should be always chose for the above-mentioned purposes, was, according to some writers, a political law established by Numa, that king being well apprised, that a man, who had a father and children alive, would be more inclined to be faithful to his country, and promote the common interest. Some think that the pater patratus was so called a patrando jurejurando, that is, from the oath he was obliged to take to attest the justice of his demand. Festus says, he was so called, because by virtue of his commission he acted as pater patriæ, that is, father of his country.

(T) Dionysius Halicarnassensis, by telling us, that the eldest of the Curatii chose out the eldest of the Horatii, and that the other two chose their adversaries according to their age, seems to insinuate, that the two sisters had each three children one after another, and at different births; for he plainly supposes that they were not all of the same age. But this difference of age most authors explain by the order in which the laws placed twins.

while the Roman camp resounded with joyful acclamations in honour of their hero (U). Thus Rome gained the superiority over Alba, her mother city, which Fuffetius acknowledged on the very field of battle, saluting king Tullus as his sovereign, and asking him what were his commands? Tullus answered, I command you nothing, but to keep the Alban youth in a readiness to march at my orders, in case I make war with the Veientes.

Horatius kills

As Horatius was returning to the city in a sort of triumph, he was met by his sister, who, in seeing him loaded with the spoils of the three brothers, among which was a military robe, which she had wrought with her own hands for the Curatius, to whom she had been betrothed, could not forbear tearing her hair, beating her breast, and reviling her brother with the most provoking and reproachful words for imbruing his hands in the blood of his relations. Hereupon Horatius, flushed with his late victory, and enraged at his sister's unseasonable grief, killed her upon the spot, and went on strait to his father's house, who not only approved of the action, but would not allow his daughter to be buried in the sepulchre of the Horatian family. However, when Tullus returned to Rome, young Horatius was brought by some illustrious citizens to his tribunal, to take his trial there. They thought it dangerous to abate the rigour of the laws in favour of conquerors; and therefore insisted on his being tried, and condemned, if found guilty. Tullus, being divided between his regard for the laws, and the desire he had to save the young Horatius, and foreseeing he should be censured by some for condemning, and by others for acquitting the criminal, dextrously turned the affair into a state crime, the cognizance of which did not belong to him, but to two commissioners, or dumviri, whom the king was to name. As the crime was notorious, and not disowned by the prisoner, the duumviri without delay pronounced sentence against him in these words: We judge you to be guilty of treason; go, lie low, and tie his hands. As soon as judgment was given, Horatius, by the king's advice, appealed to an assembly of the people, by whom the sentence against the criminal was revoked, rather through admiration of his courage, says Livy, than for the justice of his cause. However, that the crime might not go wholly unpunished, Horatius was condemned to pass under the yoke, an ignominy with which it was usual to treat prisoners of war, who had cowardly surrendered their arms. The king also appointed expiations to pacify the anger of the gods provoked by this violation of the laws. Nor was this all; the pontifices erected two altars, the one to Juno, and the other to Janus, which were still remaining in the time of Augustus, together with the yoke, known by the name of Sororium Tigillum, under which they made the criminal pass.

war upon the Veientes.

Tullus, mindful of the suspicious behaviour of the Fidenates, during his war with the Albans, cited them to appear before the senate of Rome, and answer for their conduct. But they, being conscious of their guilt, and in private intelligence with Fuffetius, who had stirred them up under-hand in hopes of shaking off the Roman yoke, refused to obey, and in conjunction with the Veientes took the field. Fuffetius, in compliance with Tullus's orders, joined him with the Alban troops; but the day before the battle he acquainted his principal officers with his design, which was to stand neuter, till fortune had declared for one side, and then join the conqueror. His project was universally approved, and all, who were present, bound themselves by a solemn oath to conceal his design, and obey his orders. In the mean time both armies marched out of their intrenchments, and while they were in motion, Fuffetius leaving the place he had been posted in, retired with his men to a rising ground. Tullus being apprised of his desertion, in that distress made privately a vow to add twelve priests to the college of the Salii, and to build a temple to fear and paleness; and then dissembling his fear, cried out with a loud voice, which was heard, both by his own men, and by the enemy; Courage, friends, we have conquered; it is by my order, that the Albans are possessing themselves of the hill, whence they are to fall down upon the enemy. The confidence of the king inspired his troops with courage; and the Fidenates and Veientes on the other hand, looking on the inaction of the Albans as suspicious, began to distrust them. And thus the discouragement one army was under, and the valour

(U) Dionysius Halicarnassensis says, that one of the Curiatii was killed in the beginning of the combat; so that there were but two Curatii left to en-

- a of the other, decided the day. The Roman cavalry fell upon the Fidenates with great resolution, and obliged them to retire in disorder to Fidenæ. Tullus, without losing time in pursuing them, returned upon the Veientes, who being disheartened at the defeat of their allies, after a feint resistance betook themselves to flight, and perished for the most part either in the Tiber, while they attempted to save themselves by swimming, or on the banks of that river by the swords of the Romans, who overtook them. Then Fuffetius, coming down from his hill, fell upon the remains of the dispersed Fidenates and Veientes. But Tullus, concealing his knowledge of Fuffetius's treachery, went privately in the night to Rome to consult the senate, and returned to the camp by break of day. He then detached Horatius, who had conquered the three
- b Albans, with a chosen body of horse and foot to demolish Alba, as had been concerted with the senate. While these orders were executing, Tullus commanded both the Roman and Alban troops to attend him unarmed; but with private instructions to the Romans to bring their swords concealed under their garments. When they were all assembled, he laid open the perfidioulness and treachery of Fuffetius in a long speech; and in the conclusion ordered him to be fastened to two chariots drawn by horses, and to be torn asunder. His accomplices were all put to the sword; but the rest of the Alban soldiers were carried to Rome with the citizens, and the chief men among them were even admitted into the Roman senate. Others were promoted to the dignity of knights, and all without exception enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens^b. Thus
- c fell the city of Alba, famous for its riches, the number of its inhabitants, and above all for being the mother of Rome. This new increase of inhabitants obliged Tullus to enlarge the limits of the city; he took in mount Cælius, allowing the Albans to settle there, and built on the same hill his own palace. The next spring he marched against the Fidenates, defeated them in a pitched battle, and having obliged them to shelter themselves within their walls, by cutting off all succours and provisions reduced them to such straits, that they surrendered at discretion. The ring-leaders of the revolt were punished, but the rest suffered to continue in their native city under the same form of government, only dependant upon Rome. So complete a victory procured him the honours of a triumph, in which the spoils of the conquered enemy were carried
- d before him as trophies.

Alba demolished, and the inhabitants transplanted to Rome.

Tullus defeats the Fidenates.

- As the power and wealth of Rome was much increased by these repeated victories, and the destruction of Alba, Tullus demanded satisfaction of the Sabines, who were a very powerful nation, for the insults which had been formerly offered to some Roman citizens at the temple of the goddess Feronia, which stood at the foot of mount Soracte, upon the banks of the Tiber, and was frequented both by the Sabines and Romans (W). The Sabines, having solicited in vain the neighbouring nations to join them, kept themselves for some time on the defensive only. But at length, being provoked by Tullus, who laid waste their country, they came to an engagement, which proved so bloody, that both nations, terrified with the numbers of their slain, retired into their respective countries, without attempting any thing more that campaign. The
- e next year the war was renewed with more fury than before. Both armies met in the neighbourhood of Lerum, a town about thirteen miles from Rome, and fought with incredible fury, victory inclining to neither side, till Tullus, giving his men new courage, by making a vow to institute on the same day a festival in honour of Saturn and Ops (X), gained a complete victory. The conquered had no other resource but

Gains a complete victory over the Sabines.

(W) The goddess Feronia presided over forests, gardens, and orchards, and is thought by some to be the same with Flora or Proserpine. Her temple was frequented by the neighbouring nations, who came to pay their homage, and make offerings to the deity, which they worshipped in common. A fair was kept annually near her temple, and the preceding years some Roman citizens had been on that occasion robbed, and kept in captivity by the Sabines, who refused to set them at liberty, when demanded by their country, saying, that the Romans had used them in the same manner by opening an asylum, and peopling Rome with their fugitives.

(X) The festivals of Saturn and Ops, or Rhea, were kept in the month of December, under the name of Saturnalia and Opalia, which were, properly speaking, one and the same solemnity, continued for several days together. The festival appropriated to Saturn was fixed to the sixteenth of the calends of January, and that of Ops to the fourteenth. Dionysius of Halicarnassus ascribes the origin of them to Tullus Hostilius's vow. But Macrobius assures us, that they were celebrated in Italy long before the building of Rome (61). Servants had at this time a right of being served by their masters, wearing their cloaths, and reproving them for their faults. In this sense Horace encourages his servant to speak his mind freely, applying himself to him thus:

to implore the clemency of the conqueror; and Tullus, whose bare name made them tremble, granted them a peace upon his own terms ^c.

Tullus, flushed with success, summoned all the Latin towns, which had been dependant on Alba, to submit to the Roman laws, and follow the fortune of their metropolis. Upon this it was resolved in a general assembly of the Latins held at Teromium, that they should not by any means submit to Rome, but to the utmost of their power maintain their ancient independency. Two generals were elected by the assembly, viz. Ancus Publicius of Cora, and Spurius Vecilius of Lavinium, to whom a full power was granted of declaring war, or making peace, as they should think fit. However, the Romans did not think it advisable to make war upon them in a regular manner; they contented themselves with making inroads and incursions, and destroying ^b ing their harvest. Medulia alone, which had received a colony in Romulus's time, and had now joined the Latins, was taken, and, as was then thought, put out of a condition of ever taking up arms again ^d.

second time.

SOME years after, the Sabines, thinking themselves in a condition to repair their ancient losses, invaded the Roman territories, and dividing themselves into small parties, over-ran the whole country. As they met with little opposition, they began to entertain thoughts of laying siege to Rome. But Tullus, marching out against them, defeated them in a pitched battle, and made them once more sensible of the superiority of Rome.

His death.

Tullus being now advanced in years, fell into superstition, and was easily imposed ^c upon by stories of prodigies, and voices from heaven. Sometimes they told him, that it had rained stones on the hill of Alba, and sometimes that a voice from heaven had been heard there, commanding the Albans to resume their ancient ceremonies. The king believed these prodigies, and appointed expiatory sacrifices for nine days, which gave rise to the custom of employing nine days to appease heaven as often as men were alarmed with prodigies of this kind. As to the manner of his death, authors disagree; some tell us, that he was killed by lightning, with his wife, children, and his whole family (Y); others are of opinion, that he died by the hands of Ancus Marcius, his successor, who slew him and his whole family, while they were performing a domestic sacrifice, and then set fire to the palace to conceal his crime. He ^d died after a reign of thirty-three years, leaving the city greatly increased, but the dominions much the same as they had been in the time of Romulus. As he was looked upon as a man struck by the gods, we find no mention in history of honours decreed to his ashes, or even of the place of his burial.

AFTER a short inter-regnum, the people and senate unanimously chose Ancus (Z) Marcius, the grandson of Numa, by his daughter Pompilia, and Marcius his relation, the

This, according to some, was done in memory of the liberty enjoyed in the golden age, before the names of servant and master were known. Besides, friends at this time sent presents to one another: no war was to be proclaimed, and no offender executed. One day only was kept at first, the fourteenth of the calends of January; but the number was afterwards increased to three, four, five, and, some say, to seven days (63).

(Y) He is said by some to have studied magic, and to have hid himself in a private place to perform a magical sacrifice; but that omitting some part of the necessary ceremonies, he so incensed the god, to whom he was sacrificing, that the enraged divinity set his palace on fire by lightning, and destroyed his wife and children in the flames (64).

(Z) Every Roman had, generally speaking, three, and sometimes four, names: the first was called prænomen, the second nomen, the third cognomen, and the fourth agnomen. The nomen shewed the family, from which he was sprung; the prænomen and cognomen were often nick-names, taken from the circumstances of the person's birth, or his defects, or bodily qualities; and the agnomen was a title of honour; as Africanus, Germanicus, &c. Thus the prince of the Roman orators was called Marcus Tullius Cicero. The prænomen Marcus signified that he was born in the month of March; his nomen, or name Tullius, was that of his family, and his cognomen, or surname Cicero, alluded to the mark or wart he had in his face, which was like a vetch, called by the Latins cicer. Valerius tells us, that Marcius had the name of Ancus from the Greek word αγκυρα, because he had a crooked arm, which he could not stretch out to its full length. We must observe here, that the ingeniti alone, or those, who were free-born, were allowed to take three names. Hence Juvenal,

- a the son of that Marcus, who persuaded Numa to accept of the kingdom, and afterwards killed himself, because he was not chose in his room. The new king began his reign, by endeavouring to restore the religious ceremonies, which had been neglected in the last reign, to their former use, and to revive husbandry, advising his subjects to lay aside all sorts of violence, and to return to their peaceable employments. Notwithstanding this seeming inclination to peace, Ancus in his heart loved war, and was desirous of the honours of a triumph. However, the love he affected for the arts of peace, gained him the affections of his subjects; but at the same time drew upon him the contempt of the neighbouring nations. The Latins were the first, who made him give way to his martial inclination. These, pretending that their treaty with the Romans was no longer binding, than while king Tullus lived, made inroads into the territories of Rome. Ancus therefore resolved to be revenged on them; but out of respect to the laws of Numa, omitted no ceremony in declaring war, which that law-giver had appointed (A). He then took the field with an army consisting intirely of new-raised troops, marched to Politorium (B), a Latin city, and made himself master of the place before the Latins could relieve it. He spared the city, and only transplanted the inhabitants to Rome, settling them with those of Tillena and Ficana, two other cities of Latium, which he likewise took, on the hill Aventinus. The next year he retook Politorium, which the Latins had repeopled, and upon this second reduction demolished it intirely. He then laid siege to Medulia, a place of great strength, which he took, after having led his troops four years successively against it. He likewise made himself master of Ficana, destroying it with fire and sword. This city he had taken in the beginning of the war; but having neglected to demolish it, the Latins had possessed themselves of it, and it was with the utmost difficulty that he reduced it the second time. The Latins, enraged, but not discouraged, at their losses, made great preparations, and took the field, with all the forces they could draw together. But Ancus, having defeated them in a pitched battle, obliged them to sue for a peace, and triumphed at Rome for the advantages he had gained over them. The Fidenates, Veientes, and Volsci, felt likewise the effects of his martial disposition. The Fidenates had revolted during the Latin war; and it was no sooner ended, than Ancus marched against them, and took their city by sap; this being the first instance we meet with in the Roman history of that kind of attack. The king dug a way under-ground from

Lucii puer, Publici puer, &c. or the slave of Lucius, of Publicus, &c. When this custom grew out of fashion, the slaves were usually called by some name of their own, which was often taken from their country, as Syrus, Geta, &c. Upon their manumission they took the prænomen and nomen of their masters; but instead of the cognomen made use of their former name, as Marcus Tullius Tiro, the freedman of Cicero. After the same manner it was customary for any foreigner, who had been made free of Rome, to bear the prænomen and nomen of the person by whose means he had obtained that privilege.

(A) The ceremonies were as follow: A fecialis was sent to the Latins, to demand satisfaction; he no sooner arrived on their borders, but he cried out, Great Jupiter, and ye confines of the Latin nation, hearken to justice. I come hither with a deputation from the Roman people in all the legal forms; and I demand that credis be given to what I say. After this formal declaration, he laid open his demands; and then calling Jupiter to witness the truth of what he said, he pursued thus: If I have unjustly and impiously made these demands, may'st thou, great god, never suffer me to return to my own country. He repeated these words at his entering the Latin territory; then to the first person he met; afterwards at the gate of the city; and lastly, in the market-place. If in about thirty days his demands were not satisfied, he added to what he had said before; O Jupiter, Juno, show Romulus, and all ye gods of heaven, of earth, and of hell, hearken; I call you all to witness, that the Latins are unjust. We will therefore enter into deliberations at Rome on the proper means of obliging them to give us just satisfaction. No sooner was the fecialis returned, but the king referred the affair to the senate, addressing himself, according to the form prescribed by Numa, to each particular senator in these words: Say, what think you of the refusal, which the pater patratus, and the whole nation of the Latins have given the pater patratus of the Romans, of restoring and granting us what we demanded of them? To which each senator gave this answer: Let us again demand our rights by a just and lawful war. This is the opinion, for which I declare. When the greater part of the senators had thus declared their opinion, the war was considered as unanimously agreed on. Then the fecialis went to the confines of the enemy's country, carrying in his hand a javelin, which was dipped in blood, and either headed with iron, or burnt at the end. When he arrived on the territories of the Latins, he pronounced the following form of words in the presence of at least three persons, not under fourteen years of age: On accounts of the damages which the Latin nation has done the Roman people, and in obedience to a decree made by the senate and people of Rome, importing that war be declared against the Latins; I and the Roman people declare it, and begin it. At these words he threw a dart upon the enemy's lands (66). 'Tis to be observed here, that at this time no use was made of the king's name or authority; he never being mentioned, but only the senate and people.

(B) It is not easy to ascertain the true situation of Politorium, Tillena, and Ficana. All we know of them is, that they were all three Latin cities, at a small distance from each other, not far from the mouth of the Tiber.

his camp quite under the walls of Fidenæ; and his men, having by that means got into the city without being observed, opened the gates to their companions, and put Ancus in possession of the place, in which he left a strong garison, after having caused those to be put to death, who had been most active in the revolt. He next marched against the Sabines, who had renewed their hostilities, defeated their united forces, and granted them a peace upon honourable terms. Over the Veientes he obtained two complete victories, for which a triumph was decreed him by the senate^c.

taken in.

Rome was greatly enlarged in this king's reign; for he not only carried the walls round the Aventine hill, but also inclosed the hill Janiculum, which stood on the other side of the Tiber, and made it a sort of citadel for Rome. In order to open a communication between the city and the new citadel, he built the bridge Sublicius (C), over the Tiber, where it washes the foot of the Aventine hill. He likewise made a large ditch, called Fossa Quiritium, which was no small defence against those who came from the plains. And now the city having received a vast increase, Ancus, to suppress the licentiousness of such multitudes of people, built a large prison in the Roman forum. But he did not content himself with enlarging the city; he likewise extended its dominions; for having taken from the Veientes the Mesian forest, the territories of Rome reached quite to the sea, where he built the port and city of Ostia to secure the advantages of trade to his subjects. About this town he caused many salt-pits to be dug; and the distribution of salt, which he made among his subjects at this time, gave rise to those public liberalities, called congiaria, from the word congius, a measure used among the ancient Romans. He rebuilt the temple of Jupiter Feretrius after a more stately and magnificent manner, and spent the latter years of his reign in improving the city, and enriching the citizens. He died after a reign of twenty-four years; during which he shewed himself no ways inferior to any of his predecessors in the arts either of peace or war. Plutarch says, he died a violent death, but is therein contradicted by most of the ancients. Ancus left two sons behind him, one an infant, the other near fifteen years of age, both under the tuition of Tarquin, not suspecting that a stranger, who had lately settled at Rome, could gain the suffrages of the people in competition with his son, and place the crown on his own head. Tarquinius was the son of a rich merchant of Corinth, who, to secure his great wealth from the rapines of Cypselus, the tyrant of that place, had left his native country, and settled in Tarquinii, one of the most famous cities of Hebruria. There he married a woman of distinction, and had by her two sons, to whom he gave Hebrurian names, calling the one Arunx, and the other Leucumo. Arunx, who was the eldest, died before his father; and though he left his wife with child, yet his father, not knowing it, and dying soon after, left his whole estate to Leucumo, his second son. So that the posthumous son of Arunx was disinherited before he was born; and therefore took the name of Egerius from egere, to want. Leucumo, being now in possession of his father's immense riches, aspired to the highest dignities in Tarquinii, his wife Tanaquil, who was of a noble extraction, stirring up his ambition. But being looked upon in Hebruria as a stranger, he was debarred from rising to any considerable post in the country where he dwelt. Roused therefore by the reproaches of the aspiring Tanaquil, he resolved to remove to Rome, where two Sabines had been raised to the throne, and where personal merit was the surest and only means of arriving at the first dignities of the state (D). He was no sooner admitted citizen of Rome, but he endeavoured to appear intirely Roman, changing the prænomen of Leucumo into Lucius, and the

Hereupon Tanaquil, who is said to have been skilled in the art of augury, embracing her husband with tenderness, in a transport of joy, explained to him the happy presage of his future grandeur (67).

(C) Some writers derive the name Sublicius from the piles on which it stood, that being the import of the Latin word Sublicia; others from the ancient word licio, which signifies to join. Neither iron nor copper were made use of in building this bridge; both being equally prohibited, if we believe Plutarch, by an ancient oracle. The care of keeping it in good repair belonged first to the pontifices, and afterwards to the questors. It was the first bridge that was built over the Tiber, and perhaps in Italy.

(D) The success which attended the new-comers, gave rise to the following fable; viz. that as Tarquin was on the road with his wife in an open chariot, an eagle appearing over his head at the foot of the Janiculum, snatched off his hat, and soaring up again, was lost for some time among the clouds; but at length came down again with great rapidity, and left the hat on Leucumo's head. (67) Liv. ubi supra.

- a Nomen, or name Damaratus, which favoured too much of the Greek, into Tarquinius, borrowed from Tarquinius, where he had been brought up. As for the cognomen of Priscus, or Old, it was not probably given him till after his death, when it was used to distinguish him from the other Tarquin. The polite and engaging behaviour of the Greek, now become a Roman, soon gained him the favour of the people, and made him known in the court of Ancus, into whose favour he artfully insinuated himself; and lest his immense riches should create suspicions in a city which was yet poor, he offered to deposit them in the public treasury to supply the wants of the public. As he was well apprised that military exploits were a sure step to great honours, he not only contributed to the expences of the war out of his estate, but in all expeditions distinguished himself in a very eminent manner. In the war with the Latins, he fought on foot, and against the Veientes signalized himself at the head of the Roman cavalry; so that the king, in consideration of his gallant behaviour, raised him to the rank of a patrician and senator. As he was no less prudent in council, than formidable in arms, he shone in the senate from his first admission into it; and his advice was always followed by the king in military expeditions ^f.

- Tarquin* looking upon the death of Ancus as a critical time to attempt mounting the throne, brought on the election with the utmost expedition, and caused the curiæ to be summoned before young Marcus was quite fifteen. For the greater precaution, he took care to keep his pupil out of the sight of the people during the comitia; and for that purpose sent him into the country on a hunting match. In the mean time he carried on his intrigues, and gained some by money, others by promises. He was the first who introduced into Rome the custom of soliciting for offices, and making interest to obtain them, the Romans having till his time concealed from the world the desire they had of obtaining the highest posts. But the Greek, who was above these timorous scruples, plainly begged the kingdom in an harangue, which he made to the people, urging the example of Tatius and Numa, the first an enemy as well as a stranger, and the second wholly unacquainted with the city; whereas he was not only a friend to the Romans, but had spent all his riches among them, and was so well acquainted with the laws and customs of Rome, that the late king had employed him in affairs both civil and military of the greatest consequence. Then he cunningly insinuated his past services, and as the people had a high opinion of his merit, they commanded him, for that was the term then used, to take upon him the management of public affairs. In the beginning of his reign, to strengthen his party in the senate, and reward those who had shewn most zeal in his election, he created an hundred new senators, who were called Senatores Minorum gentium, because chosen out of the plebeian families. However, they had the same authority in the senate as the other senators, and their children were deemed patricians.

- c His first war was with the Latins, from whom he took the cities of Apiolæ, Crustumini, Nomentum, and Collatia. The inhabitants of Apiolæ were sold for slaves; but those of Crustumini and Nomentum, having submitted after their revolt, were treated with great clemency. Collatia, which was more obstinate, met with a more severe treatment: the inhabitants were disarmed, and obliged to pay a large sum of money. As for the city, he thought he might dispose of it as he pleased, and therefore gave the sovereignty of it to Egerius, his brother Arunx's son, who from thence took the name of Collatinus, which he transmitted to his posterity. Corniculum was likewise besieged, taken by storm, and reduced to ashes. Tarquin's progress alarmed the other cities of Latium; several of them united their forces against the common enemy, but they were defeated in a bloody battle near Fidenæ, and obliged to enter into an alliance with the conqueror. Hereupon a national assembly of all the Latins being held at Ferentinum, it was resolved, that they should employ all their strength to oppose the torrent that threatened them. Pursuant to this resolution, they drew together what forces they could, and having engaged all Sabinia, and great part of Hetruria, to join them, they took the field with a very numerous army. But Tarquin having defeated the confederate armies in two actions, forced those Latin cities which had refused his alliance, to sue for it, and submit to a sort of dependence upon Rome. Tarquin, on his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph. The spoils he had taken in the conquered cities of Latium, especially in Apiolæ, he employed in building a circus for the Roman games, otherwise called the great games (E). The place chose for the circus was the Myrtian or Murtian valley, which reached from the Aventine to the Palatine hill (F).

THE war with the Latins was scarce ended, when all Hetruria combined against Tarquin, on account of his detaining the ambassadors, whom they had sent to demand back some prisoners of theirs. It was even decreed in a general assembly of the twelve leucumones, that if any city of Hetruria stood neuter, it should be for ever cut off from the general alliance. Having by this means raised a considerable army, they took the field, ravaged the Roman territory, and made themselves masters of Fidenæ by the treachery of some of the inhabitants. The king did not appear the first year in the field, but quietly suffered them to go on without opposition, chusing rather to let them triumph for a time, than to encounter them without the necessary preparations. The next year he armed all his legions, and having applied to his allies for succours, took the field early in the spring, and divided his army into two bodies. The Romans he commanded himself, and placed his cousin Collatinus at the head of the allies. Collatinus was defeated, while presuming too much on his strength, he divided his army to plunder the enemy's country. But the king with his Romans made a more fortunate campaign, having routed the Hetrurians first near Veii, and afterwards under the walls of Cære. As Fidenæ was a key to the Roman dominions, Tarquin marched against it with all his forces, put the Hetrurian army, that covered it, to the rout, and made himself master of that important place. Such of the Fidenates as were suspected to have been concerned in betraying it to the enemy, were whipped to death, and the rest sent into banishment, and their lands divided by lot among the Roman soldiers. Then Tarquin hastened to fall upon the Hetrurians once more, before the whole strength of the new army they were raising could be got together. He came up with them near Eretum, ten miles from Rome, and overthrew them with great

(E) As Tarquin was of a Greek family, he was the first who thought of building a circus at Rome in imitation of the chief cities of Greece. For the first circus we read of was built at Elis, where the olympic games were celebrated, and served as a pattern for all the rest. Livy assures us, that the Roman games were also called the Great games: but we must not infer from thence, that all the sports, which were celebrated in the circus, and called Circenses, were the great games. Some were celebrated in the circus in honour of Ceres, Apollo, &c. which were different from the Roman or great games; as were also the Megarense. For the former were celebrated before the nones of April, and the latter on the eve of the nones of September. Besides, the great games were celebrated in honour of the great gods; whence they were called the great games; and the latter in honour of Cybele. Lastly, the great games were instituted by Tarquinius Priscus, and the Megalense not till the time of Junius Brutus, who appointed them in honour of Cybele, then called μεγαλυνία, or the great goddess. As to the name of circus, which was given to the magnificent structure raised by Tarquin, some derive it from the word circulus, a circle, part of it being built in that shape. Others will have it to have been so named, because the chariots, that disputed the prize, were obliged to run seven times round the posts, which were at each end of it. The poets mention only seven rounds, without expressly saying, whether they were about several posts, or one only. But Cassiodorus tells us in express words, that it was necessary to turn round seven different posts. However, it is generally thought, that there was but one post, round which the charioteers were obliged to drive seven times. From this turning round some derive the word circus. But Terentian (68) pretends, that the Roman circus took its name from Circe, the fabulous daughter of the sun; and imagines, that she was the first who invented the Circensian sports, intending by them to represent the course of the sun her father, running round the globe of the earth in a chariot drawn by four horses.

The circus had four fronts; one at the bottom, where the posts stood; one at the opposite end, where the chariots started, and one at each side, whence the spectators beheld the shows. Dionysius Halicarnassensis tells us, that this circus was three stades and a half long, and four jugera broad, and that one hundred and fifty thousand men could sit in it at their ease. Pliny (69) tells us, that the Roman stadium contained six hundred twenty-five Roman feet, each of which contained twelve inches, or sixteen fingers breadths; so that the circus, as it was, according to the above-mentioned writer, three stadia and a half long, must have been two thousand one hundred and eighty-seven Roman feet in length. As it was four jugera broad, each of which contained, according to Pliny, two hundred and forty Roman feet, it is from thence manifest, that the circus was nine hundred sixty Roman feet broad, and consequently above twice as long as it was wide. So that the length of the circus was somewhat more than three English furlongs. It was called the great circus, either on account of its vast circumference, or because the great games were celebrated in it, or, perhaps, because it was consecrated to the great gods, viz. to Vercumnus, Neptune, Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, and especially to the Di Penates of Rome, which were in a special manner called the great gods. This circus was extremely beautified and adorned by the Roman emperors, in whose times it was enlarged to such a prodigious extent, that it contained in their proper seats two hundred and fifty thousand spectators (70).

(F) This valley was so called, according to some, from a temple erected to a goddess of that name at the foot of the Avensian hill. Others style it Myrtia from a temple built in that place to Venus, surnamed Myrtia, because the myrtle was consecrated to her.

- a slaughter; for which victory the senate decreed him a triumph^b. And now the leucumones, despairing of any future success against the Romans, sent deputies to the king, with an unlimited commission to conclude a peace upon any terms whatsoever. As Tarquin was naturally inclined to clemency, and followed that inclination when he found it noways prejudicial to his ambition, he granted them a peace without insisting upon any other condition than their owning his sovereignty over them. The Hetrurians readily agreed to this, and in proof of their accepting the king of Rome for their sovereign, they sent him all the ensigns of royalty, which were in use among them, viz. a crown of gold, a throne of ivory, a sceptre with an eagle on the top of it, a tunic embroidered with gold, and adorned with figures of palm-branches (G), and a purple robe enriched with flowers of several colours. However Tarquin deferred wearing these stately ornaments, till such time as the people and senate had consented to it by an express law. He then applied these regalia to the decoration of his triumph, and never after laid them aside. In his triumph he appeared in a gilt chariot drawn by four horses, clothed in a purple robe, and a tunic embroidered with gold, attended by twelve lictors, with their axes and fasces, with a crown on his head, and a sceptre in his hand. Thus ended the war with the Hetrurians, after it had lasted nine years.

- Tarquin* having now an interval of rest from his wars, applied all his thoughts to the beautifying, cleansing, and fortifying the city. He built the walls of Rome with hewn stone, and those famous common-sewers, which have been since looked upon as one of the wonders of the world (H). He likewise adorned the forum, fur-

(G) This the Latins called Tunica Palmata, which we ought to distinguish from the Tunica Picta. The former was not, properly speaking, a long hanging robe, but rather a vest, which was partly hid under the robe. It had at first no sleeves, and afterwards but very short ones. As all the Romans wore tunics, they shewed the difference of their rank by that of their tunics. Some sowed upon theirs purple flowers, which were stuck on like the heads of nails; and hence came the word Laticlavium. Only the chief magistrates, senators, and generals of the army, were allowed to wear these. The inferior magistrates, the Roman knights, and some other officers in the army, wore indeed tunics with purple flowers; but these flowers were smaller than the others; and from thence comes the name of Angusticlavium. Those who triumphed, instead of embroidered flowers, wore purple palm-branches upon their tunics or tunica palmata. As to the Toga picta, some think it was a robe common among the Romans, only of a purple colour: and as to the robe in general, it was nothing but a very long mantle hanging in great folds quite down to the ground, which they put upon their right shoulders, throwing one lappet of it over the left. The robes of the senators were adorned with great purple flowers, as well as their tunics; and those of the knights with smaller. The robes of those who triumphed, were probably adorned with palm branches as well as their tunics. At least it is certain, they were made of rich stuffs, and were called toga picta. Two persons only had ever the privilege of wearing them out of a triumph, viz. Paulus Æmilius and Pompey.

We have followed here the most common opinion with relation to the Laticlavium and Angusticlavium, about which critics are strangely divided. Some are of opinion, that the clavi were a kind of flowers interwoven in the cloth; others will have them to be the buttons or clasps by which the tunic was held together. A third sort pretend, that the Latinus clavus was nothing but a tunic bordered with purple. Scaliger thinks the clavi did not belong to the vest, but hung down from the neck, like chains and ornaments of that nature. Rubinius endeavours to refute all these conjectures, and to prove that the clavi were no more than purple lines or streaks in the middle of the garment. According to that author they did not receive the name of clavi, as an immediate allusion to the heads of nails, to which, he says, they bore no resemblance, but were so called from their being of a different colour from the rest of the garment. For the Romans, says that writer, used to inlay their cups, and other precious utensils, with studs of gold, or other ornamental materials. These, from their likeness to nail-heads, they called in general clavi. So that it was very natural to bring the same word to signify these lines of purple, or other colours, which were different from all the rest of the garment, as those clavi were of a different colour and figure from the vessels, which they adorned. A modern critic, of no mean character (71), tells us, that the clavi were nothing else but purple galleons, with which they bordered the fore-part of the tunic on both sides in the place where it came together. The broad galleons, says he, made the Laticlavium, and the narrow the Angusticlavium. As to the name of clavi, he thinks the ancients gave that name to any thing that was made with a design to be put upon another.

(H) Pliny, who did not examine them till near eight hundred years after they were built, could not speak of them without admiration (72). Rome contained at that time four hills within its compass, viz. the Palatinus, Tarpeius, Quirinalis, and Ælius. In the valleys between these hills the rain-water and springs uniting, formed great pools, which laid under water the streets and public places. The mud likewise made the way impassable, infected the air, and rendered the city unhealthy. This prompted Tarquin to undertake the cleansing the city from its filth, by conveying off the waters through subterraneous canals into the Tiber. He made all the arches of these common-sewers of hard stone, and spared neither expence nor labour to make the work durable. Their height and breadth were so considerable, that a cart loaded with hay could easily pass through them under-ground. But what most increased the difficulty of the work, was the conveying of the waters, which through these sewers were to carry off the filth, into the Tiber. It was necessary rounding it with galleries, in which were shops for tradesmen, and building temples a in it with schools for the youth of both sexes, and halls for the administration of public justice.

the Sabines.

The king had scarce ended these works when he engaged in a war with the Sabines, under pretence that they had assisted the Hebrurians. Both armies took the field, and came to an engagement on the confines of Sabinia, which lasted the whole day without any considerable advantage on either side; insomuch that the generals, standing in awe of each other, retired to their respective camps, and soon after returned home, without attempting any thing else that campaign. Tarquin employed the winter in making the necessary preparations against the next year. He considered that he had been often prevented from pursuing the advantages of a victory for want of horse. b For though the infantry was very numerous, the cavalry continued on the same foot, on which Romulus had left it. He therefore resolved to add some new bodies of knights to those of the first institution. In any state less superstitious than that of the Romans, this design would have been put in execution without any dispute. But in Rome the innovation, which Tarquin had a mind to introduce, met with great opposition. As the first division of the horse into three bodies had been determined by auguries, Attius Nævius, the most famous augur of that time, obstinately withstood the king's will, and took upon him the defence of Romulus's institution. Tarquin could not persuade himself, that the augur was serious in his opposition; and therefore commanded him to be brought into his presence, fully resolved to confound and discredit the diviner in the art, which superstition maintained to the diminution of the royal authority. c As soon as Nævius appeared before Tarquin in the midst of the forum, and in the sight of all the people; Canst thou discover by thy art, diviner, said the king, whether what I am thinking of can be done, or not? Go and consult thy birds. The augur did as he was ordered, and returning quickly, answered with great composure; Yes, Tarquin, my art tells me, that what you are thinking of may be done. Upon this the king, pulling out a razor from under his robe, and taking a flint in his hand, replied with a contemptuous smile; I was thinking whether it was possible to cut this flint with this razor. I have taken thee in thy own craft; the introducing the gods into thy decisions is all cheat and imposture. If thou canst perform what is impossible, do. At these words the people d burst out a laughing. But Nævius, without discovering the least surprise, addressed the king with an air of assurance, and said, Put the razor to the flint, and try; I readily submit to any punishment, if you don't do what you thought on. The king did as he was directed, and saw, to his great surprize, the flint give way to the edge of the razor, which cut through it with so much ease, that it reached the king's hand, and drew blood from it. Livy says, that Nævius took the flint into his own hand, and cut it in Tarquin's presence. e Be that as it will, the people testified their surprize by loud acclamations; and Tarquin, turning his contempt for augury into admiration, laid aside his project of increasing the number of the corps of horse, and contented himself with augmenting the number of the knights of each corps, making the Roman f cavalry amount in all to eighteen hundred men. From this time no determination was made either in the camp, or city, without the approbation of the augurs. As for Nævius, Tarquin erected a statue of brass to his memory in the comitium, which continued there till Augustus's time. The razor and flint, which were kept as monuments of the miracle, were buried near it, under an altar, at which witnesses were afterwards sworn in civil causes. This event, though related with so many circumstances, attested by all the writers of the Roman history, and adopted by some of the fathers of the church, who impute it to magic, is without all doubt a mere fabulous invention, and was looked upon as such by Tully, who, though himself an augur, writes of it thus: Look with contempt (he speaks to his brother Quintus) on the razor and flint of the famous Attius; when we reason as philosophers, we ought to lay no stress upon fables.

Tarquin early in the spring took the field against the Sabines, who, having received considerable reinforcements from Hebruria, were beforehand with him, and had insary to cut through hills, and under the city thro' rocks, a chanel large enough for a navigable stream, and covered with arches strong enough to bear the weight of houses, which were often built upon them, and stood as firm as on the most solid foundations. The expence of this great work was never so well understood, as when it came to be repaired. For the censors gave no less than a thousand talents to the person who undertook the cleansing of it.

- a camped near the conflux of the Anio and the Tiber. The Hebrurians were posted on one bank of the Tiber, and the Sabines over-against them, on the other. The confederate armies had a communication by a bridge of boats; and this Tarquin, who had incamped on a hill near the banks of the Anio, found means to set on fire, by sending down the river flat-bottom'd boats, loaded with dry wood, sulphur, and rosin. The Sabines hastened to extinguish the flame, leaving, as is very frequent on such unforeseen and sudden accidents, their camp unguarded. Then Tarquin, laying hold of this opportunity, attacked, and made himself master of it; while a detachment, which he had sent out, having passed the Tiber in the night, came and fell suddenly on the camp of the Hebrurians. The enemy being thus attacked on both sides, betook themselves to flight, and in that confusion perished, some by the flames, some by the sword, and others by leaping into the river. By this means the arms of the enemy, which came floating down the stream, brought the news of the victory to Rome before the arrival of the couriers dispatched by the king. After this victory, Tarquin, without allowing the enemy any respite, entered the territory of the Sabines; who having with incredible expedition drawn together another army, faced him a second time; but being once more routed with great slaughter, they had at last recourse to the clemency of the conqueror, and sued for peace; but Tarquin did not think fit to grant them more than a truce, which was no sooner expired, than they passed the Anio, and made incursions on the Roman lands. Hereupon Tarquin, leaving the city, fell upon the free-booters, and having taken their booty from them, incamped with the few forces he had then with him over-against the enemy, while the rest of the army hastened after him. The Sabines, whose courage was not in the least abated by their former misfortunes, did not fail to offer him battle; and the king, as soon as he was joined by the forces he expected, accepted the challenge. As the Sabines were no ways inferior to the Romans, either in numbers or bravery, the victory continued doubtful, till a body of horse, which Tarquin had detached before the battle, having taken a great compass, fell unexpectedly on the enemy's rear in the heat of the action. Then the Sabines, seized with a sudden panic, betook themselves to a disorderly flight. Few of them reached the neighbouring cities, their retreat being cut off on one side by the main body of the Roman army, and on the other by the detachment of horse. Those who escaped the swords of the conquerors, fled to their camp, which, though well fortified, was attacked and taken, almost without resistance, by the Romans. Thus ended this campaign. The next year the Sabines, having chosen a more experienced commander, appeared early in the field, but declined a battle. Tarquin, not thinking it safe to attack the enemy's camp, surrounded it on all sides; and by cutting off their communication with the neighbouring country, reduced the Sabines to the utmost extremity. The Romans looked upon them as a sure prey; but the Sabine general, taking advantage of a dark and stormy night, marched his army out of his intrenchments, and without being observed, got out of the enemy's reach, leaving only in the camp some wounded men, and a few cattle^m; and thus the campaign ended.
- f THE next year the Romans and Sabines appeared anew in the field, as soon as the season was fit for action, and having incamped over-against each other, the two generals agreed to put the whole to the issue of a battle. As Tarquin had divided his army, which was very numerous, into three bodies, he commanded the Romans himself, put his nephew Arunx at the head of the Hebrurians, and gave the command of the Latins, and other allies, to Servius Tullius, a foreigner, who from a slave was become a Roman citizen. The two armies engaged with the utmost fury, and fought the whole day with equal intrepidity and resolution; but in the end the Romans gained the victory, after Tarquin had inspired his men with fresh courage, by making a vow to build a magnificent temple in honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. The Sabines being routed and dispersed, Tarquin entered their country, which now lay open to him; and having plundered their lands, and open places, returned to Rome loaded with booty, and crowned with fresh glory. During the winter he made the necessary preparations for the besieging of their fortified places, which was to be the work of the next campaign. But in the mean time the Sabines, despairing of success, ^{The Sabines} humbled themselves so far as to send deputies to Tarquin, offering to put him in possession of all their strong-holds upon honourable conditions. The king treated them as favourably as he had done the Hebrurians, delivered up to them their prisoners ^a without ransom; and having taken possession of their country, returned to Rome, and entered the city in triumph ^a.

Tarquin, being now advanced in years, thought only of enjoying the sweets of repose after his great labours, and continual victories. However, mindful of the vow he had made to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, he levelled the top of the hill Tarpeius, marked out the plan of the temple, and laid the foundations of that glorious structure, which afterwards became the principal place of the Roman worship. And now the celebrated Navius appeared again upon the stage. This augur, being consulted about what part of Rome Jupiter would like best, declared for the hill Tarpeius, formerly Saturnius. But when they came to consecrate the area, a difficulty arose about removing the gods, who had already altars on the hill, without giving them offence. By the help of augury all these gods were consulted, and found willing to be removed, except the god Terminus, and the goddess Youth, who insisted upon not being displaced, and were consequently inclosed within the walls of the temple, which was afterwards consecrated to Jupiter, his wife Juno, and his daughter Minerva. Not long after Navius disappeared; and as the manner as well as the author of his death were utterly unknown, the sons of Ancus Marcius endeavoured to fix the calumny on the king, and by that means stir up the people against him. But their accusation being found groundless, the sons of Ancus were detested for having calumniated their king, and delivered up to him by the incensed multitude. Tarquin, who was naturally inclined ^b to mercy, pardoned them, in consideration of the favours he had received from their father. Motives of religion prompted him to be more severe on a prostitute vestal, by name Pinaria, whom he condemned to be buried alive. As this is the first instance we meet with of this kind of punishment, Tarquin is thought to have been the author of it. It was ever after inflicted on such of those priestesses as dishonoured their consecration. However, the king did not shew less esteem to the college of the vestals, but on the contrary added two to their number, and increased it to six ^c.

Ancus conspire
the death of Tarquin.

As Tarquin was now about eighty years of age, and drew near his end, the ambition of the sons of Ancus grew daily more active. They had not forgot the arts, by which Tarquin had secured to himself their father's kingdom, and had long watched ^d an opportunity of seizing it for themselves. But finding it impossible to put their design in execution, they lived quietly under the government of Tarquin, till such time as he began to take proper measures for the continuing of the crown in his family by marrying one of his daughters to Servius Tullius. Then they set no bounds to their resentment, but resolved to put the king to death before the interest of his son-in-law was well established among the people. The method they took for the execution of their design was this: They hired two young men, who dressing themselves like peasants, with hatchets on their shoulders, as if they were wood-cleavers, began a feigned quarrel near the king's palace. Many of the conspirators crouded about them under pretence of putting an end to the dispute, which still continued, till they got to the gate of the palace. Then they called out on the king for justice, and were brought before him by the officers of the court. At first they began to bawl and rail at each other, till they were restrained by a lictor, and ordered to speak by turns. Then one of them began to tell his story, and while the king was wholly intent on what he said, the other gave him a great blow on the head with his hatchet, and leaving his weapon in the wound, fled with his companion out of the palace. But while some of the king's attendants hastened to his assistance, others, pursuing the assassins, seized them. When they were put to the torture, they confessed that they had been employed by the sons of Ancus. Queen Tanaquil, who had courage and wisdom above her sex, did not lose her presence of mind even at the sight of her dying husband. She ^e immediately commanded the palace to be cleared of the croud, and gave strict orders, that no person whatsoever should be admitted within the gates. Then shutting herself up in the apartment of the expiring king, with her son-in-law Servius Tullius, his wife, and Ocrisia his mother, she encouraged Servius to ascend the throne. She then opened the window, which looked into the street, where this sudden accident had brought the people together; and with an air of assurance, told them, that the wound was not deep; that the king was stunned with the sudden blow, but was come to himself again, and hoped to have the pleasure of seeing his people again very soon; ^f

- a but in the mean time ordered them to obey Servius Tullius, who would administer justice to them, till the king was perfectly recovered. This wise dissimulation of Tanaquil Queen Tanaquil by a stratagem secures the kingdom to her son-in-law. had all the success she could expect from it. The sons of Ancus, believing that the king was still alive, went of their own accord into banishment; so that the plot, which perhaps would have succeeded, had the people seen Tarquin dead, was quite defeated, upon their believing that he was still alive. The second day after the murder of Tarquin, Servius Tullius heard causes from the throne in the royal robes, and attended by the lictors. But as he pretended only to supply the king's place, when any difficult case occurred, he promised to report it to the king. As he thought it incumbent upon him to inquire into the wicked attempt upon the king, and revenge it, he cited the sons of Ancus to appear before his tribunal; and upon their non-appearance caused them to be declared infamous, and their estates to be confiscated. After he had thus managed affairs for some time, and by his prudent administration gained the hearts of the people, the death of Tarquin was published, as a thing recent, with great lamentations in the palace; and Servius, after having performed his obsequies with great pomp, appeared in public with a strong guard, and all the marks of royalty, without waiting for the election either of the senate or people. Livy indeed tells us, that he took possession of the kingdom with the consent of the senators. But as he was not duly elected, the people looked upon him rather as governor, than king, of Rome.
- c THE most probable account authors give of the birth and education of Servius Tullius, is as follows: He was the son of Ocrisia, a native of Corniculum, who was made captive by the Romans at the taking of that place. But who his father was, is uncertain. Dionysius Halicarnassicus tells us, that one Tullius, an officer of royal extraction, who was killed in the defence of his country, was the husband of Ocrisia, whom he left with child at his death. Tarquin made a present of this beautiful captive to his queen Tanaquil, who being apprised of her extraction, and taken with her polite behaviour, restored her to her ancient freedom. But as her son was born while she was still in a state of slavery, the name of Servius was added to that of Tullius, which he received from his father. This is Dionysius's account. But Plutarch pretends, that Ocrisia was very young, when she was carried into captivity, and that she was afterwards married to one of Tarquin's clients, by whom she had Servius. Some have given this prince a divine origin, and made him the son of Vulcan, or at least of the Lar, or the household god of Tarquin's palace. Perhaps by the god of the royal palace they meant Tarquin himself. But however that be, it is certain, that Tarquin shewed all the tenderness of a father for Servius, and took particular care of his education. Tanaquil, who was no less fond of him than her husband, in order to gain him the greater veneration and esteem among the people, with what political view is not known, spread the following report, which the credulous people believed; viz. that a sudden flame, in form of a crown, surrounded the head of Servius, while he was a child, and asleep in her apartment. However, notwithstanding the great favour shewn him by the king and queen, it was chiefly by an uniform and wise conduct, that he raised himself to the throne. He distinguished himself in the army by his gallant behaviour; and his extraordinary abilities in council so gained him the esteem and affection of the people, that he was unanimously raised to the rank of a patrician, and a place in the senate. The king then married him to an illustrious Roman lady, by name Gegania; and upon her death, as his merit and fame daily increased, Tarquin thought it no dishonour to his family to give him his daughter Tarquinia in marriage. From this time the court set no bounds to the favours they bestowed upon him. The king reposed an entire confidence in him, trusting him with the management both of his domestic concerns, and the affairs of the public; in which latter he acquitted himself so well, that the people were no less satisfied with his conduct, than with the king's; and this, upon the death of his father-in-law, paved him the way to the throne.
- f As Servius, notwithstanding his superior merit, looked upon himself as chiefly indebted to Fortune for his grandeur, he erected an incredible number of temples and altars to her, under the names of Fortuna Primigenia, Fortuna Obsequens, Fortuna Privata, Fortuna Virgo, Fortuna Virilis, &c. As he proposed Numa for his pattern, and designed to establish as much order in the civil, as that wise prince had done in the religious polity of Rome, to gain himself respect from the people, he pretended to have a private correspondence with the goddess Fortuna, as Numa had had with Egeria *. However, the beginning of his reign was not without disturbances and dissensions. The sons of Ancus Marcius had a strong party among the patricians, who thought it beneath them to be governed by a man born in slavery. Besides, it had been hitherto customary in Rome not to proceed to the election of a king, till after an inter-regnum; and this order, established ever since Romulus's time, Servius had broken through, taking the power into his own hands, without the order or consent of the people. Complaints of this nature were at first dropped, as it were, accidentally, in private assemblies; but at last brought on an almost general conspiracy. The senators agreed among themselves to force the new king, the first time they assembled, to lay down his authority, to establish an inter-regnum, and then to proceed to the free election of another king. Servius, in this emergency, made it his study to gain the people, and make use of them against the senate. As he was therefore a man of great eloquence, instead of calling the senate together, he assembled the people, and placing one of the two grandsons of the late king on each side of him, made an artful and moving speech to the multitude, intreating them to be joint guardians with him of the offspring of a prince, whose memory ought to be dear to them, and promising to protect the people against the patricians, to pay all their debts, and to divide the lands taken from the enemy among them. Nor were his promises empty words; a few days after he commanded all those who were in debt, to send him an account of their debts, and the names of their creditors; and opening compting-houses in the forum, paid there all the debtors bills with his own money. Nor was this all; he published an edict, commanding all those, who had usurped lands belonging to the public, to quit them at an appointed time, and ordered the Roman citizens, who had no lands of their own, to petition for them. In short, he revived many of the laws of Romulus and Numa, which disuse had abolished, and made several new ones in favour of the common people, who were in many things put upon an equality with the senators and patricians †.

Hetrurians.

THOUGH Servius was naturally more inclined to works of peace than to military exploits, yet he found himself obliged to imbarque in a long war with the Veientes, and the rest of the Hetrurians, who had shaken off the yoke, pretending, that their obligations to be subject to Rome were dead with Tarquin, who had subjected them. But Servius, taking the field, soon subdued them anew, and depriving them of their lands, transferred the property of them to such of the new citizens of Rome as had yet no lands of their own. For this victory he obtained by the favour of the people, in spite of the senate, the honours of a triumph, and entered Rome with all the pomp, which Tarquin had introduced in such public shews ‡.

Servius, now finding the people intirely attached to his interest, resolved to take advantage of their present favour, to render his title to the throne less disputable. Accordingly, he assembled the citizens, and in a moving speech, which drew tears from their eyes, complained of a design formed by the patricians to take away his life, and to bring back the sons of Ancus; and this for no other reason, but because he was too kind to the common people. In the close of his speech, he left the kingdom to their disposal, begging them to determine between him and his pupils on one side, and their competitors on the other. He had no sooner ended his speech, than he came down hastily from the tribunal, in order to leave the assembly; but they even used violence to stop him, intreating him to be their king, and encouraging him not to fear the plots of his enemies. Then some, whom the king had dispersed among the multitude for that purpose, cried with a loud voice, Let the curiæ be assembled without delay, that we may elect Servius to be our king. In the mean time the prince, though at the bottom of the whole intrigue, affected to act only in compliance with the inclination of the people. I am glad, said he, to find you have gratitude for the good offices I have done you. You may, continued he, with an air of indifference, do just as you please. Accordingly, a day was appointed, and Servius elected by the curiæ by a greater unanimity than any of his predecessors §. However, as the senate, whose faction was formidable, could never be brought to confirm the election, Servius deliberated with himself, whether he should not renounce the dignity conferred on him by the people. But having imparted his uneasiness and perplexity to Tanaquil, she

- a removed his apprehensions, and even prevailed upon him to take an oath, whereby he engaged never to resign the crown. This great queen died soon after, and Servius omitted nothing that could contribute towards transmitting the remembrance of her noble actions to posterity. To immortalize her domestic virtues, the true glory of a woman, he hung up her distaff in the temple of Hercules ^a.

- Servius* soon after his election marched against the rebellious Hebrurians, reduced them, and was on that account honoured with a second triumph. After this victory he applied all his thoughts to the adorning and enlarging of the city. To the hills Palatinus, Tarpeius, Quirinalis, Cælius, Aventinus, he added the Esquilinus, and Viminalis, inclosing them within the limits of the city, and fixing his own palace on the Esquilinus, in order to draw inhabitants thither. He likewise added a fourth tribe to the three originally established by Romulus, calling it Tribus Esquilina. The public imposts and taxes were raised by laying a certain sum on every tribe, and hence the public subsidies were called tributes; and those, who commanded the tribes in war, were from them named tribunes, though that name was afterwards given to several sorts of magistrates. The law which obliged each inhabitant to continue in the tribe in which he was born, established great regularity in levying both the militia, and the taxes. Servius made likewise a law, that a piece of money should be paid upon every death, into the temple of the goddess Libitina, who presided over funerals; another into the temple of Juno Lucina, upon every birth; and another into the temple of Youth, as soon as any person was past the state of childhood. By this means the number of Roman citizens was known, especially of such as were able to bear arms. No regard had hitherto been had at Rome to slaves; but Servius, perhaps to do honour to his first condition, extended his care even to them, ordering little wooden oratories to be erected in all the cross-ways of the several quarters of the city; these he consecrated to the Diis Compitales, or gods of the cross-ways, and appointed slaves only to be priests of these gods, who had their particular festival, on which masters gave their slaves rest from all labour, and by this act of humanity gained their good-will.

- THAT an equal order might be established in the country, as well as in the city, the king divided the whole Roman territory into distinct tribes, commanding that there should be at least one place of refuge in each tribe, situated on a rising ground, and strong enough to secure the effects of the peasants, in case of a sudden alarm. These strong-holds he called Pagi, that is, villages, and commanded that each of them should have their peculiar temple, tutelary god, and magistrates. Each of them had likewise their particular festival, called paganalia, when every person was to pay into the hands of those, who presided at the sacrifices, a piece of money, the men of one kind, the women of another, and the children of a third. By this means an exact computation was made of the men, women, and children, in each tribe ^a.

- IN the mean time his two wards, Lucius Tarquinius, and Aruns, the grandchildren of Tarquin, being grown up, in order to secure their fidelity, he married them to his two daughters. And though the elder of these daughters, who was of a mild and tractable disposition, resembled in character the younger of his pupils, as the elder of his pupils did the younger of his daughters, who was of a violent and vicious temper, yet he thought it adviseable to give his elder daughter to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns; for by that means he matched them according to their ages, and at the same time hoped, that the elder Tullia's sweet disposition would temper Tarquin's impetuosity, and the younger Tullia's vivacity rouse the indolence of Aruns ^b.

- DURING the public rejoicing for this double marriage, the twelve leucumonies of Hebruria, uniting their forces, attempted to shake off the Roman yoke; but were in several battles defeated by Servius, and obliged to submit to him on the same conditions, on which they had submitted to his predecessor. For this success Servius was honoured with a third triumph ^c.

THE king, being thus disengaged from a troublesome war, returned to the pursuit of his political schemes, and put in execution that master-piece of policy, which Rome made use of ever after, and which established a perpetual order and regularity in all the members of the state, with respect to wars, to the public revenues, and the suffrages of the comitia. The public supplies had hitherto been raised upon the people at so much a head, without any distinction of rich and poor. Whence it likewise followed, that when levies were made for the war, the rich and poor were equally obliged ^a to take the field, according to the order of their tribe; and as they all served at their own expence, the poorer sort could, with much ado, bear the charges of a campaign. Besides, as the most indigent of the people saw themselves burdened with the same taxes as the rich, they pretended to an equal authority in the comitia: so that the election of kings and magistrates, the making of peace or war, the judging of criminals, were given up into the hands of a populace, who were easily corrupted, and had nothing to lose. Servius formed a project to remedy these evils, and put it in execution, by enacting a law, injoining all the Roman citizens to bring in an account in writing of their own names and ages, and of those of their fathers, wives, and children. By the same law, all heads of families were commanded to deliver in upon oath ^b a just estimate of their effects, and to add to it the places of their abode, whether in town or country. Whoever did not bring in an account of his effects, was to be deprived of his estate, to be beat with rods, and publicly sold for a slave. Servius from these particular accounts, which might be pretty well relied on, undertook to ease the poor by burdening the rich, and at the same time to please the latter by increasing their power.

Divides the Roman citizens into six classes, and these into centuries.

To this end he divided the Roman people into six classes: the first class consisted of those, whose estates and effects amounted to the value of ten thousand drachmæ, or an hundred thousand asses of brass; the first way of computing being used by the Greeks, and the latter by the Latins. This class was subdivided into fourscore centuries, or companies of foot. To these Servius joined eighteen centuries of Roman knights, who fought on horse-back, and appointed that this considerable body of horsemen should be at the head of the first class; because the estates of these knights, without all doubt, exceeded the sum necessary to be admitted into it. However, the public supplied them with horses, for which a tax was laid upon widows, who were exempt from all other tributes. This first class, including infantry and cavalry, consisted of ninety-eight centuries. The second class comprehended those, whose estates were valued at seven thousand five hundred drachmæ, or seventy-five thousand asses of brass. It was subdivided into twenty centuries, all foot. To these were added two centuries of carpenters, smiths, and other artificers. In the third class ^d were those, who were esteemed worth five thousand drachmæ, or fifty thousand asses. This class was subdivided into twenty centuries. The fourth class was of those, whose effects were rated at the value of five hundred drachmæ, or twenty-five thousand asses, and was divided into twenty centuries; to which were added two other centuries of trumpets, and blowers of the horn, who supplied the whole army with this martial music. The fifth class included those only, whose whole substance did not amount to more than twelve hundred and fifty drachmæ, or twelve thousand five hundred asses; and this class was divided into thirty centuries. The sixth class comprehended all those, who were not worth so much as those of the fifth class. They exceeded in number any other class, but nevertheless were reckoned but as one ^e century.

THE wise king drew from these regulations all the advantages he had expected. Levies for the army were no longer raised by tribes, nor were taxes laid at so much a head, as formerly; but all was levied by centuries. When, for instance, an army of twenty thousand men, or a large supply of money, was wanted for the war, each century furnished its quota both of men and money; so that the first class, which contained more centuries, though fewer men, than all the other together, furnished more men and more money for the public service, than the whole Roman state besides. And by this means the Roman armies consisted, for the most part, of the rich citizens of Rome, who, as they had lands and effects to defend, fought with more resolution, ^f while their riches enabled them to bear the expence of a campaign. As it was but just the king should make the first class amends for the weight laid on it, he gave it almost the whole authority in public affairs, changing the comitia by curiæ, in which every man gave his vote, into comitia by centuries, in which the majority was not reckoned by single persons, but by centuries, how few soever there might be in a century. Hence the first class, which contained more centuries than the other five taken together, had every thing at its disposal. The votes of this class were first taken; and if the ninety-eight centuries happened to agree, or only ninety-seven of them, the affair

- a was determined, because these made the majority of the hundred and ninety-three centuries, which composed the six classes. If they disagreed, then the second, the third, and the other classes in their order, were called to vote; though there was very seldom any occasion to go so low as the fourth class for a majority of votes. So that by this good order, Servius brought the affairs of the public to be determined by the judgment of the most considerable citizens, who understood the public interest much better than the blind multitude, liable to be imposed upon, and easily corrupted.

- AND now the state being thus divided into different orders, according to the census The census and lustrum. or valuation of their estates, Servius resolved to solemnize this prudent regulation by some public act of religion, that it might be the more respected, and the more lasting. Accordingly, all the citizens were commanded to appear, on a day appointed, in the campus Martius, which was a large plain, lying between the city and the Tiber, formerly consecrated by Romulus to the god Mars. Here the centuries being drawn up in battalia, a solemn lustration, or expiatory sacrifice, was performed in the name of all the people. The sacrifice consisted of a sow, a sheep, and a bull, whence it took the name of Suovetaurilia. The whole ceremony was called lustrum, à luendo, that is, from paying, expiating, clearing, or perhaps from the goddess Lua (1), who presided over expiations, and to whom Servius had dedicated a temple. This wise king, considering that in the space of five years there might be such alterations in the fortunes of private persons, as to intitle some to be raised to a higher class, and reduce others to a lower, enjoined that the census should be renewed every five years. As the census was usually closed by the lustrum, the Romans henceforth began to compute time by lustrums, each lustrum containing the space of five years. However, the lustrums were not always regularly observed, but often put off, though the census had been made in the fifth year. Some writers are of opinion, that Servius at this time coined the first money which had ever appeared at Rome; and add, that the circumstances of the lustrum probably led him to stamp the figures of the animals there slain on pieces of brass of a certain weight. It is past all doubt, that money was called pecunia, from the word pecus, which signifies cattle, a name which continued to be given to all coins, when the impressions on them were changed into more noble figures *.

- THE government of the city being thus established in so regular a manner, Servius, He gives the freedmen the privilege of Roman citizens. remembering his former servile condition, and touched with compassion on those, whom the misfortunes of an unsuccessful war had reduced to slavery, thought that such of them as had by long and faithful services deserved and obtained their freedom, were much more worthy of being made Roman citizens, than untractable vagabonds from foreign countries, who were admitted without distinction. He therefore gave the freedmen their choice, either to return to their own country, or continue at Rome. Those who chose to continue there, he divided into four tribes, and settled them within the city; and though they were distinguished from the Plebeians by their old name of liberti, or freed-men, yet they enjoyed all the privileges of free citizens. The senate took offence at the regard which the king shewed to such mean people, who had but lately shaken off their fetters; but Servius, by a most humane and judicious discourse, intirely appeased the fathers, who passed his institution into a law, which subsisted ever after.

- THE wise king, having thus established order among the people, undertook at last Reforms the royal power. to reform the royal power itself, his equity, which was the main spring of all his resolutions, leading him to act contrary to his own interest, and to sacrifice one half of the royal authority to the public good. His predecessors had reserved to themselves the cognizance of all causes both public and private; but Servius, finding the duties of his office too much for one man to discharge well, committed the cogni-

(1) The name of this goddess was lost through the ignorance of editors; but brought to light again by Justus Lipsius in his commentaries on Tacitus. For that ancient writer tells us, that Servius Tullius consecrated an altar to the goddess Lua. But the editor, not knowing who this goddess was, changed the word Lua into Luna, as if Servius had dedicated an altar to the moon. Lipsius corrects this mistake, and shews that Lua was the goddess, to whom the sacrifice of the lustrum was offered. As she was the goddess of expiations, the lustrum probably took its name from her, as she did hers from the word luo, which signifies to pay, because on that day every one paid his quota of the tax laid on his century.

zance of ordinary suits to the senate, and reserved that only of state-crimes to a himself.

the Latins and Sabines.*

ALL things being now regulated at home, both in the city and country, Servius turned his thoughts abroad, and formed a scheme for attaching the Sabines and Latins to the Romans by such social ties, as should be strengthened by religion. He summoned the Latin and Sabine cities to send their deputies to Rome, to consult about an affair of great importance. When they were come, he proposed to them the building of a temple in honour of Diana, where the Latins and Sabines should meet once a year, and join with the Romans in offering sacrifices to that goddess; that this festival should be followed by a council, in which all disputes between the cities should be amicably determined; that there proper measures should be taken to pursue their common interest; and lastly, that in order to draw the common people thither, a fair should be kept, at which every one might furnish himself with what he wanted. The king's design met with no opposition. The deputies only added to it, that the temple should be an inviolable asylum for the united nations, and that all the cities should contribute towards the expence of building it. It being left to the king to chuse a proper place for it, he pitched upon the Aventine hill, where the temple was built, and assemblies annually held in it. The laws which were to be observed in these general meetings, were engraved on a pillar of brass, and still to be seen in Augustus's time in the Latin tongue, but in Greek characters^t.

trigues of Tar-quin and the younger Tullus.*

BUT now Servius was grown old, and the ambition of Tarquin, his son-in-law, revived in proportion, as the king advanced in years. His wife used her utmost endeavours to check the rashness and fury of her husband, and to divert him from all criminal enterprizes; while her younger sister, a domestic fury, was ever instigating Aruns, who placed all his happiness in a private life, to the most villainous attempts. She was continually lamenting her fate in being tied to such an indolent husband, and wishing she had either continued unmarried, or were become a widow. Similitude of temper and manners formed by degrees a great intimacy between her and Tarquin. At length she proposed to him nothing less than the murdering of her father, sister, and husband, that they two might meet and ascend the throne together. Soon after they paved their way to an incestuous marriage, he by poisoning his wife, and she her husband, and then had the assurance to ask the king's and queen's consent to their marriage. Servius and Tarquinia, though they did not give it, were silent, through too much indulgence for a daughter, in whom now was their only hope of posterity. But these criminal nuptials were only the first step towards a yet greater iniquity. The wicked ambition of the new-married couple first shewed itself against the king; for they publicly declared, that the crown belonged to them; that Servius was an usurper, who being appointed tutor to Tarquin's grand-children, had deprived his pupils of their inheritance; that it was high time for an old man, who was but little able to support the weight of public affairs, to give place to a prince, who was of a mature age, &c. The patricians, whom Servius had taken great pleasure in humbling during the whole time of his reign, were easily gained over to Tarquin's party; and by the help of money many of the poorer citizens were also brought over to his interest. The king being informed of their treasonable practices, endeavoured to dissuade his daughter and son-in-law from such proceedings, which might end in their ruin, and exhorted them to wait for the kingdom till his death. But they, despising his counsels, and paternal admonitions, resolved to lay their claim before the senate, which Servius was obliged to summon; so that the affair came to a formal process. Tarquin reproached his father-in-law with having ascended the throne without a previous inter-regnum, and with having bought the votes of the people, and despised the suffrages of the senate. He then urged his own right of inheritance to the crown, and injustice of Servius, who, being only his guardian, had kept possession of it, when he himself was of an age to govern. Servius answered, that he had been lawfully elected by the people, and that, if there could be an hereditary right to the kingdom, the sons of Ancus had a much better one than the grandsons of the late king, who must himself have been an usurper. He then referred the whole to an assembly of the people, which being immediately proclaimed all over the city, the forum was soon filled, and Servius harangued the multitude in such a manner, as gained all their affections. They all cried out with one voice; Let Servius reign; let him continue to make the Romans happy. Amidst

- a their confused clamours, these words were likewise heard ; Let Tarquin perish ; let him die ; let us kill him. This language frightened him so, that he retired to his house in great haste, while the king was conducted back to his palace with the acclamations of the people :

THE ill success of this attempt cooled Tarquin's ardent desire of reigning ; and his ambition made him act a new part. He undertook to regain the favour of his father-in-law, by caresses, submissions, and protestations of a sincere regard and affection for him ; insomuch that the king, who judged of the probity of others from his own, was sincerely reconciled to him, and tranquillity re-established in the royal family. But it was not long ere Tarquin, roused by the continual reproaches of his wife, began

- b to renew his intrigues among the senators ; among whom he had no sooner gained a considerable party, than he put in execution a stratagem, which surprized the people by its novelty, and succeeded by the boldness of its execution. He cloathed himself in the royal robes, and causing the fasces to be carried before him by some of his domestics, crossed the Roman forum, entered the temple, where the senate used to meet, and seated himself on the throne. Such of the senators as were of his faction he found already in their places, for he had given them private notice to be there early ; and the rest being summoned to assemble in king Tarquin's name, made what haste they could to the appointed place, thinking that Servius was dead, since Tarquin assumed the title and function of king. When they were all assembled, Tarquin made a long

- c speech, reviling his father-in-law, and repeating the invectives against him, which he had so often uttered, calling him a slave, an usurper, a favourer of the populace, and an enemy to the senate and patricians. When he was yet speaking, Servius arrived ; and rashly giving way to the motions of his courage, without considering his strength, drew near the throne to pull Tarquin down from it. This raised a great noise in the assembly, which drew the people into the temple ; but no body ventured to part the two rivals. Tarquin therefore, being more strong and vigorous, seized the old man by the waste, and hurrying him through the temple, threw him down from the top of the steps into the forum. The king, who was grievously wounded, raised himself up with some difficulty ; but all his friends had abandoned him ; only

- d two or three of the people, touched with compassion, lent him their arms to lead him home to his palace. As they were dragging him on slowly, the cruel Tullia appeared in the forum, whither she had hastened in her chariot on the first report of what had passed in the senate. She found her husband on the top of the steps of the temple, and, transported with joy, was the first who saluted him king ; and her example was immediately followed by the senators of Tarquin's party. Nor was this enough for the unnatural daughter. She took aside her husband, and suggested to him, that he would never be safe so long as the usurper of his crown was alive. Hereupon Tarquin instantly dispatched some of his domestics to take away the remains of the unfortunate king's life. The orders for the wicked parricide were no sooner given, than Tullia

- e mounted her chariot again with an air of triumph to return home. The way to her house was through a narrow street called Vicus Cyprius (K), or, the good street. There the assassins had left the king's body, which was still panting. At this sight the charioteer, struck with horror, checked his horses, and made a stop : Why don't you go on ? cried Tullia to him. What stops you ? The charioteer turning about to her, Alas ! said he, it is the body of the king your father. At these words Tullia, catching up a stool that was in the chariot, and throwing it at his head, Go on, she cried, and don't be afraid of driving over a dead body. The charioteer obeyed, and the blood of the father is said to have dyed the wheels of the chariot, and even the cloaths of the inhuman daughter. And hence the street was called ever after Vicus Sceleratus. Such was the end of Servius Tullius, after he had lived seventy-four, and reigned forty-four years.

- f He was a prince of eminent justice and moderation, and made Rome more formidable by a peace of twenty years, than his predecessors had done by many victories. He was beloved by the people, esteemed by the patricians, and perhaps would have had no enemies, if he could have preserved the affections of his own family. Tarquin not suffering his obsequies to be performed with the usual pomp, lest the people might on that occasion rise up in arms, and revenge his death, Tarquinius conveyed the body of

Year of the flood 2471.
Before Christ

Of Rome 220.

Tarquin having thus possessed himself of the throne by a most wicked parricide, behaved himself during the whole time of his reign like a most cruel and despotical tyrant. In the very beginning of it the surname of proud was given him on account of his capricious humour, and haughty behaviour. As he had ascended the throne without a previous inter-regnum, and despised the suffrages of the people, and approbation of the senate, he communicated no affairs of state either to the senate ^b or people. All controversies whatsoever he decided himself, assisted by his intimate friends, and banished, fined, and even executed whom he pleased. To prevent the natural consequences of his tyranny, he kept constantly a strong guard about his person, mostly consisting of strangers, who were ready on all occasions to execute his pleasure. Wealth and merit became unpardonable crimes, as plainly appeared in the murder of M. Junius, a venerable old man, the father of the famous Brutus, who afterwards destroyed the regal power. This Junius was descended of a noble family, and had an ample patrimony, on which considerations Tarquin the elder had given him his daughter in marriage. The new king, to get possession of his estate, caused both him and his other son to be assassinated, Brutus escaping by counterfeiting mad- ^c ness. The flower of the senate retired from the city into voluntary banishment, to avoid the effects of the king's cruelty and avarice. The people, who had rejoiced at first to see the senate humbled, were in their turn as ill treated as the senators, and all the laws made in their favour annulled. Informers were dispersed all over the city to watch the words and behaviour of every citizen, and the worst construction was put upon every thing. All assemblies of the people, even for diversion and recreation, were prohibited both in the city and country. But as he was well apprised that the people would sooner or later attempt to shake off the yoke, and recover their ancient privileges and freedom, he turned his thoughts to gain a strong party among foreigners; and with this view married his daughter to Octavius Mamilius, a man of great interest ^d among the Latins. Mamilius indeed did his utmost to bring over a great many leading men of his country to the interest of his father-in-law, and his solicitations succeeded. But the king had like to have lost them again by his haughty behaviour. He had invited the Latins to meet in a national assembly at Ferentinum, on a day appointed by himself. The deputies came and took their places in the sacred grove. But as Tarquin did not appear after they had waited some hours, the assembly grew impatient, and Herdonius, an enterprising man, who hated Tarquin, took this occasion of inveighing against him. His speech made no small impression upon the assembly; but Mamilius prevailed upon them to adjourn the council to the next day. Then Tarquin appeared, and having first made a frivolous excuse for his absence, ^e acquainted the assembly, that his business with them was to demand his right of commanding the Latin armies, a right which he derived by inheritance from his grandfather. Upon this a profound silence ensued, till Herdonius stepping forth into the midst of the assembly, made a bitter invective against Tarquin, and represented the fatal consequences of admitting his proposal. Tarquin, disconcerted by the boldness of the orator, desired that the assembly might sit again the following day, when he promised to answer the invectives of Herdonius. In the meantime, having corrupted some of his domestics, he engaged them to hide a great quantity of arms in their master's baggage. The next morning he entered the assembly with an air of confidence, and after having told them that the malice of Herdonius against him was wholly ^f owing to his having refused him his daughter in marriage, he accused his adversary of having laid a plot to cut off all the deputies there present, and to usurp a tyranny over the Latin cities. In proof of this, he informed them of the arms concealed in Herdonius's baggage. The accused, knowing nothing of those arms, consented to be adjudged guilty, if upon examination the fact alledged should be found true. Accordingly, his baggage was searched, and the arms being found, and brought into the assembly, the innocent Herdonius was immediately sentenced to be thrown into a basin at the head of the spring of Ferentinum; where a hurdle being laid upon him, and stones heaped upon it, he was pressed down into the water and drowned ^g.

a THE Latins, not doubting but Herdonius was guilty of the crime laid to his charge, looked upon Tarquin as their deliverer, renewed the treaty made with his grandfather, and declared him general of the Latin armies. Not long after the Fernici, and two cantons of the Volsci, entered into an alliance with him upon the same terms. Tarquin, to secure the fidelity of his new allies, erected, with their approbation, a new temple in the midst of them, on a hill near the ruins of Alba, which he consecrated to Jupiter Latialis. There the diets of the confederate cantons were to assemble; and these assemblies were called Latia. The twenty-seventh of April was the day appointed for their annual meeting, and had the name of Feria Latina. The Romans, as the chief members of the alliance, always presided at the sacrifices and deliberations. The diet consisted of forty-seven deputies from so many cities, who formed the Latin association, which was afterwards the best part of the Roman strength, and contributed more than all the rest of Italy to the conquest of the world.

b WITH the assistance of the Latins, Tarquin thought himself in a condition to make war upon those Volsci, who had refused to enter into an alliance with him. But as he could not depend upon the fidelity of the Romans, he blended them in the same legions with the Latins, who till his time had been a separate corps. The inhabitants of Suessa Pometia (L), one of the most flourishing cities of the Volsci, were the first who felt the effects of this new alliance. They had plundered the territories of their neighbours, and Tarquin laying hold of this pretence to begin the war, marched against them, defeated their army, laid siege to their city, and having taken it by storm, gave the plunder of it to his troops, reserving only the tenth part of the spoil towards the expence of finishing the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. He then turned his arms against the Sabines, who had committed some depredations in the Roman territories, gained two complete victories over them, and made the whole Sabine nation tributary. Upon his return to Rome, where we are told he triumphed twiceⁱ, he undertook the finishing of the common sewers, and the great circus, and having obliged the idle populace to work without any other reward, but that of a poor maintenance, soon brought to perfection those two structures, which his grandfather had begun^k.

c IN the mean time many of the discontented patricians, abandoning their native country, took refuge at Gabii, a city of Latium, about a hundred furlongs from Rome, and prevailed upon the inhabitants to espouse their cause, and make war upon Tarquin. This war lasted seven years with various success, during which time the Romans, who could neither sow nor reap, being afflicted with a great famine, began to murmur, and at length to demand of Tarquin in a tumultuous manner, either a peace or provisions. Their complaints and murmurs being fomented by emissaries sent privately from the exiles at Gabii, the whole city was in the utmost confusion, and seemed only to wait for a favourable opportunity to take up arms, and drive out Tarquin, the cause of all their misfortunes. The king being on one side unwilling to make a shameful peace, and apprehending on the other a general revolt of his subjects, was at a loss what resolution to take, and under the greatest uneasiness. But his son Sextus Tarquinius found out an expedient, no less dishonourable than artful, for extricating him out of this difficulty. He pretended to be upon very ill terms with his father, and openly inveighed against him as a tyrant. Hereupon the king, as it had been agreed on before-hand, commanded him to be publicly beaten with rods as a rebel. This was no sooner known at Gabii, but the inhabitants, desirous to have Sextus among them, made him privately great offers; which he readily accepted, after they had solemnly promised never to deliver him up to his father upon any pretence whatsoever. It is not to be imagined how agreeable Sextus's arrival was to the Gabini, or what hopes they founded on their gaining over a prince, who was so much valued by the Romans. From that time they looked upon Rome as already reduced. And indeed the artful Sextus played his game with all imaginable dexterity. His public and private discourse turned upon nothing but the tyranny of the king of Rome. From words he proceeded to actions. No enemy Rome ever had was more active. He often ravaged the Roman lands, and returned to Gabii, loaded with booty. His father took care to facilitate his military exploits, and sacrificed such soldiers and officers as he suspected, to the glory of his son. His reputation being thus increased by the craft of his father, without the least suspicion of any intelligence between them, the Gabini placed so much confidence in his fidelity and valour, that they appointed him commander in chief of their army. His authority being now sufficiently established in Gabii, he dispatched a slave, in whom he could confide, privately to Rome, to inquire of his father what he should do. The king, not thinking fit to answer either in writing, or by word of mouth, took the slave into a garden, and there struck off the heads of all the tallest poppies. This done, he sent back the messenger. Sextus understood the hint, and, having assembled the Gabini, pretended to have discovered a plot to deliver him up to his father. The people pressed him to declare the conspirators, and extorted from him, as it were, by force, the name of Antistius Petrus, a man whose merit had made him the most considerable person in his country. Sextus had bribed his servants to convey among his papers some letters from the king of Rome, which being produced and read, the incensed multitude, without further examination, immediately stoned him, and committed to Sextus the care of discovering his accomplices, and inflicting on them such punishments as he should judge proper. Upon this he ordered the gates of the city to be shut, and having sent officers into the several quarters of it, caused all the eminent men in Gabii, who gave him umbrage, to be inhumanly massacred. In the midst of this desolation and confusion, he opened the gates to his father, whom he had acquainted with his design, and put him in possession of the city. The Gabini sunk into the utmost despair at the sight of the tyrant, who now had their lives, their estates, and their liberty, at his disposal. But Tarquin on this occasion, consulting good policy more than revenge, treated them with great humanity, and even entered into an alliance with them, the articles of which were written on a shield made of the hide of an ox sacrificed on that occasion. This treaty was still to be seen at Rome in Augustus's time, in the temple of Jupiter Piflius, or Sancus, that is, the god of fidelity¹.

(L) Dionysius Halicarnassensis reckons Suessa Pometia among the most wealthy cities of the Volsci. It was called Pometia, to distinguish it from another

As Tarquin was jealous even of his own children, he took care to keep them at a distance from Rome. With this view he left Sextus at Gabii, declaring him king of that city, and sent Titus and Arunx to found two new colonies, the one at Signia, the other at Circaum, a promontory on the coast of the Tyrrhenian sea. As for his fourth son Lucius Tarquinius, he kept him in Rome, he not being yet of an age to give him umbrage.

The books of the Sibyl.

THE Romans, being now accustomed to the yoke of an imperious master, bore it with great patience, and allowed Tarquin to enjoy a profound peace. It was at this time that an unknown woman appeared at court, loaded with nine volumes, which she offered to sell, but demanded a very considerable price. Tarquin refusing to purchase them at her rate, she withdrew, and burnt three of them. Some time after she returned, and demanded the same price for the remaining six. She was therefore looked upon as a mad woman, and driven away with scorn. However, having burnt the half of them, she ventured to return a third time, asking as much for the remaining three as she had done for the whole nine. Tarquin, surprised at the novelty of this proceeding, caused the books to be put into the hands of the augurs, who, finding them to be the oracles of the Sibyl of Cuma, declared them to be an invaluable treasure, and advised the king to buy the three at the same price, which the woman had asked for the nine. Tarquin followed their directions, and the woman, having received the sum she demanded, soon after disappeared, having first exhorted the Romans to preserve her books with great care. Tarquin appointed two persons of distinction, styled Duumviri, to be guardians of them (M); and ordered them to

(M) These officers were afterwards increased to ten, and then to fifteen; and, as their numbers increased, were called Decemviri, Quindecemviri, sacris faciundis. It was their business to consult the Sybilline books, when the senate thought proper. But recourse was never had to them, unless the republic was under, or threatened with, some great calamity; as when a dangerous sedition was like to break out, when the Roman armies had been defeated, or when any of those prodigies appeared, which were thought fatal to Rome. Then the Duumviri had the care of putting in execution whatever they thought commanded by the books of the Sibyls. They also presided over the sacrifices, and public sports, which they appointed to appease the wrath of heaven. And lastly, they ordered every thing that related to the Ludi Seculares. Their office was for life, and they were exempted from taxes, and from all civil and military employments. This magistracy continued at Rome from the time of Tarquin the Proud to the reign of the emperor Theodosius, when this and many other ancient superstitions were intirely abolished.

- a be locked up in a vault under the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, as soon as that building was finished ; and there they were kept, till they were burnt with the temple itself ^m.

Rome still continuing to enjoy peace, though the people were as much discontented as ever, Tarquin, in order to keep them employed, undertook the finishing of the temple of the capitol, which his grandfather had begun. He hired for this purpose architects and skilful workmen out of Hebruria, and obliged his own subjects to perform the laborious part, making them the drudges, as he had done in so many other undertakings. This temple, which was dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus, stood on the top of the hill Tarpeius, made sometime since a part of Rome. The original of the new name of Capitol is by historians said to be this : As the workmen were digging the foundations of the temple of Jupiter, they are said to have found very deep in the earth the head of a man, whose features were preserved intire, and the blood as red and fresh as if it had been but newly shed. The Romans, looking upon this as a prodigy, consulted the augurs, who declared it to presage, that Rome would some time or other become the mistress and head of Italy (N). This answer encouraged Tarquin to spare no pains nor expence in raising a structure to the honour of those gods, who were the authors of so glorious a destiny. Accordingly the foundations were laid, and the temple built in a most stately manner. It stood upon eight acres of ground, and was two hundred foot broad, and about two hundred and fifteen long. The front of this magnificent structure was to the south, facing the hill Palatinus, and the Forum Romanum. An hundred steps led up to it from the forum, which were divided at certain distances by large landing-places. This front consisted of three rows of pillars, and the two sides of the temple were adorned with a peristyle, consisting of a double row of pillars. It was in after-ages burnt down more than once (O) ; but the Romans always rebuilt it, still preserving the same proportions. The whole arch of this prodigious building was gilt both within and without (P). It contained three chapels, or rather three temples, under the same roof, one dedicated to Jupiter, another to Juno, and the third to Minerva (Q). As this was a religious undertaking, the Romans assisted Tarquin in carrying it on with more chearfulness than usual ; but the honour of putting the last hand to this stately work, and consecrating it, was reserved for a Roman consul in the time of the republic.

While Tarquin and the Romans were thus employed, a cruel plague breaking out at Rome, the king sent his two sons, Titus and Aruns, to consult the oracle of Delphos about the cause and cure of the contagion. The princes prepared magnificent presents for Apolo, and Junius Brutus, who was to attend them for their amusement, resolved to carry his offering too. He was the son of that venerable patrician, whom Tarquin had caused to be murdered in the very beginning of his reign, and had long acted the part of an idiot at court, which procured him the name of Brutus. His affected follies had something inexpressibly amusing in them, and he knew how to make use of them at proper times, and suppress them when unseasonable. He had been brought up, ever since his father's death, in the king's palace, with the princes his cousins, who were greatly diverted with his follies. He was therefore appointed to attend them to Delphos. The present he chose for the god was an elder-stick ; which was matter of diversion for the whole court. However, as he was well apprised, that the gods of those times, or their ministers, were affected with the value of the presents, he had

(N) Macrolius tells us (73), that the name of the man, to whom this head belonged, was Tolus ; so that the word Capitol is, according to him, compounded of caput and Tolus. Other writers say, that the hill Tarpeius was called Capitol, because it was the capital or chief fortress in Rome.

(O) It was burnt in Sylla's time by the negligence of those who kept it ; but Sylla rebuilt it in a more magnificent manner. It was burnt a second time in the reign of Vitellius, and repaired by Vespasian. It underwent the same misfortune under Titus, and was rebuilt by Dominian ; but always on the old foundation of Tarquin.

(P) The gilding of the whole arch of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was a work undertaken by the Romans, as Pliny informs us (74), after the destruction of Carthage. This undertaking, if Plutarch is to be credited (75), cost twelve thousand talents, a sum, which seems to exceed all belief. The gates of the temple were of brass, covered with large plates of gold. The inside of the temple, and the columns which supported it, were all of marble.

(Q) The inside of the temple was divided into three parts by two rows of columns, which made the nave and the two isles. The nave formed the chapel of Jupiter, and the two isles the chapels of Juno and Minerva.

the precaution to inclose a rod of gold in his stick without any body's knowledge. ^a This was a true symbol of his own mind and conduct; for he concealed the most valuable gifts of nature under a contemptible outside. All things being got ready, they set out for Delphos, and the young princes, having executed their father's commands, inquired of the oracle, which of them should be prince of Rome? The god answered, that the government of Rome was reserved for him who should first kiss his mother; which the princes misunderstanding, agreed to do it both together, and reign jointly. But Brutus, knowing the meaning of the oracle, as soon as they arrived in Italy, pretended to fall down by chance, and kissed the earth, the common mother of all men ^a.

THE two princes on their return to Rome found the city in a great commotion on ^b account of the war, which the king had declared with the Rutuli, under pretence that they had entertained some Roman exiles. He had already invested Ardea their metropolis, which lay sixteen miles south-east of Rome. While they lay before this place, the officers, having a good deal of leisure, used to make mutual entertainments for one another in their quarters. One day, when Sextus Tarquinius was entertaining his brothers, and his kinsman Collatinus, the conversation happened to turn upon the merit of their wives, every one extolling the good qualities of his own. This occasioned a kind of quarrel, and in order to end it, they agreed to mount their horses, as they were heated with wine, and go and surprize their wives. She, whom they should find employed in the manner most agreeable to her sex, was, by common ^c consent, to have the preference. Away therefore they posted first to Rome, where they found the king's daughters-in-law spending their time in feasting and diversions. From Rome they hastened to Collatia, where they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, in the midst of her maids spinning, and working in wool, though the night was far advanced before their arrival. Hereupon they unanimously gave her the preference, and after a noble entertainment, returned the next day to the camp before Ardea. Sextus, captivated with her beauty, found a pretence to return very soon to Collatia, where he was entertained by Lucretia, in her husband's absence, with great civility and respect. At midnight he found means to convey himself into her bed-chamber, approached her bed with his drawn sword, and laying his hand on her breast, ^d threatened her with present death, if she offered to stir or speak. Lucretia awaking, and seeing death so near, was in the greatest confusion imaginable, while Sextus, declaring his passion, endeavoured by intreaties, mixed with menaces, to make her yield to his desires. But when he found that all was in vain, and that even the fear of death could not prevail upon her to consent, he threatened her with ignominy, telling her, that if she would not yield, he would first kill her, then lay one of her slaves dead by her side, and declare to all the world, that he had only revenged the injured honour of Collatinus. The dread of infamy got the better of Lucretia's constancy; and Sextus, having obtained his wishes, returned early the next morning to the camp. Lucretia, not being able to endure the thoughts of life after the violence she had suf- ^e fered, wrote to her husband to meet her at her father's house; and then came to Rome in her chariot. Livy tells us, that she desired her father and husband to meet her at her own house. With her father Lucretius came Publius Valerius, afterwards Poplicola, and with her husband Lucius Junius Brutus, and many other Romans of distinction; for Lucretia had acquainted them, that she had an affair of the utmost consequence to impart to them. When the assembly was pretty numerous, she disclosed in few words the whole matter, declared her firm resolution not to outlive the loss of her reputation, and conjured them not to let the crime of Sextus Tarquinius go unpunished. They all endeavoured to comfort her, telling her, that there could be no guilt where the heart was innocent. But the Roman heroine, embracing her father ^f and husband with a flood of tears, plunged a dagger, which she had concealed under her garment, into her breast, and fell dead at their feet. While so tragical a sight filled the spectators with grief and consternation, Brutus, throwing off his long disguise, drew near the body of Lucretia, and snatching the poniard out of her bosom, told her relations there present, that tears and lamentations could never be heard, whilst vengeance cried so loud. Then shewing the bloody poniard to the assembly, I swear, said he, by this blood, which was once so pure, and which nothing, but the detestable villainy of Tarquin, could have polluted, that I will pursue Lucius Tarquinius the

- a proud, his wicked wife, and their children, with fire and sword; nor will ever suffer any of that family, or any other whatsoever, to reign at Rome. Ye gods, I call you to witness this my oath. At these words he presented the dagger to Collatinus, Lucretius, Valerius, and the rest of the company, and engaged them to take the same oath. These noble Romans, surprised at the sudden and unexpected appearance of so much wisdom in an idiot, thought him inspired, and gave themselves intirely up to his counsels. He then let them know, that his folly had been feigned, exhorted them to revenge the death of Lucretia, and encouraged them to shake off the shameful yoke, under which they had so long groaned. Finding them all resolved to submit to his conduct, and take what measures he should judge most proper for the execution of the design,
- b he commanded the gates to be shut, that all might be kept secret from Tarquin, till such time as the people might be assembled, the dead body exposed, and a public decree passed for the banishing of the king. The senate being assembled, no one opposed the banishment of Tarquin; but as they were divided in their opinions with respect to the new form of government, Brutus represented to them the absolute necessity of coming to a speedy resolution, shewing them that the regal power was not consistent with the security of the state, and safety of the people, and therefore was not to be trusted with one man; but two were to be chosen, who should govern with equal authority and power. Then, because names alone gave some people offence, he advised them to change the name of kingdom for that of commonwealth, and instead
- c of the title of king and monarch, to give those, who should govern, some more modest and popular name. He added, that the main thing to keep these magistrates in awe was to prevent their perpetual power, and that, if they were annual, after the manner of Athenians, they might learn both how to obey, and how to command. Lastly, that the name of king might not be wholly lost, he was for giving it to one, who should be charged with the care of religious matters, and be called Rex Sacrorum (R). This employment was to be for life, and attended with immunity from warfare; but the rex sacrorum should only concern himself with those religious rites, which the king had charge of before. The particulars of his speech were all approved of by the senate; and a decree was immediately issued out, banishing the king, and all his
- d posterity.

Brutus procures the banishment of the Tarquins.

- Brutus* having thus gained the senate, caused the yet bleeding Lucretia to be carried to the place where the comitia were usually held; and placing the dead body where it might be seen by all, he ordered the people to be called together. When the multitude were assembled, he began his speech to them by explaining the mystery of his past conduct, and the necessity he had been under, for more than twenty years together, of counterfeiting folly, as the only means of preserving his life after the murder of his father and elder brother. Then he proceeded to acquaint them with the resolution the patricians had taken to depose the tyrant, and pressed them in the strongest terms to concur in that design. He enumerated the many crimes which had
- e rendered Tarquin odious to his subjects; that he had poisoned his own brother and wife, murdered his lawful sovereign, and filled the common-sewers with the bodies of the nobility; that he came to the throne as an usurper, and continued on it as a tyrant; being treacherous to his best friends, and inhuman to all his subjects; that his three sons were of a temper as tyrannical as himself, especially the elder, of which they had a dismal instance before their eyes; that since the king was absent, and the

(R) Dionysius Halicarnassensis gives us the following account of this institution: Because the kings, says he, had in a great many respects been serviceable to the state, the founders of the commonwealth thought it very proper to keep always up the name of king in the city. Upon this account they ordered the augurs and pontifices to chuse a fit person, who should engage never to meddle with civil affairs, but devote himself wholly to the care of the public worship, and to the ceremonies of religion, with the title of Rex Sacrorum (75). Livy informs us, that this dignity was inferior to that of Pontifex Maximus, the establishers of the commonwealth having made the Rex Sacrorum but a subordinate officer

even in affairs of religion, lest the name of king, which had been formerly so odious to the people, should still in some measure prove prejudicial to their liberty (76). His wife was called queen, and was one of the chief priestesses. None but patricians were admitted to this dignity. The Rex Sacrorum was always chosen in the comitia of the people assembled in the campus Martius by centuries. As he was not allowed to have any hand in civil affairs, when the usual sacrifices before the electing of magistrates or generals were over, he was obliged to withdraw. So jealous were the Romans even of the shadow, we may say, of a king.

patricians resolved to shake off the yoke, neither men, money, nor foreign aid, should be wanting, had they but courage for the enterprize. He urged in the end of his speech, that it was shameful in them to think of commanding the Volsi, the Sabines, and other nations abroad, while they were slaves at home; and to maintain so many wars in order to gratify the ambition of a tyrant, while they had not courage enough to undertake one for their own liberty. As for the army before Ardea, he told them that he did not doubt but they would readily join in whatever should be agreed on in the city R.

THE multitude, transported with joy at the thoughts of liberty, gave their consent with loud acclamations, and called out for arms. But Brutus did not think fit to arm the people, till they had confirmed by their suffrages the decree of the senate banishing Tarquin. This decree deprived him of all the prerogatives belonging to the regal authority, condemned him and all his posterity to perpetual banishment, and devoted to the infernal gods every Roman, who should by word or deed attempt his restoration. The curiæ being assembled, and the decree proposed, they were all unanimous in confirming it. And now the administration being reduced to an inter-regnum, Lucretius was by the suffrages of the people declared inter-rex; so that it was his business to prepare every thing for the election of the new magistrates. He therefore called the people together once more, not by curiæ, but by centuries, and directed them to come armed into the campus Martius, in order to elect their new governors, who, according to the plan of government proposed by Brutus, and approved by the people, were to be called consuls (S). The inter-rex proposed to the people Junius Brutus, the head of the conspiracy, and Tarquinius Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia; and they were unanimously elected to the new dignity, and proclaimed consuls. In the mean time Tarquin, being informed by some who had got out of the city before the gates were shut, that Brutus was raising commotions to his prejudice, hastened to Rome, attended only by his sons, and a small number of his most trusty friends; for he was little apprehensive of a conspiracy carried on by one whom he despised as an idiot. But finding, to his great surprize, the gates shut, and the people in arms upon the walls, he returned with all possible expedition to the camp. There the army, during his short absence, had been gained over by the conspirators to their party. Livy tells us, that Brutus went in person to the camp, and that he arrived before Ardea at the same time that Tarquin appeared at the gates of Rome. Others say, that the new consuls sent letters to the camp, giving an account of the resolutions taken at Rome, and exhorting the troops to shake off the tyrannical yoke. However that be, it is certain, that before Tarquin returned, the soldiers, being convened by centuries, had unanimously agreed to receive the decree passed in the city; so that when Tarquin returned, they refused to admit him. The tyrant being thus driven from his capitol, and abandoned by his troops, was forced, at the age of seventy-six, to fly with his wife and children to Gabii, or, as Livy will have it, to Cære in Hebruria. Tulus, Herminius, and Marcus Horatius, who commanded the army under Tarquin, made a truce with the Rutuli for fifteen years, and having raised the siege of Ardea,

(S) Pomponius the civilian is of opinion, that the name of consul was taken from the word considero, as signifying to watch for the public good. Varro derives it from the same word, but in a different signification, viz. as importing to consult or ask counsel; because the intent of those, who first instituted the consuls, was, that they should do nothing without the advice of the people and senate. The law, which placed them at the head of the republic, calls them prætores and judices. We have this law still remaining, as quoted by Jully in the third book of laws. When it was made in the comitia, which changed the monarchy into a republic, it was couched in the following words: Reges imperio duo sumus, iique prætoribus, iudicando, & consulendo, prætores, iudices, consules, appellantur. Militia summum jus habemus. Nummi parvus. Ollis salus populi summa lex esto. They were indeed allowed the common use of the sceptre, crown, and an habit of distinction. But Livy assures us, that on the days of their triumphs, in the public sports, and at solemn sacrifices, they wore a crown of gold, an ivory staff or scepter, and an habit striped with purple, as the kings did (77) Valerius Maximus (78) tells us, that they retained at first as many lictors as the kings, viz. twenty-four; he adds, that the consul Papirius reduced them to twelve. But each consul was not attended by twelve lictors, neither did they divide them so as to have six apiece. They were only guarded by twelve lictors alternately, each in his month. This ceremonial began with the two first consuls; the consul who was the eldest, or had most children, or most suffrages for the consulship, had the lictors the first month. Brutus was attended with the fasces before his colleague Collatinus, as appears from the following verse of Virgil:

- 2 returned to Rome with all their forces ⁹. Thus ended the regal state of Rome, two hundred and forty-three or two hundred and forty-five years, according to the common computation, after the building of the city (T); and a new form of government was introduced, which, without any considerable alteration, subsisted till the times of the emperors.

(T) We have followed the common computation with regard both to the seven kings of Rome, and to the fourteen kings of Alba. But we cannot help thinking Sir Isaac Newton's computations to be better grounded, and nearer the truth. We shall deliver his opinion in his own words: When the Greeks and Latins, says that writer, were forming the technical chronology, there were great disputes about the antiquity of Rome. The Greeks made it much older than the olympiads; some of them said it was built by Æneas; others by Romus the son or grandson of Latinus, king of the Aborigines; others by Romus the son of Ulysses, or of Ascanius, or of Italus; and some of the Latins fell in at first with the opinion of the Greeks, saying, that it was built by Romulus, the son or grandson of Æneas. Timæus Siculus represented it built by Romulus, the grandson of Æneas, above an hundred years before the olympiads; and so did Neavius the poet, who was twenty years older than Ennius, and served in the first Punic war, and wrote the history of that war. Hitherto nothing certain was agreed on; but about a hundred and forty or a hundred and fifty years after the death of Alexander the Great, they began to say that Rome was built a second time by Romulus in the fifteenth age after the destruction of Troy; by ages they meant the reigns of the Latins at Alba, and reckoned the first fourteen reigns at about four hundred and thirty-two years, and the following reigns of the seven kings of Rome at two hundred and forty-four years; both which numbers made up the time of about six hundred and seventy-six years from the taking of Troy, according to those chronologers; but are much too long for the course of nature: and by this reckoning they placed the building of Rome upon the sixth or the seventh olympiad. Varrø placed it on the first year of the seventh olympiad, and was therein generally followed by the Romans. But this can scarce be reconciled to the course of nature; for I do not meet with any instance in all history, since chronology was certain, wherein seven kings, most of whom were slain, reigned two hundred and forty-four years in continual succession. The fourteen reigns of the kings of the Latins at twenty years apiece, one with another, amount to two hundred and eighty years; and these, counted from the taking of Troy, and in the thirty-eighth olympiad: and the seven reigns of the kings of Rome, four or five of them being slain, and one deposed, may, at a moderate reckoning, amount to fifteen or sixteen years apiece, one with another. Let them be reckoned at seventeen years apiece, and they will amount to a hundred and nineteen years; which, being counted backwards from the regituge, and also in the thirty-eighth olympiad: and by these two reckonings Rome was built in the thirty-eighth olympiad, or thereabout. The two hundred and eighty years, and the hundred and nineteen years together make up three hundred and ninety-nine years; and the same number of years arises by counting the twenty and one reigns at nineteen years apiece: and this being the whole time between the taking of Troy, and the regituge, let these years be counted backward from the regituge, An. 1. olymp. 68, and they will place the taking of Troy about seventy-four years after the death of Solomon (80). The death of Solomon Sir Isaac places nine hundred and seventy-nine years before Christ: so that the taking of Troy by the Greeks, after which Æneas began his voyages, will be about nine hundred and five years before Christ: and as he makes the building of Carthage by Dido to be eight hundred and eighty-three before the christian era, there are, according to him, little more than twenty years between these two last-mentioned events. This computation clears Virgil from that monstrous anachronism of near three hundred years, with which he has been so often reproached.

CHAP. III.

The consular state of Rome from the beginning of that government to the burning of the city by the Gauls.

- 1 ROME enjoyed a profound peace in the beginning of the new government. The army, which had served under Tarquinius before Ardea, being returned to the city, the consuls, suspecting they might preserve some inclination for their general, called them together in the campus Martius, and after having exhorted them to concord, they caused the decree, which was passed against the Tarquins, to be renewed in their presence.

The consuls and people swear that they will never suffer the Tarquins or any other to reign as Rome.

sence. After this, the consuls, standing before the altars, on which the intrails of a the victims had been offered, took an oath in the name of their children, and all their posterity, that they would never replace either Tarquin or his sons, or any of his family, on the throne, nor create any other king of Rome, nor suffer any to be elected. Then the consuls made the people take the same oath, and proceeded, after that solemn ceremony was over, to the election of a Rex Sacrorum, when Manius Papirius, a man of patrician extraction, was by the suffrages of the people raised the first to that dignity. The consuls having now nothing to fear from the people, who were restored to all their ancient rights, employed their thoughts about securing the senators, among whom Valerius had great interest. He had expected to be named consul at the first election; and the preference, which the people gave to Collatinus, had b displeased him to such a degree, that he had absented himself from the senate, and public affairs; insomuch that he began to be suspected of favouring the banished king. But the public apprehension ceased, when he appeared in the senate on the day appointed for the senators to take the same oath which the people had taken. He then signalized anew his love for liberty, and swore the first, that he would never favour the pretensions of the Tarquins, nor suffer them, or any other, ever to reign at Rome ^r.

The inhabitants of Tarquini send an embassy to Rome in favour of the Tarquins.

Thus Rome was in tranquillity at home, but Tarquin was raising her many enemies abroad. He had made Tarquini in Ettruria his place of residence, and prevailed upon the inhabitants to send an embassy to Rome with a letter from him to the Roman people. The ambassadors delivered the letter to the senate, demanding that it might c be read to the people assembled in the comitia. But Valerius strenuously opposed so dangerous a proceeding, and by his interest in the senate, defeated the first attempt of the artful Tarquin. As this body of the new commonwealth was above all others concerned to exclude kings, by whom they had been kept in a state of dependence, the consuls thought it necessary to restore the senate to its ancient majesty, and to gain the respect of the people, as well by the number of the senators, as by their dignity. With this view the ancient number of three hundred was once more completed, the vacant places being filled up by men of prudence and interest, chosen from among the Roman knights. These new senators were called Conscripti, that is, d persons written or inrolled on the same list, for they were added to the old senators.

But though Tarquin himself was hated both by the people and patricians, yet his sons had a great number of young debauchees in their interest. The Tarquins building their hopes on these young noblemen, who regretted the loss of their companions, and the supporters of their extravagance, prevailed with the Tarquinienses to send a second embassy to Rome, under pretence of demanding the estates of the exiles; but in reality to stir up a faction against the consuls. The ambassadors being admitted into the senate, spoke with great modesty and reserve; they only desired that the king might have his paternal estate restored to him, that at least, which had been transmitted to him by his grandfather Tarquinius Priscus, who had deserved no ill treatment at their hands. Collatinus was for complying with the demand, since the e king promised, in case it was complied with, never to attempt the recovery of the kingdom by force of arms. But Brutus opposed the demand, thinking it no good policy to furnish an enemy with money, which, without all doubt, would be employed against themselves. The affair being at last referred to the people, it was carried by one vote in the comitia, that the Tarquins should be put in possession of their paternal estates ^s.

The ambassadors engage some of the young patricians in a plot.

While the people were employed in loading carriages with the effects of the exiles, and selling what could not be carried off, the ambassadors laid hold of that opportunity to engage some young noblemen in a plot against the consuls. Among these were three of the Aquilian family, the sons of Collatinus's sister, and two Vitellii, whose sister f Brutus had married. The latter engaged in the same conspiracy Titus and Tiberius, the two sons of Brutus. The conspirators met at the house of the Aquili, and there the resolution of putting the consuls to death, and letting the Tarquins into the city by night, was taken in the presence of the ambassadors. They all bound themselves by solemn oaths, with the detestable ceremony of drinking the blood of a murdered man, and swearing over his trembling bowels, that they would do all that lay in their power to destroy the consuls, and restore the king. After the ceremony was over, each of them wrote a letter to the king, as an authentic proof of their zeal for

- a his interest, and put them into the hands of the ambassadors. But in spite of all the precaution used by the conspirators to keep the secret from their servants, Vindicius, or, as Plutarch calls him, Vindex, a slave of the Aquilii; suspecting his master's design, staid at the door of the apartment, and through a crevice saw all the mysteries of the conspiracy. However, he was afraid to disclose the secret to either of the consuls, apprehending that Brutus, to save his sons, and Collatinus, to secure the lives of his nephews, might think fit to destroy the single evidence of their crime. He went therefore straight to P. Valerius, whose house was always open to the meanest of the people, and unburdened his mind to him. Valerius took the slave under his protection, and having shut him up in a room under the care of his wife, he went out
- b attended by his friends, clients, and domestics, whom he divided into two bands; one he posted under the conduct of his brother M. Valerius at the entrance of the house of the Aquilii, while he himself with a strong guard entered the apartment of the ambassadors, who lodged in the same house, and there found and seized the letters, which the conspirators had writ the night before. As he was coming out, he met the Aquilii, who being surprized to see him, and suspecting that their letters were seized, endeavoured to force them from him. But all their endeavours were in vain; for Valerius not only kept them, but with the assistance of his attendants took all the heads of the conspiracy prisoners. M. Valerius, his brother, had also the good luck to intercept other letters, concealed among some cloaths, which the domestics of the Aquilii were carrying away.
- c EARLY the next morning the people were summoned to the Comitia, where Brutus and his colleague sat on the tribunal of justice. The prisoners being brought before their judges, were, one after another, tied to stakes with their hands bound behind them. This was so melancholly a sight, that the people could scarce refrain from tears, when they beheld in that condition the sons of Brutus, whom they looked upon as their deliverer. The minds of the multitude were in suspense about the sentence, which the consuls were to pronounce, the one against his sons, the other against his nephews. But Brutus, without betraying the least concern, began the trial with the examination of his sons. Vindicius appeared against them; and his testimony was found unanswerable.
- d Then Brutus ordered the letters to be read, which his sons had wrote to the Tarquins. The proof being clear, the prisoners made no defence but with their tears. Tutus, said he, speaking coldly to the two prisoners without calling them sons, And you, Tiberius, what have you to offer in your defence? They were thrice called upon to make their defence; but tears were still their only answer. Upon which the greater part of the senators were moved with compassion, and a confused murmur was heard among them, banish them; banish them. Collatinus wept, and Valerius, severe as he was, did not utter a single word. This favourable disposition gave the two guilty youths some hopes. But the whole assembly trembled, and expected the decision with horror. As the two criminals offered nothing in their defence, Brutus at length rose up to give sentence. Upon which ensued a profound silence, every one present being concerned for the young men as for their own children. But Brutus with a steady voice, not interrupted by a single sigh, turning to the lictors, who were the executioners, To you, lictors, said he, I deliver them, execute the law upon them. At these words a loud shriek was heard in the assembly, distress shewed itself in every face, and the mournful looks of the people pleaded for pity. But the consul shewing no regard to their tears, the whole assembly cried out, with one voice, We give them back to their country, and to their family. But neither these intercessions, nor the bitter lamentations of the young men, who called upon their father with the most endearing names, could soften the inflexible judge. He would not even abate of the punishment which was in such cases inflicted on the greatest criminals. The lictors seized
- f them, and having stripped them naked, and tied their hands behind them, they first beat them with rods, and then struck off their heads, Brutus all the time gazing on the cruel spectacle with a steady look, and an unaltered countenance. When this execution was over, Brutus came down from the tribunal, quitted the comitia, and left the rest of the criminals to the discretion of his colleague. Collatinus, inclined to spare his nephews, allowed them one day to clear themselves, and even ordered that Vindicius should be taken out of the hands of the accusers, and delivered up to his masters. This roused the zeal of Valerius, who had promised to protect the evidence. The lictors attempted in vain to force the important witnesses from him, and the people called for Brutus, insisting upon his coming back to the comitia. The unfortunate father had had but a few minutes to recollect himself, and secretly bewail the misfortunes of his family. However, he appeared again with the same firmness of mind he had shewn before, and ascending the tribunal, told the multitude that what he had done was by virtue of his paternal authority over his children; but that for the rest of the delinquents, it belonged to them to determine their fate, and either condemn his severity by instances of lenity, or approve his firmness by examples of justice.

But they are

THUS three articles of great importance to the rising commonwealth were left to the decision of the curiæ, viz. 1. What punishment should be inflicted on the rest of the conspirators; 2. What punishment the ambassadors of the Tarquinienses had deserved; 3. What reward should be given to the discoverer of the conspiracy. As to the first, they determined, that the conspirators should, without exception, suffer as rebels; which decree was accordingly executed. As to the second, the ambassadors were spared out of respect to the law of nations. In the third place, it was decreed, that Vindicius should enjoy that liberty which he had secured to the Romans (U), and besides, that he should be rewarded with all the privileges of a Roman citizen, and with twenty-five thousand asses of brass, to be paid him out of the public treasury. And now, though the people had formerly decreed, that the estates of the Tarquins should be restored to them, the senate refused to the declared enemies of Rome those means which they designed to make use of for its destruction; so that their palace, with its beautiful portico, was destroyed, and their lands distributed among those indigent citizens, who had none of their own. The public kept only a piece of ground, lying between the city and the Tiber, and bordering on the campus Martius, which the king had, by an incroachment on the city, added to his demesnes, and cultivated for his own profit. This piece of ground was consecrated to Mars, and became afterwards a common field, where the Roman youth exercised themselves in running and wrestling. After the field was consecrated, the Romans scrupled making any advantage of the corn, which they found ready reaped to their hands, and therefore threw it together with the trees which encompassed the field, into the Tiber. The water being at that time very low, the trees and sheaves of corn, stopping in a muddy place, began to form that island, which from the many temples built on it was afterwards called the holy island (W).

IN the mean time the weakness which Collatinus had betrayed at the trial of the conspirators, had turned the suspicions, which the people entertained of him, into

(U) It is commonly believed, that the Latin phrase, vindicare in libertatem, that is, to set free, had its rise from the name of Vindicius. Some indeed derive it from the word vindicta, which signifies a wand, with which the prætor used to strike the slave, whose master had a mind to let him at liberty. But in all likelihood the vindicta, or wand itself, took its name from Vindicius. The ceremony of granting freedoms publicly was thus performed: the slave was brought before the consul, and in after-ages before the prætor, by his master, who laying his hand upon his slave's head, said to the prætor, hunc hominem liberum esse volo, and with that took him by the hand, and immediately let go his hold; whence came the Latin word manumissio, and the phrase è manu emittere. Then he gave him a blow on the cheek, and presented him to the consul or prætor, who, striking him gently with his vindicta or wand, pronounced these words, nunc te liberum esse prope Quiritium. Hence Persius,

Vindicta postquam meus à prætoris recessi.

This ceremony being ended, the slave was registered upon the roll of freed-men. Then he was shaved, and received a cap in token of his liberty. But this ceremony of taking the cap was performed in the temple of Feronia, the goddess of freed-men. In this temple there was a seat of stone with this inscription, Benemeriti servus fedaant, surgant liberi. The pileus or cap was among the Romans, as is well known, a symbol of liberty. Another way of conferring freedom was by testament. A slave was said to be free by testament, when his master, in consideration of his faithful service, had left him free by his last will. This kind of liberti or freed-men were styled Orcini, because their masters were gone to Orcus, or the infernal regions. In allusion to this custom, those senators were merrily distinguished by the name of Senatores Orcini, who, upon the death of Julius Cæsar, thrust themselves into the senate without any just claim to the senatorial dignity (81). From these two manners of conferring freedom came the Latin expressions, liber manumissione, liber testamento.

(W) The Romans built several temples on the island, particularly three frequently spoke of by the ancients, viz. one dedicated to Faunus, another to Jupiter, and the third to Æsculapius, which was a very magnificent structure. From these temples it was called the holy island. It was joined to the city, and to the Janiculum by two bridges, whence it took the name of the island of the two bridges.

- a hatred. Brutus observing this, took advantage of the disposition of the multitude to get him deposed. In a numerous assembly of the people he made a speech, in which he bitterly inveighed against him, as if he had attempted the destruction of that liberty, which his honour obliged him to defend. He ended his harangue with these words; His soliciting you to restore to the enemies of Rome their estates, and to grant impunity to cruel conspirators, have unmasked a partisan of the Tarquins concealed under the appearance of a consul. Let us prevent, O Romans, the evils, which a domestic enemy is preparing for us. Let us deprive him of that authority which he abuses, and wrest that sword out of his hand, with which he threatens us. In my judgment he ought to be deposed. I therefore order you to assemble by curiæ, to determine by your suffrages, whether Collatinus or Brutus is to be your consul, you cannot have both; for I from this moment renounce the consulship, if Collatinus is to share the government with me. These words made so deep an impression on the minds of the multitude, that they would not hear Collatinus, when he began to speak in his own defence. His only resource was to forbid the people, by virtue of his authority as consul, to hold the assembly, which his colleague had appointed; but this prohibition was a new provocation, which raised the indignation of the people to such a height, that they cried out to have their votes instantly taken, and were going to depose Collatinus with ignominy, and banish him by a public decree. But Spurius Lucretius, his father-in-law, having obtained leave of the consuls to speak to the assembly, advised Collatinus voluntarily to resign into the hands of the people that authority, which he had received from them. Then he exhorted Brutus not to insist on the disgraceful banishment of a colleague, who, jointly with him, had been one of the principal authors of the common liberty, adding, that if Collatinus should, of his own accord, divest himself of the consulship, it would be but reasonable, that the Romans should mitigate the uneasiness of his voluntary retirement by their liberality, so as to enable him to support the dignity of a Roman consul in his retirement. This advice was received with universal applause. Collatinus resigned the consulship; and Brutus, after having commended his wisdom, to shew that he had no personal enmity to him, procured him a present of twenty talents out of the public treasury, to which he added five talents of his own. Collatinus retired to Lavinium, where he led a quiet life, and died in a very advanced age * (X).

Collatinus forced to abdicate the consulship.

Brutus, that the people might have no room to suspect that he intended to govern singly, immediately assembled the people by centuries in the campus martius, for the election of a new consul, when Publius Valerius was chosen, a man remarkable for his eloquence, for the talent of reconciling differences, an excessive abstemiousness, severity to himself, and compassion for the miseries of other men (Y). As the two

(X) Dionysius of Halicarnassus differs in his account of this whole matter from Plutarch, whom we have followed, thinking his relation of these transactions more agreeable to the temper of Brutus. The former writer tells us, that Brutus, immediately after the execution of his children, caused the Aquilii to be brought before him, and gave them leave to make their defence; and that they, after their letters were read aloud, having recourse to tears and entreaties, only owned the crimes that were laid to their charge. Whereupon the inflexible Brutus ordered the lictors to seize them, and execute the law upon them. Collatinus suspended the execution, and made the warmest remonstrances in favour of the conspirators; but being piqued at the obstinacy of Brutus, he had recourse to his authority, and pardoned the criminals. This so exasperated Brutus, that he committed the Aquilii to prison, in spite of the opposition of his colleague, and accused him before the people of treason and perfidiousness. Collatinus finding the people obstinately bent against him, and those whose defence he had undertaken, thought he could no longer exercise the office of consul with dignity, and therefore abdicated. Brutus, upon his abdication, put all those to death, who had been any ways concerned in the conspiracy. Livy says, that Collatinus was obliged to lay down the consulship, for no other reason, but because he had the misfortune to be descended from the Tarquins. The same author places the conspiracy of the Vucllii and Aquilii in the consulship of Brutus and Valerius, after Collatinus was deposed; but therein he is contradicted both by Plutarch and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who place the circumstances of the conspiracy in the order we have related them.

(Y) Valerius was originally a Sabine, and still preserved that austerity of manners, which was professed in the country of his ancestors. The first of his family who settled at Rome, was Valerius Volesus, or, as Festus and the Festii Capitolini call him, Velusius. Plutarch gives him the honour of negotiating the peace between Romulus and Tatius. Valerius Volesus, the father of P. Valerius, left him a great estate, the best part of which he applied to the relief of the indigent in the time of the kings, when his liberality could not proceed from any hopes of preferment. He was a man of great eloquence, considering the rusticity of the Romans in those days; but is said never to have made use of the art of persuasion but to defend the oppressed, as he made no other use of his great wealth, but to relieve the miserable. However, he was not free from ambition, and had taken it very much amiss, that the people, in the former election, had preferred to him one of the blood of the Tarquins.

consuls were equally eminent for their love of virtue, and of the public good, there a was a perfect harmony between them. They began their administration by passing a law, which granted a general amnesty to all those who had followed the fortune of the Tarquins, provided they returned to the city within twenty days. This wise precaution deprived the banished king of a great number of friends and soldiers, and brought back to Rome many persons of eminent parts. However, Tarquin was not so discouraged by the desertion of the Romans, as to lose all hopes of recovering the kingdom, and getting by force what he could not carry by stratagem. He had recourse to the Veientes, the old enemies of Rome, and having engaged them and the Tarquinienſes to unite their forces in the support of his cause, he advanced towards Rome. The consuls, without delay, marched out to meet him. Brutus commanded the horse, and Valerius the foot, drawn up in a square battalion. When the two armies were in sight of one another, a motion was made on both sides to begin the onset. Brutus advanced with his cavalry, and Aruns, one of Tarquin's sons, at the same time came forward at the head of the enemy's horse. Aruns no sooner discovered Brutus, attended with lictors, but inflamed with rage, he cried out, There he is, the enemy of my family, the usurper of my father's throne. This said, he pushed on his horse, and Brutus flew to meet him. As the two champions were hurried on more by hatred and rage than the love of glory, passion left no room on either side for skill or precaution. They rushed on to the encounter with such fury, that they were both run through the body. Their horses, meeting each other with a violent shock, threw their dying riders; and the death of these generals was the prelude to the battle, which continued till night with dubious success, it not being known in either camp which side had gained the victory, or which had lost the greater number of men; but in the night the Hetrurians being terrified by a voice, which was heard out of the neighbouring wood of Arſia, declaring the Romans conquerors, without doubt a stratagem of Valerius, abandoned their camp in great confusion, disbanded, and returned into their own country. Hereupon Valerius remaining master of the field, plundered the enemy's camp; and having caused the slain to be numbered, found, that the Hetrurians had lost eleven thousand three hundred men, and the Romans but one man short of that number. For this victory Valerius triumphed on his return to the city, after a more magnificent manner than any before him. Soon after he buried his colleague Brutus with great pomp, and gave Rome the first example of those funeral orations, which were ever after made in commendation of great men. The women distinguished themselves on this occasion; for looking upon Brutus as the avenger of the honour of their sex, they mourned for him a whole year (Z). As Valerius deferred some time convening the centuries for the election of a new consul, the Romans, who carried their love of liberty to an excess, began to put a bad construction upon his delays; and their jealousy was in some measure countenanced by his building at that time a fine house on a steep part of the hill Palatinus, which commanded the forum. But Valerius, being informed of their uneasiness, caused the house to be levelled with the ground the very next night; and having called the people together as soon as it was day, he expostulated with them about their groundless suspicions, bid them go see the ruins of that building which had given them umbrage, and told them, that he designed to fix his habitation in the valley, that they might, from the top of the hill, crush him with stones, if he was still the object of their jealousy. When he had ended his speech, he ordered the comitia to assemble for the election of a new consul. On this occasion Rome gave a fresh proof of her gratitude to the first authors of her liberty; for Sp. Lucretius, the father of Lucretia, was unanimously chosen to succeed Brutus. He was the only person who remained unrewarded of the four patricians, who had bound themselves by oath to deliver

(Z.) Brutus is deservedly counted by all the ancients among the most illustrious heroes we find mentioned in history. He restored liberty to his country, secured it with the blood of his own sons, and died in defending it against an usurper. The Romans looked upon him as a second founder of their city, and owned, that he had undergone more hardships and dangers in establishing the commonwealth, than Romulus had done in founding the kingdom.

The Romans afterwards erected his statue in the capitol, where he was placed in the midst of the kings of Rome, with a naked sword in his hand. It plainly appears that he left no issue; and yet Tully mentions Lucius Brutus, one of the chief conspirators against Caesar, as lineally descended from the first consul; but herein he is contradicted by most of the ancients, who tell us, that Junius Brutus left no children behind him.

- a their country from slavery. He was therefore pitched upon for the consular dignity; but the new consul died a few days after his election; so that Valerius was once more sole governor. And now the many proofs which he gave the people of his zeal for their interest, gained him the name of Poplicola, or Popular, which he ever after retained. He began his administration by ordering the axes, which were so apt to strike terror, to be taken out of the fasces, which he obliged the lictors to lower in the assemblies of the people. He made several laws in favour of the people, which greatly retrenched the consular power. By one he allowed an appeal from the consuls to the people. By another he exempted artificers, widows, and old men, who had no children to relieve them, from paying tribute. A third law prescribed an absolute submission to the orders of the consuls; but limited the fine laid upon those who disobeyed them, to the value of five oxen and two rams. He also published a fourth, making it lawful to kill, without waiting for a legal condemnation, any person who should aspire to the sovereign power. Impunity was promised to the murderer, provided he could prove the ill designs of the person he had killed. The last law he enacted was with relation to the public money, which he ordered to be removed from his own house to the temple of Saturn, where it was committed to the care of two senators of probity, chosen by the people, and afterwards called questors (A) ².

Valerius gets the name of Poplicola or Popular.

His laws in favour of the people.

(A) According to Plutarch, there were no questors in Rome till Poplicola's time; and this office was originally annexed to that of the consuls, or rather a branch of it. But Ulpian, on the contrary, pretends, and quotes several authors to support his opinion, that there were questors even in Tullus Hostilius's reign. To reconcile these two opinions, it is to be observed, that the name of questors among the Romans had two different significations; sometimes it signified commissioners, by whom capital crimes were cognizable, and sometimes magistrates, who were put in commission for managing the public money. Ulpian might speak of the former sort of questors, as being in the time of the kings; and Plutarch of the other, which was introduced by Poplicola in the time of the commonwealth. The office of the questors was to take care of the public treasure, for which they were accountable when their year was out; for their office lasted no longer; to furnish the necessary sums for the service of the public; and to receive ambassadors, attend them, and provide them with lodgings and other necessities. When the army returned from any war, the military ensigns were put into their hands, to be deposited by them in the temple of Saturn. A general could not obtain the honours of a triumph, till he had given them a faithful account of the spoils taken from the enemy, and sworn to it. Tho' the questors had no jurisdiction, that is, could not cite any person to appear before them, or imprison a man; Neque vocationem, neque prehensionem habebant, neque ad pratorum in jus vocari poterant, says Aulus Gellius (82); yet the most illustrious patricians, and even those who had been consuls, did not think this office beneath them. We find in the ancient annals, that Titus Quinctius Capitolinus, and M. Valerius, were questors, after they had enjoyed the honour of the consulship three times. Cato the elder accepted the questorship after he had triumphed, and discharged the first and most honourable employments of the republic. There were at first two questors only, and those of the patrician order; but as their business increased, it was thought advisable to create two more, whose province was confined to the paying of the armies abroad, and the selling of the plunder and booty. When this regulation came to be passed into a law by the people, the tribunes insisted that it should not pass, but upon condition that two of the four questors should be plebeians. This the senate and consuls opposed at first, but were at length obliged to yield to the demands of the tribunes. These new questors were called questores consulares, militares, and peregrini. They attended the Roman armies, paid the troops, and sold the spoils and prisoners taken from the enemy. The other questors were called questores aerarii and urbani, because they were questors of the treasury, and resided at Rome. In the last consulship of Fabius Gurgus, that is, about the year of Rome 488, the great increase of the republic caused the number of the questors to be doubled. The four new ones were called provincial questors; and each of them had his province, where he resided, those parts of Italy, which were subject to Rome, being divided into four large provinces or districts. The provincial questors were afterwards multiplied, in proportion as the republic enlarged her conquests. The military questors, and the urbani, or those who resided in Rome, had neither curule chairs, nor lictors, nor apparitores, nor any other marks of distinction annexed to their office; nay, they were obliged to appear before the prætor, when summoned by the meanest of the citizens; but the provincial questors, to increase the state of the Roman people, were allowed to appear in their provinces with the pretoria, and guarded by lictors with their fasces. This is plain from several passages in Tully. In his third oration against Verres, The two Sicilian questors, says he, came before me with their fasces; and in his oration for Plancius, he acknowledges it as a favour, that Plancius, tho' then questor, came to receive him at Dyrrachium without his lictors, and the usual marks of his dignity. The office of the provincial questors was to take the same care of the revenues of the provinces, which the questores aerarii had of the revenues at Rome. They were particularly concerned in all cases relating to provisions; and no contract for corn could be made without them. The four provincial questorships were sought for by the most ambitious, before Rome had extended her conquests beyond Italy; but when she had brought the east and west under subjection, and great kingdoms were become so many provinces, the four Italian ones began to be despised. The proconsuls and proprætors, that is, the governors of those provinces and kingdoms, had each his questor to take care of the revenues; and then the questorships of the large and distant provinces were most greedily sought

Poplicola had no sooner enacted these laws, and made several other regulations very ^a advantageous for the people, but he assembled the comitia for the election of a new consul, which he had deferred, only because he apprehended, that a colleague might possibly oppose his design of diminishing the consular power. The choice fell upon Horatius Pulvillus; and a few months after his election, the first year of the consular power being expired, Poplicola was chosen again, and with him was joined T. Lucretius, the brother of the famous Lucretia. The new consuls revived the census and the lustrum, and on that occasion found one hundred and thirty thousand men in Rome, who were at, or past the age of puberty ^a.

In the mean time Poplicola's second consulship being expired, he was chosen a third time, and with him Horatius Pulvillus, who had before been consul for a few months. ^b During their consulship, Porfena, king of the Clusini, one of the twelve nations of Hebruria, being gained by the great promises of Tarquin, espoused his cause, and at the head of a prodigious, but somewhat confused multitude of Hebrurians, advanced to the banks of the Tiber. The first post he attacked was the fort of the Janiculum, which he made himself master of, obliging the Romans to retire over the bridge into the city. This first shock put them into confusion; but the consuls, encouraging their men, made them pass the river with the utmost expedition, and drew them up in order of battle beyond the bridge, to secure the pass. Hereupon Porfena advanced to engage them. The victory was long doubtful; but M. Valerius, Poplicola's brother, and T. Lucretius, who were at the head of the left wing, being both ^c wounded, and carried out of the field, a general terror seized the Roman army. Horatius Cocles, a brave Roman, having endeavoured in vain to rally the terrified legions, resolved rather to die than abandon his post; and being joined by Sp. Lartius, and T. Herminius, these three heroes placed themselves in the narrow pass, which led to the bridge, and there calling out to the Romans to break it down, valiantly opposed the enemy, till the demolition of the bridge was near completed. Then Horatius, having prevailed upon his companions to cross the river on a few planks which remained, sustained for some time alone the attack of the enemy. At length, being wounded in the thigh, upon a signal given him that the bridge was quite demolished, he leaped into the river, and gained the opposite bank, through a shower ^d of darts. Thus, by the wonderful bravery of one man, was the city and republic saved from impending ruin. The whole city was so sensible of this, that they all hastened to pay their acknowledgments to their deliverer. They crowned him at his arrival, carried him on their arms from the place where he landed into the city, and erected a statue of brass to him in the temple of Vulcan. The senate gave him as much land as one plough could inclose within a circular furrow in one day; and tho' there was a great scarcity in Rome, yet the inhabitants, to the number of three hundred thousand, assessed themselves to make him a present of as much provisions as each of them consumed in a day. However, as Horatius had but one eye, whence he was surnamed Cocles, and continued lame the remaining part of his life, these ^e defects prevented his ever being elected consul.

sought for by those, who were qualified to stand candidates for them. They were there out of the sight of the senate, and sometimes in rich governments, where they could raise more money, and were more honoured and respected; for this reason, when the quaestors drew lots in the presence of the Roman tribes for the quaestorships, the person, to whom any of the Italian ones fell, became the jest of the people. He goes to the waters, said the people, meaning, that he was going to live quietly near Rome, as those Romans did, who went to Bain or Puteoli for the waters. Some think, that this proverb alludes to the office of the Italian quaestors, who were often obliged to go to the sea-ports to collect the imposts the republic had laid on exported goods. The quaestors were first chosen by the people, and afterwards by the consuls, the quaestorship being originally a branch of their office. In Tully's time they were again chosen by the people in the comitia by tribes; of which more hereafter. The office of quaestor, tho' often discharged by persons who had been consuls, was the first step to great employments. None could stand for the quaestorship till they attained to a certain age; but to determine the exact age the laws required, is no easy matter. Some pretend, that none could undertake this office till they were twenty-seven, and quote Polybius in favour of their opinion; for that author writes (83), that the quaestorship was not to be obtained till after ten years service in the army; and the Romans usually entered into the army at the age of seventeen. Others think, that the age fixed by the law was twenty-four or twenty-five. In process of time, when honours were obtained by intrigues and favour, these laws were neglected; for Caesar and Pollio were quaestors, as Quintilian informs us (84), long before they were of the age the law required.

- a As Porfena was master of the country on both sides the river, it was very difficult to find provisions for so great a number of inhabitants. A famine therefore began to be felt, and many of the indigent populace, who, in such cases, are the first sufferers, went to seek bread in the enemy's camp; but the consuls kept up the courage of the best citizens, by assuring them, that a convoy of corn would soon arrive in the camp from Pometia: and their expectations were not disappointed; many boats loaded with corn safely entered the port of Rome in the night. But in a short time the city was again reduced to great straits; which Porfena having notice of, sent the Romans word, that he would deliver them from the hunger they suffered, if they would receive their old masters; but they, notwithstanding their present distress, returned this answer, That hunger was a less evil than slavery and oppression.

b IN the mean time the consuls formed a scheme for drawing the enemy into an ambuscade; and for that purpose spread at Rome a report, which was soon carried into the Hetrurian camp by the slaves who deserted, that the next day all the cattle brought thither from the country, would be sent to graze in the fields under a guard. This bait drew the enemy into an ambush, in which five thousand of them were cut in pieces; but, notwithstanding this, and some other small advantages, Rome was almost wearied out with so long a siege, when Mucius Cordus, a young Roman, of an c illustrious birth, formed a design, which raised the courage of the people. He prevailed upon the consuls to consent to it, and imparted it to the senators, lest his leaving Rome should be looked upon as a desertion; but all he told them was, that he intended to cross the Tiber, enter the enemy's camp, and there execute some great exploit. The consuls and senate having encouraged him to undertake any thing in the present deplorable state of Rome, he went out of the city with a poniard under his garment, and being dressed in an Hetrurian habit, entered the enemy's camp undiscovered, mixed with the Hetrurian soldiers, whose language he had learned from his infancy, and made his way quite to the king's tent. It happened to be the day on which the troops were all reviewed and paid, and Porfena's secretary, magnificently dressed, was sitting on the same tribunal with the king, giving audience, and receiving petitions. Mucius, mistaking him for the king, leaped upon the tribunal, and,

d with one stroke of his poniard, laid him dead at the king's feet. He then attempted to make his escape through the multitude that stood amazed at so bold and unexpected an attempt; but being seized and brought back to the tribunal, which he had just stained with blood, Thou execrable assassin, said the king, who art thou? whence comest thou? who are thy accomplices? To which words, Mucius, less terrified than his judge, made this reply; I am a Roman, and my name is Mucius Cordus. My design was to deliver Rome from her most cruel enemy; discharge therefore all thy fury upon me. Thou hast been an eye-witness of my courage, now try my constancy with tortures; and then thou wilt be forced to confess, that Roman bravery has made me capable both of attempting whatever man can do, and suffering what human nature can endure. This discourse filled

e Porfena with amazement; but he was still more surprized when he saw the Roman, with a steady countenance, and a look, which testified his inward rage at having missed his blow, thrust his right hand into a pan of burning coals, and there held it a great while without shewing any signs of pain. So surprising a sight changed the king's resentment into admiration. Porfena granted him his life and liberty, and even restored him the dagger, which he had made use of with a design to stab him. Mucius, who had now lost the use of his right hand, took it with his left; and thence had the surname of Scævola, that is, Left-handed b.

f Mucius was in his turn charmed with the generosity of his enemy; but had the presence of mind to invent a story for the service of his country. He pretended to discover to the king a plot, which, he said, was formed at Rome against his life by three hundred young Romans, all as resolute as himself, who were dispersed in the Hetrurian camp, and had bound themselves, by the most sacred oaths, to attempt his life, one after another, at the same hazard as he had done. Porfena, struck with terror at this pretended discovery, as soon as Mucius was retired, called a council to deliberate about the means of preserving himself from the dangers which threatened him. His friends and counsellors suggested various precautions; but none of them seeming sufficient to remove his uneasiness, his son Aruns, a great admirer of the Roman virtue, advised him to render all precautions needless, by abandoning the cause of a few exiles, and concluding a peace with the Romans. His advice made an impression on Porfena; and as the Hetrurians had already begun to complain of the length of the siege, he sent deputies to Rome, whose demands shewed, that their matter had much abated of his former pretensions; for they did not insist on the restoration of the Tarquins, but only on the restitution of their estates, or an equivalent. And in regard of their own nation, they required the Romans to re-instate the Veientes in the possession of seven villages, which they had taken from them in former wars. The ambassadors were received at Rome with joy; and their demands being heard in the senate, Poplicola prevailed upon the senators to comply with them; but the people would not consent to the first article, till Porfena had heard the strong reasons they had to offer against it; after which they were willing to leave it to his arbitration. As to the other article, they readily agreed to it, and offered hostages to secure the performance of it. A truce being agreed on, the Romans sent their deputies to Porfena's camp, to plead their cause against the Tarquins, and with them the hostages they had promised, ten young men, and as many virgins, of the most illustrious families in Rome. Among these were the son of Horatius the consul, Valeria the daughter of Poplicola, and the famous Clælia. The reception Porfena gave the Roman envoys, raised the jealousy of the Tarquins, who, still retaining their ancient pride, refused to admit Porfena for a judge between them and the Romans. But the king, without any regard to their opposition, resolved to satisfy himself, by an exact enquiry, whether the protection he had given the Tarquins was just? But while the cause was ready to be opened before the Roman deputies, news was brought, that the young women, whom the Romans had sent as hostages, had ventured to swim cross the Tiber, and were returned to Rome. They had gone to bathe in the river, and Clælia happening to turn her eyes towards her native city, that sight raised in her a desire of returning to it. She therefore ventured to swim cross the river; and having encouraged her companions to follow her, they all got safe to the opposite shore, and returned to their fathers houses (B). The return of the hostages gave the consul Poplicola great uneasiness; he was afraid lest this rash action might be imputed to want of fidelity in the Romans. To remove therefore all suspicions, he sent a deputation to the Hetrurian camp, assuring the king, that Rome had no share in the foolish attempt of the young women, and promising to send them immediately back to the camp from whence they had fled. Porfena was easily appeased; but the news of the speedy return of the hostages being known in the camp, the Tarquins, without any regard to the truce, or respect to the king their protector, lay in ambush on the road to surprize them. Poplicola having put himself at the head of the Roman troops who escorted them, sustained the attack of the Tarquins, tho' sudden and unexpected, till his daughter Valeria rode full speed to the Hetrurian camp, and gave notice of the danger her father and companions were in; and then Aruns, the king's son, flying with a great body of cavalry to their relief, put the aggressors to the rout. This notorious piece of treachery in the Tarquins, gave Porfena strong suspicions of the badness of their cause. He therefore assembled the chief commanders of the Hetrurians, and having heard in their presence the complaints of the Romans, and the justification of their proceedings against the Tarquins, he was so struck with horror at the recital of the crimes the Tarquins were charged with, that he immediately ordered them to leave his camp, declaring, that he renounced his alliance with them, and would no longer continue the hospitality he had shewn them. He then commanded the ten young virgins to be brought before him, and inquired, who was the first author, and chief manager of the enterprize? They all kept silence, till Clælia herself, with an air of intrepidity, confessed, that she alone was guilty, and that she had encouraged the others by her advice. Upon this, the king, extolling her resolution above the bravery of Horatius, and the intrepidity of Mucius, made her a present of a fine horse, with sumptuous furniture. After this he concluded a peace with the fena, as we have said, presented her with a fine horse; which might give rise to this fable. An equestrian statue was erected to her memory in the via sacra, which, according to Plutarch, was to be seen in his time (85). Dionysius of Halicarnassus says it was consumed by fire.

Romans,

- a Romans, and restored to them all their hostages, declaring, that their bare word was to him sufficient security for the performance of the articles ^c.

AND now Porfena being to return to Clusium, gave, before his departure, a further testimony of his respect and friendship for the Romans. He knew that Rome was greatly distressed for want of provisions; but being afraid to offend the inhabitants by relieving them in a direct manner, he ordered his soldiers to leave behind them their tents and provisions, and to carry nothing with them but their arms. As his camp abounded with all sorts of provisions, Rome was hereby much relieved in her wants. The moveables and corn of the Hetrurians were sold by auction to private persons; and on this occasion the Romans took up the custom of making a proclamation by a herald, whenever any effects belonging to the public were to be sold, in the following words, These are Porfena's goods. The design of this was to preserve the memory of that prince's kindness. The senate, not satisfied with this, erected a statue of the king near the comitium, and sent an embassy to him with a present of a throne adorned with ivory, a sceptre, a crown of gold, and a triumphal robe ^d.

- b AFTER the departure of Porfena, the Romans first rewarded those, who had distinguished themselves during the siege, especially Mucius Scævola, to whom they gave a large piece of ground belonging to the public. Their next care was to shew their gratitude to the gods, by some public act of religion; and as the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus had not yet been consecrated, the senate ordered the consecration of it. It naturally belonged to one of the consuls to perform the ceremony; but it was the right of the senate to appoint which of the consuls they pleased. The patricians had been long jealous of the glory, which Poplicola had acquired in his three consulships; and therefore, in order to rob him of this mark of distinction, ordered him to march out against some Latin troops, that committed ravages in the Roman territory, and, in his absence, appointed his colleague Horatius Pulvillus to perform the ceremony. As he was beginning the consecration, Poplicola's brother, Marcus, cried out, I give you notice, that your son has lost his life in a battle. This was false; but he hoped by these words to interrupt the ceremony. But Horatius, without shewing the least concern, coldly replied, Then let him be buried, and finished the consecration. Thus Poplicola ended the glorious year of his third consulship with receiving a mortification, which could not but sensibly affect him. Spurius Lartius and T. Herminius, who had so valiantly defended the bridge, were chosen consuls for the next year; which proved a year of peace.

- c IN the consulship of M. Valerius, brother to Poplicola, and P. Posthumius, who succeeded the above-mentioned consuls, the Sabines invading the Roman territories, committed great devastations. Whereupon the two consuls took the field; and having divided their forces into two bodies, Posthumius with one of them encamped at a small distance from Rome, to prevent a surprize from the Tarquins; while Valerius posted himself at Tibur upon the Anio. As the Sabines were encamped on the opposite bank, Valerius, by the advice of his brother Poplicola, crossing the river, offered them battle; which they not declining, a bloody engagement ensued, wherein Valerius gained some advantage with his right; but his left being almost pushed into the river, he was very near losing the day, when his colleague, who had notice of the action, coming seasonably to his relief, attacked the enemy in flank, and put them to flight. The Sabine troops would have been intirely cut off, if night coming on, had not given them an opportunity to escape. For this victory the consuls were decreed a triumph, and they both entered Rome in the same chariot. Valerius is said to have gained the same year a second victory over the Sabines, and to have killed thirteen thousand of them, without the loss of one Roman. The republic therefore, to reward him according to his merit, built him a house, and, to distinguish it from all others, ordered the door to be so hung, as to open outwards to the street; whereas the doors of all other houses opened inwards. As for Posthumius, he was allowed to have a burial-place for himself and his family within the walls of Rome; a privilege never before granted to any ^e.

- f THE next year, when Poplicola was consul the fourth time, the Sabines renewed the war. Aelius Clausus, the most eminent man in Sabinia, for riches, valour and eloquence, first retarded their preparations, by speaking in all their diets against a war with Rome, and then came over to the Romans, with five thousand families of his friends and dependents. On his arrival at Rome, he changed his name to Appius Claudius, was immediately declared a patrician, and took his place in the senate. Twenty-five acres of land were given him in fee, and a quarter in the city assigned for his friends and followers, to each of which were granted two acres of ground, with all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens. These donations were made irrevocable by a decree of the senate, confirmed by the suffrages of the people. The family of the Claudii became afterwards one of the most illustrious families of Rome. The Sabines, enraged at the departure of Clausus, took the field with a very considerable army; and it was very lucky for Rome that they determined to come to a battle before the year of Poplicola's consulship was out. The Sabine army was divided into two bodies, one of which encamped in the open field near Fidenæ; the other kept within the walls of that city, to guard it, and secure a retreat to the other body, in case they were defeated. On the other hand, the consuls having likewise divided their army into two bodies, marched out against the enemy. Poplicola took his post over-against the Sabines, while Lucretius, the other consul, encamped on an eminence within reach of his colleague. The Romans were eager to engage immediately, and end the dispute at once by a decisive battle; but the Sabines, not daring to venture an engagement in the day-time, resolved to make a sudden attack on the enemy's camp in the dead of the night. With this view they prepared great quantities of fascines to fill up the ditch, and scaling ladders to mount the ramparts. That body of Sabines, which guarded Fidenæ, was ordered to march out of the town on the first signal, and fetching a large compass, to lie in ambush behind Lucretius's camp, in order to surprize it, when Lucretius should march to the assistance of his colleague, and then charge him in the rear. But the wise Poplicola, receiving timely intelligence of the enemy's designs, instantly dispatched his brother Marcus to the other camp, to acquaint Lucretius with the night-expedition resolved upon by the Sabines. Both consuls, having taken the necessary precautions, waited for the enemy, without suffering their troops to shew any marks of suspecting their intention. The Sabines marched silently out of their camp before mid-night, and drawing near the Roman entrenchments, filled up the ditch with fascines, and passed over to scale the rampart; but, as fast as they advanced to it, they were, without any noise, stabbed by the Romans, who were drawn up in the space between the ditch and the rampart. The slaughter continued till the moon rose, when the Sabines discovering the dead bodies of their companions, and the Roman troops, who had strewed the ground with them without being perceived, betook themselves to a confused flight. The Romans pursued them with loud shouts; which being heard by Lucretius, he, in his turn, went to attack the body that lay in ambush, and gained a complete victory over them. In this action thirteen thousand Sabines were killed on the spot, and four thousand two hundred taken prisoners^f. Poplicola taking advantage of the enemy's consternation, advanced with all his forces to Fidenæ; and having taken the place by assault, put to death the heads of the revolt; but spared the other inhabitants, obliging them only to surrender part of their lands for the support of the garrison he left in the city. Poplicola, on his return to Rome, was honoured with a triumph; but soon after died, and was buried at the expence of the public, there not being found money enough in his house to defray the charges of his funeral. He was the most virtuous citizen, the greatest general, and the best affected consul to the people Rome had ever had. He had always led a frugal life, and taken more care to transmit his virtues to his children, than to enrich them with the goods of fortune. The Romans thought they could not refuse him a burial-place in the city, and therefore erected a tomb for him near the forum, and gave his family a right of interment in the same place. But as the Valerii always affected popularity, they never made use of this privilege, but contented themselves with carrying the bodies of those who died in Rome, to the sepulchre of the founder of their family, and conveying them from thence out of the city, where the ashes were deposited in a tomb near the walls. As Poplicola had been one of those, who stood up in defence of the chastity of the Roman women, they mourned a whole year for him, as they had done before for Brutus. But his greatest glory was comprised under the name of Poplicola (C), which the Romans gave him, and his tender regard for the people had deserved^g.

(C) In some editions of the Latin historians we read Publicola instead of Poplicola; but the Fassi Capitoli, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Plutarch, and Dio, call him constantly Poplicola, which is an abbreviation of Populicola, a word denoting his regard for the people.

- a THE Sabines were no sooner informed of Poplicola's death, but they raised a more numerous army than they had done the preceding years; and having made a sudden incursion into the Roman territory, advanced to the very gates of Rome. P. Posthumius, one of the consuls, being provoked at the insolence of the Sabines, sallied out against them with a good body of men, drawn together in a tumultuous manner. The Sabines, as soon as he appeared, fled to a neighbouring forest, where the main body of their army lay concealed. Posthumius followed them; but, as he drew near the forest, the Sabines rallying, faced about, and, with loud shouts, gave the signal to the whole army to fall upon the consul's troops. Posthumius made what resistance he could with men out of breath, and in disorder; but was obliged to retire with great loss. To complete his misfortune, he was intercepted in his retreat by a body of Sabines posted on a hill between him and the city; so that he was forced to pass the night in the open field, surrounded on all sides by the enemy's squadrons. As soon as the defeat of Posthumius was known at Rome, Menenius Agrippa, the other consul, marched at the head of the bravest youth in the city, to the relief of his colleague. But the Sabines, at his approach, retired into their own country, whence, elated with their late success, they sent a proud message to the Romans, requiring them to receive the king they had banished; to submit to the Sabines, by whom they had been conquered, and to receive their laws. To this demand the Romans returned a suitable answer, commanding the Sabines to return to their former duty, and to come in a suppliant manner to beg pardon for their attempts against the authority of their masters. After these mutual bravadoes, the consuls on one side, and the Sabines on the other, took the field again with all the forces of their respective states. Both armies encamped near Eretum, about ten miles from Rome, where they soon came to a general engagement, in which Posthumius, desirous to redeem his credit, behaved with extraordinary valour, and, together with his colleague, obtained a complete victory. No sooner did the news of this glorious day reach the senate, but they decreed a full triumph for Menenius, and an inferior one, which they called ovation (D), for Posthumius, whose gallant behaviour, in the late action, had not, in the opinion of the fathers, sufficiently atoned for his miscarriage in the beginning of the war.
- d THE Sabine war continued under the new consuls Sp. Cassius Uscellinus and Opiter Virginus Tricostus. The former, entering the enemy's country, defeated them in a pitched battle near Cures, ten thousand three hundred of them being killed, and four thousand taken prisoners. This defeat obliged them to sue for peace, which, after many submissions, they purchased with corn, money, and ten thousand acres of arable land. While Cassius was thus employed against the Sabines, his colleague Virginus reduced Cameria, a city in the neighbourhood of Alba, which had revolted from the Romans; and having beheaded the most guilty of the inhabitants, sold the rest for slaves, and razed the city ^b.
- e Tarquin, still restless, and not despairing to recover his kingdom, by means of his son-in-law Mamilius Octavius, prevailed upon the Latins, who had hitherto stood neuter, to espouse his cause. During the alarm which this resolution occasioned at Rome, the Tarquins, in concert with some of the inhabitants of Fidenæ, made themselves masters of that city. Hereupon the consul Manius, marching against the rebels, closely invested the place, and reduced it to great straits. The besieged, in that extremity, implored the assistance of the Latins; which occasioned a general meeting of the deputies from the several cities of Latium. In this assembly it was attended by the senate only: his crown was of myrtle, not of laurel; and his robe only the prætecta, the common habit of magistrates. The ovation of Posthumius, the first that had ever been seen in Rome, is marked in the Fasti Capitolini on the third of the nones of April. Two days after, Menenius Agrippa appeared with all the magnificence of a triumph; being mounted on a chariot, seated in a curule chair, clothed with a robe embroidered with palm branches, he was conducted to the capitol with the sound of trumpets, and the acclamations of the army and people.

(D) Authors differ in their opinions as to the derivation of this word; some derive it from obè, denoting the adoration of the people in these ceremonies; others from the words exan or evoe, with which the Greek bacchanals rung. Plutarch refers the origin of this word to the kind of victim, which was offered to the gods in the ceremony of the ovation (86); for in the triumph a bull was sacrificed in the capitol, but in the ovation only a sheep; so that, according to this writer, ovatio comes from the word ovis, signifying a sheep. The person, who was honoured with an ovation, entered Rome on foot, or, at most, on horse-back, and was

debated, whether the Latins should declare in favour of the Tarquins and the Fidenates, or adhere to the ancient treaties between the two nations. After long debates, it was resolved, that an embassy should be sent to the Romans with proposals, which were ; That they should receive the Tarquins, after they had engaged by oath to grant a general amnesty ; and that they should raise the siege of Fidenæ. The ambassadors were to allow the Romans a whole year to consider on these overtures, and to threaten them with a war, in case they refused to comply with them. The chief view of Tarquin and his partizans in promoting this embassy, was to lay hold of that opportunity to raise a sedition in the city. To the ambassadors therefore of the Latins he joined some of his own emissaries, who, on their arrival in the city, found two sorts of people disposed to enter into their measures, viz. the slaves, and the meaner citizens. The slaves had formed a conspiracy the year before to seize the capitol, and set fire to the city in several quarters at the same time. But the plot being discovered, those, who were concerned in it, had been all crucified ; and this execution had highly provoked the whole body of slaves. As to the meaner citizens, who were for the most part overwhelmed with debt, and cruelly used by their creditors, they were well apprised, that there could happen no change in the government but to their advantage. These were the conspirators pitched upon ; and to them were given the following parts to act : the citizens were to make themselves masters of the ramparts and gates of the city at an appointed hour of the night, and then to raise a great shout as a signal to the slaves, who had engaged to massacre their masters at the same instant. The gates of the city were then to be opened to the Tarquins, who were to enter Rome while it was yet reeking with the blood of the senators. The conspiracy was ripe for execution, when Tarquin's principal agents, Publius and Marcus, both of his own name and family, being terrified with frightful dreams, had not courage enough to proceed in their design, till they had consulted a diviner. However, they did not discover to him the conspiracy ; but only asked him in general terms, What success they might expect in a project they had formed ? The soothsayer, without the least hesitation, returned the following answer, Your project will end in your ruin ; disburden yourselves of so heavy a load. Hereupon the Tarquins, fearing left some of the other conspirators should be before-hand with them in informing, went immediately to S. Sulpicius, the only consul then at Rome, and discovered the whole matter to him. The consul greatly commended them, and detained them in his house, till, by private inquiries, he was assured of the truth of their depositions. Then he assembled the senate, and gave the Latin ambassadors their audience of leave, with an answer to their proposals ; which was, that the Romans would neither receive the Tarquins, nor raise the siege of Fidenæ, being all to a man ready to sacrifice their lives in defence of their liberty, and willing to undergo any dangers, rather than submit to the government of a tyrant. The ambassadors being dismissed with this answer, and conducted out of the city, Sulpicius laid open to the fathers the dreadful conspiracy, which struck them with horror ; but they were all at a loss in what manner they should apprehend and punish the guilty, since, by the law of Poplicola, there was an appeal to the people in all capital cases, and the two witnesses, who were strangers, might be excepted against by Roman citizens. In this perplexity they left the whole conduct of this critical affair to Sulpitius, who took a method, which, he thought, would equally serve to prove the guilt, and punish the guilty. He engaged the two informers to assemble the conspirators, and to appoint a rendezvous at mid-night in the forum, as if they designed to take the last measures for the execution of the enterprise. In the mean time he took all proper measures to secure the city, and ordered the Roman knights to hold themselves ready, in the houses adjoining to the forum, to execute the orders they should receive. The conspirators met at the time and place appointed by the two Tarquins ; and the knights, upon a signal agreed on before-hand, invested the forum, and blocked up all the avenues to it so closely, that it was impossible for any of the conspirators to make their escape. As soon as it was light, the two consuls appeared with a strong guard on the tribunal ; for Sulpicius had sent to his colleague Manius, who was besieging Fidenæ, desiring him to hasten to the city with a chosen body of troops. The people were convened by curiæ, and acquainted with the conspiracy, which had been formed against the common liberty. The accused were allowed to make their defence, if they had any thing to offer against the evidence ; but not one of them denying the fact, the consuls repaired to the senate, where sentence of death was pronounced against the conspirators,

- a spirators, in case the people approved it. This decree of the senate being read to, and approved by the assembly, the people were ordered to retire, and the conspirators were delivered up to the soldiers, who put them all to the sword. The peace of Rome was thought sufficiently secured by this stroke of severity; and therefore, tho' all the conspirators were not punished with death, it was judged proper not to make any further inquiries. The two informers were rewarded with all the privileges of Roman citizens, a hundred thousand asses, and twenty acres of land. Three festival days were appointed for expiations, sacrifices, and public games, by way of thanksgiving to the gods. But the general joy was disturbed by a melancholy accident: as the people were conducting Tullius Manius the consul from the circus to his house, he fell from his chariot, and died three days after¹.

- b THE city of Fidenæ was not yet reduced; it held out during the following consulship of T. Æbutius and P. Velurius; but was taken the next year by T. Lartius, who, together with Q. Clælius, was raised to the consular dignity. The Latins, enraged at the loss of this town, began to complain of their leading men; which opportunity Tarquin and Mamilius improved so far, as to make all the Latin cities, twenty-four in number, enter into an alliance against Rome, and to bind themselves by oath never to violate their engagements. The Latins made vast preparations, as did likewise the Romans; but the latter could procure no assistance from their neighbours. As the Latin nation was much superior to them in strength, they sent deputies to solicit succours from the several states with which they were surrounded; but their negotiations proved every-where unsuccessful: and, what was worse than all, the republic had rebellious sons in her own bosom, who refused to lend their aid in defence of their country. The poorer sort of people, and the debtors, refused to take the military oaths, or to serve, alledging their poverty, and the fruitless hazards they ran in fighting for the defence of a city, where they were oppressed and enslaved by their creditors. This spirit of mutiny spread among the inferior classes, most of them refusing to lift themselves, unless their debts were all remitted by a decree of the senate; nay, they began to talk of leaving the city, and settling elsewhere. The senate, apprehending a general insurrection, assembled to deliberate on the means of quieting these domestic troubles. Some were for a free remission of all debts, as the safest expedient at that juncture; others urged the dangerous consequences of such a condescension, advising them to lift such only as were willing to serve, not doubting but those, who refused their assistance, would offer it of their own accord, when it was no longer desired. Several other expedients were offered; but at length this prevailed, viz. that all actions for debts should be suspended till the conclusion of the war with the Latins. But this the indigent debtors thought only a suspension of their misery; and therefore it had not the intended effect on the minds of the unruly multitude. The senate might indeed have prosecuted the ringleaders of the sedition; but the law of Poplicola, called the Valerian law, which allowed appeals to the assembly of the people, was a protection for the seditious, who were sure of being acquitted by the accomplices of their rebellion. The senate therefore, to elude the effect of a privilege that put such a restraint upon their power, resolved to create one supreme magistrate, who, with the title of dictator, should have an absolute power for a time; but as this could not be done without striking at the law of Poplicola, and transferring the power of the people in criminal cases to a magistrate superior to all laws, it was necessary to use artifice, in order to obtain the consent of the curiæ. They therefore represented to them in a public assembly, that, in so difficult a conjuncture, when they had their domestic quarrels to decide, and at the same time a powerful enemy to repulse, it would be expedient to put the commonwealth under a single governor, who, superior to the consuls themselves, should be the arbiter of the laws, and, as it were, the father of his country; that his power should have no limits; but however, lest he should abuse it, they ought not to trust him with it above six months. The people, not foreseeing the consequences of this change, agreed to it; but the greatest difficulty was to find a man duly qualified in all respects for so great a trust. T. Lartius, one of the consuls, seemed to be of all men the most unexceptionable; but the senate, fearing to offend his colleague by an invidious preference, gave the consuls the power of chusing a dictator, and obliged them to name one of themselves, not doubting but Clælius would yield to the superior talents of his colleague; nor were they disappointed in their expectation. But Lartius, with the same readiness, named Clatius; and the only contest was, which of the two should raise the other to the supreme authority. Each persisted obstinately in remitting the dignity to his colleague, till Clatius, starting up on a sudden, abdicated the consulship, and, after the manner of an inter-rex, proclaimed Titus Lartius dictator (E), who thereupon was obliged to take upon him the government of the republic ^k.

Lartius indeed took as much state upon him, after he had entered upon his office, as he had shewn modesty in refusing it. He began by creating, without the participation either of the senate or people, a general of the Roman horse (F), an office which lasted only during the dictatorship, and which all subsequent dictators revived ^b immediately after their election. Sp. Cassius, formerly consul, and honoured with a triumph, was the person he advanced to this second station in the republic. Lartius, having by this means secured the Roman knights, resolved, in the next place, to make the people respect and fear him. With this view he never appeared in public, but attended by twenty-four lictors, to whose fasces he added again the axes, which Poplicola had caused to be taken from them. The novelty of this sight was alone sufficient to awe the seditious, and, without executions, to spread consternation throughout Rome. The murmurs of the inferior classes being by this means silenced, the dictator commanded a census to be taken, according to the institution of king Servius. Every one, without exception, brought in his name, age, the particulars of his estate, &c. and there appeared to be in Rome one hundred and fifty thousand seven hundred men, who were past the age of puberty. Out of these the dictator formed four armies; the first he commanded himself; the second he gave to Clatius his late colleague; the third to Sp. Cassius his general of the horse; and the fourth he left in Rome, under the command of his brother Sp. Lartius, who was to guard the city. The Latins not being so forward in their preparations as was expected, all their hostilities against Rome this campaign amounted to no more than the sending a detachment into the Roman territory to lay it waste. The dictator gained some advantage over that party; and the great humanity with which he treated the prisoners and wounded, disposed the Latins to listen the more readily to the overtures, which he at the same time made them for a suspension of hostilities. At length a truce was agreed on for a year; and then Lartius, seeing the republic restored to its former tranquillity, resigned the dictatorship, tho' the time appointed for its duration was not yet expired ^l.

(E) This supreme officer was called dictator, either because he was dictus, that is, named by the consul, or from his dictating and commanding what should be done. No one could be created dictator till he had been consul. The time assigned for the duration of the office was the space of six months. As to the perpetual dictatorships of Sylla and Julius Caesar, they were notorious usurpations, and violations of the laws of their country. The dictator was not allowed to march out of Italy, lest he should take advantage of the distance of the place, to attempt something against the common liberty. He was always to march on foot, except in case of a tedious or sudden expedition, and then he formally asked leave of the people to ride (87). In all other things his power was absolute and uncontrouled. He might proclaim war, levy forces, lead them out, disband them, &c. without consulting the senate. He could punish as he pleased; and from his judgment lay no appeal. To make his authority more awful, he had always twenty-four fasces with axes carried before him, if we believe Plutarch (88), and Polybius (89). Livy ascribes the first rise of this custom to Sylla (89). The authority of all other magistrates ceased, or were subordinate to him. He had the naming of the general of the horse, who was wholly at his command. When his authority was expired, he was not obliged to give an account of any thing he had done during his administration. In short, the dictatorship was a kind of absolute monarchy, tho' not durable, and was looked upon as the only refuge of the commonwealth in time of danger, till Sylla and Caesar, converting it into a tyranny, rendered the name of dictator odious; in-somuch, that upon the murder of the latter, a decree passed in the senate, forbidding the use of that dignity upon any account whatsoever for the future (91).

(F) As the regal power was revived in the dictator, he was allowed to create a chief officer in the army, under the name of magister equitum, that is, master or general of the horse; which answered to the office of the tribunus celerum in the time of the kings. It was the second dignity in the Roman state, but, like the dictatorship, temporary. The magister equitum served as the dictator's lieutenant-general; but could act nothing without his express order.

- a making the necessary preparations for war. The nobility of Latium, who were for the most part in the interest of the Tarquins, having found means to exclude the citizens from the Latin diets, carried all before them in those assemblies; whereupon many of the citizens removed with their families to Rome, where they were well received. The Latins being bent upon war, the senate, notwithstanding the perfect harmony that reigned between them and the people, thought it expedient to create a dictator. The two consuls were therefore impowered to name one of themselves to that dignity; whereupon Virginus readily yielded it to his colleague Posthumus, as the more able commander. The new dictator, having created Æbutius Elva, formerly consul, his general of the horse, and divided his army into four bodies, left
- b one of them, under the command of Sempronius, to guard the city, and with the other three, commanded by himself, Virginus, and Æbutius, marched out against the Latins, who, with an army of forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, under the command of Sextus Tarquinius, Titus Tarquinius, and Mamilius, had already made themselves masters of Corbio, a strong-hold belonging to the republic, and put the garrison to the sword. Posthumus encamped in the night on a steep hill near the lake Regillus; and Virgilius on another hill over-against him. Æbutius was ordered to march silently in the night, with the cavalry and light-armed infantry, to take possession of a third hill upon the road, by which provisions must be brought to the Latins. Before Æbutius had fortified his new camp, he was vigorously attacked by Lucius Tarquinius, whom he repulsed three times with great loss, the dictator having sent him a timely reinforcement. After this, Æbutius intercepted two couriers sent by the Volsci to the Latin generals, and, by letters found upon them, discovered, that a considerable army of the Volsci and Hernici were to join the Latin forces in three days. Upon this intelligence, Posthumus drew his three bodies of troops together, which amounted in all to no more than twenty-four thousand foot, and one thousand horse, with a design to engage the enemy before the arrival of the succours they expected. Accordingly he encouraged his men, and, with his army in battle array, advanced to the place where the enemy was encamped. The Latins, who were much superior to the Romans in numbers, and besides began to want provisions, did not decline the
- d engagement. Titus Tarquinius, at the head of the Roman exiles and deserters, was in the centre, Mamilius in the right wing, and Sextus Tarquinius in the left. In the Roman army the dictator commanded in the centre, Æbutius in the left wing, and Virginus in the right. The first body that advanced was that of the dictator, and, as soon as it began to march, T. Tarquinius singling out the dictator, ran full speed against him. The dictator did not decline the encounter, but flying at his adversary, wounded him with a javelin in the right side. Upon this, the first line of the Latins advanced to cover their general; but he being carried out of the field, they made but a faint resistance when charged by the troops of the dictator. They were destitute of a leader, and therefore began to retire, when Sextus Tarquinius, taking the place of his brother, brought them back to the charge, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that the victory in the centre was still doubtful. On the side of Mamilius and Æbutius, both parties, encouraged by the example of their leaders, fought with incredible bravery and resolution. After a long and bloody contest, the two generals agreed to determine the doubtful victory by a single combat. Accordingly the two champions pushed on their horses against each other. Æbutius with his lance wounded Mamilius in the breast; and Mamilius with his sword Æbutius in the right arm. Neither of the wounds were mortal; but both generals falling from their horses, put an end to the combat. Marcus Valerius, the brother of Poplicola, supplying the place of Æbutius, endeavoured, at the head of the Roman horse, to break the enemy's battalions; but was repulsed by the cavalry of the Roman royalists. At the same time Mamilius appeared again in the van with a considerable body of horse and light-armed infantry. Valerius, with the assistance of his two nephews, the sons of Poplicola, and a chosen troop of volunteers, attempted to break through the Latin battalions, in order to engage Mamilius; but being surrounded by the Roman exiles, he received a mortal wound in his side, fell from his horse, and died. The dead body was carried off by the two sons of Poplicola, in spite of the utmost efforts of the exiles, and delivered to Valerius's servants, who conveyed it to the Roman camp; but the young heroes being afterwards invested on all sides, and overpowered by numbers, were both killed on the spot. Upon their death, the left wing of the
- g Romans began to give ground; but were soon brought back by Posthumus, who,

with a body of Roman knights, flying to their assistance, charged the royalists with such fury, that they were, after an obstinate resistance, obliged to give way, and retire in the utmost confusion. In the mean time Titus Horminius, one of the dictator's lieutenants, having rallied those who had fled, fell upon some close battalions of the enemy's right wing, which still kept their ground under the command of Mamilius, killed him with his own hand, and put that body to flight. But while he was busy in stripping the body of his enemy, he received himself a wound, of which he died soon after. Sextus Tarquinius in the mean time maintained the fight with great bravery, at the head of the left wing, against the consul Virginus, and had even broke through the right wing of the Roman army, when the dictator attacked him unexpectedly with his victorious squadrons. Then Sextus, having lost at once all hopes of victory, threw himself, like one in despair, into the midst of the Roman knights, and there sunk under a multitude of wounds, after he had distinguished himself in a most eminent manner. The death of the three generals was followed by the intire defeat of the Latin army. Their camp was taken and plundered, and most of their troops cut in pieces; for of the forty-three thousand men who came into the field, scarce ten thousand returned home. The next morning the Volsci and Hernici came, according to their agreement, to assist the Latins; but finding, upon their arrival, how matters had gone, some of them were for falling upon the Romans before they could recover from the fatigue of the preceding day; but others thought it more safe to send ambassadors to the dictator, to congratulate him on his victory, and assure him, that they had left their own country with no other design than to assist Rome in so dangerous a war. Posthumus, by producing their couriers and letters, gave them to understand, that he was well apprised of their designs and treacherous proceedings. However, out of a regard to the law of nations, he sent them back unhurt, with a challenge to their generals to fight the next day; but the Volsci and their confederates, not caring to engage a victorious army, decamped in the night, and returned to their respective countries before break of day.

THE Latins, having now no remedy but an intire submission, sent ambassadors to solicit a peace at Rome, yielding themselves intirely to the judgment of the senate. As Rome had long since made it a maxim to spare the nations which submitted, the motion of Titus Lartius, the late dictator, prevailed, and the ancient treaties with the Latins were renewed, on condition however, that they restored the prisoners they had taken, delivered up the deserters, and drove the Roman exiles out of Latium. Thus ended the last war, which the Romans waged with their neighbours on account of their banished king; who, being now abandoned by the Latins, Hetrurians, and Sabines, retired into Campania to Aristodemus, tyrant of Cumæ, and there died in the ninetieth year of his age, and fourteenth of his exile.

THE freedom, which the Romans recovered by the expulsion of Tarquinius, being now secured to them by the death of that prince, who was the last of his family, and the Latin war ended greatly to the advantage of the republic, Posthumus laid down his office, the courts of justice were again opened, and the creditors began to prosecute their debtors (G) with more rigour than ever, which revived the complaints

(G) When the debtor was insolvent, the creditor had a right to put him in irons, or to sell him as a slave. After a certain number of summonses, the law granted to the debtor thirty days of grace, to raise the sum for which he was accountable. The words of the law are; Æris confessi, rebusque jure judicatis, triginti dies iusti sunt. Post dein manum endo jactis—Vincito aut nervo, aut compedibus. After the thirty days were expired, if the debtor had not discharged the debt, he was led to the prætor, who delivered him over to the mercy of his creditors. These bound him, and kept him in chains for the space of sixty days. Afterwards, for three market-days successively, the debtor was brought to the tribunal of the prætor; then a public crier proclaimed in the forum the debt, for which the prisoner was detained. It often happened, that rich persons redeemed the prisoner, by paying his debts; but if no-body appeared in behalf of the debtor, after the third market-day, the creditor had a right to inflict the punishments appointed by the law;

Tertio mundinis capite pœnas dato, aut trans Tiberim peregre venundato, that is, Let him on the third market-day be punished with death, or sold beyond the Tiber as a slave. If there were several creditors, they were allowed, in consequence of this severe law, to divide the body of the prisoner into several parts, and share it among them, in proportion to the sum they demanded; But, according to Quintilian and Cæcilius, humanity and custom had given prescription against so barbarous a law, which was never put in execution. This punishment was changed to coercion; that is, the creditors had a right to imprison their debtors in their own houses, and make them slaves. These were called nexi, and not servi, because their slavery lasted no longer than till their debts were paid. This coercion was afterwards changed into public imprisonment, which was a less rigorous punishment than the slavery the debtors underwent in the creditors houses, where they were often cruelly treated, and whipped unmercifully.

- a and murmurs among the inferior classes. To prevent the disturbances, which this affair might occasion, the senate procured the consulship for Appius Claudius, who had ever opposed, with great warmth, the pretensions of the people; but, lest he should exert too great severity, they gave him for his colleague P. Servilius, a man of a gentle and humane temper, and greatly beloved by the people. The latter exhorted the senate, as soon as he entered upon his office, to ease the people, and restrain the severity of the creditors; but Appius maintained, with his usual constancy, that it was a manifest injustice to relieve the debtors at the expence of the creditors. The senate assembled daily, in order to settle the tranquillity of the city upon a lasting foundation; but met with so many difficulties, the consuls being of different opinions, that they could never come to any conclusion. In the mean time the oppressed populace held secret assemblies in the night, and seemed disposed to rise up in arms; so that the senate began to apprehend nothing less than a civil war. In the midst of these disturbances, the Volsci, who were well acquainted with the present state of the city, having drawn together what forces they could, advanced towards Rome, promising themselves great advantages from the domestic disorders, and universal confusion, which reigned in the city. It was therefore necessary for the consuls to raise an army; but the Roman youth absolutely refused to serve. This disobedience occasioned new disputes between the consuls, Claudius being for severity, and Servilius for moderation. As the time drew near to take the field against the Volsci, the senate decreed, that Servilius should command the army, and Claudius govern the city. But tho' Servilius was looked upon as a friend to the people, yet they refused to lift themselves, unless the senate came first to some determination about the important affair of debts. Servilius was therefore obliged to march against the enemy with such only as offered to serve out of a personal affection to him. The Volsci, depending on the civil broils at Rome, had not been so expeditious in their preparations for the war, as to be in a condition to face a Roman army in the field; and therefore they had recourse to entreaties, by which they prevailed upon the good-natured consul to favour them, and grant them a peace, upon condition that they supplied his troops with cloaths and provisions, and delivered to him three hundred hostages of the best families^a.

An insurrection
at Rome.

- Not long after the return of Servilius, the senate was informed from Latium, that the Volsci were making new preparations for war; that they had engaged the Hernici and Sabines to join them against Rome, and sent deputies to their nation for the same purpose. These deputies the Latin ambassadors brought with them, and delivered them up to the senate. Such a treacherous proceeding in the Volsci, after they had been so kindly treated by the consul Servilius, fired the senate, and war was immediately declared; but while the senators were yet sitting, a plebeian, loaded with chains, appeared in the forum. He was advanced in years, tall of stature, lean, pale, with his eyes sunk into his head, a long beard, and his hair in disorder. At his clamours and gestures the people crowded about him, and all looked on him with great attention, till at length several knew him, and remembered to have served with him in the wars, and to have seen him fight in the first ranks of the legions with great valour. The bare sight of him raised the compassion of the multitude; but when they had heard him give an account of his misfortunes, they were all filled with rage and indignation. He told them, that he was born free; that he had, in eight-and-twenty battles, exposed his life for the good of his country; that, in the last war with the Sabines, he not only had been hindered from cultivating his little inheritance, but that the enemy, in an incursion, after having plundered his house, had set it on fire; that the necessities of life, and the tributes, which, notwithstanding his misfortunes, he was obliged to pay, had forced him to contract debts; that the interest being grown, by degrees, to an excessive sum, he was reduced to the melancholy expedient of yielding up his inheritance to discharge part of it; but that the merciless creditor, not being yet quite paid, had dragged him to prison, with two of his children; that, to oblige him to hasten the payment of the residue, he had delivered him over to his slaves, who, by his order, had tore his body with whips. At the same time he flung off his garment, and discovered his back still bloody; and on his breast the scars of the honourable wounds, which he had received in fighting for his country. At this sight, the people, already ripe for sedition, uttered a thouland curses against the patricians, and made such outcries, as terrified the senate, a which was then sitting. The people flocked from all quarters of the city into the forum; the artificers left their shops; and those, who were confined for debt, having found means to escape from their creditors, with the frightful figure they made, with their ragged clothes, and the noise of their chains, raised both pity and indignation. These unhappy wretches spread themselves all over the city; and if any one offered to stop them, he was immediately massacred by the enraged multitude. The consul Appius, seeing that the fury of the mutineers was like to fall upon him, left the senate, and, by favour of the tumult, got safe to his own house. Servilius, having pulled off his robe, that he might be thereby more agreeable to the people, ran into the thickest of the croud; and tho' he embraced some, threw himself at the feet of others, b and shewed great compassion for all, yet he could not prevail upon them to suspend all acts of violence to the next day, till he had promised, that the senate should have regard to their complaints; nay, he went further, and proclaimed by a herald, that no one should molest any Roman citizen for debt, till the senate had decreed otherwise.

THE next day the forum was soon filled, both with citizens and country-people, brought thither by their common interest. The senate assembled, and Servilius laid before them the necessity, in such a conjuncture, of abating somewhat of the severity of the laws. On the other hand, Appius pretended, that this project tended to the ruin of the subordination necessary in a well-governed state; and that c the condescension, which Servilius was for shewing to the necessities of the people, would be looked upon by the seditious, only as a disguised weakness, and so breed new pretensions. As Appius could not bear contradiction, his speech was tinged with the harshness of his manners; he even came to personal reflections, and represented his colleague as a vile flatterer of the plebeians, and a favourer of the revolt. Servilius, in his turn, reproached him with the obstinacy of his temper, his pride, and the animosity he shewed against the people. The senators were divided between these two great men; so that there was no end of their disputes. In the mean time the people expected with impatience a decree in their favour, and there not being a sufficient number of senators assembled for that purpose, they imputed their absence d to the consuls management, in order to frustrate their hopes. While the people were yet in the forum, they saw some horsemen come full speed to acquaint the Romans, that the Volsci were advancing with a design to besiege Rome. The plebeians were overjoyed to see their own country in danger; and when the debtors were invited to take up arms in defence of the common liberty, they shewed the chains, with which their creditors had loaded them. Is it not the same thing to us, said they, whether these chains are put upon us by the enemy, or by our own countrymen? Let the patricians expose their lives, since they alone reap advantage from our victories. Shall we make a rampart with our bodies, only to hinder the enemy from pulling down our prisons, and carrying away our chains? It was necessary, in this extremity, that something should be done to e quell the tumult, and induce the people to lend their assistance against an insulting enemy. Appius was obstinate and inflexible; but Servilius was prevailed upon by his friends to make the people such promises in the name of the senate, as the senators were firmly resolved never to perform. He told them, that it was not consistent with the dignity of the senate to comply with their demands, as it were out of fear; but that, when the war should be ended, the senate would in gratitude remit all their debts. This discourse abated the fury of the populace; and the reading a decree, which passed the same day, intirely quelled it. All creditors were thereby forbidden to prosecute any Roman citizen for debt, who was willing to serve, or to seize his children or his goods; but the creditors were commanded to prosecute all such debtors with the utmost severity, as either should refuse to serve, or desert after they f were inrolled. To this wise law Rome owed her preservation; for it was no sooner published, than multitudes crouded to the capitol, and even made interest to be admitted into the legions. When the levies were completed, Servilius marched to meet the enemy, and encamped near the Pontine lake (H); where the Volsci, attempting

The consul Servilius, by fair promises, engages the people to assist themselves.

(H) The Pontine lake took its name from the city of Pometia, formerly one of the most considerable cities of Latium. This part of Latium, before it was laid under water by the overflowing of the Nymphæus, the Amajens, the Asura, and the Ufens, was thought the garden of Italy. There were, according

a attempting to surprize his camp, were intirely defeated. The consul, to reward his soldiers, gave them all the spoil, that they might have wherewithal to pay their debts (1). He then marched to Suessa Pomertia, the capital of the Volsci, took it by assault, and put all to the sword who were able to bear arms. He gave likewise this wealthy city up to be plundered by the soldiers, without reserving any part of the spoil for the public treasury. In the mean time Appius, who had been left in Rome, beheaded the three hundred hostages, which the Volsci had given to the Romans upon Servilius's first expedition ^a.

So glorious a campaign had merited the honours of a triumph for the consul, who returned to the city with hopes of obtaining it; but, on his arrival, he was informed, that his colleague Appius had persuaded the senate to refuse him it, under pretence, that b he was a seditious man, who aimed at popularity, by an excessive indulgence and profuseness to his soldiers. Servilius, being sensibly affected with the unjust proceedings of the senate, took a bold step, which afterwards proved a fatal precedent to his country. He no sooner came before Rome, which none were allowed to enter who demanded a triumph, but he caused the people to be called together in a field without the walls, and there complained to them, both of the jealousy of his colleague, and the injustice of the senate; upon which the people encouraged him by their acclamations to attempt whatever he pleased. Without regard therefore to the decision of the senate, he decreed himself a triumph, and marched, with the usual pomp, c to the capitol, followed by his army, and attended by all the people ^a.

WHILE the people were taken up with public games and rejoicings, on account of the victory over the Volsci, ambassadors arrived from the Aurunci, demanding, that the Roman garison in Ecetra, a Volscian town, which had lately submitted to Rome, should be removed from thence, and adding threatnings, in case of refusal. As Ecetra stood on the confines of the country of the Aurunci, they had taken umbrage at the neighbourhood of that garison. The senate therefore sent the envoys back with this answer, Go, tell your masters, that it is a dangerous thing to attack those, whose very neighbourhood is formidable to them. The Aurunci, provoked at this answer, entered Latium, and advanced as far as Aricia, where they were met by the Roman army, under the command of Servilius, and the famous Posthumius, surnamed Regillensis, from the victory he had gained over the Latins at the lake Regillus. The battle which ensued was very bloody; but the Romans, tho' at first greatly disheartened at the gigantic stature, fierce looks, and martial air of the enemy, gained at length a d complete victory, and made themselves masters of the camp of the Aurunci, who retired into their own country. Of all the plebeians, who served in this, and in the late war with the Volsci, none behaved with more gallantry than those who were most in debt. The people therefore thought, that, after so many victories, they might demand of the senate the performance of Servilius's promise. But the inflexible Appius even doubled the severity of the judgments he gave against such debtors as were brought before his tribunal; he ordered all those, who had been set at liberty during the war, to be brought back to their creditors prisons by force. Those who e were arrested, appealed to Servilius, urging the promises he had made before the campaign, and the services they had done in the war; but Appius having got the ascendant in the senate, Servilius had not interest enough to prevail upon them to make good his word given in their name, or to protect the unhappy ing to Pliny (1), twenty-three cities in it, which are supposed to have been drowned by inundations, or overturned by earthquakes; for there were no remains of them to be seen in the time of Dionysius Halicarnassensis.

(1) It was customary, in the beginning of the commonwealth, to divide the spoils between the victorious army and the public treasury. The product of these spoils was generally applied to the building of temples, the celebrating of public games, or the adorning of the city. Servius tells us (3), that the generals thought themselves obliged to appropriate part of the fruit of their victories to the god, whose protection they had invoked. Agreeable to this custom, adds the same writer, there was a temple in Rome, consecrated to Jupiter the plunderer, Jovis predatori. Servilius was accused by his colleague of having acted contrary to the law, which ordained, that the general, who returned from any military expedition, should not dispose of the spoil as he pleased. This law made him accountable for it; but nevertheless the republic often dispensed with it, and left it to the discretion of the general to distribute such military rewards among his soldiers, as he thought fit; provided he gave an account of his administration to the people, and did not appropriate to his own use the fruits of the conquests he had made in the name of the republic.

wretches; so that he became as much despised, as Appius was hated. This appeared a very remarkably when the time came to consecrate a temple, which had been erected to Mercury. The consecrator was to enjoy considerable powers and privileges; and on this account the senate, unwilling to disgust either Appius or Servilius, referred the whole matter to the people. The curiæ were therefore assembled, with full power to chuse whom they pleased; and they, to shew how much they were displeased with both the consuls, bestowed the honour of consecrating the temple on one Latiarius, who was only a centurion. Hereupon Appius and Servilius, equally enraged, joined with the senate in putting in execution the laws against debtors with the utmost severity; but the people, paying no regard to their authority, when any plebeian was prosecuted for debt, crowded into the forum, and made such a noise, that the sentence pronounced by the judges could not be heard. They no longer endeavoured to appease their creditors, or mollify the senate by entreaties, but insulted both; so that the patricians, and not the plebeians, were now in danger of imprisonment and slavery.

revolt; but the people refuse to serve.

In the mean time the Sabines, encouraged by these intestine broils, revolted, and engaged the Roman colony of Medulia to enter into an alliance with them; which was confirmed by mutual oaths. The new consuls, A. Virginus and T. Valerius, both men of little note, summoned the tribes, in order to raise an army for the war, which threatened them; but the people obstinately refused to list themselves, till such time as all debts should be cancelled. Hereupon the consuls, ascending their tribunal, called upon one of the most factious by name to come and be enrolled. As the man did not answer the summons, he was instantly seized; but the populace tore him out of the lictors hands, and insulted both the consuls, and patricians who attended them. While the city was thus rent into factions, and all things seemed to tend to a civil war, envoys arrived from the Latins and Crustumini, complaining of the hostilities of the Æqui and Sabines, and at the same time ambassadors from the Volsci, demanding restitution of the lands, which had been taken from them in the late war. These embassies filled the Romans with consternation or joy, according to the party each had embraced. As it was necessary to give all these depuxies proper answers, the senate assembled, and, after long debates, returned the following answer to the ambassadors of the Volsci, viz. That it was not consistent with the honour of the republic to comply with their demands. As to the Latins and Crustumini, who were in alliance with Rome, they were assured, that the republic would not leave them exposed to the insults of their enemies, without sending them succours. With these answers the ambassadors were dismissed; but as Rome could neither protect her allies, nor repulse her enemies, unless peace were first established at home, the senate met again the next day, to deliberate about the methods necessary to procure that happiness. The consul Virginus was for protecting those debtors, who had fought so successfully the last year, and for leaving the others to the severity of the law. Titus Lanius, that venerable senator, who had been formerly dictator, pleaded in behalf of all debtors. Appius, when it came to his turn to speak, enumerated all the motives, which had engaged him to side with the patricians; declared, that he could not change his opinion; urged the dangerous consequences of violating contracts between debtors and creditors; and, in the close of his speech, proposed the naming a dictator in the present extremity. This expedient was thought dangerous by some of the oldest senators; but the motion was carried by a majority, and Manius Valerius, a man of seventy years of age, brother to the famous Poplicola, was nominated by one of the consuls, contrary to the law, which required, that the dictator should be chosen out of such as had been, or were actually consuls; but as no man was judged more proper for that station at this time, the necessity of the case made the senate overlook its rules. Valerius, as soon as he was proclaimed dictator, named for his general of the horse Quintus Servilius, brother to the last year's consul; and finding the minds of the people well inclined to his government, he ascended the tribunal, and harangued the multitude, putting them in mind of the great zeal his family had always shewed for their interest, and desiring, in return, their confidence. He promised, that, if they would lend their assistance, and serve their country at this time, he would procure for them from the senate, all the reasonable condescensions they could expect. And in the mean time, said he, I command, that no mention be made of confiscations or imprisonment.

Manius Valerius, a brother of Poplicola, created dictator

- a sonments, during my administration. The people, depending on the promises of the dictator, took arms with pleasure, and ten legions were soon raised; three of which were given to each consul, and four reserved for the dictator. Veturius was ordered to march against the Æqui, Virginus against the Volsci, and the dictator himself led his legions against the Sabines. The three generals were all attended with good success, and it proved a glorious campaign for the republic. Valerius on his return was honoured with a triumph, and as a further mark of distinction, both the senate and people agreed in allotting him an honourable place in the circus, at the celebration of the public games, and appointed that a curule chair should be always placed there for him; an honour which they made hereditary in his family ^a.
- b BUT now Valerius remembering his promises to the people, demanded of the senate the performance of them. But the patrician usurers had made such a party in the senate during his absence, that the senators not only refused to comply with his demands, but reproached him with the affliction of his family for the plebeians, and taxed him with betraying the interests of the senate. The prudent dictator, to prevent, in some degree, the misfortunes which threatened the republic, sent a colony of poor debtors to Velitra, which had been just taken from the Volsci. But as there still remained a great number of those unhappy wretches; he solicited anew the senate in their favour. But his motion being rejected, he told the senators in great anger, that perhaps in a short time they would wish for such an intercessor with the people, and leaving the senate abruptly, summoned the people. When the assembly was formed, he appeared in it with all the ensigns of his dignity; and in the first place acknowledged his obligations to them; then he made great complaints of the unfincere conduct of the senate with regard both to them and him; and lastly declared his resolution to retire, or to surrender himself up to their resentments, if they suspected that he had betrayed their interest. Having ended his speech, he laid down his employment, and stripped himself of the badges of the dictatorship. The people, who had heard him with sentiments of respect and veneration, conducted him quite home to his house with loud acclamations, as if he had procured the abolition of their debts. The senate, to prevent the disorders which they foresaw must attend the abdication of an injured dictator, ordered the two consuls, who still held the soldiers engaged by their oath (K), to lead the army into the field, under pretence that the Æqui and Sabines were making fresh preparations for war. The soldiery, who were well apprised of the artifice, went out of Rome with the utmost rage; and therefore, as soon as they were in the field, some of the most seditious proposed the assassinating of the consuls, not out of any personal hatred, but merely to free themselves from the oath which bound them to their command. Others thought it would be monstrous to put an end to the religious engagements they had entered into with the consuls, by criminal means, and on that account rejected the motion. After the leaders of the mutiny had considered of various projects, they concluded at last to carry away the military ensigns and standards, and engage all the troops to follow them without the privity of their officers (L). (K) The giving the military oath, called sacramentum, was, properly speaking, the legal method of forming the Roman armies. After the soldiers had been chosen out of each tribe, this oath was administered to them in the following manner: The tribunes of each legion assembled the bodies they commanded. Then one soldier in a legion swore, in the name of all the rest, to obey the commander of the Roman army. After this, every soldier came and singly engaged to perform what had been sworn. In process of time another oath, called by Livy (4) jusiurandum, was added to this, by virtue of which rebels and deserters were punished with death, and no appeal admitted. There was likewise another way of inlisting men, called conjuratio, which took place in unforeseen commotions and sudden irruptions of an enemy. Then, that no time might be lost in raising the necessary forces, the soldiers were excused the formalities usually observed in inrolling them. The general only went up to the capitol, and there erected two standards, one red for the foot, and the other blue for the horse. After this, he pronounced these words: Let those, who love the safety of the republic, make haste and follow me. A third way of inrolling men was this: the consuls committed to the care of persons appointed for that purpose the raising of troops in different places, as the republic had occasion for them; and this was called evocatio. The military oath was so essential in inlisting men, that no Roman could serve in the army, even as a volunteer, or kill an enemy, till he had bound himself by a solemn promise to obey his general. In consequence of this custom, which was authorized by law, Tully tells us (5), that Cato wrote to Pomilius to inform him, that his son could not continue in the army without taking the military oath again, the time of his former engagement being expired.

(L) Dionysius Halicarnassensis gives us the reason why the legions so readily followed their ensigns.

design was executed under the conduct of a plebeian, named Sicinnius Bellatus. The troops marched away, and encamped beyond the Anio, three miles from Rome, on a hill called afterwards the sacred mount, as their retreat was styled the secession.

THE first thing the rebellious army did, was to chuse themselves a general, and Sicinnius was the man they pitched upon. Then they secured themselves within strong intrenchments, where they lay quiet without committing any hostilities. The consuls and officers, seeing themselves thus deserted by their troops, dispatched a messenger to Sicinnius, exhorting him to return to the camp, and bring back the troops to their duty. But he returned such an answer, as shewed that he was determined to keep no measures with the patricians. A desertion so general, and which looked like the beginning of a civil war, gave great uneasiness to the senate, and occasioned a general consternation in the city. The patricians were forced to guard the gates themselves, in order to prevent the citizens from going out to join the malecontents. But notwithstanding this precaution, those who were burdened with debts, and such as loved novelty, escaped, and flocked to the camp of Sicinnius. In this general confusion the senate met daily, and after warm debates, in which they mutually accused each other of indulgence and severity, they at length agreed to send a deputation to the malecontents, offering them a general pardon, and exhorting them to return to the city. But this step only served to increase the insolence of the soldiers. The deputies were therefore sent back contemptuously with no other answer, but that the patricians should quickly find what enemies they had to deal with. This answer occasioned new alarms in the city. In the mean time, the two consuls, whose magistracy was expiring, assembled the centuries, which were left in Rome, for the election of their successors, and as no body at so dangerous a conjuncture stood candidate for that dignity, they obliged Posthumus Cominius, and Spurius Cassius Viscellinus, both consular men, and equally agreeable to the plebeians and patricians, to accept the consulship. Their first care was to convene the senate to deliberate upon the most speedy and easy methods of restoring peace and union. Menenius Agrippa, a man of great integrity, and who had stood neuter in the divisions of the people and senate, being the first called upon to give his opinion, declared warmly for a reconciliation with the people, and proposed the sending of such deputies, as were agreeable to them, with full power to make up matters upon whatever conditions they should think necessary for the good of the republic. M. Valerius, the late dictator, being desired next to give his opinion, upbraided the senate with neglecting his former counsels; accused their indiscretion in not offering the people an abolition of their debts by the first deputation, foretold, that the mutineers would, besides their first demands, insist upon lasting securities for their future preservation from oppression; lastly, he declared for the opinion of Menenius, advising the senate not to delay one moment giving the people satisfaction, let their demands be what they would. Appius, when it was his turn to speak, opposed, in a very plausible harangue, the opinion of Menenius and Valerius, and declared intirely against treating with the rebels, till they had laid down their arms; but on that condition was for shewing them mercy and indulgence. Hereupon the senate was divided; the old men were for Menenius Agrippa, and Valerius; the young senators, jealous of the prerogatives of their rank, declared all for Appius, and the uproar was so great, that they almost came to blows. The two consuls, who were disposed to favour the people, having conferred together in private, determined to give time to those hot spirits to cool, and with that view put off the decision of this great affair to another day. But before the assembly broke up, in order to intimidate

The Romans, says he, when they are in the field, respect nothing more than their ensigns and standards. They swear by their military ensigns, and pay them a sort of religious worship. On certain festivals they crown them with flowers, and perfume them. Animated by this superstitious prejudice, they exposed themselves to the greatest dangers, and despised death itself to secure those precious pledges, and prevent their being taken by the enemy. Those, to whose care they were committed, were either put to death, or whipped, if they suffered the enemy to take them. The Romans in the times of their first simplicity had no other ensigns or colours, but a bundle of hay or grass fastened to the top of a long pole, as we have observed above. In succeeding ages they made use of the figures of monsters and animals, viz. of eagles, dragons, boars, wolves, &c. Each manipulus had its own ensign. The horse made use of a standard, called vexillum, which was made of a piece of rich stuff, about a foot square. It was fastened to a cross piece of wood, which was fixed to the top of a pike. But the form of the ensigns and standards varied according to the times, and the temper of the Romans, as we shall have occasion to observe in the sequel of this history.

- a the young senators, who had behaved in a very audacious manner, they threatened to exclude them from the senate, by fixing the age (M) necessary for a senator, unless they brought a more peaceable disposition of mind along with them. Some days after the senate met anew, when every thing was transacted with great tranquillity, Menenius being desired again to declare his sentiments, still continued to think it necessary that plenipotentiaries should be sent to the malecontents, with full power to grant them whatever they should think consistent with the good of the republic. All the senators, who had been consuls, agreed with Menenius, except Appius, who, when it came to his turn to speak, continued to protest against treating with rebels, till they had laid down their arms, and prayed Jupiter, and the tutelar gods of Rome, that he might be
- b deceived in his apprehensions of the evil consequences of such a stop.

HOWEVER, the senate determined by all means to divert the present evil, continued in their former resolution of sending commissioners to treat with the malecontents, and accordingly ten were named, and among them T. Lartius, Menenius Agrippa, and M. Valerius, all three in great esteem, and of whom two had governed the republic, and commanded her armies in quality of dictators. These with their colleagues set out for the camp, where they were received with all the respect due to their character. The presence of the deputies had been sufficient to bring back the mutineers to their duty, had not some turbulent spirits taken care to keep up the fire of discord. These were Sennius Bellutus, and another plebeian much of the same character, named

c Lucius Junius, like the founder of the republic; nay, he affected the surname of Brutus, thinking himself destined to deliver the people from the tyranny of the senate, as the famous Brutus had freed Rome from the oppressions of the kings. These two being appointed by the malecontents to treat with the deputies from the senate, effaced with their crafty and artful speeches the impression, which the presence of the deputies and their harangues had made on the minds of the multitude. But Menenius Agrippa, after having assured them that the senate had, with unanimous consent, determined to annul all bonds and obligations at present subsisting, so softened the populace by this promise, and the famous apologue of a conspiracy of all the members of the human body against the stomach, which he applied to the people and the senate, that they

d all cried out that they were satisfied, and that he might lead them back to Rome. This sudden motion alarmed the pretended Brutus, who represented to the people, that they ought indeed to be very thankful for the favour shewed them at present in the abolition of their debts; but that he could not forbear letting them know that he was very apprehensive about the future, and therefore was of opinion that means should be found to secure the liberties of the people against the attempts of the ambitious patricians.

What other security can you ask, replied Menenius, besides what our laws, and the constitution of the republic already afford? Give us leave, answered Brutus, to chuse annually out of the body of the plebeians a certain number of magistrates, who without having any other authority in Rome but that of protecting them, may oppose or e disannul any edicts or judgments which shall be burdensome to the people. If you come hither with a sincere intention of peace, you cannot reject so equitable a proposal. The deputies, greatly surprised at such a demand, told them that they asked a very extraordinary thing, which absolutely exceeded the bounds of their instructions and powers; but that M. Valerius, and some others of the deputies would go and make their report of it to the senate, and return with an answer. Accordingly, they repaired with all speed to Rome, where M. Valerius gave his opinion in favour of the people, while Appius, burning with indignation, exclaimed against the dreadful consequences which would attend Valerius's condescension. But his remonstrances were neglected, and

(M) It is manifest from hence, that the laws had not yet determined at what age one might be admitted into the senate; and yet that there was a fixed age afterwards required is very certain; for Tully, in speaking of Pompey (6), says, that he commanded armies before he had attained to the age that was required in a senator; the same is affirmed by Plutarch; and no expression is more frequently made use of by the ancient historians in the lives of great men, than that of etate senatoria. But what age the laws fixed is uncertain. Dio Cassius limits it to five and twenty, which was the age required for the questorship, the first office of any considerable note. However, we read of many persons promoted to this dignity without any regard had to their years. Pompey established among the Bithynians a law, by which no one could become a member of their senate till he was thirty complete. It is probable, he followed the custom of the Roman republic in this regulation; and the more so, because Pliny the younger, in one of his letters to the emperor Trajan, says, that the Bithynians made the Romans their patterns, especially in what related to their magistracy and senate.

the other side prevailed, most of the senators being weary of these divisions, and a desirous to have peace at any rate; so that with almost an universal consent, a senatus-consultum or decree of the senate was passed, permitting the creation of these new magistrates, who were called Tribunes of the people. This decree, which included also the abolition of debts, was carried by the deputies of the senate to the camp as a seal of peace. The people were now for returning to Rome, but the leaders of the sedition would not allow them to separate before they had elected the new magistrates. The assembly was held in the very camp, and the auspices being taken, the suffrages were gathered by curiæ, when L. Junius Brutus, and C. Sicinnius Bellutus were, according to Dionysius, chosen for the first tribunes. These immediately named the two Licini, Publius, and Caius, with Sp. Icilius Ruge to be their colleagues. Livy says, that C. b Licinius, and Lucius Albinus, were the first tribunes, and that they afterwards chose themselves three colleagues, among whom was Sicinnius Bellutus. Before they left the camp a law was passed, whereby the persons of the tribunes were made sacred. The words of the law were, Let the tribune of the people be exempt from all the servile offices imposed on the citizens. Let none of these offices be laid upon him, but by his own consent. Let no one strike him, or cause another to strike him. If any offend in this, let him be execrable, and his goods appropriated to the worship of Ceres. If any one kills him, any person may kill the murderer with impunity. To make this law perpetual, all the Romans were obliged to swear, for themselves and their posterity, that they would inviolably observe it. After these regulations the people erected an altar to Jupiter c the terrible on the top of the hill, where they had incamped, and having consecrated the place of their retreat, which from this time was called the sacred mount, they followed the deputies of the senate, and returned to the city.

THE tribunes were at first five in number, but a few years after five more were added. They were always chosen by the plebeians, and out of their body. Their sole function was to defend the liberties of the plebeians, and so interpose in all grievances offered them by their superiors. This interposing in matters determined by the senate, or other magistrates, was called intercessio, and was performed by standing up, and pronouncing only one word, Veto, I forbid it. They had their seats placed at the door of the senate, and were never admitted into it, but when the consuls called them d to ask their opinion upon some affair that concerned the interests of the people. As for the ensigns of their office, they had no toga prætexta, lictors, or curule chair; but were habited like private men, and attended only by one servant, called Viator. Their power was confined within the walls of Rome, or extended at most to a mile round the city. They were not allowed to be absent from the city a day, Dion says an hour, except in the feriæ Latinæ. To shew their readiness to protect the people, they were obliged to keep their doors open night and day. Their authority was very great; for though at first they pretended only to prevent oppression, yet afterwards they usurped the power of doing almost whatever they pleased, having the populace to back them. They assembled the people, enacted laws, made decrees, and executed them upon the magistrates themselves, commanding sometimes the very consuls to be carried to prison. In short, they occasioned far greater disturbances in the state than those which they were first created to appease, whence they are styled by some of the ancients, the bane of the public tranquillity.

ONE of the first steps of the tribunes towards an increase of power was to ask permission of the senate to chuse two assistants in the execution of their office. This new demand was also complied with, and two men were chosen out of the plebeians to be the tribunes, assistants, or agents. These afterwards had the cognizance of a great many affairs, which before belonged to the consuls, and the inspection of all buildings both public and private; from which last branch of their office they took the name of Ædiles, with the epithet of Plebeian, to distinguish them from the Ædiles curules, of whom we shall speak hereafter.

Rome being now in a profound peace at home, troops were easily raised to march against the Volsci, whom the consul Cominius defeated in a pitched battle, and took from them Langula and Polusca. He marched next to besiege Corioli, the metropolis of the Volsci, and strongly fortified; which he likewise made himself master of, and gained a victory over the Antiates the same day. But Caius Marcius, a young patrician, had all the glory of both actions. For the besieged having made a vigorous sally, a and driven the Romans back quite to their intrenchments, Marcus by his words and example rallied the fugitives, brought them back to the charge, and having obliged the enemy to retire into the city, followed them so close, that he went in with them, and made himself master of the place. He then hastened, without suffering his soldiers to stay for plunder, to join the consul's army, which was upon the point of engaging with the Antiates, who were come to assist their allies. In the engagement which ensued, he behaved with equal bravery, and was attended with equal success, the victory, which was gained, being intirely owing to his courage and prudent conduct. The next day the consul, having caused his tribunal to be erected before his tent, and called his soldiers together, made an harangue to them, which was little more than a panegyric on the brave Marcus. He put a crown of gold upon his head, assigned him a tenth part of all the spoil, gave him a fine horse with stately furniture in the name of the republic, allotted him as much money as he could carry away, and lastly, allowed him to chuse out any ten of the prisoners. But of all these presents the young hero accepted only the horse, and demanded but one captive of the ten, an old friend of his family, with a design to give him his liberty. This generous and disinterested conduct silenced even jealousy itself. All respected an hero, whose sentiments were as noble as his valour signal. But the consul, to add to the glory of the brave warrior, bestowed on him the surname of Coriolanus, transferring thereby from himself to Marcus all the honour of the conquest of Corioli ^{The gallant behaviour of Caius Marcus Coriolanus.}.

c THE enemies of Rome being terrified by the reduction of the Volsci, kept quiet at home; so that the consul disbanded his army, and war was succeeded by works of religion, public games, and treaties of peace. The ancient alliance was renewed with the Latins, and a third day added to the feria Latina. In the mean time Menenius Agrippa died in as great poverty as Poplicola. His relations resolved to bury him without ceremony. But the people, at the motion of their new tribunes, agreed to pay a sextans, or two ounces of brass, a head, towards the expences of a magnificent funeral. Upon this the senate, thinking it would reflect no small dishonour upon them to suffer an illustrious patrician to be buried at the expence of the people, allotted a sum out of the public treasury for his funeral, and committed the care of it to the quæstors. Nevertheless the people refused to receive back their money, ordering it to be given to the children of the deceased Menenius. This memorable consulship ended with a census and lustrum, and there appeared to be but a hundred thousand men in Rome fit to bear arms.

UNDER the new administration of T. Geganus and P. Minucius, Rome suffered greatly by a famine, and this calamity revived the civil dissensions. The senate, to disburden the city, sent away great numbers of the people to plant colonies at Velitra and Norba, in spite of the opposition of the tribunes. In the mean time the Antiates, taking advantage of the famine, with which Rome was afflicted, and of the discord between the people and the senate, made incursions to the very gates of the city. Coriolanus could not bear this insult, and therefore, as the tribunes still opposed any regular levies being made, he put himself at the head of a band of volunteers, advanced into the enemy's country, defeated them in several engagements, and returned loaded with a rich booty, consisting of corn, cattle, and slaves. At this the patricians triumphed, and the plebeians, who had remained behind, complained of their tribunes for having diverted them from following so successful a leader. On the other hand, the tribunes, whose credit subsisted only by the misunderstanding they fomented between the two orders in the commonwealth, endeavoured to stir up the populace to a general revolt, openly accusing the patricians of being the cause of the scarcity, while their own families, they said, were plentifully supplied with provisions. The senate, alarmed at the storm that threatened them, met daily to deliberate on the means to avert it. Some of the senators were for employing soft words and fair promises to gain over the most mutinous. But the opinion of Appius prevailed, which was, that the tribunes should be threatened with the severest punishments, as disturbers of the public peace, if they did not amend their behaviour. But when the consuls came to declare to the curiæ the resolution of the senate, the tribunes interrupted them, and even disputed with them the right of speaking in the comitia, contending that their province was confined to the senate. The contest growing very warm, and the hottest in each party being ready to come to blows, Brutus, who was now but ædile, desired leave of ^{Rome suffers greatly by a famine. the consuls to speak to the people, promising to quiet the dispute. Geganius and Minucius, pleased with the deference paid them, readily consented to let him say what he thought fit. But he, instead of addressing himself either to the tribunes, or the people, turned to the consul Geganius, who had been one of the commissioners sent to the malecontents on the sacred mount, and asked him, whether he remembered, that one of the articles of the late reconciliation was, that no patrician should interrupt those who were appointed to take care of the interests of the people? I remember it very well, replied the consul. Why then, added Brutus, do you now come hither to disturb the conference between the people and their tribunes? Because, said Geganius, this assembly was summoned by us, and not by you. The consul added too rashly, that if the tribunes had convened the assembly, he would not even have come to hear what they said. At these words Brutus cried out aloud, that's enough; you grant all we ask; speak to day as much as you please; to morrow I will tell you how far our power extends, and how far yours. The next morning, before it was light, the tribunes and ædiles went to the temple of Vulcan, which stood near the comitium, and there assembled the people, complaining to them of the attempt that had been made the day before, to impose silence upon them in the assembly of the people, whom it was their duty to defend. They then proposed to the curiæ the following law, empowering the tribunes to harangue the people. Let no man presume to interrupt a tribune who is speaking in the assembly of the Roman people. If any one break this law, he shall presently give bail to pay the fine, to which he shall be condemned: if he refuses to give this security, he shall be put to death, and his goods confiscated: the difficulties, which may arise about these securities, shall be referred to the people, and determined by them. This law was confirmed by the suffrages of the people, before the consuls could make any opposition to it. The senate indeed refused to confirm it; but then the people in their turn would not accept the decrees of the senate. Thus these two tribunals were ever opposing one another; but the people always gained their point by their numbers and the unanimity of their leaders.

Fresh disputes about the division of corn.

THE people, satisfied with having enlarged the power of their tribunes, bore the famine patiently, and continued quiet till plenty of corn arriving from Sicily furnished the tribunes with a new occasion of rekindling sedition. The senators, who favoured the people, were for distributing gratis among the poor the corn, which had been bought with the public money. But the opposite faction was for holding up the price of bread, in order to keep the populace in dependence and subjection. The famous Coriolanus, at the head of the severe party, spoke loudly against shewing any indulgence to the people, proposed the abolishing of the tribuneship, and taking vengeance of the mad rabble for their past insolence. The senators were divided in their opinions, but the major part were for re-establishing the government upon its ancient foundations, and annulling the treaty concluded on the sacred mount. These proceedings enraged the tribunes, who left the assembly in the greatest fury, calling out aloud on the gods, the avengers of perjury, to witness the solemn oaths by which the senate had authorized the establishment of their dignity. The people, fired by their factious tribunes, were ready to break into the senate, and there sacrifice Coriolanus to their hatred and revenge. But the tribunes, that their proceedings might be regular, stopt them, and having assembled the curiæ, summoned Coriolanus to appear before them. But he despised a summons brought him from a tribunal, which he did not acknowledge. Hereupon the tribunes, with a gang of the most mutinous among the plebeians, waited for him at the door of the senate, with a design to seize him when he came out. But as he had a stronger guard with him than they, composed of young senators, who had a great respect for his person, the tribunes and their officers were beat back. Upon this the uproar was increased on the one hand by the crouds of people, who flocked together from all parts of the city, and on the other by the patricians, who hastened to the assistance of Coriolanus. But in the mean time the consuls coming up, dispersed the croud, and partly by intreaties, partly by their authority prevailed upon the people to retire. The next day the tribunes, having assembled the people early in the morning, inveighed, as usual, against the whole order of the patricians, but in particular against Coriolanus, repeating the very words he had uttered in the senate relating to the distribution of corn. Then they exaggerated the violence he had used against them the day before, the ill usage their officers had met

- a with from him and his company, the great number of men he had always about him, whom they called the tyrant's guards, &c. After they had with long and bitter invectives made Coriolanus odious to the people, they added, that if there was any patrician, who would undertake his defence, he might mount the tribunal, and speak to the people. Then Minucius, the eldest consul, presenting himself, in a long speech cleared the senate from being the cause of the famine, excused the imprudent warmth of Coriolanus, desired them to remember his virtues as well as his faults, and intreated them, in the name of the senate, to forgive him. The gentle words of Minucius, joined with promises of sudden plenty, softened and calmed the people. But the artful Sicinnius, now tribune of the people a second time, effaced all impressions made on their minds
- b in favour of Coriolanus. After having thanked the consuls and patricians for their favourable disposition, he exhorted Coriolanus to have recourse to the clemency of the people, and to make an apology for his conduct. The tribune well knew that Coriolanus was a man of too lofty a spirit to stoop to supplications, and therefore did not doubt but he would provoke the people afresh with the haughtiness of his answers. Accordingly, the young patrician, instead of appearing as a criminal, assumed the air of a judge, and by an ill-timed resoluteness destroyed the effect of the consul's speech. For he not only owned what he had said in the senate, but gloried in it, and refused to submit to any tribunal, but that of the consuls, protesting with a loud voice, and a threatening look, that he would not have vouchsafed to appear in a tumultuous assembly of seditious men, had it not been to reproach them with their crimes, and put some check to their boundless desires. Lastly, he declared his hatred to the tribunes, whom he called the bane of the public happiness.
- It is easy to imagine that such a speech must greatly offend the plebeians. Some of them were for massacring him on the spot. But Sicinnius, thinking it necessary to observe, at least, some appearance of justice, put a stop to the fury of the enraged multitude, and having consulted a part with his colleague, without so much as giving himself the trouble to collect the voices of the assembly, pronounced sentence of death upon him, and ordered him to be thrown down headlong from the top of the Tarpeian rock, a punishment inflicted upon such as were enemies to their country. The
- d ædiles instantly advanced with their officers to put the sentence in execution. But the senate, and all the patricians in the assembly, hastening to his assistance, placed him in the midst of them, determined to oppose force with force. And now the people, either thinking their tribunes had carried their animosity too far, or awed by the presence of the consuls, refused to give assistance to their ædiles; Sicinnius therefore, by the advice of Brutus, resolved to prosecute Coriolanus in a legal way, and to convene the people by tribes for his trial. Of this resolution he gave Coriolanus notice with the following words: We cite thee, Coriolanus, to appear before the people in seven and twenty days. He then added, as for the distribution of corn, if the senate does not take due care of that matter, the tribunes will give directions about it themselves. Having thus
- e spoke, he adjourned the assembly. In the mean time the senate, in order to soothe the people, fixed the price of corn at the lowest rate it ever had been at even before the sedition. The consuls likewise, fearing lest the prosecution of Coriolanus should deter others from speaking their mind freely in the senate, did all that lay in their power to appease the tribunes. Minucius represented to them, that by an immemorial custom, all proceedings in capital cases were to begin in the senate, and that it belonged to the senators to declare whether it was proper to refer them to the people; he added, that the kings themselves had paid this deference to so august a body, and that he hoped the tribunes would not violate the ancient rules of the government, but apply to the senate, if they had any grievances to lay to the charge of Coriolanus; he concluded
- f by assuring them, that according to the nature of the crime, and the solidity of the proofs, the senate would refer the whole matter to the judgment of the people. Sicinnius exclaimed against this proposal, pretending that the affair naturally devolved upon the people, as the supreme court of judicature. But the other tribunes, plainly perceiving that they should make themselves odious even to the plebeians, if they so manifestly deviated from the usual forms of justice, agreed to let the senate decide, as usual, whether the people should take cognizance of the matter depending. However, they insisted upon two conditions, which were; 1st, that the tribunes might be heard in the senate, with relation to the grievances which they pretended they had to lay to the charge of the person accused; 2dly, that the senators, after having been sworn, should deliver their opinions regularly, and the consuls pronounce sentence according to the plurality of voices. These preliminaries being agreed on, the tribunes were introduced into the senate. Decius, the youngest of them, but a man of great eloquence, undertook to shew that it belonged to the people to hear and determine the present cause. He cited a law of Poplicola, by which the plebeians, when ill treated by the patricians, were allowed to bring their complaints before the assembly of the people; he urged, that Coriolanus, having been guilty of a notorious insult on the authority of the people, and the dignity of their tribunes, the people were therefore his legal judges; he exaggerated the heinousness of Coriolanus's offence, and advised the senate to withdraw their protection from so proud and insolent a patrician.

WHEN the tribune had ended his speech, the consuls asked the opinion of the assembly, beginning with the oldest, and most venerable senators; for in those days, says Dionysius, the young senators were not so presumptuous as to make speeches, or to think themselves capable of instructing their elders. They only gave their opinion by some sign, or by walking over to that side which they thought to be most in the right; whence they were called Senatores Pedarii, from the Latin word pes, a foot. Appius Claudius, when it came to his turn to speak, appeared to be still the same man, an irreconcilable enemy to the people; he enumerated with great warmth all the incroachments of the plebeians. At first, said he, they pleaded poverty, and only demanded an abolition of debts. In the beginning of their seditious separation, they seemed to be content with impunity, and leave to return home. After this they thought fit to demand a college of tribunes to protect them against our decrees. The authority of these officers they would have to be sacred, and their persons inviolable. Then, by the help of these new magistrates, they made laws without our privity, despised the authority of the senate and consuls, and disannulled our decrees. And now, by an unheard-of usurpation, they summon a most illustrious patrician to appear at their tribunal, where he is to be tried as a criminal only for delivering his opinion freely. After this he exclaimed against submitting Coriolanus to be tried by the people, or making any concessions to them, and exhorted the senators not to fear a civil war, telling them that both gods and men would join in their defence. But the popular Valerius was of a contrary opinion. He exaggerated the horrible consequences of a civil war, and endeavoured to shew, that their paying some deference to the people and their tribunes was the only means to quiet their fury both against their threatened country and the offender. His opinion prevailed, and it was carried by a majority that Coriolanus should be tried by the people. When the decree was ready to be drawn up, Coriolanus, finding the senate was deserting him, desired to know what crime in particular he was to be accused of; the tribunes answered, that they would confine their whole accusation to the single crime of usurping tyrannical power. Upon that foot, replied Coriolanus, I have nothing to object to the decree of the senate; let it be put in writing; I will appear before the people, and answer that frivolous charge. Thus with the consent of all parties the decree was drawn up, and put into the hands of the tribunes, who immediately assembled the people, read it to them, and exhorted all the citizens of the republic, as well those who dwelt in the country, as the inhabitants of Rome, to be in the forum on the day appointed for the decision of this affair. The decree of the senate allowed the accused seven and twenty days to prepare his defence; during which time the tribunes frequently conferred among themselves, and with the leading men among the plebeians, as if the preservation of the republic had depended on the destruction of Coriolanus.

The senate consents that Coriolanus shall be tried by the people.

WHEN the appointed day came, new disputes arose about the form of the comitia, by which the accused was to be tried. The tribunes had separated the people by tribes before the senators came; whereas from the reign of Servius Tullius the voices had always been gathered by centuries. The consuls were for keeping up the ancient custom, being well apprised that they could save Coriolanus, if the voices were reckoned by centuries, of which the patricians themselves, and the richest citizens made the majority. But the artful tribunes, alledging that in an affair relating to the rights of the people every citizen's vote should have its due weight, would not by any means consent to let the voices be collected otherwise than by tribes. The people being assembled, Minutius the consul spoke first, and endeavoured to persuade the people to be satisfied with Coriolanus's submission in being brought to a trial before them, and not suffer it to be said that so illustrious a citizen underwent the forms of justice like a

- a criminal. But if you persist, said he, and are determined to vote, remember that the whole senate is come hither to sue for his pardon. Will you refuse it to three hundred of the most venerable men in the republic? No; the most bitter enemy can never hold out against such powerful intercessors. Sicinnius answered with a haughty air, that he was not so cowardly as to betray the interests of the people, and that the assembly should not be dismissed till the affair was determined by a majority of voices. Well then, replied Minucius, since you obstinately insist that Coriolanus shall be tried by this assembly, notwithstanding our intreaties, I demand that, pursuant to your agreement with the senate, you confine your accusation to the single article of tyranny, and bring proofs and witnesses of this crime. Sicinnius then began the accusation, and running over the whole life of Coriolanus, represented him as aiming, in every part of it, at regal power.

Coriolanus is tried in an assembly of the people by tribes.

- As soon as the tribune had done speaking, Coriolanus presented himself in the assembly, and answered the calumnies thrown upon his conduct by a bare recital of his services. He first enumerated the many campaigns he had made in the service of the republic. Then he exposed to the view of the people many crowns, with which he had been rewarded by the Roman generals; and every time he shewed the people any of those proofs of his valour, he called upon the commanders, who had honoured him with them, to testify the truth of what he said. He likewise named the many citizens he had saved in battle, and desired them to stand up and witness what he advanced. These men immediately appeared in the midst of the assembly, and stretching out their hands as suppliants, conjured the assembly not to destroy a man, to whom they were indebted for their lives: they offered to take the place of the accused, and to secure his life at the expence of their own. As these were mostly plebeians, their sighs and pressing solicitations made such an impression on the multitude, that they could not refrain from tears. Then Coriolanus, tearing away his robe, shewed his breast all covered with the scars of the many wounds he had received, and at the same time, with an air of confidence mixed with modesty, It was to save these worthy men, said he, that I have received the wounds you see; let the tribunes shew, if they can, how such actions are consistent with the treacherous designs they lay to my charge. Is it easy to believe, that a man, who has done nothing to gain the favour of the people, but hazard his life for them, could have a design of usurping the throne? He had scarce done speaking, when the most worthy men among the plebeians cried out, that so good a citizen ought to be acquitted, and that a man of his birth and merit ought not to have been brought to a trial upon such slight presumptions. Even the most mutinous thought that the accusers had not given sufficient proofs of the crime laid to his charge. So that the assembly was just ready to break up much to the reputation of Coriolanus, when the tribune Decius, alarmed at this change, brought in a new charge against him, viz. that contrary to the Roman laws he had disposed of the spoils taken from the Antiates in his late expedition, during the famine, among his soldiers, instead of delivering them to the quæstor. This, said Decius, is a plain proof of his evil designs: with the public money he secured to himself creatures, and guards, and supporters of his intended usurpation. Let him make it appear that he had power to dispose of the booty without violating the laws: let him answer directly to this one article, without dazzling us with the splendid shew of his crowns and scars, or using any other arts to blind the assembly. Neither Coriolanus nor his friends were prepared for this chicane; so that the tribunes, taking advantage of their surprize, exaggerated this breach of the law: Sicinnius insolently asked him, whether he was king of Rome, and by what authority he had disposed of what belonged to the republic, and the Roman people? All Coriolanus could say was, that those of the people, who had attended him in that expedition, had received the whole benefit of that pillage. But the tribunes, urging he had by that distribution violated a law which was as ancient as Rome itself, rekindled the former animosity of the people against him, especially of those who had not been sharers in the booty. Of this animosity they laid hold as the most favourable opportunity to collect the suffrages, and get Coriolanus condemned to perpetual banishment. Of the twenty-one tribes, but nine voted for him, and the rest against him. The joy of the people upon this great event is not to be imagined: they never expressed more, even after the greatest victories. And indeed not without reason; for by the advantage they had gained over the senate and the nobility, the form of government was absolutely changed, and the plebeians, who had been hitherto dependent on the patricians, were become their judges, and possessed of a right to call before their tribunal the greatest men in the commonwealth, and to decide their fate. As the assembly was dispersing, it was easy to distinguish the patricians from the plebeians by the sorrow or joy which appeared in their countenances. Coriolanus was the only person among the former, who seemed unconcerned. He neither said nor did any thing unworthy of his usual magnanimity. He repaired immediately to his own house, where he found his mother Veturia and Volumnia his wife, drowned in tears, and in the first transports of their grief. He exhorted them in a few words, to behave with constancy and fortitude under the various events of life; and having recommended to them the care of his children, who were yet but infants, he took his leave, not suffering any body to attend him in his exile, except three or four of his clients. A great number of the senators and other patricians attended him to the gate of the city; but he, justly offended at the weakness of their conduct, said not one word to them by the way, and parted from them with the same reproachful silence.

THE illustrious exile spent the first days of his banishment at a country seat of his own in the neighbourhood of Rome. There being left wholly to himself, he could not resist the strong motions of his resentment, but resolved to revenge the affront which the senate had suffered the people to put upon him. Having taken this resolution, he cast his eyes upon the several nations that were neighbours and enemies to Rome, and finding none more exasperated against the Romans, or in a better condition to undertake a war, than the Volsci, he determined to seek a retreat among them, not doubting but he should prevail upon them to espouse his quarrel, and join with him in pursuing their common revenge. The Volsci were at that time a republic consisting of several small cantons united by a league, and governed by an assembly of deputies from each of them. One Attius Tullus, or, as Plutarch calls him, Tullus Amphidius, a man of great experience in war, and who had a considerable interest throughout the whole nation, was then their general. In the late wars between the Romans and the Volsci he had been often encountered, and always conquered in battle by Coriolanus. However the Roman thought he could disclose his resentments, and intrust his life with no body more safely than with a brave man, who perhaps might entertain as great an esteem for him as he had for Attius. He therefore came to a resolution to apply himself directly to him. Accordingly, he left his retreat in disguise, and in the evening entering Anonium, one of the chief cities of the Volsci, where Tullus resided, he went straight to his house with his face covered, and sat down by the hearth of the domestic gods, a place sacred in all the houses of the ancient Pagans. Attius was at supper in an inner apartment, when news was brought him, that a stranger, of a very majestic air, was, without speaking to any body, come into his house, and had placed himself by the hearth of his lares. Attius immediately came out, and asked him who he was, and what he required? Coriolanus then discovered his face; but the other not recognising him, he told him his name, acquainted him with his case, and offered to assist the Volsci against Rome with his counsels, and all his experience in war. Attius immediately gave him his hand, received him with great kindness, and assured him of the friendship of the Volsci. He then led him into his apartment, where they spent the following days in private conferences about the means of punishing Rome for the mischiefs she had done to the Volsci, and the hard usage Coriolanus had received from her. But the great point was how to bring the whole nation to a declaration of war with Rome. The Volsci had suffered greatly in the last war, and had, by yielding some of their towns, and part of their territory, obtained of the republic a truce for two years. As this truce was not yet expired, Tullus, though he had a great interest in the diets of the cantons of his country, could not promise that he should be able to persuade the whole nation to take up arms. However, the two generals found means at last to compass what they desired. The Romans were making great preparations for public sports, which drew crowds of strangers from all parts. The Volsci especially went thither in great numbers, which gave no small uneasiness to the consuls, whose apprehensions were increased by an artifice which the two generals had concerted together. This was to suborn one of the Volsci to go to the consuls, and pretend to make a discovery of a design his countrymen had to set fire to Rome, while the Romans were taken up with the games and public sports in the circus. Livy seems to insinuate, that this scheme was laid without the knowledge of Coriolanus; but Plutarch and Dionysius tell

The consuls immediately made the report of the pretended plot to the senate, and the senate caused the same day a decree to be published throughout the city, ordering all the Volsci to leave it before sun-set on pain of death. The consuls being ordered to see this decree put in execution, caused all the gates of the city to be shut except the gate Capena, through which all the Volsci were drove out with shame and ignominy. Tullus met them as by chance, and hearing how they had been treated, exaggerated the affront they had received. We alone, said he, of all the different nations now in Rome are not thought worthy to see the games. We alone, like the profane wretches and outlaws, are driven from a public festival. Go and tell in all your cities and villages the distinguishing mark the Romans have put upon us. He
- b found no difficulty in exasperating minds already prejudiced; a general diet was tumultuously assembled, when all the deputies were of opinion, that they were at liberty The Volsci resolve upon a war with Rome. to begin the war without waiting till the truce was expired. When Tullus, who conducted the affair, saw his countrymen ready to carry fire and sword into the territory of Rome, he advised them, before they broke up, to send for Coriolanus into their assembly; telling them, that he now bore more enmity to the Romans than they themselves, and was capable of doing them more hurt than they had received from them. The Roman was accordingly sent for, and being introduced into the assembly, he related his misfortunes, made a merit of choosing a retreat among the Volsci, rather than among the Latins, Hetrurians, Sabines, &c. persuaded them to demand
- c back all the cities the Romans had taken from them; and lastly, offered to assist their generals with his counsels and sword, without aspiring to any command in their armies. His speech was received with great applause, and ambassadors were dispatched to Rome to demand the restoration of the lands and cities which had been taken in the late war. But the only answer they brought back was this; that the Romans would not give up what they had conquered, and that if the Volsci were the first to take arms, the Romans would be the last to lay them down. Upon this the Volsci unanimously appointed Tullus and Coriolanus to command their troops, and to bind the latter more strictly to them, conferred on him the dignity of senator. The two generals immediately raised a numerous army, which they divided into two bodies; Tullus with one Coriolanus appointed to command their troops.
- d staid in the country to cover it on the side of Latium, while Coriolanus with the other, consisting of the flower of the Volscian troops, entered the territory of Rome, before the consuls had taken any measures to oppose him, and there made himself master of Giræum, Corbis, Vitellium, and Trebia. Toleria, Bola, Labitum, and Pedum, all in Latium, or on the confines of that country, were taken sword in hand, and the inhabitants given up to the fury of an enemy victorious and enraged. As this irruption was not expected, Coriolanus found many Roman citizens dispersed about the country, and these he made slaves. He burnt their farms, carried away their cattle, broke in pieces all their instruments of husbandry, and in short carried fire and sword into all parts. However, in that general devastation, either out of regard to his old friends, or to keep up a reciprocal animosity between the two parties, he spared the houses and lands of the patricians. This conduct had the desired effect. The plebeians complained of the patricians, as if they had brought so formidable an enemy upon them. The patricians on the other hand upbraided the people with having forced so great a captain to throw himself in despair into the party of the enemy. As mutual distrust, suspicion and hatred reigned in both parties, they were not so eager to repulse the Volsci, as to decry and ruin each other: so that Coriolanus finding no army in the field to oppose his designs, carried on his conquests, took Lavinium, and at length came and incamped at the Fossa Cluilia within five miles of Rome. The consternation in the city was then general. The people, terrified at the approach of so formidable an
- e enemy, hastened into the forum, and there with loud cries demanded peace, and the abolition of the decree of Coriolanus's banishment. But the senate, who had formerly protected the exile, now refused to comply with the demands of the people, either to clear themselves from the suspicion of maintaining a correspondence with Coriolanus, or perhaps out of that spirit of generosity, which made the Romans averse from peace, when they were attended with bad success in war. However that be, the Roman general no sooner understood the opposition the senate made to his return, but he advanced to Rome, and invested the place, as if he designed to besiege it. As he continued there that evening, and a good part of the next day, without making any motion, the Romans imagined he only waited for an opportunity of reconciling himself with his country. The senate therefore resolved to send a deputation to him, consisting of The people are for recalling him from banishment. five five senators, who had been his most zealous friends. These were M. Minucius, Posthumus Cominius, Sp. Lartius, P. Pinarius, and Q. Sulpicius, who had all been consuls. When Coriolanus understood that the deputies were coming, he pleased himself with the thought of humbling those proud republicans. He made them pass through two ranks of soldiers standing to their arms, and gave them audience sitting, and surrounded by the most considerable men among the Volsci. Minucius, who had been his chief advocate, put him in mind of the regard the patricians had always shewn him, and endeavoured to excuse, in some measure, the people, of whom nine tribes had voted for him. He expostulated with him for carrying his resentment to such an excess, reminded him of the instability of fortune, and lastly, invited him to throw himself into the arms of his native city, which stretched them out, like a tender mother, to receive him into her bosom. Coriolanus answered with a haughty air, that as general of the Volsci he must advise them to apply to the nation he served, and in a suppliant manner sue to them for peace, which he engaged to procure for them, upon condition that Rome restored to the Volsci the country she had taken from them, granted them the same rights of citizenship which she had granted to the Latins, and recalled the Roman colonies from those towns, of which she had got possession unjustly. As to the liberty offered him of going back to Rome, he said it was not worth his acceptance. Is a bare re-establishment in Rome, said he, a sufficient satisfaction for the affronts I have received? Can there be any safety for me, while a Sicinnius or a Decius is able to arm the populace against my life? No; Rome is an unnatural mother, who has cast off a son that was useful to her, and zealous for her glory. She shall soon know by the effects of my resentment, whose cause it is that the gods espouse. Having thus spoke in a haughty strain what concerned the interests of the Volsci, and his own injuries, he assumed a more gentle air towards the deputies, assured them, that he remembered with pleasure his obligations to them, returned them thanks for the generous protection they granted to his wife and children, and told them, that to shew his gratitude, he would even allow the Romans a truce for thirty days with respect to the proper territory of Rome; but that after the expiration of that time, he should expect from them a decisive answer^a.

Coriolanus employed the thirty days in making new conquests in Latium, and then returned and incamped before Rome with all his forces. The senate had spent the thirty days in deliberations, and the result of their debates may give us a true notion of the temper of those haughty republicans. They resolved never to receive law from their enemy, nor treat of peace with him, till he had laid down his arms, and retired from the territory of Rome, and from those of her allies. Their pride did not abate, notwithstanding the present calamity. They chose ten new deputies to carry this message to Coriolanus, who returned them this short answer, that the Romans had no choice but compliance with the articles, or war; and that he allowed them three days more to come to a final determination. He even refused to hear their reply, threatening to treat them as spies, if they did not quit his camp immediately. The report of the deputies threw the city into the utmost consternation. All that could be done in this universal dejection, was to appoint every one his post, either on the ramparts, the capitol, or in the towers. The tribunes were not now so much as heard of; the consuls, being at a loss what to do, assembled the senate; expedient upon expedient was proposed, and at last they all agreed to send a new deputation to the enemy's camp, consisting of all the ministers of the gods, with which they thought Coriolanus could not but be affected. Accordingly, all the priests, augurs, sacrificers, and guardians of the sacred things, were ordered to march out of the city in their pompous habits, and to conjure Coriolanus, by the respect he owed to the gods, to grant peace to his country. But this deputation was as fruitless as the former. Coriolanus sent them back to the city with orders to acquaint the senate, that the attack would immediately begin, if they did not submit to the conditions which he had proposed in the name of the Volscian nation.

Upon the return of the priests, they all looked upon the republic as lost; the men ran in disorder to the walls, and the women in despair to the temples, especially to that of Jupiter in the capitol, where, with tears in their eyes, they implored of the tutelar gods of Rome the preservation of their country, then on the brink of ruin. Such was the face of affairs in the city, when a Roman matron, named Valeria, sister of the

- a famous Valerius Poplicola, as if she had been moved by a kind of divine inspiration, turned to the other matrons, who were come in crowds to the temple of Jupiter, and suggested to them a resolution which saved Rome. Let us not suffer ourselves, said she to them, to sink under our present afflictions. What men could not do, women may perhaps accomplish. We may perhaps soften the heart of a conqueror hitherto inflexible. Let us go in this mournful dress to the house of Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, and agree with her to repair to the camp of her son. Coriolanus will never be able to hold out against the tears of his mother, his wife, and his children, when attended with all the women of distinction in Rome. This motion being approved of by all who were present, they went straight to the house of Veturia, whom they found with Volumnia, her daughter-in-law, deploring their own misfortunes, and those of Rome. Volumnia, surprised to see so many women of distinction crowd to her, asked what had brought them to a house overwhelmed with sorrow? You, replied Valeria, are the only refuge we have left in our misfortunes. We come to intreat you to preserve our estates, our honour and our liberty from the Volsci. Repair then with us to the camp of Coriolanus, and bring with you Volumnia, and these tender children, who may soften the heart of their beloved father. Your presence will persuade him to prefer the preservation of his destitute family to the pursuit of his resentment, and the honours he may expect from the Volsci. Nothing can be more glorious for you, Veturia, than to recover your son, deliver your country, and save the lives of your fellow-citizens. Make no delay, since the danger is great, and requires a speedy remedy. At these words Veturia burst out into tears, recollected herself a moment, and then replied; Alas! my interest in Coriolanus is but a poor refuge. What impressions can women make on a warrior spirited by revenge? I am not wanting in affection to my country; but what am I now in my son's eyes more than other Roman women, who share the aversion he has for Rome? This he sufficiently shewed at his departure into banishment. Coriolanus, said he to us, is now lost to you for ever. I have no longer either mother, wife, or children. I renounce all, even my domestic gods. Can we then hope to soften so hard a heart? What shall we persuade him to do? To love a country, which has treated him so injuriously? To betray a nation, which has received him in its bosom? Shall we desire him to shew compassion for a people, who had none for him? Let me spend my days, Valeria, in grief and sorrow, and don't force me to suffer the mortification of a refusal, which will be equally dishonourable to Coriolanus and his mother. But Valeria renewing her intreaties, and with her all the Roman matrons embracing her knees, and conjuring her not to refuse her country this last assistance, Veturia, at length overcome, promised to comply with their request, if the senate agreed to it. Valeria immediately gave advice of this design to the consuls, who proposed it in the senate, where, after long debates, it was approved of by the fathers. Then Veturia, and the most illustrious of the Roman matrons, in a great many chariots, which the consuls had ordered to be got ready for them, took their way to the enemy's camp. Coriolanus being informed by his scouts, that his mother, his wife, and a great number of other women were coming to his camp, determined to receive them with the same respect that he had paid to the ministers of religion, but in the main to grant them nothing; for he was well apprised of the views the Romans had in so unheard-of a deputation. But notwithstanding his resolution, he no sooner saw his mother and wife at the head of this troop of women, than he began to relent. He walked out of his tent, and ordering his lictors to lower their fasces before persons so dear to him, he ran hastily to embrace them. They expressed their joy upon seeing each other again chiefly by tears; and when they had given some time to the first emotions of nature, Veturia began to enter upon the subject, for which she came. Coriolanus, that he might not give any umbrage to the Volsci, called the chief officers of his army to be witnesses of what passed in this interview. They were no sooner come, than Veturia told him, that the Roman matrons, who attended her, had omitted nothing, during his absence, that could comfort her and his wife Volumnia in their affliction; that they were come to beg peace of him once more, and to conjure him, by all that was dear to him, to turn his arms against other enemies, &c. Coriolanus replied, that he could not think of betraying the interests of a nation that had trusted him with the command of their army, and honoured him with a place in their senate; that he had found more honours at Antium, than he had lost at Rome, and that nothing would be wanting to his happiness, if she and Volumnia would leave the ungrateful city, and come and enjoy among the Volsci the honours which they would pay to the mother and wife of their general. The Volscian officers seemed very much pleased with this answer; but Veturia, without entering into a comparison between Rome and Antium, which would have offended ^a them, told her son, that she would never require any thing of him that might be a blemish upon his honour; but that without being any ways wanting in what he owed to the Volsci, he might mediate a peace equally advantageous to both nations. Then raising her voice, she added; and can you, my son, reject a proposal so equitable? can you prefer a cruel and obstinate revenge to the tears and intreaties of your mother? consider, that your answer is to decide the fate of my glory, and of my life too. A Roman woman knows how to die, when her honour calls upon her so to do. If I cannot move you, know I have resolved to give myself death in your presence. You shall not march to Rome without treading under your feet the body of her, to whom you owe your being. Veturia perceiving her speech made a deep impres- ^b sion on his mind, continued her discourse, conjuring him by the great Jupiter, who presided in the capitol, and by the manes of his father and ancestors, to withdraw his troops from before Rome, and allow the Romans for her sake a truce for a year, that in this interval measures might be taken to procure a solid and lasting peace. Grant this, my son, said she, and if my tears and prayers are not able to move you, behold your mother at your feet, imploring of you the preservation of her country. With these words, melting in tears, she embraced his knees; his wife and children did the same, and all the Roman matrons, who were with them, begged for mercy by their cries and tears. Coriolanus, seeing his mother at his feet, could hold out no longer, but amidst a struggle with different passions cried out, ah, my mother, you ^c disarm me, and tenderly pressing her hand in lifting her up, he added in a low voice, Rome is saved; but your son is lost; well foreseeing that the Volsci would never forgive him the regard he was going to pay to her intreaties. He then retired into his tent with his mother, wife, and children, and there conferred with the two persons that were most dear to him about the measures he should take with respect to the Volsci and to the Romans. The articles agreed on were these; 1st, that Coriolanus should decamp the next day without committing any hostilities in the Roman territory; 2dly, that after he had assembled the chiefs of the Volsci, he should use his utmost endeavours to persuade them to conclude a peace with Rome upon reasonable terms; 3dly, that if the Volsci would not hearken to an accommodation, he should then lay down the ^d command of their army, which would probably be a means to bring them to a better temper. Veturia, after a conference so beneficial to her country, taking leave of her son, returned in the evening with the other Roman ladies to Rome, where they were received with the acclamations of the whole city. The senate desired them to ask what reward they pleased for so important a service. But Veturia, after having consulted with the others, replied, that they asked nothing but leave to build a temple at their own expence to the Fortune of women. The senate, applauding their disinterestedness, ordered both the temple and the statue to be erected at the expence of the public, in the very place where Veturia had overcome the obstinacy of her son. Valeria, who had proposed so successful a deputation, was the first priestess of this sanctuary, ^e which was much frequented by the Roman women ^a.

His mother prevails upon him to raise the siege of Rome.

EARLY next morning Coriolanus led back his troops into the country of the Volsci, and there divided all the spoil among his soldiers, without reserving any thing for himself. This liberality increased their affection to him, so that they made his apology where-ever they went. However, some murmured at the respect he had shewn for his mother and country. Among these was Attius Tullus, who, growing jealous of the esteem and credit which his rival had gained with the soldiers, publicly gave out that he had betrayed the interest of the Volsci. Hereupon Coriolanus desired he might be allowed to clear his conduct before the general council of the nation. An assembly was accordingly held; but while Coriolanus was beginning to answer the charge ^f brought against him by his adversaries, Tullus, who no less feared his eloquence than his valour, raised a tumult, by the advantage of which some of the opposite faction suborned by Tullus, threw themselves upon him, and stabbed him. The soldiers, who had served under him, greatly lamented his death, and the people of Antium performed his obsequies with great pomp, and erected a stately tomb to his memory. The Romans had their reasons of state for not decreeing him the same funeral honours. For he had born arms against his country, and was not yet reconciled to Rome by a regular treaty. However, the Roman ladies, upon their presenting a petition to the

- a senate, obtained leave to wear mourning for him ten months. Such was the end of the famous Marcus, surnamed Coriolanus, who, for his eminent virtues, and great services, deserved a much better treatment both from the Romans and the Volsci. He was descended from one of the most illustrious patrician families in Rome. He had an excellent understanding, was frugal, disinterested, of strict probity, and inviolably attached to the observation of the laws. These pacific virtues were never known to be accompanied with a more heroic courage, or so great a capacity for the art of war. Rome never bred a more able general: he was always successful, because always equally brave and prudent. But he was imperious, inexorably severe, and so far from affecting popularity, that he ran into the other extreme, which passed for pride. Tho' b he was too haughty for a republican, his country has ever honoured him as one of her heroes, and history has done him the justice to say, that he could, at the head of a Roman army, have more enlarged the dominions of the republic, than all the generals, who went before him. But unhappy factions hindered Rome from reaping any benefit from his virtues. But she was at last sensible of the loss she had suffered by banishing him; and her own misfortunes taught her how many calamities she might have avoided, and how many conquests gained, if she had not provoked a man of such eminent parts.

UPON the news of Coriolanus's death, the consuls ventured to take the field. These were Sp. Nautius and Sextus Furius, men of no experience in war or courage. They incamped separately on eminences at a small distance from the enemy. But though the Æqui and Volsci, who had entered into a confederacy against Rome, quarrelled about the choice of a general, and even fought a bloody battle, the timorous consuls did not venture to attack them in their retreat, but led their troops back to Rome, where they were received with the hisses of the people b.

THE people had of late placed such persons at their head as were pliable and submissive, without regarding any other qualifications; but having experienced the inconveniencies of being governed by men of little merit, they resolved for the future to change their conduct; and therefore chose two consuls, who had given distinguishing proofs of their courage and skill in war, Aquilius Tuscus, and Sicinnius Sabinus.

- d The former gained a compleat victory over the Hernici, and the latter over the Volsci, who had been so formidable under the command of Coriolanus: their army was intirely defeated, their camp taken, and their general Attius Tullus killed in the battle. This victory being of greater consequence than that of Aquilius, Sicinnius was decreed a triumph, and the other only an ovation. These consuls were succeeded by Sp. Cassius, who had been twice consul before, and had obtained a triumph, and Proculus Virginius, a patrician of known courage. The latter marched against the Æqui, who upon the approach of the Roman army retired with all their effects into their cities. The consul therefore, who was not in a condition to undertake sieges, returned to Rome. It had fallen to Cassius's lot to make war with the Hernici; and accordingly he took the field, and entering their country, by the mere terror of his arms reduced them to submit, and sue for peace and an alliance with the republic. The consul however would not settle the conditions of the alliance, till they had first obtained a decree of the senate for it; which deference so obliged the fathers, that they empowered Cassius to draw up the articles of the treaty himself, promising to ratify whatever he should determine. This mark of distinction emboldened the consul to demand the honours of a triumph, which, though not due to him, for he had gained no victory, yet were granted. He was no sooner honoured with a second triumph, than he drew up the conditions of the treaty with the Hernici, which was only a copy of the treaty he had made with the Latins in his second consulship. This condescension gave no small umbrage to the senate; f they could not bear that a foreign nation, but just reconciled to Rome, should be raised at once to equal honours and privileges with the Latins, who were allied to them by blood, and had done them many important services. As Cassius was a man naturally vain and ostentatious, some penetrating republicans began to suspect that in thus favouring the Hernici, he had private views prejudicial to the state. And indeed he soon convinced them, that his views and interests were very different from those of the commonwealth. For the very next day after his triumph, having, according to custom, convened an assembly of the people, to give them an account of what he had done for the service of the republic during the campaign, among other things he told them, that he proposed, before the end of his magistracy, to render the condition of the plebeians ^a so happy, that they should no longer envy that of the patricians. The next day he assembled the senate, and there made a long speech in praise of the plebeians, which he concluded by proposing a new division of the lands belonging to the public, saying, it was but reasonable, that the lands, taken from the enemy, should be divided among those who had exposed their lives to enlarge the bounds of the republic. He added, that he likewise thought it reasonable that the poor citizens should be reimbursed what money they had paid in the late famine for the corn, which Gelo, one of the princes of Sicily, had made a present of to the republic, and which ought to have been distributed gratis among the people. Both these proposals were rejected by the senate with great indignation. Most of the senators, without any respect to the dignity of Cassius, ^b publicly reproached him with his pride, his ambition, and the desire he betrayed of raising new troubles in the commonwealth. But Cassius, flattering himself that the people would declare in his favour, convened a new assembly, and having there bitterly inveighed against the patricians, he exhorted the multitude to free themselves at once from the indigence to which the avarice of the nobility had reduced them, by making a solemn law for the partition of the conquered lands in their own favour. He did not stop here; but advised them, by the same law, to admit the Latins and Hernici to share with them in the distribution. To make the people relish this part of his proposal, he insinuated to them, that by this means those two nations would be united with them in one common interest, and consequently would not fail to support them in ^c case of any attempt made by the patricians to drive them from their possessions. This law, as it related to the division of lands, was called the Agrarian law from the Latin word ager, signifying land. The people at first received the proposal with great applause. But the tribunes, displeased to see a consul author of a law, which favoured the people, opposed it to the utmost of their power, and brought over to them great numbers of the people, who at first had been fond of Cassius, and had blamed both tribunes and patricians as betraying their interest. It is a shame, said the tribunes, to suffer lands, which you have acquired by your blood, to be profusely distributed among allies, who had no share in your conquests. Why are the Hernici to have one third of their lands left to them? Ought they not, as a conquered people, to be intirely deprived of them? There ^d is, without all doubt, O Romans, a design upon your liberty. Your slavery will be the consequence of this fatal division of lands, which the artful consul would make between you and foreigners. By that extraordinary distribution of lands between the conquerors and the conquered, he designs to make the old enemies of Rome his creatures, to the prejudice of the republic, and to plane himself a way to sovereign power. One day, when Cassius, and his colleague Virginus, who opposed this law, were disputing before the people, Rabulcius, a cunning tribune, addressed them both thus: Is not your dispute, whether the people of Rome shall themselves take possession of all the conquered lands, or share them with the Hernici and Latins? The consuls agreed it was. Upon which the tribune, turning to the people, Our consuls agree, said he, as to the main point; neither of them is for ^e excluding you from the lands in dispute. Lose no time therefore, Romans, in taking possession of what is unanimously granted you. As for the other article, leave it to be considered of hereafter. This advice pleased the people, who were for having the clause in favour of foreigners dropt. But Cassius, who was fond of his own scheme, dismissed the assembly before they came to any resolution. As the people were then all inclined to favour Virginus, Cassius did not appear for some days in public, pretending to be indisposed, but in reality contriving new expedients to get his law passed. To this end he brought as many Latins to Rome as he could, for they had the privileges of Roman citizens. But Virginus, aware of his colleague's design, published a decree, commanding all those, who were not inhabitants of Rome, to leave it immediately. ^f Cassius, on the other hand, made a contrary edict, declaring it lawful for any one, who was inrolled among the citizens of Rome, to remain there; so that a sedition was like to ensue. The senate assembled to prevent the calamities which seemed to threaten the state. Several opinions were offered: Appius Claudius, that intrepid defender of the laws, spoke first, and opposed the Cassian law in both its parts. He was against distributing the lands either to Romans or foreigners; inveighed against Virginus for shewing too much indulgence to the people and their tribunes; proposed selling part both of the newly conquered lands, and of those which some of the nobility had usurped; and depositing the money arising from the sale, in the treasury, for defraying the charges of the war; and lastly, moved, that a college of ten senators, under the

- a the name of Decemviri, might be created to measure these lands, and determine the differences which might arise about their limits. A. Sempronius Stratinus, a man much respected by the senate, spoke next, and after having highly approved of Appius's advice, observed that there were two sorts of lands to be disposed of; some, which were formerly conquered by the Romans, without the assistance of their allies; and these he thought ought to be divided between the public and the indigent Romans only; others that had been lately conquered from the Hernici, by the assistance of the Latins; and these he was for dividing between the public, the Romans, the Latins, and the Hernici, who were now become allies. As to the creation of the Decemvirs, he seconded that motion. Pursuant to the advice of these two senators, a senatus consultum, or
- b decree of the senate, was drawn up, by which it was enacted, that ten of the fathers, who had been consuls, should be appointed to divide the conquered lands between the treasury, the Romans, and their allies; that for the future all the lands the Romans should conquer with the assistance of their allies, should be divided between the public treasury, the citizens of Rome, and those allies; and lastly, that the choice of the first decemvirs should be left to the consuls of the ensuing year. As the estates of the principal men in Rome lay wholly in those conquered lands, they got this last article added to the decree, in order to put off the execution of it. Nay, the chief men in the senate resolved among themselves to impeach Cassius, and prosecute him to the utmost, in order to deter others from stirring in this affair. Accordingly, the two new consuls, Q. Fabius, and Servius Cornelius, were no sooner entered upon their office, but the quaestors, Casus Fabius, brother to the first consul, and Valerius, nephew to the great Poplicola, having convened an assembly of the people, according to the power annexed to their office, accused Cassius of having introduced foreign troops into the city with a design to usurp the sovereignty. The charge being plainly proved by the depositions of the Latins, and Hernici themselves, Cassius was condemned by the unanimous voice of all his fellow-citizens, and thrown down headlong from the top of the Tarpeian rock.^c Some writers tell us, that as soon as the two new consuls had taken possession of their dignity, Cassius's own father accused him to the senate of having aspired to the sovereignty, and that, like another Brutus, having laid the
- c proofs of his crime before the assembly of the people, he took him home to his own house, and there caused him to be put to death in the presence of his whole family.^d

The senate decree a partition of the conquered lands.

Sp. Cassius is condemned and executed.

- THE pride of the patricians, and their contemptuous treatment of the people, made the poorer citizens regret the loss of Cassius, who had been their zealous defender. The consuls put off from day to day the nominating the decemvirs for the distribution of the lands, notwithstanding the solicitation of the tribunes to have the agrarian law put in execution. This provoked the people, who, being stirred up by the seditious harangues of their tribunes, began to hold private assemblies, and threaten both the consuls and the senate. Every thing seemed to tend to a revolt, when the consuls had recourse to the old expedient of amusing the people with a war. But as they were
- e well apprised that the tribunes would oppose the necessary levies, they caused a rumor to be spread, that they were going to create a dictator, and that Appius Claudius would be chosen. The very name of a man so severe, and so much dreaded by the multitude, made such an impression on the people, that they lifted themselves without delay. Cornelius entered the country of the Veientes, and Q. Fabius that of the Volsci: both consuls were attended with good success. Fabius returned with a great booty in spoils, cattle, and slaves, but sold the whole, and put the money into the hands of the quaestors, without giving the least part of it to his soldiers. And now this year being expired, Casus Fabius the quaestor, and Amilius Mamercinus were chosen consuls in the comitia by centuries. Amilius marched against the Volsci, by whom he was
- f defeated in the field; but the enemy having attacked his camp, after he had received a strong reinforcement from his colleague, he sallied out upon them, put them to flight, and laid waste their country. During the absence of the consuls, the senate, to divert the people's minds from the Agrarian law, ordered the consecration of the temple of Castor and Pollux, which had been vowed by Posthumus at the battle of Regillus. In the mean while the time for electing new consuls being come, M. Fabius, brother to Quintus and Casus, and L. Valerius, who in his quaestorship had been instrumental in the destruction of Cassius, were chosen. During their consulship, the war with the Volsci breaking out anew, the tribune Manius protested against any levies for the service, till the decemvirs were named for executing the Agrarian laws. The consuls, to a extricate themselves from this perplexity, carried their tribunal out of Rome, beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunes, which was confined within the walls of the city. They then sent a summons to the people; and if any one refused to appear, or give in his name, they ordered his house in the country to be demolished, and his lands laid waste. Thus without having any contests with the tribunes, they brought the people to their duty, and soon formed two armies, one to march against the Veientes, the other against the Volsci. The consuls, distrusting their troops, which consisted of men ill affected to them, and for the most part enlisted against their will, agreed to act only upon the defensive. This agreement was observed by Fabius, who marched against the Veientes; but Valerius came to an engagement with the Volsci, which proved very bloody without any considerable advantage on either side; for both armies, after having fought many hours with incredible fury, retired, as it were, by common consent to their respective camps. The friends of Valerius at Rome gave out, that it was through want of affection in the soldiers to their general, that he had not gained a complete victory; but the soldiers in all their letters accused their general of incapacity in military affairs. The consuls detained their soldiers in the field as long as possible, to avoid new disturbances; but the time for the election of new magistrates drawing near, they were obliged to return to Rome, and then discord raged again with more fury than ever. The patricians were for promoting Appius Claudius, son of the famous Appius, who had so signally shewed his aversion to the people. But as often as the consuls ordered the centuries to assemble, the tribunes at the head of the people made so much noise, and raised such violent and bitter contests, that it was impossible to proceed to the election. The consuls and the senate endeavoured to appease the tumult; but to no effect, the tribunes telling them, that unless they chose men of unquestionable characters, they should find means to prevent any election, and that they would not suffer tyrants to be imposed upon them for magistrates. As these disputes threatened a sedition, the senate agreed to reduce the republic for some time to an inter-regnum, and commit the administration of affairs to some venerable old men, who should govern by turns, and take care to provide new consuls. S. Atra- tinus was the first who took upon him the care of public affairs, according to this scheme; and from that time all other authority ceased in Rome. To him, a few days after, succeeded Sp. Lartius, a man of a pacific disposition, who managed both parties so artfully, that he prevailed on each to abate somewhat of their demands. It was concluded, that the election should be made as usual, and by the votes of the centuries, and that the two parties should agree before-hand upon the persons who should be raised to the consulate. Union being re-established upon these conditions, they proceeded only for form sake to the election. The tribunes got the consular dignity bestowed upon C. Julius Julius, who was of the people's party. The patricians named for his colleague Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who, without having ever offended the people, had on all occasions stood up for the rights of the senate. As for the promotion of Appius, the patricians, fearing the opposition of the tribunes might raise a fatal sedition, thought it adviseable to defer it to more peaceable times. The tribunes made some opposition to the new levies, in hopes of getting the decemvirs named, and obtaining the partition of the lands. But Fabius, notwithstanding their opposition, raised such a number of troops, as enabled him to take the field, and ravage the country of the Veientes.*

The republic

The civil feuds break out afresh.

THE civil feuds broke out afresh upon the next election of consuls. The people insisted on chusing patricians of their party, and the senate were for electing such only as were in the interest of the nobility. Each party stood to its pretensions with equal warmth; but at length the affair was accommodated, and they agreed to go by the same rule as in the last election. The senate, named Cajo Fabius, who in his quaestor-ship had destroyed Cassius, and the people Sp. Furius. The Aequi and the Veientes, having renewed their incursions, the consuls ordered the people to take arms. But Sp.
Isilius, one of the tribunes, revived the old quarrel about the division of lands, and declared he would vigorously oppose all the decrees that should be issued by the senate, let the matter of them be what it would, till the decemvirs were named. In the mean time the Aequi and Veientes with fire and sword laid waste the territory of Rome, without the consuls being able to take the field, through the obstinacy of the tribunes,

- a who prevented their making any levies. In this perplexity Appius thought of an expedient, which proved very successful. This was, to gain over some of the tribunes; for if the opposition of a single tribune could suspend the execution of a decree of the senate, he concluded, that it had the same force as to the resolutions of his colleagues. The senators therefore applied themselves to gain the friendship of the tribunes, wherein they succeeded, four of that college declaring in a public assembly, that they could not bear that the enemy should thus lay waste the country with impunity. The opposition of Isidius being therefore over-ruled, the people took arms. Furius being beloved by his soldiers, had a successful campaign, and gained very considerable advantages over the Æqui. But the troops of Fabius, who were to act against the
- b Vientes, chose rather to lose their own glory, than gain any honour for their general. They refused to pursue the enemy, after they had put their troops to flight, lest by making the victory complete, they should procure Fabius a triumph at his return to Rome. Neither did they stop here; but the night following, they struck their tents without orders, and began their march towards the city. The consul, finding it impossible to govern them, put the best face he could upon the matter, sounded a retreat, and returned with them.

The senate by a stratagem carry their point against Isidius, and make the necessary levies.

- As it was now become customary in the republic to have one of the consuls chosen according to the inclinations of the people, and the other according to those of the senate, the patricians cast their eyes again upon the Fabian family, and raised to the
- c consulship M. Fabius a second time, notwithstanding his brother Cæso had been so disagreeable to the army the year before; and the people promoted Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus. In their consulship the Hetrurians, encouraged by the divisions in Rome, invaded the Roman territory with a numerous army. Pontificius, one of the tribunes, renewed the old dispute; but the senate, having gained some of their college, an army of twenty thousand men was raised, and equally divided between the two consuls, who taking the field, incamped near each other; but had so little dependance on the affection of their troops, that they kept within their intrenchments. In the mean time lightning falling upon the tent of the consul Manlius, the augurs declared that his camp would be taken by the enemy; upon which prediction he quitted it the
- d same night, and joined his army to that of Fabius. The Hetrurians, interpreting the omen to their advantage, seized the deserted camp, and then insulted the united armies in their intrenchments. Upon this, those very soldiers, who a little before had agreed not to come to a battle, began to complain of their commanders for not leading them out against the enemy. The generals seemed to consult together whether it were proper to engage the enemy; but their true design was to increase the eagerness of the soldiers by further delays. Accordingly, they grew so impatient to fall upon the insulting Hetrurians, that the consuls were obliged to take away their arms, lest they should come to an engagement without orders. Then they crowded about the generals tents, making great clamours; and Fabius laid hold of that opportunity to reproach
- e them with their former behaviour, and to increase their ardor by expressing a diffidence of their courage and honour. He had no sooner ended his speech, but they all cried out with one voice, Lead us on, and lay aside your suspicions. One Flevoletius, a centurion, in great esteem among the troops, hearing these words, got upon an eminence, and thus addressed himself to the consuls: I plainly see you have not quite laid aside your distrust of us; and indeed you have reason to fear that we shall not all answerably to our promises. But for my part, at least, I declare I will behave in the battle like a true Roman. Fellow soldiers, continued he, do you take the same oath that I am now going to take. At which words he drew his sword, and lifting it up towards heaven, cried out, O great Jupiter, Mars, and thou god, whosoever thou art, who punishest breach of faith, I call you
- f to witness that I will never return to Rome till I have conquered. The consuls, inferior officers, and all the soldiers, took the same oath, and confirmed it by sacrifices. Then the consuls restored the soldiers their arms, and marched them out of the camp in silence and good order to take possession of an advantageous post, where they drew them up in battalia. On the other hand, the Hetrurians were surprised to see the cowardly Romans come out of their intrenchments, and offer them battle. As this was a thing they did not expect, they had not brought the soldiers of the two camps together. However, either of their armies was considerably more numerous than that of the Romans; and besides, it was confidently reported, that the Romans would betray their generals, and desert them in the heat of the engagement. Full of these hopes, they sounded the charge. The consul Manlius commanded the right wing of the Roman army, Q. Fabius the left, and M. Fabius, the other consul, the main a body. Both armies advanced with great shouts, and came to a close engagement. The front of the right wing of the Hetrurians being more extended than that of the left wing of the Romans, and more numerous, Fabius, with great difficulty, withstood the multitude that faced him. However, he had broke into a great body of Veientes, and put them in disorder, when an Hetrurian, of a gigantic stature, attacking him, plunged his lance into his breast. Fabius drew it out, but soon after fell from his horse, and died. Upon his death the left wing was surrounded, which the consul Fabius hearing, he immediately quitted his post, and flew to their assistance, with his brother Cajo, and such troops as he could confide in, and finding the Romans, disheartened at the loss of their leader, giving way, and ready to betake themselves b to a disorderly flight, he cried out; Fellow soldiers, have you forgot your oaths? Will you shamefully fly back to the camp? Are you more afraid of the Hetrurians than of Jupiter and Mars? Having uttered these words, he threw himself with his brother Cajo into the midst of the enemy, and being seconded by the troops he brought with him, obliged the Hetrurians to retire with great slaughter. In the right wing, commanded by Manlius, the Romans fought with great courage and resolution, till the brave consul being wounded, was carried out of the field. Then his absence, and the report of his death, made a great alteration on that side. The Romans began to lose ground, but the consul Fabius and his brother appearing unexpectedly in the first ranks, and assuring the frightened Romans that the enemy's right wing and main body were put to c flight, and that the consul Manlius was still alive, they returned to the charge, and would have gained a compleat victory, if a new battle had not begun in another place. A body of Veientes in the heat of the action fell upon the Roman camp, which was guarded by a small number of troops, and were ready to enter it, when Manlius, wounded, as he was, hearing of their danger, caused himself to be carried thither. But while, forgetful of his wound, he was defending at the head of a small body of chosen horse one of the avenues to the camp, his strength being quite exhausted, he fell from his horse, and being surrounded by the enemy, was killed on the spot. His death was followed by the taking of the camp, the Romans, who defended it, being d overpowered with numbers. Hereupon the consul Fabius, who was still engaged in the plain, leaving his men, came unexpectedly upon the Hetrurians, retook the camp, and then hastening back to the field of battle, gave the finishing stroke to the defeat of the enemy, who retired into their intrenchments in disorder. Thus the Romans gained the victory; but it cost them dear, one of the consuls, the surviving consul's brother, and a greater number of persons of distinction being killed than in any former action. The consul was so affected with the death of his brother, that at his return to Rome, he declined the honours of a triumph, which had been decreed him, while he was yet in the camp. He entered the city in mourning, bringing with him the bodies of his colleague and brother, and mounting the rostra, made a panegyric on those two heroes, without saying any thing of his own exploits. As he was now the e sole governor of the republic, he was afraid of countenancing the least appearance of monarchy, and therefore he abdicated the consulship, two months before it expired, and leaving the government in an inter-regnum, retired to cure the wounds he had received in the action. This modest and generous behaviour in a person of so great merit gained him the hearts of the people; so that from this time the Fabii became popular f.

The consul Cajo Fabius advises the senate to put the Agrarian law in execution.

THE Roman people assembling in the campus Martius chose Cajo Fabius the third time: so that now the three brothers had enjoyed that office for seven years successively. The colleague, whom the centuries gave him, was T. Virginus. The new magistrates had no sooner entered upon their office, but Fabius, actuated by his new affection for the f people, laboured to reconcile them to the senate. The demands of the people, about the distribution of the conquered lands, and the refusal of the patricians, had been too long the source of divisions in the republic. The consul therefore, before the tribunes had presented any petition on that head, which they did every year, exhorted the senators to prevent the complaints of the people, and put an end to the daily disturbances, by making the distribution of those lands themselves. But Fabius was not heard; some rallied him on his new zeal for the interests of the people, others murmured, and some even accused him of ambition. He was attended with better

- a success in his military expeditions ; for he dispersed the Æqui, who had committed great ravages in the Latin territories, without the loss of a single man, and afterwards hastened to the relief of his colleague, who being surrounded by the Veientes, without timely assistance, would have been obliged to surrender at discretion. Nor was this the only remarkable service that Cæso Fabius did the republic in his third consulate. The two consuls were scarce returned to Rome and their armies disbanded, when the Hetrurians entered again the Roman territory, and made incursions even to the foot of the hill Janiculum, carrying off the cattle, and laying the whole country waste. The senate assembled to deliberate upon the means of putting a stop to these devastations, but the people refusing to take arms till the Agrarian law was put in execution,
- b the fathers were greatly at a loss what to do. In this perplexity Fabius formed a project worthy of his affection for his country. He assembled all the men of his own name and family, and having communicated to them his design, which was, that the family of Fabii should alone, and at their own expence, take upon them to secure the frontiers against the Veientes ; the Fabii readily consented to the motion, and communicated their design to the fathers, by whom it was received with applause, and unanimously approved. Early the next morning those illustrious patricians, being in all three hundred and six, appeared under arms at Cæso Fabius's door, and from thence marched through the city in good order with about four thousand men, partly their vassals, and partly their clients, all under the command of M. Fabius, who had last
- c year gained the battle of Veii, and was now cured of the wounds he had received on that occasion. The whole city ran in crowds to see them, and made vows to heaven for their preservation. They went out of the city at the gate Carmentalis ; and marching to the banks of the Cremera, now the Baccano, a small river, which discharges itself into the Tiber, there built a fort in a steep place, surrounded it with a double ditch, and erected towers at certain distances. When the works were finished, they divided their men into four small parties, one of which was left to guard the fort, while the other three marched into three several parts of the enemy's country, and pillaged it. Their first expeditions were attended with great success ; no husbandmen durst appear in the plains, or bring out their cattle. In the mean time, new consuls being
- d chosen at Rome, viz. Lucius Æmilius a second time, and C. Servilius, Cæso Fabius, the last year's consul, obtained leave of the senate to join his family on the banks of the Cremera. But the conscript fathers, to gain him the more respect, created for him a new office, declaring him a proconsul, a title which gave him the same power over the troops he commanded, as if he had been consul ; but no other authority (N). The new consuls had scarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome, that the Hetrurians were raising a formidable army in order to fall upon the Fabii, and that the Æqui and Volsci had already invaded the country of the Latins. Hereupon the consuls divided their army into three bodies ; Æmilius led one against the Veientes, Servilius another against the Volsci, and Sp. Furius the third, with the title of proconsul,
- e against the Æqui. The Volsci being attacked by Servilius, repulsed him, and obliged him to keep in his camp without attempting any thing else that summer. The Æqui fled at the approach of Furius, who laid waste their country. The Veientes, having received strong reinforcements from the other Hetrurian leucumonies, came to an engagement with Æmilius, but were intirely defeated, and forced to sue for peace. The consul out of respect to the senate referred their deputies to the conscript fathers, and they in return gave him full power to conclude a treaty upon what conditions he should think proper. Hereupon the consul granted them a peace, without demanding hostages, or requiring any thing more than two months provisions for his army, and

War with the Hetrurians, the Volsci, and the Æqui.

(N) Livy does not mention the creation of a proconsul till the year of Rome 189, when he speaks of T. Quinctius Barbatus, as commanding the army of the republic against the Æqui in that quality. This dignity, when it was, if we may be allowed the expression, in its infancy, was confined to the command of the troops, when the presence of the consul was necessary at Rome, or when the republic, being attacked by several different nations at once, was obliged to send several armies into the field, and consequently to increase the number of her generals. When the expedition was ended, the proconsulate expired. But afterwards, when Rome became mistress of Italy, and gave law to distant nations, she then appointed governors over the conquered provinces in quality of proconsuls and proprætors. These offices had then great privileges annexed to them, as we shall observe in a more proper place. It is not plain from the Latin historians, whether the proconsulate was at first disposed of by the senate or people, or whether they both joined in the election of a proconsul ; but when the proconsulate became a common office in the republic, it is certain, that the people, assembled by tribes, sometimes by curiæ, and more rarely by centuries, had their share in the election ; of which we shall find instances in the sequel of this history.

money to defray the expences of the war for six months. This indulgence highly ^a offended the senate, inasmuch that they refused him a triumph. However, as he was an excellent commander, they promised to reward him, according to his merit, on condition he relieved his colleague, who was kept blocked up in his camp by the Volsci. But Æmilius, piqued at the refusal he had met with, returned to Rome, and complained to the people of the proceedings of the senate, as if they were displeased with him for no other reason, but because he had put too speedy an end to the war with the Veientes. The patricians, said he, prolong the wars abroad, with no other view but to put off the execution of the Cassian law, and the distribution of the conquered lands. He did not stop here, but to shew his resentment, instead of marching to the assistance of Servilius, he disbanded his army, and recalled Furius, who, as ^b proconsul, was obliged to obey him.

NOTWITHSTANDING the peace concluded with the Veientes, the Fabii did not abandon their post, but continued on the frontiers to keep a people in awe, whose inconstancy, and inclination to break treaties, were well known. In the following consulship of C. Horatius, and T. Menenius, the other Hetrurian leucumonies being offended at the separate peace the Veientes had made with Rome, summoned them to appear in the general diet of the nation, and there gave them to understand, that they must either break the treaty they had made with Rome, or sustain a war with the other eleven leucumonies. The Veientes being reduced to this dilemma, chose the former, and accordingly sent to the Fabii, requiring them to demolish their fort, and quit the ^c frontiers. The Fabii rejected the proposal with indignation; whereupon hostilities were immediately renewed, and all Hetruria espoused the quarrel of their countrymen. The Fabii continued to ravage the country, and often engaged the Veientes in the open field with their usual success, till they were at last unfortunately surprised in an ambush. The Veientes lodged a whole army of Hetrurians in a neighbouring wood, and posted centinels on all the eminences, to give them notice when they should fall out. Then they brought out all their cattle and horses into a valley under a small guard, as if they had no other design but to feed them. The Fabii no sooner saw them, than they marched out in a great body, leaving no more men in the fort than were necessary to secure it from a surprise. They advanced in good order, and the ^d herdsman with their guard flying on their approach, some of the Fabii pursued the fugitives, while others seized the cattle, and a small number of them continued drawn up in order of battle. Immediately the Hetrurians sallied out of the wood, surrounded the Romans on all sides, and cut in pieces those who were in pursuit of the booty. Hereupon the Fabii, who had kept their ranks, drawing themselves into a close compact body, which faced every way, quitted the plain, and gained an eminence, opening themselves a way with their swords through the enemy's forces. When they had got half way up the ascent, they fell into another ambush, and were quite encompassed anew by a fresh body of Hetrurian troops, which had been posted in a ^e wood near the hill. The Fabii, though quite spent, and out of breath, renewed the fight with great vigour, made a dreadful slaughter of the Hetrurians, and at length, in spite of all opposition, gained the top of the hill. There they spent the night without any provisions, being on all sides beset by an army of Hetrurians. The next day the Fabii, who were left to guard the fort, being informed of the danger of their relations, hastened to their relief; but being attacked in the plain by a numerous body of the enemy, they were all to a man cut off. Not long after those, who were on the top of the hill, being pressed by hunger and thirst, broke their way through the enemy, of whom they killed great numbers. The Hetrurians, surprised at their courage and intrepidity, in the heat of action, offered to let them retire unmolested, upon condition they would throw down their arms, and give their word that they would ^f abandon the fort. But this the brave men looked upon as a dishonourable proposal, and therefore chose rather to die with glory, than save their lives by an action, which they thought would reflect disgrace on their family. They renewed the attack; upon which the Hetrurians, changing their way of fighting, avoided coming to a close engagement; and keeping at a distance, showered from all parts darts and stones on those illustrious warriors. They held out some time against the unexpected storm, and pushed forwards against the enemy, who had not the courage to come near them. At length the Hetrurians, perceiving that the swords of the Romans were for the most part broke,

- a broke, and their bucklers split in pieces, ventured to attack them man to man. Then the Fabii, like men in despair, threw themselves with incredible fury into the midst of the Hetrurian battalions, and snatching the arms of their enemies, fought them with their own weapons. Hereupon the Hetrurians were again obliged to have recourse to javelins and stones, with which those brave men were overwhelmed, and all killed on the spot. The Hetrurians cut off their heads, and carrying them in triumph on the tops of their lances, shewed them to the Fabii, who had staid in the fort. At this sight they gave themselves up to despair, and instead of defending the ramparts, sallied out upon the enemy without observing any order, aiming at nothing but to sell their lives dear. These were likewise cut in pieces; so that of the three hundred and six Fabii, not one escaped. Livy, and those who have copied after him, tell us, that only one of the name was left in Rome, a youth not fourteen years of age, from whom the Fabii, we find afterwards mentioned, were all descended. But Dionysius of Halicarnassus looks upon this as a mere fable, invented to give something of a miraculous air to so tragical an event. And indeed we can hardly believe, that of all the Fabii, who perished at the Cremera, one only left a child behind him. However that be, Rome suffered a great loss, and shewed all the concern gratitude could express. The gate Carmentalis, through which they marched out of the city, was thenceforth called Porta Scelerata, or the accursed gate, and the day of their defeat was reckoned among the unlucky days, on which it was not lawful to begin any thing of consequence ^a (O). The consul Menenius, who had received orders to march against the Hetrurians, was but thirty furlongs from the field of battle, when the Fabii were cut in pieces. But it was believed, that he, out of jealousy, gave them up to destruction, when he might have easily relieved them. He afterwards incamped disadvantageously on the side of a hill, without securing the top of it; so that the Hetrurians incamping above him, attacked him from the higher ground, gave him an intire defeat, and made themselves masters of his camp. Puffed up with this victory, they advanced to the hill Janiculum, and posted themselves on the top of it, whence they could see all that passed in the city, and observe what preparations were made against a siege. This obliged the senate to recall the consul Horatius, and the army which was appointed to act against the Volsci. The brave Horatius immediately came to a battle with the Hetrurians, near the gate Collina, the success of which was pretty equal: but in a second, near the temple of Ilope, about a mile from Rome, he

(O) We have followed Dionysius of Halicarnassus in our account of the unfortunate defeat of the Fabii. But other historians are said by that writer to relate it in the following manner. The family of the Fabii, Livy they, being obliged to offer up a sacrifice, and celebrate a family-feast together, they marched out of the fort on the Cremera, in order to discharge this religious duty, guarded by a small number of their clients. They passed through the enemy's country without using the precaution of sending out scouts to reconnoitre, or marching in order of battle, as if they had been at peace with the Hetrurian nation. But the Veientes being informed of their departure, posted part of their troops in an ambuscade on the road the Romans were to take, while a small body marched to meet the guard, and attack it. The Fabii, who suspected nothing of this nature, fell into the snare which had been laid for them. The troops, which lay concealed, sallied out unexpectedly and attacked them with vigor, some in front, others in flank, while a troop of Veientes, who followed them close, fell upon their rear. Being thus surrounded on all sides, and overpowered with numbers, they were all cut off. This account has not, according to Dionysius, the least appearance of truth. Is it credible, says he, that all the Fabii should abandon so important a post without an express order from the senate? As for the care of the sacrifice, it might have been committed to such of their family and name as were dispensed with by their age from bearing arms. If we suppose, that all the Fabii, not one excepted, were shut up in the fort, it would have been sufficient for them to have dispatched three or four of the family to discharge their obligations in the name of all the rest. Besides, it would have been highly imprudent in them to leave such an important place defenceless, and at the enemy's mercy, and to march through their country with as much confidence as in the most peaceable times.

Livy observes, that the Fabii marched out of the city at the gate Carmentalis, leaving the temple of Janus on their right hand. Ovid speaks of the departure of the Fabii, of the curie annexed to the gate Carmentalis, and of the temple of Janus in the following verses:

*Carmentis porta dextra est vis proxima Jano;
Ire per hanc noli, quisquis es; omen habet.
Illa fama refert Fabius exisse trecentos.
Porta vacat culpa, sed tamen omen habet* (7).

The same poet tells us, that only one youth of the Fabian family, not yet fourteen years of age, was saved.

*Una dies Fabios ad bellum miserat omnes;
Ad bellum missos perdidit una dies.
Us tamen Herculeæ superesset semina gentis
Credibile est ipsos consuluisse deos.
Nam puer impubes, et adhuc non utilis armis
Unus de Fabia gente relictus erat* (8).

gained a victory, which revived the Roman courage, and secured the city. However, the enemy did not decamp from the Janiculum, nor quite lay aside the design of besieging Rome. At the same time a famine began to be felt in the city, occasioned by the incursions of the Hetrurians. The lands having been left unsown the last year for fear of their ravages, and most of the barns in the country burnt or plundered, there was a great scarcity of corn. The meaner sort of the people got together in companies, threatening to plunder the granaries of the rich; and their clamours and mutinies were fomented by the tribunes, who did not fail to throw all the blame on the conscript fathers. On the other hand, the senators, to clear themselves, did all that lay in their power to relieve the people. They sent out merchants to buy corn, fixed the price of it at a low rate, and ordered that none of the patricians should keep more in their granaries than was necessary for the maintenance of their families. But these wise precautions were only serviceable for a time. The Romans found themselves at last under a necessity either of starving, or driving the enemy farther off. They marched out therefore under the conduct of their new consuls, A. Virginus, and P. Servilius, and engaging the Hetrurians, gained a compleat victory over them. But when by the dead bodies, that were brought to Rome to be burnt, the senate saw how many Romans had perished in the engagement, they refused the consuls the honour of a triumph.

Menenius accused before the people, and fined.

THE departure of the Hetrurians restored plenty to the city, provisions being brought thither from all the neighbouring countries. But the people were no sooner delivered from the fear of a foreign enemy, than they renewed their complaints about the distribution of the conquered lands. As they could not bring about the execution of the Cassian law, they laid the whole blame upon the consuls, citing them, as soon as they were out of their office, before the assembly of the tribes. Thus Menenius, the son of the famous Menenius Agrippa, was accused by the tribunes of having connived at the destruction of the Fabii; and summoned to give an account of his conduct before a tribunal, where his most inveterate enemies were his judges. The patricians used the same arts they had formerly practised in the affair of Coriolanus, to prevent his being tried by the people; but to no purpose; for the tribunes continued obstinate, and their obstinacy prevailed. Menenius was tried, not by the curiæ, but by the tribes, and almost unanimously condemned to death. But the senate, and all his friends, soliciting earnestly in his behalf, the tribunes changed the sentence of death into a fine of two thousand asses, that is, about five pounds of our money, a considerable sum, when men of the first rank lived upon the product of their small farms, which they often cultivated with their own hands. Nay, this fine was excessive, with respect to Menenius, whose father had left him no other patrimony, but his glory. His friends offered to pay it for him, but he rejected their generous offers, and being sensibly affected with the injustice and ingratitude of his fellow-citizens, shut himself up in his house, where he soon died of grief and hunger. This melancholly accident greatly increased the animosity between the patricians and plebeians; the former determining to keep no measures with the latter, openly declared that they would never suffer the Cassian law to be put in execution. On the other hand, the tribunes, more enraged than ever, omitted no opportunity of prosecuting the nobility. They took great pleasure in humbling the patricians, and summoning the consuls, as soon as they had laid down their office, to appear before the tribunal of the people. Servilius, as we have observed above, had lost a great number of men in the engagement with the Hetrurians, when he drove them from the Janiculum. He had therefore scarce laid down the fasces, when a criminal process was commenced against him for pursuing the enemy too far, and by that indiscretion exposing the lives of many citizens to unnecessary dangers. But this was only a pretence for the prosecution. The real crime both of Servilius and Menenius was, their omitting to name the decemvirs for the partition of the lands. Servilius had too much confidence in the goodness of his cause to beg the senate to intercede for him. He faced the danger boldly, and without changing either his habit or countenance, appeared before the assembly of the people, and made so judicious a defence, that he was unanimously acquitted. He soon after not only cleared his character from all blemish, but added a new lustre to it. A remarkable victory, which the consul Valerius gained the same year over the Hetrurians, was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Servilius, who served

- in quality of the consul's lieutenant. The following year, A. Manlius and L. Furius being chosen consuls, the former marched against the Veientes, who, at his approach, shut themselves up in Veii, where they were so distressed for want of provisions, that they sued for peace, and obtained of the senate a forty yearstruce. The consul Manlius, for this successful and unbloody expedition, was honoured with an ovation.

The Veientes obtain a forty years truce.

PEACE abroad was always followed by intestine broils at home. The old disputes about the distribution of the lands were revived by the tribunes; but the consuls, without being in the least shaken by their clamours and menaces, finished their year, and left affairs in the same situation they had found them. They had no sooner resigned the fasces to L. Æmilius, now the third time consul, and Vosijus Junius, than

New disputes about the distribution of lands.

- b Cn. Genucius, a daring, enterprising tribune, cited them to appear before the people, accusing them of having neglected to name the commissioners, with a design to debar the poor citizens and brave soldiers of the share they had so well deserved in the conquered lands. He exhorted the people to do themselves justice, representing to them, that if they inflicted an exemplary punishment on those criminals, they might, by that means, oblige their successors to put in execution the Cassian law. Accordingly a day was appointed for their trial. These violent proceedings greatly alarmed the senate, who now saw, with no less indignation than sorrow, that the tribunes aimed equally at their lives and fortunes, and that they had formed a design of destroying all the senators one after another. They therefore had private meetings
- c among themselves, and resolved to rescue Furius and Manlius, if they were condemned, there not being wanting desperate men, who offered to make the attempt. On the other hand, the people triumphed before-hand, insolently boasting, that, in spite of all the artifices of the senate, the Cassian law should pass, and be sealed with the blood of those who had opposed it; but the very day before the trial of Manlius and Furius, the furious tribune Genucius was found dead in his bed, without any marks on his body either of violence or poison. He was carried into the forum, and being there exposed to public view, the common people concluded, that the gods did not approve of his enterprize; but the wiser sort entertained violent suspicions of the patricians. However, the religious notion having prevailed, the partition of lands was not so much as mentioned for some time after ^a.

- d THE consuls and senate, finding the tribunes greatly confounded at the unexpected death of their colleague, and more at the effect it had upon the superstitious minds of the people, began to act in a very arbitrary manner, imagining they should now meet with no opposition, either from the people or their tribunes. As there was occasion to raise an army, the consuls held their tribunal, as usual, in the forum, and there either fined or caused to be whipped those citizens, who did not appear as soon as they were called to give in their names. Amongst others they called one P. Volero to list himself as a common soldier. Volero, tho' by birth a plebeian, had been formerly an officer in the army; and therefore, as he had behaved on all occasions with great valour, he expected to be promoted, at least, to the post of a centurion. Not able therefore to stifle his resentment, he complained of the injustice of the consuls, and demanded to be restored to his former post, or to know for what fault he was degraded. The consuls, in great anger, sent a lictor to seize him; and, upon his making resistance, ordered him to be beaten with rods. The lictor endeavoured to execute their sentence; but Volero, striking him a blow on the face, declared, that he had done nothing which deserved that punishment, and at the same time implored the protection of the tribunes; but they, terrified at the death of Genucius, not daring to appear, he appealed from the consuls to the people, crying out to the multitude, Allyst me, O Romans, it is your protection I implore; since our tribunes had rather see a citizen of Rome beaten with rods, than run the bazard of dying in their beds
- e by the treachery of the consuls, we have no remedy left us against the tyranny of the consuls but force. At these words the mutinous populace fell upon the lictors, broke their fasces, and drove them out of the forum. The consuls themselves, being surrounded on all sides by the multitude, who pressed hard upon them, thought it adviseable to withdraw, and retire to the senate-house as a place of refuge. Hereupon the tribunes, recovering their spirits, inspired the people with new fury, which was no longer levelled at the patricians in general, but only at the consuls. Those magistrates, in this sudden commotion, which put all the city in an uproar, assembled the senate, and complained of the outrages committed by the people, contrary to the respect due to their dignity. Some senators were for putting Volero to death, and ordering him immediately to be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian rock; but the more moderate among them did not think proper to put it to the trial, whether the anger of the senate, or the fury of the people, should prevail. The tribunes, on the other hand, demanded justice upon the consuls, for commanding a Roman citizen to be whipped like a slave, after he had appealed to the people; which was a manifest and criminal transgression of the Valerian law. While the people were thus complaining of the consuls, and the consuls of the people, Volero, in order to secure himself against the fury of the patricians, engaged the people to confer upon him the office of tribune, vacant by the death of Genucius. He publicly boasted, that, if he were invested with that dignity, he would take such measures, as should deliver the people from being ever more oppressed by the senate. The multitude, charmed with this hope, readily granted him their votes, and he entered on his office after the election of the new consuls L. Pinarius and P. Furius. Every one expected, that he would immediately begin a prosecution against the last year's consuls; but Volero soon discovered, that he had views far more extensive and important to the interest of his party, than a mere personal revenge. Without dropping one disrespectful word against the late magistrates, he endeavoured to lessen the authority of the patricians in general, by depriving them of the influence they had in the election of the tribunes. In a general assembly of the people, he proposed, that their magistrates and protectors might be chosen for the future in the comitia by tribes, and not by curiæ. In this the subtle tribune had two views very prejudicial to the patricians. In the first place, the curiæ were never assembled for elections, till the senate had consented to it by a decree. In the second place, the patricians, who commanded the suffrages of their clients, often got such tribunes elected, as were agreeable to themselves; but neither of these inconveniencies attended the comitia assembled by tribes; for the tribunes had the power of assembling them, without the consent of the senate; and the country-tribes, who were not so devoted to the patricians as those in the city, had a right to vote in them, as well as the inhabitants of Rome. The plebeian faction was highly pleased with this proposal, and warmly declared for passing it into a law: but the consuls, the senate, and the whole order of the patricians, opposed it to the utmost of their power; so that Volero's law became the common and only subject of dispute between the two parties, the Agrarian law being for some time intirely dropped. A dreadful plague suspended, for a few months, this furious contest; but it no sooner ceased, than the tribunes resumed the prosecution of Volero's law. In the mean time Volero's tribuneship expiring, the people continued him in the same office for the following year, in spite of the opposition of the senate, and the whole patrician party.

Appius Claudius set up by
against Volero.

THE patricians, finding the people bent upon carrying their point, had but one expedient left; which was, to set up against Volero a man, who was not to be terrified by the clamours and menaces of the multitude. With this view, they pitched upon Appius Claudius, and raised him to the consulate. He was the son of the famous Appius Claudius, who had so often signalized his hatred to the plebeians, and no less zealous than his father for the interest of the senate, but more obstinate and inflexible. As he thought himself but ill qualified to govern in a time of general commotions, he had absented himself from the comitia; but the patricians, acquainted with his steadiness and intrepidity, got him elected, tho' absent, in the comitia by centuries, in which they had great interest. They joined with him T. Quinctius, a venerable senator, of a sweet temper, who was beloved by the people, tho' looked upon as one of the chief leaders of the other party. The new consuls having convened the senate to deliberate on the most proper methods to hinder the publication of Volero's law, Appius, following the dictates of his natural severity, was for raising an army, and sending the people to vent that martial courage abroad, which made them untractable at home. But Quinctius was of a contrary opinion; he thought it unjust to make war upon nations, that had given Rome no occasion of complaint; and besides, represented to the senate, that the people themselves would soon be apprised of their design, and refuse to take arms, which would turn to the dishonour of the consular authority, and produce a general flame. The opinion of Quinctius prevailed; but Appius, who could not bear the least contradiction, lived upon ill terms with his

a colleague all the rest of the year ; which greatly increased the affection the people had already for Quintius .

THE division of the consuls, and union of the tribunes, made Volero believe, that he should now get his law passed. He had even the confidence to add the two following articles to it, viz. that all affairs relating to the people should no longer be brought before the curiæ, but before the tribes ; and that the ædiles, as well as the tribunes, should be chosen by them. There were but four tribes in the city, and seventeen in the country, which were not any-ways influenced by the nobility ; so that in the comitia by tribes the patricians had but little interest. They therefore exerted their utmost endeavours to ward off a blow, which tended directly to destroy

b the authority of the senate, and to establish that of the people upon its ruins. When the senate met to deliberate upon these extraordinary proposals, Appius was for making a decree to invite all those, who loved their country, to take arms, and declaring those, who refused to obey the summons, enemies to their country ; but Quintius, who was afraid of seeing Rome become a field of battle, thought it advisable to try, whether the people could be brought to their duty by ways of gentleness and insinuation. The advice of Claudius was rejected as too violent, and even dangerous, and the more moderate counsels of Quintius prevailing, the tribunes were desired to convene an assembly of the people, and to suffer the consuls peaceably, and without interruption, to represent to the people the true interests of the common-

c wealth ; after which they might, in concert, agree upon such measures, as should be most for the common good of the people and senate. The tribunes acquiesced to so reasonable a proposal ; and Quintius, when the time came, mounting the rostra, made such an impression on the minds of the people, by his soft and insinuating eloquence, that Volero's proposal would have been rejected, if Appius, when it was his turn to speak, had not, by his imperious behaviour, his threatnings, and his invectives against the people, and their tribunes, effaced the impressions made by his colleague. Caius Leſtorius, who was accounted one of the bravest soldiers in the republic, and had, for that reason, been raised to the tribuneship, when the domestic broils were like to end in a civil war, rose up to answer the consuls ; but, without taking d any notice of Quintius's arguments, insisted only on the invectives of Appius, which he retorted, and concluded thus : But to what purpose do we fight with words against a wild beast ? The sword is the proper weapon to be used in such engagements ; the sword perhaps may make you sensible, that the Roman people are not so despicable as you think them. In the mean time, you shall experience the authority of those tribunes, who are the objects of your contempt, but whom the law has made your judges. Upon this there was a profound silence ; and Leſtorius, lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, swore by all that was most sacred, that he would either get Volero's law passed, or perish in the attempt. Then, after having kept the people some time in suspense, turning to Appius, I come mand you, said he, to leave the assembly. Appius despised his order, and told him, that, tho' a tribune, he was but a private man, and that his whole power consisted

f in forming an opposition to such decrees of the senate as were prejudicial to the plebeians. Then calling about him his friends, clients, and relations, who were very numerous, he prepared to oppose force with force. The tribune, having conferred hastily with his colleagues, commanded one of his officers to seize Appius, and carry him to prison. Hereupon a scuffle began between the consuls lictors and the officers of the tribune. The senators, the patricians, and the clients, who attended Appius, placed him in the midst of them, and repulsed Leſtorius, who advanced in person to assist his officers. Nothing was heard but confused cries proceeding from mutual animosity. From reproaches they quickly came to blows ; but as arms were forbidden in the city, little blood was spilt in the fray. Quintius, attended by some venerable senators, threw himself into the midst of the contending parties, and having found means to convey Appius out of the tumult, appeased the tribunes, and put an end to the scuffle.

THE next morning, the people, spirited up by their tribunes, and especially by Leſtorius, who had been wounded the day before, seized on the capitol, fortified themselves there, and seemed resolved to begin an open war. The senate being assembled to deliberate on ways to quiet the sedition, Quintius was for yielding something in favour of the people ; whereas Appius could by no means be brought to make them the least concession. During this disagreement, which lasted several days, Quintilius,^a having often conferred with the tribunes, gained at length their consent to refer both their private and public complaints to the senate, and to stand to the determination of the conscript fathers. He then convened the senators, and after having acquainted them with the good disposition of the tribunes, got the following decree passed, viz. That as the scuffle, which had happened a few days before, was not premeditated, but the effect of a sudden commotion, arising on both sides from a pretended zeal for the republic, all injuries committed and received on that occasion, should be buried in an eternal oblivion. As to the law in question, since Appius would by no means suffer it to be proposed to the assembly of the people, without a previous decree of the senate, it was agreed, that it should be referred to the senate, and that a decree should be made for that purpose. The affair was therefore disputed with great warmth, Appius calling both gods and men to witness, that the republic was betrayed, and that the senate were submitting to a law more detrimental to their authority, than those which had been formed on the sacred mount; but Quintilius brought the senate to yield to the people, and allow them to propose the law in their assembly, where it passed, and was unanimously received with great applause. From this time therefore the tribunes were made, and almost every thing relating to the people determined, not in the comitia by curiæ, but by tribes.^b

Volsci.*

NOT long after this law was passed, the consuls were obliged to take the field. Quintilius marched against the Æqui, and Appius against the Volsci. The former was so much esteemed and loved by his army, that the enemy, not caring to appear against troops so well affected to their general, shut themselves up in their cities, or lay concealed in the forests. The consul therefore, having laid waste their country, returned with a great booty to Rome, where he was received with loud acclamations, and called the father of the soldiers, while Appius was styled by his men, the tyrant of the army; and indeed never was an army governed with more severity, or discipline exacted with more rigour. As his rage against the people was no longer under any restraint from the tribunes, he intirely gave way to it; the consequence of which was, that the centurions and soldiers all murmured at their general's orders, and even entered into a conspiracy, not against his life, but his glory; for they resolved, by agreement, not to oppose the enemy, lest their general should receive the honours of triumph. The Volsci, being informed of all that passed in the Roman camp, drew up their men in order of battle, and challenged the Romans to an engagement. Appius marched out against them; but he was no sooner within reach of the enemy, than his men threw away their arms, and, with one consent, returned to the camp. The Volsci took advantage of this confusion, and having cut to pieces those who were in the rear, attacked the entrenchments; but the Romans, fearing the enemy might break into the camp, faced about, made a brave resistance, and drove back the Volsci. The rash consul would have led them again to face the enemy the next day; but they loudly demanded of their officers to be led out of the enemy's country, and forced Appius to comply with their demand, and break up his camp. As soon as the incensed consul entered the Roman territory, where he was out of the reach of the enemy, he summoned his soldiers to assemble; and, being seated in his tribunal, he first upbraided them with their disobedience and treachery, and then, giving a loose to his resentment, he commanded the heads of the centurions and other officers, who had abandoned their posts, to be struck off in his presence. Those, who had born the ensigns, and delivered them to the enemy, he caused to be beaten to death with rods. As for the common soldiers, he decimated them, that is, put every tenth man to death. As the time of the comitia for the election of new consuls drew near, he led back to Rome the remains of his army, where he was received with the hisses of the multitude.^c

of the Agrarian law revived.*

THE consuls chosen to succeed Quintilius and Appius, were L. Valerius a second time, and Tib. Æmilius. They had scarce entered upon their office, when the tribunes revived the old dispute concerning the partition of the lands. Both the consuls were disposed to favour the people; Æmilius out of revenge against the senate, for having refused his father the honours of a triumph, when he returned from a successful war against the Æqui; and Valerius, to gain the good-will of the people, whose hatred he had drawn upon himself by prosecuting Cassius during his quæstorship. As

- a the consuls, by a decree of the senate passed in the consulate of Virginus and Cassius, were impowered to nominate the decemvirs, in order to make a new distribution of the conquered lands, the tribunes, being secure of the present consuls, brought the affair before the senate, where it occasioned long debates. Emilius, the consul's father, who spoke first, was for having the decemvirs named by the consuls, in order to proceed to the division of the conquered lands; which, said he, being public and common, ought to be for the equal benefit of all. But Appius, that sworn enemy of the people, opposed the opinion of Emilius with so much warmth and strength of reason, that the senate rejected the proposal of the tribunes, tho' supported by both the consuls. Hereupon the tribunes, enraged at their disappointment, resolved to
- b destroy so violent an adversary, and with that view cited him before the people, as a declared enemy to the public liberty. Appius, without changing his habit, as was usual on such occasions, or even suffering his friends to solicit the multitude in his behalf, on the day of the assembly, appeared in the midst of his accusers with the same dignity as if he had been their judge. His accusation was reduced to these four heads. 1. That he had spirited up the senate against the people. 2. That he had raised seditions in the republic. 3. That he had caused a tribune to be struck, tho' the laws declared his person sacred and inviolable. 4. That he had sunk the courage of his soldiers by his severity, and suffered himself to be overcome by the Volsci. But he answered these several articles with so much strength, that the people durst not condemn him. The tribunes, who were bent upon his destruction, fearing he would be acquitted, put off giving sentence to another day, under pretence, that they should not have time before night to collect the suffrages. But Appius, plainly foreseeing that he should fall a victim to the implacable hatred of those magistrates, prevented the disgrace of a condemnation, by laying violent hands on himself. The tribunes endeavoured in vain to deprive him of such funeral honours as his merit and rank in the republic deserved. His son obtained leave of the consuls to assemble the people, and make, according to custom, his funeral oration; which the people heard with pleasure, shewing him more regard after his death, than they had done in his life-time.
- c He kills himself
- d UPON the death of Appius, the tribunes resumed the business of the Agrarian law, which his prosecution had only suspended; but not being able to prevail upon the present consuls to name the decemvirs, the people, at their instigation, refused to appear at the election of the consuls for the next year, as if they intended to separate themselves once more from the body of the republic. However, the patricians, with their clients, raised to the consulate T. Quinctius a second time, and Q. Servilius, who, to prevent the breach from growing wider, busied the people all that year with foreign wars. Servilius had great success against the Sabines; and Quinctius gained a complete victory over the united forces of the Æqui and Volsci, which was followed by the siege and surrender of the city of Antium. Quinctius, on his return to
- e Rome, was honoured with a triumph, and attended both by the senate and people in his procession to the capitol. The domestic dissensions began afresh in the following consulate of T. Emilius a second time, and Q. Fabius, son of one of the three famous brothers, who perished in the battle of Cremera. Emilius, who had favoured the people in his first consulate, renewed his endeavours to get the Cassian law put in execution; whereupon great disturbances ensuing, Fabius found out an expedient to appease both the people and patricians. He proposed to send a colony to people that pleasant and fruitful canton of the Volsci, which Quinctius had just conquered. His motion was received with great applause by the meaner sort of people, and three senators, viz. T. Quinctius the consul, A. Virginus, and P. Furius, were immediately
- f appointed to make the distribution of the lands; but when the plebians were to give in their names to those triumvirs, few of them appeared; nay, they began to change their style, and complain of the senate, who, they said, were sending brave men out of their country, because they opposed their oppressions; the greater part therefore chose rather to stay at Rome, than leave it to take possession of the lands, for which they had raised so many disturbances. The games, the shews, the public assemblies, the hurry of business, and the share they had in the government, contributed to tie them to their old abode, and, notwithstanding their poverty, made them look upon a colony as an honourable banishment. The triumvirs, finding the people unwilling to quit Rome, were forced to admit of strangers to make up the number appointed for the colony. However, one advantage accrued from the refusal of the people, which was, that those, who would not give in their names, were ever after ashamed to meddle in the affair of the partition of the lands.

The Æqui subdued.

But revolt, and defeat the consul Sp. Furius.

Quinctius obliges them to retire into their own country.

The Æqui and Volsci appear before Rome.

Rome enjoying now a profound tranquillity, Fabius took the field against the Æqui, and obliged them to sue for a peace; which was granted them, on condition of their being subject to the republic. However, in the following consulate of Sp. Posthumius and Q. Servilius, now a second time consul, they began to stir again; and the next year, when T. Quinctius a third time, and Q. Fabius a second time, were consuls, they renewed the war, and continued it under the consuls A. Posthumius and Sp. Furius. The latter, who was but a very indifferent commander, having engaged rashly with the enemy, was defeated, and so closely besieged in his camp, that not a man could go out to give notice at Rome of his danger. However, the senate had advice of it, and, in so great a distress, resolved upon an expedient, never used but in great extremity; which was, to give up the government absolutely into the consuls hands, by these words, Videat consul, ne quid respublica detrementi capiat, Let the consul take care that the republic suffer no detriment. Posthumius, who received this commission, made all take arms who were able, and gave T. Quinctius the command of the army, with the title of proconsul. As soon as Quinctius came within sight of the invested camp, the Æqui retired; but Furius had before made a sally, in which his brother L. Furius, and two cohorts, had been surrounded by the enemy, and cut in pieces. The consul now acted upon the offensive, and obliged the enemy to withdraw into their own country. Posthumius attacked a great body of their freebooters, loaded with spoil, and made a great slaughter of them. By these successes Rome was restored to its former tranquillity. In the following consulate of P. Servilius Priscus and Æbutius Elva, a dreadful plague broke out in Rome, and swept away almost all the flower of the youth who were able to bear arms, the fourth part of the senators, the greatest part of the tribunes, and both the consuls. Upon the news of so general a mortality among the Romans, the Æqui and Volsci renewed their old design of destroying the haughty republic. They began the campaign with committing hostilities in the territories of the Latins and Hernici, who immediately applied to the Roman senate for succours; but all the Romans could do, was to give leave to their allies to arm and defend themselves, and to promise them assistance in better times. Hereupon the Latins shut themselves up in their cities, leaving their country open to the ravages of the enemy. The Hernici took the field, and even ventured an engagement, in which they lost a great many men, and were, on that account, tho' the success of the battle was pretty equal, forced to confine themselves to their cities; so that the Æqui and Volsci, having now no enemy to oppose them in the field, entered the Roman territory, and appeared unexpectedly before Rome. The two consuls being dead, and the few tribunes, who were still alive, unable, on account of their bad state of health, to assist the republic either with their hands or their advice, the ædiles took upon them to represent the dignity, and perform the functions of the consuls. Notwithstanding so many calamities, the Romans seemed to have lost nothing of their ancient steadiness. They crept to the ramparts, and put the best face they could on their affairs. The senators themselves mounted the guard, and stood centinels; and the city being well fortified on all sides, the Æqui and Volsci, more expert at plundering than carrying on a siege, laid aside all thoughts of making themselves masters of Rome, and marched their forces towards Tusculum. In the mean time the plague continued to rage in the city. The two augurs, Virginus and Valerius, died of it, as well as Sulpicius the chief of the curiones, that is, the priests of each curia. The dead were so numerous, that they were thrown into the Tiber without burial; so that the calamity becoming now greater than ever, the people turned their thoughts intirely to divine assistance; all made their vows upon the altars, and the matrons swept the temples with their hair, and continued prostrate in the presence of the gods, till at length a more wholesome season put an end to the distemper, and delivered Rome from a calamity, which threatened her with utter destruction. Several patricians had governed one after another during the inter-regnum, which had lasted from the death of the consuls; and now Valerius Poplicola, being inter-rex, assembled the centuries for the election of new ones, when Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius Geminus, were chosen. In the beginning of their consulate, the tribunes, forgetting the miseries the city had suffered, undertook to renew the old quarrel about the division of the lands; but the people,

- * without hearkening to them, turned all their thoughts upon revenging the insults Rome had received from the Æqui and Volsci the year before. Even those citizens, whom the laws exempted from going to war, enlisted themselves for the service; so that two consular armies were immediately raised. It fell to Lucretius's lot to march against the Æqui and Volsci, who had united their forces; but were overthrown in a pitched battle, with the loss of both their generals, and of thirteen thousand four hundred and sixty men, the most dreadful defeat they had ever received. So memorable an action made Rome forget the misfortunes she had suffered the last year.

The Æqui and Volsci entirely defeated.

- WHILE the two consuls were thus employed in the field, a tribune of the people, named C. Terentius Arsa, took the opportunity of their absence to weaken the consular authority, exclaiming in a full assembly of the people against the exorbitant power of the consuls, and demanding that bounds might be set to it with regard to public affairs, and that invariable laws might be established, for the consuls to be governed by in deciding the contests that arose between man and man. We must observe here, that the people referred all their differences to the judgment of the consuls, who regulated their sentences either by the principles of natural equity, or by ancient usages, or by the laws of Romulus and his successors, some remains of which were still to be found in the sacred books that were lodged with the pontifices, who, together with the patricians, made a mystery to the people of those first elements of their science of law. Terentius therefore, or, as Livy calls him, Terentillus, represented to the people, that the patrician magistrates were absolute masters of each man's fortune, and that the consuls, having no rule to go by in deciding causes but their caprice, or laws unknown to the plebeians, might strip them, when they pleased, of all their effects, and at the same time make them believe, that they acted therein agreeable to the laws. To prevent this inconvenience, insupportable in a free city, he moved for an immediate establishment of laws, known by every body, to serve for a rule to the magistrates in their sentences, and to the litigants for proofs of the justice or injustice of their cause. He urged at the same time with great vehemence, that the consuls had all the despotic power of kings, and only wanted the name; and therefore demanded, that a choice should be made of five of the best men in the republic, who should be authorized to restrain within due bounds a power so excessive; so that the consuls for the future might have no other authority over their fellow-citizens, but what those very citizens should think fit to intrust them with. The senators were all surprized at such bold proposals. Q. Fabius, who then governed the city in the absence of the consuls, immediately dispatched messengers to them, acquainting them with what had happened, and conjuring them to hasten back to Rome. He then convened the senate, and, after having enumerated the fatal consequences of such an innovation, prevailed upon the tribunes to desist from seconding Terentius in his first demand concerning the limitation of the consular power; but as for the second, they still persisted in demanding a choice to be made from among the senators and plebeians, of proper persons, to form a body of laws for determining suits among the citizens; however, overcome by the entreaties of Fabius, they consented to suspend the prosecution of this affair till the arrival of the consuls. Thus the city continued some time quiet; for the tribunes did not so much as mention the Terentian law, till the new consuls, P. Volumnius, and S. Sulpicius, were chosen; and then the whole college renewed their efforts to get the law passed. The people were often assembled to hear the harangues of the tribunes on this subject; and the senate as often to concert measures to oppose their designs. The factions and blind zeal on both sides increased to such a degree, that there was just reason to apprehend a civil war. The alarms, which these dissensions gave, were increased by the dread, which some pretended prodigies occasioned in the city. At the same time the Hernici, who were in alliance with Rome, gave notice to the senate, that the Æqui and Volsci were secretly arming, and that the new colony of Antium was entered into that confederacy. This news authorized the consuls to raise an army of citizens, as usual, whose absence would lessen the strength of the tribunes; but these magistrates of the people, pretending that this war was nothing but a trick of the senate to get the citizens out of Rome, opposed the levies, and revived the demand of Terentius for the compiling a body of laws. The contest ran high, and occasioned great disturbances. Every thing was carried by mere violence. The consuls having caused a plebeian to be arrested, because he refused to give in his name, the tribunes rescued him out of the licitor's hands, and set him at liberty. On the other hand, the young patricians made great disturbances in the comitia, dispersed the people by violence, and, with their clamours, hindered the reading of the law, which was drawn up in these words: Let the people, in lawful comitia, elect ten men of a mature age, consummate wisdom, and unspotted reputation, to draw up a body of laws, as well for the public administration, as for the determination of public affairs; let these laws be fixed up in the forum; and let the annual magistrate, as well as other judges, be obliged to conform to them in their decisions of the controversies, which may arise in Rome. At length the tribunes gained their point of having this law proposed to the people; but when the day came for the comitia by tribes to determine the affair, the young senators and patricians, having Quinctius Cæso, the son of Quinctius Cincinnatus, at their head, rushed into the crowd, knocked down all who stood in their way, and dispersed the assembly, in spite of all that the tribunes could do to keep them together. Cæso was a young man, tall, well-shaped, of an extraordinary strength of body, and had signalized himself by actions of uncommon bravery in several battles. His eloquence was not inferior to his strength and valour; for no patrician was heard with greater applause, or spoke with more dignity. He was always the first to answer the seditious harangues of the tribunes with great freedom. These magistrates therefore, enraged to meet with so much opposition from one single man, conspired his ruin; and having agreed among themselves upon articles of impeachment, Virginus, the most zealous of the tribunes, caused him to be summoned before the assembly of the people. This made Cæso more violent in his opposition to the Terentian law; he reviled the plebeians, and inveighed with great bitterness against the tribunes. In the mean time Virginus still went on proposing the law, not so much out of any hopes that it would meet with a ready acceptance, as purely to increase the fury of Cæso, and render him, by his violent and rash behaviour, more odious to the multitude. Accordingly the inconsiderate youth, being supported by the senate, who flattered his vanity with their applauses, gave the tribunes new matter of complaint, and made, we may say, open war with them and their party. At length the day came, which was appointed for his trial; and then his courage all on a sudden failed him. He did not imitate the constancy of Coriolanus, but condescended to mean intreaties, and endeavoured to save his life by low and unworthy solicitations. He put on mourning, and with a countenance full of sorrow and humiliation, went about, begging the favour of the meanest plebeians. The tribune Virginus opened his accusation, and, in his discourse, enumerated the several violences of the young patrician, and produced those to be witnesses against him, who had been themselves ill-used by him; but the chief crime laid to his charge, was his having hindered by violence the meeting of some judicial assemblies legally called. When the accusation was ended, the accused was called upon to plead; but Cæso refused to own the jurisdiction of the assembly, offering at the same time to submit himself to the judgment of the consuls, his only lawful judges. This set the people yet more against him; so that his father, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, a man highly esteemed and respected of the republic, was obliged to undertake his defence. He denied the capital points in the charge; and, as to hasty words or blows, he excused them as the indiscretions of youth, which rather deserved pity than resentment. Then T. Quinctius Capitolinus, who had been thrice consul, Sp. Furius, and Lucretius, all appeared to witness his bravery in several engagements, and his other good qualities. Neither the Quinctian family, said Quinctius Capitolinus, nor the city of Rome, ever produced a young patrician of greater expectation. He made his first campaign under me, and I was witness of his glorious exploits. Nor did Sp. Furius give a less advantageous testimony to young Cæso; The consul Quinctius, said he, often sent him to my relief, when I was in great danger; and nobody contributed more than he to the advantages we gained over the enemy. Lucretius likewise, who had been honoured with a triumph the year before, did justice to the valour of the accused: On this occasion, said he, I think myself obliged to share my glory with the brave Cæso. Nobody signalized himself more, both in single combats, and the general action, in which I was conqueror. What city is there, to which this gallant youth will not be an ornament, if we drive him from ours? As to the natural impetuosity he is reproached with, age and prudence will, by degrees, correct it; and when his virtue is arrived at its maturity, his defects will be worn away. How great a man will Cæso be, when years shall have tempered the ardour, which now transports him? The suffrages of so many illustrious

- a illustrious men, and the entreaties of the father, made a sensible impression on the multitude; but Virginus, who was bent upon Cæso's destruction, frustrated the hopes of the patricians. He rose up, and addressing himself to Quinctius Cincinnatus, The public, said he, does justice to your virtues, and the affection you have for the people; but alas! how different is your son from you! His proud temper and tyrannical conduct make him unworthy of pardon. The education he has received under the eye of a modest and popular father, has not been able to abate his pride. Romans, what have you to expect from him for the future? What a pernicious example has he given to the youth, who follow and admire him? If you, Quinctius, were ignorant of it before, yet being to-day better informed of it, you ought to join your indignation to ours. If you was acquainted with his conduct, and did not correct him, you are not worthy of the favour you ask. But what am I saying? your son's transports were certainly concealed from you; nor have you had any share in his attempts upon the authority of the Roman people: No, Quinctius, you are not to be blamed for any thing, but being a better father than a commonwealth's man; but, in order to efface in your heart those remains of tenderness which the people share with you, I beg, that my colleague, M. Volscius, may be heard in what he has to offer by way of private complaint against your son. I hope the people will not leave unrevengeed one of their own magistrates, who has been so great a sufferer by him. Then Volscius ascending the rostra, to act the part that had been concerted between them, directed his speech to the people thus: As I was returning one night with my brother from a friend's house, where we had supped, we met, hard-by the public stews, Cæso, accompanied, according to his custom, by several young patricians of the same character with himself, who, I suppose, had been making a debauch together in those infamous houses. They at first attacked us with abusive language, which I indeed was for taking no notice of; but my brother, less patient than myself, returned injuries for injuries. Then Cæso, full of anger and resentment, fell upon him, and, notwithstanding my prayers and entreaties, so beat and bruised him, that he expired upon the spot. This happened the year the plague made such havock among us. I designed to carry my complaints to the consuls; but death took them from us soon after. L. Lucretius, and T. Veturius, their successors, took the field in a hurry, and Cæso followed them. At their return I prepared to bring my action; but Cæso, hearing of my design, waited for me one night in a by-place, and falling upon me, repeated his blows so thick, that, to avoid my brother's fate, I was forced to promise never to mention what had befallen either of us.

Cæso is falsely accused of murder.

THE people were so exasperated at this story, that, without examining into the truth of the fact, they were ready to tear young Cæso in pieces; but Virginus, to give some appearance of justice to his villainous prosecution, interposed, and moved, that Cæso should be secured and imprisoned, till his crime could be fully proved, since Volscius had not his witnesses at hand. This occasioned great debates; T. Quinctius representing to the assembly, that it was a thing unheard-of in the republic, that, upon a bare accusation, a citizen should be arrested, and carried to jail. On the other hand, Virginus maintained, that such a precaution was necessary to prevent such an offender from escaping the justice of the people. After the question had been long debated, with great warmth and liberty of speech on both sides, the tribunes took a middle way between Virginus's pretensions and those of the contrary party, which was, that Cæso should be set at liberty, provided he gave security for his appearance before the people on the day appointed. This raised a new debate about the sum, in which the securities were to be bound; but the senate at last fixed the sum to three thousand asses of brass, that is, about nine pounds thirteen shillings and nine pence of our money; and left it to the tribunes to declare how many citizens should be security for it, in case of his escape. They were content with ten securities, who bound themselves to produce Cæso on the day he was to be tried, or to pay the fine. And this is the first time we read of bail given for appearance in public and capital cases. Cæso was no sooner at liberty than he left Rome, and retired into Hetruria; but the tribunes knew nothing of his escape, till he was again cited to appear, when his friends endeavoured to prove to the people, that he had executed justice on himself, and anticipated their sentence of banishment, by banishing himself; but the tribunes, seeing plainly that this was only an evasion to avoid the payment of the fine, exacted it with more rigour; so that Quinctius, the father of Cæso, having sold the best part of his estate on that account, was forced to retire to a poor cottage on the

tion to the Terentian law.

THE tribunes, believing that the banishment of Cæso would keep the young patricians in awe, called an assembly of the people, in order to propose the Terentian law, and get it approved by the tribes; but it was no sooner mentioned, than there sprung up as it were a thousand Cæsos, all opposing it with the same intrepidity. Hereupon the tribunes ordered all the patricians to be driven away from the assembly; but the nobility, uniting themselves more closely together after the prosecution of Cæso, opposed force by force; and being attended by a great number of their clients, made the tribunes feel the evil consequences of the sedition they had begun. The people were dispersed anew, and the tribunes obliged to save themselves, by taking refuge b in their own houses. Thus the law was hindered from passing this year. The following year the senate and patricians, in conjunction, raised to the consulate Cains Claudius, brother to Appius Claudius, who killed himself, and P. Valerius a second time. The tribunes, seeing the whole body of the nobility united against them, and despairing to carry their point by a fair, open contest, combined together to destroy at one stroke the better part of the senate, and such of the patricians as were obnoxious to them. In order to put in execution so detestable a project, in the first place, by many false reports spread abroad among the people, they filled the whole city with inquietude and distrust, as if some great design was secretly hatching against the public liberty. Then, to give the people strong suspicions of the whole body of the c nobility, they caused a letter to be delivered to themselves in public. While they were sitting in their tribunal, a stranger came, and having, in the sight of all the people, put into their hands a letter, disappeared in an instant, and was never afterwards seen. The tribunes read the letter to themselves, and, in reading it, put on an air of terror and surprize, in order to excite the curiosity of the people, and make them more uneasy. Then rising from their seats, and causing silence to be proclaimed by the crier, Virginus, with looks full of consternation, addressing himself to the assembly, spoke thus: Romans, you are threatened with the greatest dangers. If the gods, who are the protectors of innocence, had not discovered the wicked designs of your enemies, you had been all lost. But you must give us leave to acquaint the senate with the d affair before it be divulged. Virginus having thus spoke, the tribunes went all in a body to the consuls houses, and the senate being immediately assembled, the tribunes were admitted into it. In the mean time the emissaries of the tribunes spread a thousand false reports among the people about the contents of the letter. Some said, that Cæso was advancing towards Rome, where he had correspondents, at the head of an army of Volsci; others, that the patricians had conspired to call him back, and, with his assistance, to destroy the tribunate; others confined the enterprize to the young patricians, and maintained, that Cæso was still in Rome, and would soon appear at the head of a numerous body, composed of patricians and their clients, &c. Thus the people's prejudices were kept up, and their hatred to the patricians increased. e

THE tribunes being admitted into the senate, Virginus addressed himself to the consuls [and senators in the following words: "Our discretion, conscript fathers,
"made us keep silence, while the misfortunes, with which we are now threatened,
"were yet uncertain. To act upon bare conjectures against seditious men not yet "discovered, is often only giving a handle to factious spirits to raise insurrections;
"however, we have not been unactive upon our first suspicions, and our private in"quiries have been effectual. We have been faithfully served by those foreigners, "with whom we live in hospitality and friendship. Their letters will convince "you, that the gods watch over the republic for its preservation. The symptoms
"we find at home, agree with the accounts we receive from abroad. Rome is be- f
"trayed. Some of the most illustrious families in this city, and some even of the "senate itself, are turned conspirators, and have sworn her destruction. Among the "Roman knights there are assassins, who are ready to murder us. They wait only "for the opportunity of a dark night to break into our houses, and massacre us, and "all those among the people, who shew any zeal for the public liberty. They take "it for granted, that, after this barbarous execution, they shall easily obtain of you
"the abolition of the tribunate. Cæso, that Cæso, whom they rescued from his just "punishment, is the instrument of their fury. He is to appear within the walls,

" attended

- a " attended by numerous troops of Æqui and Volsi, who are to be brought hither
 " privately, and in small parties. The tribunes are to fall the first victims to his
 " resentment; and such of the people as shall dare to make any resistance, are to be " sacrificed without mercy. These are our dangers; this is the crime of your patri" cians. What then is now to be done? O! ye immortal gods, who unite us in " the same religious worship, inspire the senate with sentiments of equity; efface
 " out of their minds all regard to rank, birth and party-interest. We conjure you,
 " conscript fathers, not to give us up to the rage of these assassins. In order to pre" vent their evil designs, we hope you will not refuse us a decree; empowering us to " make further inquiries into this conspiracy, and to secure the chief authors of it.
- b " Those, who are most in danger, are most nearly concerned to avoid it, and will " be most active in making discoveries. Time presses us, and our assassins are at the " gates. The least delay were dangerous. Who knows but this very night may be " pitched upon for the execution of the bloody design? They must be conspirators " themselves, who are against inquiring into the conspiracy."

THE demand of the tribunes much embarrassed the senate. The more timorous were apprehensive, that a refusal would irritate the people, and raise a sedition; but those who had more firmness of mind, represented how dangerous it was to give the tribunes an unbounded power in an affair of a capital nature. But the consul Clau- dius, addressing himself to the tribunes, replied thus: " I take upon me to answer

- c " you, tribunes, because none of you can have the confidence to say, that I am con" cerned in the conspiracy, with which you charge the patricians. My conduct puts " me out of your reach. However, my design in speaking, is not to dissuade the " senators from suffering informations to be taken of such a cruel attempt, or to hin" der them from giving you this commission. Were the accusation true, too much " precaution could not be used to secure your lives, and the public liberty; but let " us search the matter to the bottom. The tribunes last year could not get their
 " law passed: hence their air of consternation; hence their continual deliberations,
 " their assemblies, and their conferences. And what resolutions have they taken in " them? No doubt, to invent the chimerical conspiracy they now bring to light.
- d " Let us accuse the patricians, said they, of having conspired against our lives;
 " and then demand of the senate a power to take cognizance of the conspiracy. If " they refuse it, we shall then inspire the populace with new rage against them. If " they grant it, we will then give full scope to our resentment, and intimidate the " opposers of the Terentian law. This is the tribunes scheme; these are the snares
 " they have laid for us. Speak, Virginus, tell us, whence came these letters, which " have so much alarmed you? Who are these guests, and these faithful allies?
 " How came they acquainted with the misfortunes which threaten you? Where is " the bearer of this foul accusation? Why has he disappeared? Let us know who " are the senators and knights named in the letter you produce? Surely we have " time enough to hear the names of those great criminals. Shall we wait till you " are made masters of our lives by a decree of the senate, and have it in your power " to convict us of treason by false evidence? You say, the symptoms at home agree " with the informations from abroad; why don't you then shew us these symptoms?
 " Why don't you produce the accusers? Could you possibly imagine, that the se" nate would deliver up our most illustrious citizens to your fury, upon a bare accu" sation by letter, without any kind of proof? To you, conscript fathers, to your " indulgence the bold attempts of the tribunes are to be ascribed. You were too " easy in delivering up the brave Cæso to the rage of his persecutors. The tribunes " success against him encourages them to attempt every thing against us. To con" clude, my opinion is, that, if the state be in any danger, it is only from these
 " seducers of the people, who, while they set up for the defenders of the public
 " liberty, are indeed its greatest enemies." This speech quite stunned the tribunes.
 They withdrew with no less shame than fury; and repairing to the assembly of the people, who waited for them, began there to inveigh most bitterly against both senate and consuls; but Appius following them, ascended the rostra, and spoke to the people with so much strength and eloquence, that the better sort were fully convinced, that the pretended conspiracy was only an artifice of the tribunes to have it in their power to destroy their enemies; but the undistinguishing rabble continued in their first per-

persuasion; and the tribunes took great care to maintain the belief of an error, which ^a gave them an opportunity of raising new disturbances in the state ^w.

Herdonius, a Sabine, attempts the reduction of Rome.

THE intestine broils of the republic encouraged a private man in Sabinia, named Appius Herdonius, to attempt the reduction of Rome. He was descended of an illustrious family, and having a great number of slaves and clients, he flattered himself that he should be able, with their assistance, to reduce the Roman republic under his obedience, and make himself king of Rome. This bold design he imparted to his friends, representing to them, that it was not impracticable to surprize the city during the division between the people and the senate. Some of his friends, no less enterprising than himself, approving his undertaking, soon got together about four thousand men, consisting partly of their own clients, but chiefly of slaves, outlaws, ^b and men of desperate fortunes. This was indeed a small number for so great an enterprize; but Herdonius took it for granted, that a great number of Roman exiles, the Roman populace, who were greedy of plunder, such citizens as were enemies to the patricians, the slaves, and also the Æqui and Volsci, would not fail to come to his assistance, upon the first news of his attempt. With these hopes he embarked his troops on the Tiber by night, brought them down the river, and landed them before break of day by the side of the capitol. He got up the hill without being perceived, and, under cover of the darkness, possessed himself of the temple of Jupiter, and the fortress adjoining to it. Thence he threw himself into the neighbouring houses, and put all those to the sword, who refused to join him. Some, who had the good luck ^c to save themselves before the Sabines entered their houses, raised with their noise an alarm in all the quarters of the city. Nothing was heard but confused voices of people, crying out, To arms, the enemy is in the heart of the city. The consuls, awakened by the noise, knew not whether this tumult arose from a domestic faction, or foreign enemy, and were therefore equally afraid to arm the people, or leave them disarmed. They therefore contented themselves with giving arms to some, on whom they could depend, and placing them in the forum, and at the gates of the city. The night was spent in doubts and uneasiness, neither the consuls nor the people knowing how many, or what enemies they were to contend with. At length the return of light discovered who was at the head of so daring an enterprize. The consuls ^d immediately repaired to the forum, and summoned all the citizens to take arms, and follow them; but the tribunes, mounting their tribunal, with their unseasonable harangues, cooled the ardor of the people. We don't pretend, said they, to obstruct the public good; but after all, Romans, this is the time for turning the service you are going to do your country to your own advantage. Before you take arms, insist upon the consuls not opposing the Terentian law; and don't expose your lives to evident dangers, till they have promised upon oath, that as soon as you have re-taken the capitol, they will suffer the Terentian law to pass. Why should you venture your lives, when you can draw no advantage from your bravery? These words made such an impression upon the minds of the multitude, that neither the commands of ^e the consuls, nor the danger with which they were threatened, could prevail upon them to take arms. The consul Claudius, full of indignation, was for having the patricians attack the citadel themselves. The people, said he, would sell you their services too dear. The patricians, attended by their clients, and a few volunteers, are sufficient to drive away the rash Herdonius; besides, we may borrow succours of the Latins and Hernici: our slaves, if we set them at liberty, will lend us their assistance. In short, any soldiers are better than refractory citizens, who refuse to relieve their country in its utmost danger. But Valerius, who was more moderate and popular than his colleague, was of opinion, that, in the present circumstances, the senate ought not to refuse the multitude any thing that could induce them to take ^f up arms immediately. The best part of the senators being of his mind, he advanced into the midst of the people, and promised them, that, as soon as the capitol was re-taken, he would not hinder the tribunes from proposing the law. The people, charmed with this promise, took arms, and solemnly swore never to lay them down without the consuls leave. Then the consuls drew lots for the conduct of the attack, which fell to Valerius. Claudius was appointed to cover the city, and prevent any succours from joining Herdonius. Valerius, having drawn up his men in the forum, marched to the attack with them, and a legion of Tusculans, which L. Mamilius, the

- a supreme magistrate of Tusculum, had sent of his own accord to the assistance of the Romans. Herdonius sustained the assault with such courage and resolution, that the day was far spent before the Romans had gained any advantage over him. The consul Valerius, encouraging his men by his example to advance boldly, notwithstanding the showers of darts, which were incessantly discharged upon them, was slain at the head of the legionaries. P. Volumnius, who saw him fall, ordered his body to be covered, in order to conceal his death. He then took his place, and led on the Romans with so much bravery and resolution, that they carried the place before they missed their commander. Herdonius fought like a man in despair, who was resolved to sell his life very dear. As he was a man of a tall stature, and great strength, he made a terrible slaughter of the Romans, disputing the ground inch by inch, till he was at length slain, after having lost the greatest part of his followers. Those, who outlived the loss of their general, either stabbed themselves, or threw themselves headlong from the top of the capitol. And thus ended this rash enterprize in the destruction of Herdonius, and all those who were concerned in it.

- THE city was no sooner recovered from its fright, but the tribunes called upon Claudius, the surviving consul, to perform his colleague's promise; but he put it off, under various pretences, and at length refused to do any thing in the affair, till a new consul was elected in the room of Valerius. The day for the election being appointed, the senate and the whole body of patricians resolved to chuse some senator of great merit, who should be capable of defeating the tribunes design, and keeping the people in awe with his authority. They cast their eyes upon Quintius Cincinnatus, the father of Cæso, who was accordingly elected by the first class, consisting of eighteen centuries of cavalry, and fourscore of infantry; so that there was no occasion for the inferior classes to give their suffrages. When the deputies sent by the senate to acquaint Quintius with his promotion, presented him with the decree of his election, the venerable old man, wholly free from ambition, was in some doubt what resolution to take. He had retired, after his son's disgrace, into the country, and was so taken with the sweets of a rural life, that he preferred them to all the pomp of the consular dignity. However, the love of his country getting the better of his private satisfaction, he left the plough, which he was driving when the deputies arrived, and consented to go with them to the city; but he first took leave of his wife, and recommending to her the care of his domestic affairs, I fear, said he, my dear Racilia, that our fields will be but ill manured this year. He no sooner entered upon his office, but he turned his thoughts upon reforming the senate, and restraining the insolence of the people and their tribunes. In the first speech he made, he reprimanded both the senate and people with equal severity, without declaring himself for either party. He reproached the senate for feeding, with their continual compliance, the rebellious spirit of the people; and the tribunes for raising continual disturbances, and promoting an unbridled licentiousness among the populace. Some seditious men, said he, reign in Rome, with more insolence and tyranny than ever did the Tarquins; but I shall take care to carry the people out of the way of those seducers. Know then, ye Roman people, that my colleague and I have resolved to make war upon the Æqui and Volsci. We declare too, that our intention is to pass the winter in the field, without ever returning, during our consulate, into a city so full of sedition. We command all those, who have taken the military oath, to appear to-morrow with their arms at the lake Regillus. The tribunes answered, that they would not suffer any levies to be made; and that if Quintius was determined to take the field, he might chance to go to war only with his colleague. The brave consul replied, That there was no occasion for new levies, since the oaths the people had taken to Valerius, whose place he supplied, were still binding. The tribunes, to elude that engagement, cried out, That by the oath the people had taken to Valerius, they had not laid themselves under any obligation to Quintius, who was then but a private man. But the answers of the tribunes seeming even to those, who were most nearly concerned, more subtle than solid, every one began to take arms, tho' very unwillingly. What still increased their uneasiness, was a report spread abroad, that the consuls designed to hold a general assembly on the banks of the lake Regillus, and there to annul whatever had been done in former assemblies for the advantage of the people, the authority of the tribunes being confined to the city. Quintius further gave out, that, on his return, he would name a dictator, whose authority could not be curbed by the opposition of a the tribunes. These reports, artfully spread abroad, struck both the people and the tribunes with terror. The women and children, all in tears, conjured the principal men in the senate to intercede for them with Quintilius, and to prevail upon him to suffer their husbands and fathers to return to their homes at the end of the campaign. Quintilius seemed inflexible; and the people, struck with consternation at the very mention of spending the winter in the camp, became very submissive. At length a kind of treaty was made between Quintilius and the tribunes: the former promised not to force the troops to winter in the field, nor even to march out of the city; and the latter, on their parts, bound themselves to make no proposal to the people of new laws. To these two articles was added a third, viz. that for the future neither b consuls nor tribunes should be continued in their offices beyond the year. Quintilius having thus restored tranquillity to the city, applied himself to hear and determine private causes, and pronounced such equitable judgments, that the people, charmed with his conduct, seemed to have forgot that there were any such officers as tribunes in the republic.

The Æqui and Volſci defeated

NOTWITHSTANDING the late agreement between Quintilius and the tribunes, the latter got themselves continued in their employments. Hereupon the patricians were for continuing Quintilius in the consulship; but he warmly opposed it, upbraiding the senators with their contemptible levity in being so ready to violate their own laws, and thereby countenancing the breach of them in the people. Before he retired c to his farm, he presided at the comitia, when Fabius Vibulanus a third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginensis, were named consuls for the ensuing year. They had scarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome, that Antium had revolted to the Volſci, who, together with the Æqui, had taken the field. It fell to Fabius's lot to march against the Volſci; and he gained considerable advantages over them, while his colleague was attended with equal success against the Æqui, who, after having been defeated in the field with great slaughter, shut themselves up in the city of Antium. Cornelius laid close siege to the place, took it by storm, and ordered the chief authors of the revolt to be first whipped in the market-place, and then beheaded. The Æqui, being disheartened at their repeated losses, had recourse to the clemency d of the senate, who granted them peace, upon the same conditions on which it had been formerly granted to the Latins. They were to continue in possession of their cities, lands and laws, but under the dominion of Rome.

Volſcius proſe-

WHILE the consuls were thus employed in the field, A. Cornelius, and Q. Servilius, both quaestors this year, being men of great probity, began a prosecution against M. Volſcius, for having bore false witness against Casſo. In virtue of the power annexed to their office, they convened an assembly of the people, and produced their evidences, of whom some deposed, that they had seen Casſo in the army on the very day when Volſcius pretended he killed his brother at Rome. Others gave testimony, that e Volſcius's brother died of a languishing distemper; and that he never stirred out of his house after he was seized with it. These facts, and many others, were attested by so many persons of unquestionable credit, that there was no room left to doubt of Volſcius's malice; but the tribunes, who had suborned Volſcius, put a stop to this prosecution, declaring, that they would not suffer the suffrages of the people to be gathered upon any affair whatsoever, before the Terentian law was determined. The senate, in their turn, made use of the like pretence, declaring, that they would not suffer the Terentian law to be proposed, till the business of Volſcius was determined. These contests were spun out till the return of the consuls, who entered Rome in triumph, and soon after resigned the fasces to C. Nautius, and L. Minucius, who were obliged to take the field in the very beginning of their year against the Volſci, who had revolted f from the Romans, and the Sabines, who, with a numerous army, committed great devastations in the Roman territory. The latter were routed by the consul Nautius, and forced to shut themselves up in their strong-holds. But Minucius, by a stratagem of Cluilius, commander of the Æqui, being led into a valley, was there hemmed in on all sides, and in danger of being starved into a surrender at discretion. Some horsemen, having found means to make their escape in the dead of the night, carried the news to Rome. Whereupon Quintus Fabius, governor of the city, immediately dispatched a messenger to the other consul, to inform him of the danger his colleague was

- a in. Nautius repaired to Rome in all haste; and having assembled the senate, all the fathers were for having recourse to the remedy made use of in their greatest calamities, which was, to create a dictator. Accordingly the consul named Quintius (Quintus Cincinnatus for that high station, and immediately returned to put himself at the head of his army. The governor of Rome sent the consul's decree to Quintius, who was found, as before, cultivating his small inheritance with his own hands. When he saw the deputies with a numerous train of attendants, and twenty-four lictors with their fasces advancing to him, he put on his robe, and going to meet them, What tidings, said he, do you bring from Rome? Your country, replied the deputies, being in great danger, stands in need of a dictator, and has pitched upon you; you are the only refuge Rome has in her distress. At these words he sighed, and, tho' sorry to quit his beloved solitude, yet obeyed the orders of the senate, and, having put on the habit of his new dignity, set out for Rome. The senate having notice that he drew near, sent him a boat, in which he crossed the Tiber, his three sons, his friends, and the chief men of the senate, receiving him at his landing, and conducting him in triumph to his house, amidst the loud acclamations of the people. The next day the dictator named for general of the horse L. Tarquinius. He was a patrician of uncommon valour, but not having wherewithal to keep a horse, had till then served in the infantry; but the dictator, who had observed his gallantry and conduct in the campaign he had made under him, did justice to his merit; and, notwithstanding his poverty, raised him to that high station. The first order Quintius made, was, that all the shops and tribunals should be shut up. Then he commanded all the youth in the city and country to be before sun-set in the campus Martius, each with twelve stakes, and provisions for five days. He then put himself at the head of these troops, and, before break of day, arriving at the enemy's camp, viewed their entrenchments, as well as the obscurity of the night would allow him. He made his soldiers, by several loud shouts, give the consul notice of the arrival of succours. Upon this, the consular army expressing as much joy as the Æqui did terror, without waiting for day-light, ran to arms, and fell upon the enemy with another shout, which was heard by the dictator's army. The Æqui first turned their arms against Quintius, in order to prevent him from surrounding them; but being called back to repulse the consul, Quintius laid hold of that opportunity to fortify his entrenchments with a palisado made of the stakes his men had brought from Rome. These entrenchments served at the same time to shut up the enemy's camp; so that the general of the Æqui, named Gracchus Duius, found himself at day-light in the same situation to which he had reduced the consul. Early in the morning the dictator and consul attacked the enemy's camp at the same time with such vigour, that Duius, fearing his camp would be won sword in hand, had recourse to negotiation. He sent deputies to the consul, who refusing to hear them, referred them to the dictator. Quintius having heard their proposals, which were, to quit their camp, and retire without baggage, arms or cloaths, replied sternly, That he did not think their death would be of any service to his republic, and therefore was willing to grant them their lives, but upon condition, that they delivered up to him their general and chief officers, and submitted to pass every man of them under the yoke, to imprint it deeply in their minds, that the Æqui were a nation conquered by the Romans. If they refused to comply with these conditions, he threatened to cut them all in pieces. The Æqui, being surrounded on all sides, and unable to sustain two attacks at the same time, submitted to what conditions the victorious enemy was pleased to impose upon them. Two javelins were therefore fixed in the ground, and a third laid over them; and under this sort of gate all the soldiers passed, naked and unarmed. At the same time they delivered up to the Romans their general and chief officers, who were reserved to adorn the dictator's triumph. Quintius would not allow the troops of the consul Minucius to have any share of the spoil. Cowardly troops, said he to the consular army, you were almost become a prey to the enemy; it is not therefore just you should have any share of their riches. As for you, Minucius, added he, you must learn the art of war in an inferior rank, before you pretend again to command in chief. He then obliged him to lay down his office; which the modest consul was so far from resenting, that he and his troops presented the dictator with a crown of gold of a pound weight, for having saved the lives and honour of his fellow-citizens. Quintius, after this victory, returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph, being attended both by his own and Minucius's army, with garlands of flowers on their heads.

heads. Before his chariot were led the enemy's general, and a great number of officers in chains, who were the chief ornament of that procession. The dictator, having finished his expedition in less than a fortnight's time, was for laying down immediately his office, and retiring to his beloved solitude; but his friends prevailed upon him to continue in the dictatorship, till Volscius, the accuser of his son Caso, was brought to his trial. Accordingly he assembled the curiæ; and the informer being convicted of calumny and false testimony, was, according to the law of retaliation, condemned to perpetual banishment, and Caso recalled home. This done, Quintius abdicated the dictatorship the sixteenth day after his advancement to it, though he might have held that dignity six months.

THE abdication of the dictator was followed by new disturbances. Virginus was continued a fifth year in the tribuneship; Volscius was recalled from banishment, and reinstated in his office; the tribunes revived the dispute about the Terentian law; and at the same time the Æqui, tho' lately subdued, together with the Sabines, began to make their usual inroads, and lay waste the Roman territory. The two new consuls, C. Horatius, and Q. Minucius, were ordered by the senate to raise troops, and march without delay against the enemy; but the tribunes, after their old way, protested, that they would not suffer one plebeian to give in his name, till the commissioners for making a body of laws, according to Terentius's proposal, were named. An extraordinary assembly of the senate was therefore summoned, to deliberate on the present troubles, and Quintius Cincinnatus recalled to make head against the tribunes. He was of opinion, that the whole senate, and the body of the patricians, with their friends and clients, should take arms, and hasten into the field. His advice was received with applause. Even the oldest senators repaired immediately to their houses, took arms, and, attended by their clients and friends, appeared in the forum. The people, who flocked thither from all parts, being moved at this new sight, the consul Horatius exhorted all good citizens to join those illustrious senators, who chose rather to expose their lives to the utmost dangers, than to see Rome insulted by her enemies. Virginus, in the name of his colleagues and the people, answered, That the plebeians would not serve, till the Terentian law was accepted. Hereupon Horatius made a reproachful speech to the curiæ, shewing them the dismal effects, which the seditious practices of their tribunes must at last unavoidably produce. His harangue made a deep impression on the minds of the multitude; which Virginus perceiving, thought it advisable to conform to the present conjuncture. Assuming therefore a milder behaviour, he told the consul, That he was ready to give over opposing the levies, nay, that he would himself exhort the people to take arms, provided the senate would grant them one favour, which would be of great service to them, and noways detrimental to the authority of the conscript fathers. The consul desired him to speak his mind freely, assuring him, that he would find the senate ready to comply with any reasonable request in behalf of the people. Then Virginus, having first conferred with his colleagues, replied, All that the people request of you is, that you will suffer the number of the tribunes to be increased from five to ten. If you give us a refusal in an affair of so small importance, accuse yourselves only of the misfortunes the republic may suffer. This unexpected request divided the senate. Caius Claudius opposed it with great warmth, being governed by this hereditary maxim, as we may call it, that all the requests of the tribunes ought to be suspected. But Quintius Cincinnatus, considering this affair in another light, was for granting the tribunes their request. He thought, that the more numerous the tribunes were, the more easy it would be to sow divisions among them. The opinion of this great man prevailed, and the senate passed a decree, giving the people leave to chuse ten tribunes annually, provided they did not continue the same man in office above a year. Pursuant to this decree, the tribes were immediately assembled, and two tribunes chosen out of each of the first five classes. The tribunes being satisfied, two armies were raised without opposition. Minucius marched against the Sabines, who fled before him, and retired into their own country. Horatius led his troops against the Æqui, retook Corbio and Ortona, which they had seized; and then both consuls returned to Rome, to preside in the comitia at the election of their successors.

IN the following consulate of M. Valerius Laetucinus, and Sp. Virginus Tricostus, the tribunes, grown more audacious than ever by their number, proposed, that mount

- a Arventine, or at least such parts of it as lay uncultivated, or were not possessed by lawful owners, might be yielded to the people, who being now very numerous, began to want habitations. The consuls looking upon this new demand as a prelude to the revival of the Agrarian law, and therefore deferring to convene the senate to debate it, Isilius, one of the tribunes, ventured upon an attempt never heard of before. He sent an officer to them, commanding them to assemble the senate forthwith, and to repair to it themselves. The messenger was, by the consuls orders, soundly beat, and ignominiously driven away by one of their lictors. Hereupon the tribunes caused the lictor to be seized, and some of them were for putting him immediately to death, for violating the sacred privileges of the tribuneship in the person of their officer. The senate, to save him, had recourse to entreaties, but without success. They were obliged to come to a composition with the tribunes. The lictor was set at liberty; but mount Arventine was, by a decree of the senate, yielded to the people. The senate soon found, that their compliance with the last demands of the people served only to put them upon new pretensions. Isilius, the most enterprising of the tribunes, formed a design to bring the consuls themselves under subjection. In the consulate of T. Romilius and C. Veturius, the tribunes made more noise than ever about the Terentian law; and the consuls, knowing the republic would never be quiet at home, till she was engaged in a war abroad, resolved to revenge the inroads, which the Sabines and Æqui had made the year before; but, in raising levies, they used so much severity,
- c that the people appealed to their tribunes, who taking the part of the complainants, endeavoured to rescue out of the hands of the lictors those, whom the consuls had ordered to be seized, for refusing to answer when called upon. The consuls advanced to support the execution of their orders; but the tribunes, supported by the populace, not only repulsed them, but ordered their ædiles to seize those sovereign magistrates, and carry them to prison. So daring an attempt provoked the patricians to such a degree, that they fell upon the tribunes, beat them soundly, and forced them to fly, with those who stood up for them. The next day the tribunes assembled the people anew, and summoned the consuls to appear before their tribunal, and there answer for what had happened the day before. The consuls scornfully refusing to obey the
- d summons, the tribunes brought their complaints to the senate, and threatened to assemble the tribes in order to judge the consuls, in case they did not appear to justify their conduct. The consul Romilius haughtily answered, That the tribunes had been the aggressors, and the sole authors of the tumult; and protested, that, if they were so daring as to proceed a step further in this affair, he would arm the whole body of patricians against them. The senate, thinking it equally dangerous to declare either for the consuls or the tribunes, broke up, without coming to any resolution. Isilius, finding that nothing was to be expected from the senate, convened an assembly of the people, in order to stir them up to some vigorous resolution. Some of the plebeians were for taking arms, and retiring again to the sacred mount; others for proceeding
- e against the consuls, and insisting upon their appearing before the people, or condemning them to death or banishment, in case they did not appear; but the most moderate advised the people to defer all proceedings against the consuls, till their consulate was expired, and, in the mean time, to prosecute, with the utmost rigour, those patricians, who had assisted them in the insult they had committed on the persons of the tribunes. Of these three different opinions the tribunes chose to follow the second; and accordingly summoned the consuls to appear the third market-day. This project however came to nothing; for Isilius declared in the assembly of the people, that the college of tribunes, at the entreaties of the senate, forgave the consuls the personal injuries they had received from them; but could not neglect the
- f interests of the people, and would therefore propose both the Agrarian and Terentian laws to their consideration. This said, he fixed a day for a new assembly to deliberate upon those matters.

THE time appointed being come, and the people assembled, Isilius made a long harangue on the reasonableness of the Agrarian law, and then declared, that any plebeian might speak his mind freely. Upon this, many plebeians pleaded the right their services gave them to a share of the conquered lands, and made loud complaints of the patricians, who usurped what the plebeians had gained with their blood. This was the common complaint of the plebeians; but none represented it in stronger terms than one Sicinius, or, as Livy calls him, Siccius Dentatus. He was a plebeian shape and mein, and not uneloquent for a man of his profession. He enumerated his exploits in war during forty years service; told the multitude, that he had been in a hundred and twenty engagements, that he had received forty-five wounds, and all before, twelve of them in that single action against Herdonius the Sabine; that for the thirty last years he had been always in some command or other; that fourteen civic crowns had been given him for saving the lives of so many citizens, three mural crowns for having been the first who mounted the breach in towns taken by storm, eight other crowns for different exploits, eighty-three golden collars, sixty golden bracelets, eighteen lances, twenty-five sets of furniture for horses, nine of which he had won from so many enemies conquered in single combats. And these military toys, added he, are the only rewards I have hitherto received. No lands, no share of the conquered countries. Usurpers, without any title but that of a patrician extraction, possess them. Is this to be endured? Shall they alone enjoy the fruits of our conquests? the purchase of our blood? No, plebeians, let us delay no longer to do ourselves justice. Let us this very day pass the law proposed by Scilius. If the young patricians oppose it, let our tribunes make them feel what is the extent of their authority. Scilius bestowed the highest elogiums on Dentatus, but affecting to appear a strict observer of the laws, he told him, that he could not with justice propose the law till he had heard what the patricians alledged against it. Accordingly, he adjourned the assembly to the next day. In the mean time the consuls, having spent great part of the night in consulting with the chief men of the senate about the proper means to frustrate the designs of the tribunes, came to the following resolution, viz. to employ the whole art of eloquence to win over the people; but if they continued obstinately bent upon the publication of the law, in that case to hinder by main force the collecting of the votes. This resolution being imparted to the patricians, they all repaired early in the morning to the forum, and dispersed themselves among the multitude in small parties. The consuls being come, the tribunes caused proclamation to be made by a herald, that whoever had any solid reasons to offer against the publication of the Agrarian law, might lay them before the people. Several senators presented themselves one after another; but they no sooner began to speak, than the populace set up such a clamour, that it was impossible to hear what they said. The consuls protested against all that should be done in so tumultuous an assembly; but the tribunes, without hearkening to their remonstrances, commanded the urns to be opened, and the tables to be delivered out to the people, in order to vote. Hereupon the young patricians starting up, snatched away the urns, and scattered about the tablets, on which the votes were written, and throwing themselves, at the head of their clients and friends, into the croud, by blows and main force hindered the people from dividing into their respective tribes. The tribunes, having attempted in vain to oppose the patricians, and keep the people together, were at length obliged to retire, and defer the promulgation of the law to another day. Early next morning, the tribunes assembled the people, and having demanded and obtained permission of the assembly to inquire after the authors of the late disorder, they resolved to turn the whole accusation against the youth of the Posthumian, Sempronian, and Clelian families, who had been the most active in the fray. It was then customary in Rome to determine what punishment the accused deserved, in case he was convicted, before his crime was reported to the people. The tribunes therefore having assembled a certain number of the most considerable citizens to determine the punishment they should inflict upon the ring-leaders of the tumult, some voted for death, others for banishment; but Sicinius was for the least punishment the laws enjoined, viz. the confiscation of their effects; and his opinion prevailed. The chief men of the senate, having consulted together on this occasion, thought it adviseable not to oppose the prosecution, hoping that the multitude, satisfied with this revenge, would drop the more important affair of the law. As for the loss of the sufferers, they resolved to repair it at their private charges. Accordingly, when the day came for the trial, the persons accused not appearing, were condemned in a fine for default, and their goods publicly sold to pay it. But the senate caused them to be bought up by private hands, and restored to the former proprietors.

The patricians oppose by force the passing of the law.

The Æqui invade the territory of Tusculum.

DURING these contentions, news was brought, that the Æqui had made an irruption into the territory of the Tusculans, who were in alliance with Rome. The senate

- a immediately decreed, that the consuls should take the field, and march to the assistance of those faithful allies. The tribunes did not fail to lay hold of this opportunity to raise new disturbances about the Agrarian law, protesting, that they would not suffer the plebeians to take arms, till the law was passed. But herein they were not seconded by the people, who, remembering the assistance they had received from Tusculum against Herdonius, readily gave in their names; so that two armies were immediately raised. Sicinius Dentatus was one of the first who joined the consuls at the head of eight hundred veterans as brave as himself, who had all served the time prescribed by law, but yet were willing to make one campaign more under the command of so famous a leader. The consuls marched out of Rome in great state; but the
- b Æqui, on the news of their approach, retired to their own frontiers, and incamped on a steep rock. The Romans pitched their camp not far from the enemy, and kept close within it, to conceal their strength, and by that means encourage the enemy to offer them battle. Accordingly, the Æqui, imagining the number of the Romans to be very small, went down into the plain, and there challenged the Romans to an engagement. The consul Romilius, who commanded that day in chief, seeing the enemy thus confirmed in their false confidence, resolved to give them battle in the plain, and at the same time to attack their camp on the hill. With this view he sent for Sicinius, and either out of esteem for so valiant a commander, or, what is most likely, with a design to expose him and his veterans, who were all plebeians, to be cut
- c in pieces, gave him the charge of attacking the enemy's camp. Sicinnus, being well apprised of the danger of so desperate an attempt, gave the consul this respectful answer. I never yet declined any dangerous enterprise out of fear: but give me leave to represent to you, that the execution of what you command, is not so easy as you seem to imagine it. The rock we must climb up is very steep on all sides, and not accessible, but by a narrow way, which an handful of men may defend against a whole army. If you will have me therefore to make this attack, enlarge my troop, and put us in a condition to shew our bravery without dishonouring ourselves by a rash attempt. At these words, the consul told him in great anger, that his business was to obey, and not to act the general; and then added, with a scornful smile, this then
- d is the brave man who has signalised himself in an hundred and twenty battles, who has been forty years in the service, and whose whole body is covered over with wounds! He draws back at the sight of danger, and has no courage, but in words. Go, Sicinnus, go to the comitia, and fight the patricians with your tongue. What you refuse to undertake, others shall put in execution for you. The brave plebeian, enraged at the general's reproaches, told him boldly, that he found he was resolved either to destroy an old soldier, or to shame him; that he had been always ready to sacrifice his life for his honour, and therefore would now march up to the enemy's camp, and either win it, or fall in the attempt, with all the veterans under his command. Then turning to them, my dear fellow-soldiers, said he, let us go whithersoever honour and
- e the command of our general call us. You will bear me witness after my death, that I was destroyed only for having defended with zeal the public liberty. His veterans took their leave of the rest of the soldiers, who looked upon them as men sent to slaughter. But Sicinnus, who understood the art of war better than the consul, instead of following the narrow path, which he had pointed out to him, led his men round about, and at length entered a great wood that seemed to stretch along the hills quite to the enemy's camp. There he met with a peasant, who conducted him to an eminence, which overlooked the enemy's camp, and was not far from it. From thence he had a sight of the two armies, which were already engaged, and at the same time observed, that the soldiers, who were left to guard the enemy's camp,
- f were all gone to that side, which were next the plain, to see from thence the battle. In this juncture Sicinnus, with his veterans, entering the intrenchments without opposition, ordered his men to give a loud shout, and at the same time falling upon the Æqui, whose eyes were turned another way, struck them with such terror, that they abandoned the camp, and fled in the utmost confusion to the main body of their army. Sicinnus pursued them close, made a great slaughter of them by the way, and then falling upon the rear of the main body, which was engaged with the Romans, quickly put an end to the conflict. The Æqui betook themselves to flight, and the consuls following them, killed above seven thousand men in the pursuit. Sicinnus, as soon as it was dark, retired with his veterans to the camp he had taken from the enemy,
- g and having there put to the sword all the prisoners, killed the horses, and set fire to the

the tents, arms and baggage, marched with all possible expedition to Rome, with a his victorious cohort, and gave an account to the tribunes of what had passed, begging that the honours of a triumph might not be allowed to generals who had abused their authority to destroy their fellow-citizens. The people, full of indignation, promised they would never consent that the consuls should have a triumph, and accordingly, when the generals returned from the campaign, the multitude refused to let them enter the city with the usual pomp on such occasions. The senate, fearing some new commotions, did not think proper to espouse the consuls cause, so that they returned without honour, and loaded with fresh odium.

The last year's consuls tried by the people, and fined.

THE two consuls had no sooner resigned the fasces to their successors Sp. Tarpeius, and A. Aternius, but they were cited before the assembly of the people. Sicinius, b whom the people had raised to the tribuneship, took upon him the management of the prosecution against his enemy Romilius, whilst Allienus, one of the ædiles, accused Veturius. On the day appointed for their trial, they both appeared, depending on the promises the patricians had made them, which were not to suffer the suffrages of the people to be gathered. But Sicinius took such measures to prevent the young patricians from raising any disturbances, that they were both regularly tried for having offered violence to the tribunes, and disturbed them in the execution of their office, and besides, for abusing their authority in the army, in order to destroy Sicinius, and the eight hundred veterans of his cohort. The people fined them both, Romilius in ten thousand asses, and Veturius in fifteen thousand. History has not told us why the c people made this difference in their fines; Veturius seems to have been less guilty than his colleague, and yet his fine was one-third larger. Perhaps Sicinius, satisfied with humbling his adversary, did not care to reduce him to poverty.

UNDER this year's consuls a law was made, with the consent of all orders in the state, empowering any magistrate to lay a fine upon such as should be wanting in respect to his dignity; a prerogative reserved before to the consuls only. This new regulation raised the authority of the tribunes, and put them almost upon a level with the consuls. However, to prevent any particular magistrate from abusing his authority in this point, it was provided by the same law, that the highest fine for such crimes should never exceed the value of two oxen, and thirty sheep. c

The tribunes resume the pursuit of the Terentian law,

THE tribunes, finding they could not by any means bring the consuls to hear of the Agrarian law, returned to the pursuit of the Terentian. The senate, to put an end to the continual contests between them and the people, which they foresaw would at length make Rome become a prey to her enemies, began to hearken to the tribunes proposal, and declared that they would not oppose the drawing up a body of laws, which should be a guide to the magistrates, provided all the legislators were chosen out of the nobility. On the other hand the tribunes were for having them chosen partly out of the nobility, and partly out of the plebeians. On this occasion Romilius, to the great surprise of both parties, declared with great warmth for the establishment of fixed laws, and at the same time proposed the sending of deputies to Athens to e transcribe the laws of Solon, and of the other law-givers of Greece, in order to form thereby a body of Roman laws, which should be the rule for magistrates in all the parts of their administration. The opinion of Romilius was followed by the two consuls, and a great majority of the senators. But before the decree passed, the tribune Sicinius rose up and bestowed great encomiums on Romilius, protesting, that for the future he should ever be his friend. Nay, he went further; and as Romilius had not yet paid the fine, the tribune declared that he remitted it in the name of the people. But as fines, according to the custom of those days, were always applied to religious uses, Romilius rejected this favour, protesting that he would not defraud the gods of the money which belonged to them. A decree conformable to f Romilius's proposal being passed by the senate, and confirmed by the people, Sp. Posthumus, S. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, were appointed to repair to Greece, and there collect the best laws and institutions of the Greek cities, especially of Athens. The quæstors ordered some galleys to be fitted out, and magnificently adorned, to give the Greeks an advantageous opinion of the Roman republic, with which they were yet intirely unacquainted. On board these galleys the deputies set out, leaving Rome in the enjoyment of a profound peace, which lasted all this year and the following, when P. Horatius, and Sextus Quintilius were consuls; but almost all Italy was afflicted with a plague, which swept away great numbers of citizens at Rome, amongst others the

Which at length passed.

- a consul Quintilius, Sp. Furius, who had been named to succeed him, Servius Cornelius, the high-priest of Jupiter, the augur Horatius Pulvillus, four tribunes of the people, and the best part of the senators. The next year, P. Sestius and T. Menenius being consuls, the plague ceased, and the deputies, who had been sent into Greece, returned home. Upon their return, the people pressed the nomination of the ten commissioners or decemvirs for the great work of drawing up a body of laws. But the consuls Sestius and Menenius, being averse to the whole design, put off the election under various pretences. At first they alledged in excuse of their delay, that their successors, in whose consulate this great affair was to be settled, ought to be previously elected. This hastened the election of the new consuls, and Appius Claudius and T. Genucius were chosen before the usual time. Appius was the son of that Appius who killed himself, and grandson of the first Appius. All the patricians gave him their suffrages, hoping he would be no less zealous for the power of the senate than his ancestors. After this election of magistrates for the next year, the tribunes applied themselves anew to the present consuls for the nomination of the decemvirs. But Menenius, pretending to be out of order, kept at home, and Sestius declared, that he would not act in so great an affair without his colleague. Hereupon the tribunes applied themselves to the consuls elect. It then evidently appeared, that the Roman constancy, and zeal of the most rigid patricians for the interests of their body, was nothing else but a refined ambition. For Appius Claudius, who had hitherto valued himself on his immoveable attachment to the party of the nobility, and seemed to have derived it with his blood from his ancestors, changed all at once, and joined with the tribunes, in order to get the decemvirs appointed. His colleague Genucius followed his example, but with more moderation. Appius publicly undertook the defence of the popular faction, and, at the instigation of the tribunes, made an harangue in their favour in a general assembly of the people. He there publicly declared, that the nomination of the decemvirs ought to be deferred no longer, and added, that if the election of himself and his colleague to the consulate was thought to be of any hindrance to it, they were both ready to relinquish their pretensions to that dignity. Appius had in this his private views; he expected, that by the favour of the tribunes, he should be placed at the head of the decemvirs, and by that means have a more absolute authority, than if he had continued consul. The next step was to bring the affair before the senate. Menenius still pretended sickness, and stayed at home; but Sestius was at length prevailed upon by Appius and Genucius to assemble the conscript fathers, and propose the nomination of those new magistrates, which did not pass without some opposition. The patricians did not find their account in establishing these laws, the authority of the consuls being much greater, while they continued to determine causes in an arbitrary manner. Many therefore among the senators were for adhering to the ancient customs, and rejecting all changes in the government of the state. But Appius, who had a strong party in the assembly, maintained on the contrary, that it was highly reasonable that laws should be established, equally binding all citizens, and equally favourable to all; adding, that such an establishment would put an end to the domestic feuds, which had so long divided Rome, as it were, into two cities. The opinion of Appius prevailed, and it was resolved, that ten men, venerable for their age and wisdom, should be chosen to compile a body of laws out of those that had been brought from Greece. It was likewise decreed, that these commissioners should for one whole year be invested with the sovereign power, that the authority of consuls, tribunes, ædiles, and quaestors, should cease; that there should be no appeal from the decemvirs; and lastly, that during their administration, they should be the sole judges of peace and war, and of all matters of justice. This is the first instance of suspending the tribuneship, which, as the tribunes were not properly magistrates, had hitherto been always preserved even under the dictators. But when the ten commissioners came to be chosen, a new difficulty arose. The tribunes demanded, as they had done before, that some plebeians should be let into the commission; but the senate opposing with great unanimity this pretension, the tribunes yielded, for fear the nomination of the decemvirs should be dropt intirely; but upon condition that no alteration should be made by the decemvirs, in two laws favourable to the people, viz. the Scilian, which gave the people ground to build upon on the Aventine, and that of the Mons sacer, by which the tribunes were appointed to defend and protect the people against the oppressions of the patricians. These two articles being agreed upon, a solemn assembly was held of the whole Roman people convened by centuries, and the auspices being taken, they propose the ten tables of laws.

The decemviral government

proceeded to the election of the decemvirs. Appius Claudius, and his colleague T. Genucius, were the first named. To them were added Sestius the consul, who had laid this matter before the senate against his colleague's will; Sp. Posthumus, S. Sulcius, and A. Manlius, who had brought the laws from Greece; T. Romilius, the first who proposed that deputation; C. Julius, T. Veturius, and P. Horatius, all consulars, and men of great distinction. This was almost as remarkable a revolution in the government of Rome, as that from kings to consuls. Nothing could be more moderate and gentle than the beginning of this joint reign, as we may style it, of the decemvirs. They agreed among themselves, that only one of them at a time should have the fasces and the other consular ornaments, assemble the senate, confirm decrees, &c. To this honour they were to succeed by turns, each enjoying it one whole day, and then resigning it to another. The rest, who were not actually exercising their authority, affected no distinction but that of guards, their habits differing very little from those of the other senators. They repaired every morning, each in his turn, to their tribunal in the forum, and there distributed justice with so much impartiality, that the people, charmed with their conduct, seemed to have quite forgot their tribunes. Appius was the most popular of them all. He, who was formerly a severe and inflexible magistrate, was now all affability and complaisance. He knew most of the citizens by their names, received them with respect, and saluted them with great marks of affection; insomuch, that from being the detestation, he became the idol of the people, and was looked upon as a second Poplicola. Before the end of the year each of the decemvirs presented to the people that part of the laws which he had drawn up. They were assisted by one Hermodorus, banished from Ephesus, his native city, and then accidentally at Rome, in understanding the Greek transcripts brought from Athens. We are told, that Heraclitus, one of Hermodorus's friends, wrote him a congratulatory letter on the pains he had taken in drawing up the Roman laws; adding, that in a dream he had seen all the nations of the earth bowing down before those laws, and worshipping them after the Persian manner^d. When the whole work was compleated, the decemvirs assembled the people, and harangued them with the following words; May the gods grant, that what we now present to you, Romans, may be equally agreeable to you, and advantageous to the republic, to you, and your remotest posterity! go, read the laws we have drawn up. We have used all the care and attention possible. But, after all, a whole nation must see further than any ten persons. Examine our laws therefore in private, make them the subject of your public conversation; confer upon them among yourselves, and consult with one another what ought to be taken from them, and what may be added to them. Nothing that we have drawn up shall have the force of a law, till it is received with universal consent. Be you, Romans, rather the authors, than barely the approvers of laws, which are to establish order and regularity, and to be the main foundation of the happiness both of the senate and people. A discourse so modest and candid was heard with great applause. Immediately the laws were cut in ten tables of oak, fixed up in the forum, and all, who came to start any difficulties about them, well received, and readily heard. When all necessary corrections and amendments had been made, the ten tables were carried before the senate, where they met, with no opposition; so that a decree was passed for convening the centuries for their ratification. This assembly was soon after held, and the auspices being solemnly taken, the laws were first confirmed by the unanimous voices of the whole Roman people, and then transcribed on pillars of brass, and ranged in order in the forum, as the foundation of all judicial determinations, with regard both to public and private affairs^e.

As many eminent men in the republic were of opinion, that several regulations, which would fill two other tables, were necessary to be added to the ten already established, the continuation of the decemviral government for one year more was proposed in a general assembly of the people, and approved of by the senate and people with equal readiness, but for different reasons. The senators were glad at any rate to get rid of the tribunes; and the people extremely desirous to keep back the restoration of the consular dignity. Never was any office so much solicited by the gravest and wisest senators, as the decemvirate at this time. Those patricians, who were formerly the most declared enemies of the people, and who scorned to canvass for public offices, were now wholly taken up in flattering and courting the meanest

- a of the citizens. Appius, though a decemvir, forgetting his dignity, debased himself more than any of the candidates. He was perpetually seen in public places in company with those who had been formerly tribunes, and whom he knew to be agreeable to the people. By their means he recommended himself to the multitude, for they were continually boasting of him to the populace, as the author of the happiness they enjoyed under the mild government of the decemvirs. But Appius himself, when asked by the patricians, whether he desired to be continued in his office for the next year, affected to dislike it, and was continually talking of the uneasiness that attends public employments. But his colleagues saw into his designs, and wisely formed their judgment of him by his actions, and not his words. They observed that he abused the regard the people had for him to lessen the most venerable senators in the esteem of the people; that he excluded all men of known merit and steadiness from standing at the approaching election by artfully defaming them among the multitude; that contrary to the pride of the Claudian family, he affected great affability and moderation, &c. All this gave great uneasiness to his competitors, and rendered him suspicious to his colleagues. These latter therefore formed a design to disappoint him. When the time of the comitia for the creation of the new decemvirs drew near, they appointed Appius to preside in them; for the president in these assemblies proposed to the people the persons, who stood for the office in question, and it had never yet been known, that any one had nominated himself. But Appius, contrary to all the rules of decency, proposed himself for the first decemvir; and the people, who were now intirely devoted to him, readily gave him their suffrages. The other persons he named were all men at his devotion, and such as he favoured. The first of the number was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been three times consul, a patrician indeed of a character hitherto unblameable. After him were chosen five other patricians, viz. M. Cornelius, M. Sergius, L. Minucius, T. Antonius, and M. Rabulcius, all men little esteemed in their own body, but in great favour with Appius. But what most surprised the senate was, that Appius, out of complaisance to the people, proposed three plebeians for the decemviral dignity, viz. Q. Petilius, Cæso Duilius, and Sp. Oppius. These, though excluded by their birth, and by a late agreement between the patricians and plebeians from this supreme magistracy, were by a plurality of voices added to the number of the decemvirs. Several men of known probity and moderation had offered themselves for candidates only to exclude those, whose behaviour gave them cause to suspect them of some ill designs, namely Quintilius Cincinnatus, Quintilius Capitolinus, and Caius Claudius, uncle to Appius. But these Appius, who presided at the election, did not so much as name, lest the people, who were well acquainted with their merit, should prefer them to his creatures.

- AND NOW Claudius, seeing himself once more at the head of the decemvirs, threw off the mask, and turned his thoughts wholly on making his domination perpetual. As he governed his colleagues with absolute sway before they began to exercise their office, he inspired them with his own sentiments. They had private meetings every day to deliberate about the most proper means of perpetuating themselves in that dignity. Above all things, they thought it necessary, and agreed to keep up a good understanding with one another. Appius, at their head, directed all their proceedings, and told them what they were to do. From that time they appeared reserved and mysterious, suffered few persons to come near them, and had no intercourse but with those of their own body. This close union and confederacy of ambitious men, made the senate apprehensive, that the decemvirs for the ensuing year would behave themselves very differently from their predecessors. When the ides of May came, and the new decemvirs made their first appearance, the Romans were greatly surprised to see each decemvir appear in the forum early in the morning with twelve lictors bearing axes among their fasces, like those that were anciently carried before the kings, and afterwards before the dictator; so that the forum was filled with an hundred and twenty lictors. This was a dreadful sight to Rome, the people prognosticating from thence that this would be a year of tyranny and injustice. And they were soon made sensible, that their fears were not groundless. The decemvirs began to reign imperiously, and with a despotic power. They were always surrounded, not only by the numerous train of their lictors, but also by a croud of desperate men, loaded with debts, and guilty of the blackest crimes. Many of the young patricians, preferring licentiousness to liberty, made their court to them in the most abject manner, in order a to screen themselves from justice, and escape by their favour, the punishment due to their crimes. No man's life or property was any longer safe. The young patricians, supporters of the ten tyrants, were not ashamed upon the most frivolous pretences to take possession of their neighbours estates; and when application was made to the decemvirs for redress, the complainants were treated with contempt, and their complaints rejected. An inconsiderate word, or an expression of concern at the remembrance of their ancient liberty, was a capital crime. Some of the chief citizens were beaten with rods for complaining of the present administration; others were banished, and some even put to death, and their goods confiscated. The new tyrants vented b their fury chiefly upon the people, treating them more like slaves than Roman citizens. As for the patricians, most of them, dreading the tyranny of the decemvirs, gave way to the storm, and retired into the country for the remaining part of the year. They hoped that the tempest would cease with the annual power of the decemvirs. In the mean time the ides of May, the time fixed for holding the comitia, in order to elect new magistrates, drew near; but the decemvirs, instead of assembling the people, proposed two new tables of laws, the first relating to religion, and the worship of the gods, the second to marriages and the right of husbands. These made up the number of the twelve tables so much spoke of, which the Romans preserved ever after as a sacred depositum. Notwithstanding the hatred the public bore to the decemvirs, they found little to object to their laws. The last only, forbidding patricians and c plebeians to intermarry, seemed an artful invention of the tyrants to keep the two parties always divided, that they might reign with more security. In the mean time the ides of May passed, and not a word of any comitia for an election of new magistrates. The tyrants then shewed themselves bare-faced, and in spite both of the senate and people, retained their power without any other title but possession and violence. All who gave them the least umbrage were proscribed; and many worthy citizens, retiring voluntarily from their country, took refuge among the Latins and Hernici. The people, groaning under so cruel a tyranny, cast their eyes upon the senate, as their only refuge. But the senators, instead of comforting them, took an ill-natured pleasure in seeing d them oppressed, and bearing a great share in the misfortunes they had occasioned. When any plebeian complained to them, they maliciously referred him to Claudius, that idol, whom they had set up, and preferred to so many illustrious defenders of their country. C. Claudius, greatly concerned to see his nephew become the tyrant of his country, went several times to his house, with an intention to reprove him, and put him in mind of the glorious examples left him by his ancestors. But Appius, guessing at the errand he came upon, constantly eluded him, having ordered his attendants to admit none but the supporters and partners of his tyranny.

They convene the senate to obtain a decree for the levying of troops.

L. Valerius opposes the decemvirs.

In the mean time the Sabines and Æqui, hearing of the weak condition of the republic, and disdainful to live subject to a city, which had lost her own liberty, invaded the Roman territory, and advanced within a few miles of Rome. This unexpected e invasion alarmed the decemvirs. It was necessary to make head against the enemy; but the difficulty was how to raise an army, when the people were dissatisfied with their governors. In this perplexity the decemvirs resolved to assemble the senate, and endeavour to prevail with the conscript fathers to interpose their authority, and make a decree for legal levies. The people were surprised to hear a proclamation made in the forum for the senators to meet. We are indebted, said they, to our enemies for the appearance of this single spark of our ancient liberty. But when the decemvirs repaired to the senate, they found no body there but their own creatures. The others had retired to their country seats; and thither the decemvirs sent messengers, summoning them to appear on a day appointed. Most of them obeyed the summons, and f returned to Rome, but with views very different from those of the usurpers. Appius, in a studied harangue, represented the danger which threatened the republic from the Sabines and the Æqui, and desired a decree for levies without delay. He had scarce finished, when L. Valerius Potitus rose up to speak without waiting till it came to his turn. He was the grandson of the famous Valerius Poplicola, and son of that Valerius, who was slain at the head of the Romans fighting against Herdonius the Sabine. Appius, apprehending he was going to propose something contrary to the interest of the decemvirs, sternly commanded him to sit down, and hold his peace, till senators, older than himself, and more considerable in the republic, had declared their opinions. But the brave Valerius, despising his command, complained of his pride and insolence, in g presuming

- a presuming to impose silence upon a senator standing up for the liberty of the commonwealth, laid open the conspiracy they had all formed against the republic; and lastly, called upon Fabius, one of the decemvirs, as a man of justice and probity, to undertake the defence of his oppressed country, telling him, that on him chiefly the senate turned its eyes. Fabius, overwhelmed with shame and confusion, did not answer. But Appius and the other decemvirs, starting up from their seats in a great rage, surrounded Valerius, and obliged him to hold his peace. Such an extraordinary proceeding raised a tumult in the assembly, most of the senators being highly provoked at the haughty behaviour of the decemvirs, but no body more than M. Horatius Barbatus, the grandson of that Horatius, who had been consul with Poplicola. As he was
- b an intimate friend of Valerius, and animated with the same zeal for liberty, he could no longer bear the insolence of Appius and his colleagues; but standing up, called them the Tarquins and tyrants of their country. What hinders us, said he, from immediately executing the same vengeance on the new Tarquins; which our ancestors did on the former tyrants? To restore liberty to Rome is an hereditary honour in the families of the Valerii and Horatii. It is not the name of king that makes a tyrant, &c. He was going on, when the decemvirs, surrounding him, drowned his voice with their clamours, threatening to have him thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, if he did not instantly hold his peace. But when they perceived, that the senate in general expressed an uncommon resentment at their tyrannical proceedings, they repented of having imposed silence upon those who had a mind to speak. Appius, their chief, as soon as the tumult was appeased, declared to the assembly, that it was not the intention of the decemvirs to hinder by any violence the conscript fathers from delivering their opinions; but that it was necessary to conform to the ordinary method, which was, that every one should speak in his turn, and confine himself to the matter in hand. He added, that whatever Horatius might imagine to the contrary, the commission of the decemvirs was limited to no period but that of the establishment of the laws; that they would not lay down their office till the twelve tables were settled in due form, and that then they would give an account of their administration. But,
- c till that be done, continued he, we will steadily maintain and execute the offices of consuls and tribunes, which are united in us. Then turning to his uncle C. Claudius, he desired him to speak his mind with freedom concerning the levies. But he, without confining himself to that subject, in a long harangue imputed all the misfortunes of the state to the usurpation and tyranny of the decemvirs, exhorted the senators to insist on their being deposed, and in a very pathetic strain urged his nephew to abdicate an authority, which was become intolerable to a free people. Appius disdained to give his uncle any answer; but M. Cornelius, one of his colleagues, spoke for him, and applying himself directly to C. Claudius, We don't want your advice, said he, to direct our conduct; if you want to give particular counsels to your nephew, go to his house: the only affair in question here is the war with the Sabines and Aequi: tell us
- d in plain terms your opinion concerning the levies. Claudius rose up a second time, and turning to the senate, since my nephew, said he, will not condescend to speak to me, either in his own house, or in full senate, and I am so unhappy as to see the tyrant of my country arise out of my own family, I declare, conscript fathers, that I am resolved to retire to Regillus. I banish myself from Rome, and make an oath never to enter it again, but with our liberty. However, to fulfil the obligation I lie under of giving my opinion with relation to the present business, I am for coming to no determination concerning the levies, till consuls are chosen to lead them. His opinion was followed by Quintius Cincinnatus, Quintius Capitolinus, and L. Lucretius, all consular persons, and by the chief men in the senate. When it came to L. Cornelius's turn to
- e speak, he, in an harangue, which he had concerted before-hand with his brother M. Cornelius, one of the decemvirs, imputed the enmity of the old senators against the decemvirate to envy and private resentment, for having been themselves disappointed in the pursuit of that office; urged the unreasonableness of losing time in disputes about new magistrates, when the enemy was almost at the gates of Rome, and represented that it was impossible to come to a new election in less time than twenty-seven days, during which time the city might be besieged, and reduced to the utmost extremity. His speech was highly applauded by the creatures of the decemvirs; and even some of the oldest senators were for granting levies, hoping, that when the war was finished, the abdication of the decemvirs would quietly follow of course, and the government return naturally into the hands of the consuls. Appius, seeing with great pleasure that the majority were for granting him and his colleagues a power to raise levies, a asked, for form sake, the opinion of Valerius, on whom he had imposed silence in the beginning of the assembly. Valerius, rising up, proposed the creating of a dictator, an expedient, which had been so successfully practised on many occasions. All the senators, who spoke after Valerius, declared for this motion, as did also many of those who had before voted for the continuation of the decemvirate. A warm dispute hereupon arose with much clamour and tumult. Appius, taking advantage of the disorder, stepped forth into the midst of the assembly, and cried out aloud, that the suffrages had been gathered, and that the opinion of Cornelius had prevailed. He then ordered the decree of the senate, which he had brought with him ready drawn up, and which empowered the decemvirs to raise troops, to be read in the assembly, and immediately b dismissing the senators withdrew.

THE authority of the decemvirs being now become more formidable than ever, the most timorous among the citizens became as submissive and complying as the tyrants could wish; others sought an asylum in the country, or among the neighbouring nations. Appius, enraged to see the best men in the republic abandon the city out of hatred to his government, placed guards at all the gates to prevent their escape. But finding that this precaution only increased the number of the malecontents, and fearing a general revolt, he removed the guard, and left every one free to retire. But to be revenged on those who withdrew, he confiscated their effects, or bestowed them on his ruffians and partisans. As for Valerius and Horatius, they staid at Rome, c and, having gathered together in their houses a great number of their clients and friends, to secure them against the violence of the decemvirs, held private assemblies to concert measures for restoring liberty to the commonwealth. In the mean time the decemvirs raised ten legions, the people, destitute of their tribunes, being forced to lift themselves. Q. Fabius, with two other decemvirs, Q. Petilius, and M. Rabuleius, marched against the Sabines at the head of three legions, M. Cornelius, L. Minucius, M. Sergius, T. Antonius, and C. Duilius, all decemvirs, led five legions against the Æqui. Appius and Oppius remained with two legions in the city to keep in awe the domestic enemy, more formidable to him than the Sabines and Æqui. The people, of whom the legions were composed, regretting the loss of their liberty, would not conquer, but d suffered the enemy to gain great advantages over them, and at last, feigning a sudden fright, dispersed in the night, and returned into the Roman territory. Appius did not fail to send recruits and provisions to his colleagues, exhorting them to keep the soldiers in awe by the terror of punishments, or, in case that was dangerous, to destroy by private ways the most mutinous, and he himself set them an example. The famous Sicinius Dentatus, of whom we have spoke above, being returned from the camp, filled the city with his complaints against the decemvirs, exaggerating the faults they had committed in the management of the war. Appius, to get him out of Rome, sent for him, discoursed with him several times, and desiring him to speak with freedom, examined him concerning the conduct of the decemvirs. Sicinius, e without reserve or circumspection, blamed the proceedings of Fabius and the other generals. Appius, pretending to admire his wisdom, prevailed upon him to go and assist Fabius with his advice; and to deceive him the more effectually, he dignified him with the character of envoy or legate, which not only gave him the authority of a general, but made his person sacred and inviolable. As true valour is a stranger to jealousy and distrust, the brave Sicinius, willingly embraced the opportunity of serving his country, and repaired to the camp with all speed, where the decemvirs, instructed by Appius, received him with outward marks of great joy, and consulted him, soon after his arrival, about the operations of the campaign. Sicinius advised them f to remove their camp into the enemy's country, for many reasons, which he laid before them. This was what Fabius wanted, and accordingly he commissioned him to go and view the situation of the country, and mark out the ground for a new incampment. He appointed him a hundred chosen men light armed to be his guard; but this guard consisted only of the decemvirs ruffians, who had secret orders to dispatch him. Sicinius, not suspecting the least treachery, led them into the narrow passes between the mountains, and there they took the opportunity of falling upon him when he could not make his escape. The brave veteran no sooner perceived their base design, but drawing his sword, he set his back against a rock, that he might not be

The base assassins, not daring now to venture near him, stood at a distance, and discharged their darts at him, which he avoiding with great dexterity, some of them climbing up to the top of the rock, from thence overwhelmed him with stones. They then went back to the camp, where they gave out, that they had been attacked by the enemy, and that Sicinius had been killed in the action. But when the soldiers, who marched out under arms to fetch the body of Sicinius, came to the place of the pretended battle, they observed, that the slain were all Romans, and that they lay unstripped, with their faces towards him. This made them suspect that Sicinius had been murdered by his guard, and raised loud
- b complaints and a general discontent throughout the camp. The whole army in the greatest fury and rage demanded that the assassins might be brought to justice; but the decemvirs helped them to make their escape, and caused the body of Sicinius to be honourably interred, lest the soldiers should convey it to Rome, and there raise new disturbances. The discontent which so odious a treachery raised in the army came to such a height, that the greater part of the soldiers began to think in earnest of throwing off the yoke, and restoring their country to its ancient liberty, which they soon found an opportunity to effect.

- Appius*, as we have observed above, remained at home with a body of troops to keep the city in awe, while his colleagues marched against the Sabines and Æqui. As
- c he was one day going to his tribunal, he observed a young virgin of extraordinary beauty, and though he seemed dead to all soft passions, yet he was taken with her charms. It was then customary at Rome for young persons of both sexes to pursue such studies, as were proper for them, in public schools erected in the forum; and in one of these it was, that Appius first saw this beautiful young woman, and was charmed no less with her intent application to her book, than with her graceful mein, and engaging behaviour. As his office obliged him to appear frequently in the forum, this severe magistrate, and grave law-giver, was observed to stop when he passed by the school of the young virgins, and there to behold with great satisfaction some pleasing object. The person, who thus drew his attention, was the daughter of one L. Virginius, a man famous in the city for his probity, and in the army for his valor. Though he was a plebeian, he made a considerable figure in the troops, and had led several detachments in the present war with the Æqui, as commander in chief. His daughter's name was Virginia. Her mother Numitoria being dead, her father Virginius, upon his departure for the war, had committed her to the care of an uncle by her mother's side, who shewed for her all the affection and concern of a father. She was now marriageable; and Virginius had already promised her to Scilius, who had been tribune of the people, and was to marry her at the end of the campaign. But in the mean time the decemvir, conceiving a violent passion for her, resolved at all adventures to satisfy it. He would willingly have married her; but he had a wife
- e already, and though divorces were allowed by law, yet there had never been any instance of one. Polygamy was strictly forbidden, and besides, the decemvir himself had just past a law prohibiting all marriages between patricians and plebeians; so that he had no room to hope the accomplishment of his wishes, but by the scandalous means of debauching the young maid; and these he began to pursue, by endeavouring to corrupt, with large presents and great offers, Virginia's nurse or governess. But she, equally faithful and prudent, instead of making a private market of the beauty and charms of young Virginia, rejected his offers with the utmost indignation, and kept a more watchful eye over her charge than ever. The amorous tyrant, finding he could neither corrupt nor deceive the trusty and watchful nurse, had recourse
- f to another stratagem, the execution of which he intrusted to M. Claudius, one of his clients, an infamous wretch, and fit for any villanous enterprize. This minister of the decemvir's passion, taking with him a band of profligate fellows, entered the school, where Virginia was, and seizing her by the arm, declared that she was the daughter of one of his slaves, and therefore belonged to him. As he was carrying her to his house, with all the authority which the law gave to a master over his fugitive slave, the people flocked about him, and being touched with so moving a sight, obliged him to set her at liberty. Claudius, finding he could not execute his first design, cited her to appear before the decemvir; and she by the new laws was obliged to follow him to the tribunal. Appius, who was alone upon the bench, was just ready
- g to adjudge her to the claimant, as his lawful slave, when the people, full of indignation, nation, cried out with one voice, that Virginia's relations ought first to be heard, ^a Appius, absolute as he was, dared not refuse to suspend the sentence, till some of the prisoner's relations appeared. The first who came was Numitorius, the uncle of the young woman, attended by a great number of his friends and relations. Upon his arrival, silence being made, Claudius renewed his claim, founded on a lie concerted between him and the judge; he pretended, that Virginia was born in his house of a slave belonging to him; that her mother had given her to Numitoria, the wife of Virginus, and that Numitoria had imposed the child upon her husband, and made Virginia pass for his daughter. He added, that he would soon produce undeniable testimonies of what he advanced; that in the mean time it was but just that a slave should go with her master, and that he would give security to produce the young ^b woman again in court, when Virginus, her pretended father, returned from the war.

Numitorius represented, that it was highly unjust to dispute a citizen's right to his very children, when he was not present to assert it, adding, that Virginus, who was serving his country in the camp, would not fail to be at Rome in two days, and that it was reasonable her uncle, who had the care of her person, should in the mean time be the guardian of her honour. This, he said, was conformable to the laws, which ordained, that during a law-suit, and before a definitive sentence, the plaintiff should not disturb the defendant in his possession. But this law Appius eluded, by artfully observing, that in the present dispute there were two circumstances, which altered the case. Here, said he, there are two persons claiming; one as a father, the other as ^c a master; if the pretended father were present, he indeed ought to be allowed the possession; but he being absent, the person, who claims her as his slave, ought to be preferred to any other, provided he gives good security to produce her again at the return of the person, who is called her father. Having thus spoke, he ordered Virginia to be put into Claudius's hands. The iniquity of the judgment incensed all who were present. The women, who surrounded Virginia, made such outcries, that they were heard at a great distance. They kept her in the middle of them, and seemed resolute to defend her. At that instant Icilius, to whom she had been promised in marriage, arrived, and breaking through the croud, forced his way to the tribunal, to defend his dear Virginia. A lictor endeavoured to oppose his passage, ^d crying to him, that sentence was already passed. But nothing could stop the enraged lover; he took Virginia in his arms, and addressing himself to Appius; No, Appius, he cried, nothing but death shall separate me from Virginia. Add my murder to the many crimes with which thou art already polluted. Assemble all thy lictors, and those of thy colleagues too, I will defend her honour to my last breath. Have you deprived us of the protection of our tribunes, only to subject our wives and our daughters to your lewdness? Go on to exercise your rage upon our estates and lives; but spare the chastity of our virgins. If any attempt be made upon the honour of Virginia, I call the gods to witness, that it shall not go unrevenged. What will not Virginus be ^e able to do in the army, and Icilius among the people, when the one is to revenge the cause of an injured wife, and the other of a dishonoured daughter? He was going on, when the lictors were ordered to drive him away, and to seize Virginia. But the people, moved with his misfortune and his courage, fell upon the officers of the decemvir, dispersed them, and obliged Claudius to take refuge under the tribunal.
Appius, seeing the people incensed against him beyond measure, called his client to him, whispered in his ear, and then having caused silence to be made, It is not, said he, the fury of the violent Icilius, which makes me comply, but the intreaties of Claudius my client. He is willing to give up the right he has to carry home his slave, and to commit her to the same hands in which she was before. At his request
I will wait for Virginus's return, till to-morrow. Let his friends take care to give ^f him notice. If Virginus does not appear at the time appointed, I would have Icilius know, that I shall not want any assistance from my colleagues to put my decree in execution. When he had done speaking, Claudius desired that Icilius might give security for producing Virginia the next day, which he did accordingly, all the people then present offering eagerly to be his security. Icilius and Numitorius immediately dispatched, the first his brother, the second his son, to bring Virginus from the camp.
Appius at the same time sent a courier with orders to the generals to put him under arrest. But the other messengers were more expeditious; and Virginus upon the first notice of his daughter's danger had left the army, and was so fortunate as to escape two parties, which were sent, one from the camp, and the other from the city to stop ^g him.

- a him. He appeared the next morning in the forum, leading his daughter in deep mourning, attended by a great number of matrons of distinction. He addressed himself to his fellow-citizens as he passed, and uttered his complaints with an air of dignity, which seemed rather to demand than implore assistance. Scilius broke into the throng, inveighed loudly against Appius, and endeavoured to transfuse his own resentment into every breast. But the silent tears of the women, who attended Virginia, affected the multitude more than any words. Appius was greatly surprised to hear that Virginus was in the forum. Full of rage, he repaired thither, and though informed of the disposition of the people, he ascended his tribunal, being surrounded by a numerous croud of his dependants and creatures. Claudius spoke the first, renewed
- b his claim, and produced the slave, whom he had suborned to declare that she was the mother of Virginia, and that she had sold her to the wife of Virginus. Several other witnesses appeared to attest the same thing, all gained with great promises by Appius and his client Claudius. The friends and relations of Virginia, to destroy this imposture, urged the little probability of Numitoria's imposing a child upon her husband. He had married her, when she was very young, and was almost of the same age with her. Virginia was born soon after their marriage. Where was the necessity then, said they, for Numitoria's practising such a fraud as is pretended. Besides, if she had proved barren, and had designed to introduce a stranger into her family, why should she have chosen the child of a slave rather than of a free woman? Why a girl, when she might
- c as easily have had a boy? Besides, was it probable, that a contrivance carried on by so many persons should continue so long a secret? Would not the slave have made her court to her master, as soon as Numitoria was dead, by discovering a secret to him, which would have put him in possession of a young woman well educated, and of extraordinary beauty? Why was this mystery kept undiscovered till Appius was decemvir, since the slave for a long time past could have no interest in concealing it? To these presumptions Virginus added undeniable proofs, and brought some of the most considerable women in Rome, who deposed, some that they had seen Numitoria when she was big with child, others, that they had assisted at her labour, and some, that they had seen her suckle young Virginia, which she could not have done, had she been
- d barren, as Claudius pretended. Appius, observing that these unanswerable proofs made a great impression upon the multitude, interrupted the evidence, and commanding silence, signified, that he himself had something to say. All the people listened with attention, being anxious to know what he could object against so many witnesses of unquestionable credit. He then spoke thus: Virginus, said he, I must acquaint you and all who are present, that this is not the first time I have heard of this affair. Claudius's father revealed the secret to me at his death, when he made me his son's guardian. Afterwards, I examined into the matter, and found it to be true. However, I did not think it became me to meddle in an affair of this nature, and therefore left it to my pupil to recover his right, or to agree with the parties concerned when he
- e should come of age. But now that the cause is brought before me in judgment, being obliged to give sentence, according to my own personal knowledge, I declare both as judge and witness, that the young woman belongs to Claudius, and my sentence is, that she be delivered up to him as his property. Virginus, provoked to the highest degree at so unjust and cruel a sentence, was no longer master of himself. He trembled with rage, and accompanying his words with a threatening gesture, infamous wretch, said he, I never designed my daughter for thee. I educated her for a lawful husband, and not to be a prey to a lustful ravager. Must then brutal passions among us take the place of honourable marriages! How the citizens here will bear with these things I know not; but I trust that the army will revenge my wrongs. At these
- f words the people set up a loud cry full of indignation, as if they were determined to oppose the execution of Appius's decree. But the decemvir, having first cast his eyes on all sides, to observe his strength, and how his friends were posted, told the multitude with a threatening voice, that he was not unacquainted with the plots that had been laid to cause an insurrection, but that he neither wanted power nor resolution to inflict exemplary punishments on such as should offer to disturb the public peace. Let every one therefore, said he, retire to his own house, and none presume to give law to a supreme magistrate. As for you, Claudius, added he, seize your slave, and make use of my guard to disperse the croud. At these words, uttered with an imperious tone, the multitude gave back, and left Virginia standing by herself, a
- g helpless prey to injustice. The unfortunate father seeing there was no other remedy, drew near Appius, and in a suppliant manner addressed him thus: Pardon, Appius, a the unguarded words, which have escaped me in my first transports of grief, and allow me to ask in the young woman's presence some questions of her nurse, that I may carry home at least the comfort of being set right in this matter. Appius readily granted him his request, and Virginius taking his daughter in his arms, and wiping the tears, in which she was all bathed, drew near to some shops, which were in the forum. There he snatched up a butcher's knife, and turning to Virginia, My dear daughter, said he, this is the only way to save thy liberty, and thy honour; go, Virginia, go to thy ancestors, whilst thou art yet a free woman, pure and undefiled. With these words he plunged the knife into her heart, and then drawing it out again all smooking with her blood, and turning to Appius; by this blood, he cried, I devote thy head to the infernal gods. The decemvir immediately ordered him to be seized; but he with the knife in his hand made his way through the croud, got out of the city, and mounting his horse, took the road to the camp. In the mean time Numitorius and Icilius, staying by the dead body of Virginia, and shewing it to the people, raised a great commotion in the city. As for Appius, he seemed to have quite lost his reason; instead of endeavouring to pacify the multitude, he retired to his own house, and from thence sent his lictors to seize Icilius, and carry away the dead body. But the people opposed the execution of his orders, and falling upon the lictors, broke their fasces, and drove them out of the forum. Hereupon the decemvir had the boldness to come in person, attended by a chosen company of young patricians, to support his authority. But Valerius and Horatius, those sworn enemies of the decemvirs, putting themselves at the head of their friends and clients, obliged the decemvir to retire. In this perplexity Appius hastened to the temple of Vulcan, and there pretending to act the part of a tribune of the people, demanded that Valerius and Horatius should be thrown head-long from the Tarpeian rock, as disturbers of the public tranquillity. But his harangue was often interrupted with hisses; and in the mean time Valerius, having caused the body of Virginia to be carried to the top of a flight of steps, whence it might be seen by the people, was from the same eminence inveighing against Appius. So that there were two assemblies and two orators in different parts of the forum declaiming against each other at the same time. But Appius's auditors soon left him to go to Valerius; and Appius, terrified at the desertion of many of his creatures, privately withdrew, and hiding his face with his robe, took refuge in a neighbouring house. At that juncture Oppius, the plebeian decemvir, rushed into the forum to defend his colleague; but finding that the party of Horatius and Valerius was by far the strongest, he judged, that the wisest method in the present exigence was to convene the senate; and this immediately quieted the multitude, for they hoped, that the decemvirate would by that means be abolished. But the senators then in Rome being all friends to the decemvirs, only ordered the people to behave themselves peaceably, and commissioned some young members of their body to go to the camp near mount Algidus, and prevent the sedition which Virginius might raise there^b.

He had entered the camp attended by four hundred citizens, and holding the fatal knife in his hand. The soldiers, at this strange sight, flocked to him from all quarters, when he, standing on an eminence, with his face drowned in tears, related to them the plot laid by Appius against his daughter's honour and liberty, and the cruel method he had been forced to take for the preservation of her chastity. The centurions and soldiers, full of indignation against Appius, assured him, that they were determined to stand by him in whatever he should undertake against so wicked a tyrant. The decemvirs, who commanded the army, being informed of Virginius's return, and the disposition of the soldiers, attempted to seize the former, and appease the latter. But the soldiers, refusing to pay any obedience to the orders of men, whom they looked upon as usurpers and tyrants, flew to their arms, snatched up their ensigns, and took the way to Rome, which they reached about evening, and entered without making the least disturbance. They marched quietly through the city to mount Aventine, and there intrenched themselves, declaring, that they would not lay down their arms, till the decemvirate was abolished, and the tribuneship restored. Hereupon Oppius convened the senate, for Appius was afraid to appear in public, and the conscript fathers agreed to send three of their body to the army, to ask, why they had left the camp without their generals orders, and what their intent was in pos-

- a seffing themselves of mount Aventine ? As they had not yet chosen a head, they all cried out with one voice, let Valerius and Horatius be sent to us, we will return no answer to the senate, but by them. As soon as the three commissioners were gone, Virginus advised the troops to chuse chiefs to govern them, and manage for them. Agreeable to his advice, ten persons were elected under the name of military tribunes. The army was desirous to have Virginus at the head of them ; but he declined the honour. My daughter, said he, is dead, and I have not yet revenged her death. No kind of honour will become me, till her manes are appeased. Besides, what prudent or moderate counsels can you expect from me, who am so incensed against the tyrants ? I shall be of more service to the common cause by acting in it as a private man. Ten military tribunes elected.

- b In the mean time the three legions sent against the Sabines, being stirred up by Numitorius and Icilius, abandoned their generals, and having, after the example of the other army, chosen themselves ten military tribunes, marched through the city, and joined the legions on the Aventine. The two armies thus united, commissioned their twenty tribunes to elect two out of their number to be supreme over all, and the choice fell upon M. Oppius and Sextus Manilius. In the mean time the senate assembled every day, but spent the whole time in debates without coming to any resolution. At length it was carried by a majority of voices, that Valerius and Horatius should be sent to the revolted army. But they protested, that they would not move a step so long as the
- c decemvirs were masters of the government. The two armies, tired out with these delays, removed their camp to the sacred mount, intrenched themselves there, and observed the same good discipline as their ancestors had formerly done. In this decampment they were followed by such numbers of citizens with their wives and children, that Rome was in a manner deserted. The senators, surpris'd to see the streets so thin of people, resolv'd at length to abolish the decemvirate, to restore to the people their tribunes, and to the senate its consuls. The decemvirs, finding they could not retain their authority any longer, only desired, that they might not be sacrificed to the hatred of their enemies, offering to resign the power with which they were invested, whenever the senate should think fit to create new consuls. Upon this Valerius and Horatius repaired to the army, where they were received with inexpressible joy. Icilius, whom the army chose for their speaker, after having returned the deputies thanks for the zeal they had shewn all along in behalf of the people, demanded in the name of all who had retired to the Mons sacer, 1. The re-establishment of the tribunes of the people, with a right of appeal to them from the decisions of the consuls. 2. An amnesty for all who had left the camp without permission from their generals. 3. That the decemvirs should be delivered into their hands, that they might be burnt alive. But the prudent deputies made a great difference between the two first articles and the last. Your two first demands, said they, are agreeable to reason ; but the third is the effect of passion. You are offered a shield ; do not pretend to take a sword too.
- e The senate has not yet declared you innocent, and will you already take upon you to give law to it ? The people being satisfied that no tribunes whatsoever could have their interests more at heart than those two senators, empowered them to make what terms for them they should think fit. Horatius and Valerius returned immediately to the senate, and gave them an account of the demands of the people, but omitted their threats against the decemvirs, who hearing no mention made of their punishment, readily consented to all that was asked. Only Appius seem'd unwilling to part with his power : To re-establish the tribuneship, said he, is only to put arms into the hands of the enraged multitude. I find my life must be sacrificed to the public hatred. But since it must be so, I will not any longer oppose the rage of the populace. I am ready
- f to resign the decemvirate, and care not how soon I do it. Accordingly, a decree was pass'd, abolishing the decemvirate, and restoring the tribunes. Then the decemvirs, repairing to the forum, there laid down their authority to the great joy of the city. When the news of their resignation was carried to the camp, the army leaving the sacred mount, incamped a second time on mount Aventine, and there chose their tribunes, the pontifex Maximus presiding at the election. Virginus, Icilius, and Numitorius, were first named. C. Sicinius, M. Duilius, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Aronius, P. Villius, and C. Oppius, were appointed their colleagues. An interrex was afterwards created, who held an assembly of the people by centuries, in which L. Valerius and M. Horatius were rais'd to the consulate. These consuls, being both
- g very popular, got several laws pass'd, which gave the people a superiority over the senate. The senate resolves to abolish the decemvirate. A decree passes abolishing the decemvirate. L. Valerius and M. Horatius rais'd to the consulate.

enate. Formerly the decrees of the people, convened by tribes, obliged only the plebeians; but now it was enacted, that all decrees made in the comitia by tribes, should have the force of laws with relation to all citizens. That the tribunes might be maintained in perpetual possession of their right of judging causes brought before them by appeal, it was likewise enacted, that for the future no magistrates of any kind should be invested with authority, without appeal to the assembly of the people, and that it should be lawful for any one to kill the man, who should attempt the creation of such a magistrate. The ceremonies were likewise renewed, whereby the persons of the tribunes were made sacred. To these regulations another was added, viz. that the decrees of the senate should for the future be carried to the ædiles, and kept in the temple of Ceres. This was done, lest the succeeding consuls should suppress the decrees now made, and by that means render them useless.

ginius,

THE power of the tribunes being now firmly established, they resolved to prosecute the decemvirs, and begin with Appius, who was accordingly cited to appear. Virginius, who was appointed to be his accuser, without enumerating all his crimes, insisted only on his having, contrary to law, refused a young woman, who was in possession of her liberty, the right of enjoying it, till the suit was determined. If you do not instantly clear yourself from this breach of the law, I will order you, said Virginius, to be carried to prison. Appius kept silence; but when the tribunes officers offered to seize him, he cried out, I appeal; and having enumerated the services done to the republic by his family, and reminded the people of his own zeal for the common good in promoting and compiling the body of laws contained in the twelve tables, he claimed the protection of the laws just made in favour of appeals. Virginius answered, that such a monster as Appius ought not to partake of the common benefits of society, nor be allowed to escape imprisonment on giving security, since he had refused that privilege to Virginia. He added, that it was but reasonable that so profligate a wretch should be carried to that prison, which he himself had built, and insolently named the habitation of the people of Rome. Accordingly, he was led, notwithstanding his appeal, to prison; but his trial was put off to the third market-day. In this interval Claudius, the uncle of Appius, who had so much disapproved of his nephew's conduct, and had always been against the decemvirs, yet upon hearing of the danger of Appius, hastened to Rome, and appeared in the forum with all his friends and relations in habits of mourning. He went from citizen to citizen, beseeching them not to fix such an ignominy on the Claudian family; but to no purpose; Virginius on the other hand begging them to shew compassion for him and his daughter, and not for the Claudian family, which had tyrannized over them.

And dies there.

But before the day appointed for the trial, Appius died in prison. Dionysius tells us, that the tribunes gave out he had strangled himself; but that it was much suspected he had been dispatched by their orders. Livy barely relates, that Appius, to avoid the infamy of a public punishment, laid violent hands on himself in prison.

THE prosecution of Oppius, one of the plebeian decemvirs, followed next. He was accused by Numitorius, Virginia's uncle, as an accomplice with Appius, whose injustice in her affair he had not opposed, though at that time in Rome. Nor was this the only crime laid to his charge. A veteran, who had served twenty-seven years in the army, and had been eight times honoured with military rewards, uncovering his shoulders, exposed to the multitude the marks of the rods, with which he had been beaten by Oppius's orders, and offered to undergo the same treatment again if the decemvir could assign any good reason for his cruelty. The accused was by the unanimous suffrages of the people thrown into prison, where he died the same day. The other eight decemvirs, terrified with these imprisonments, which were followed by sudden deaths, retired into banishment of their own accord. Upon their flight their effects were confiscated and sold, and the money arising from them carried by the quæstors into the public treasury. As for M. Claudius, the client, who had been suborned to serve the pleasures, and carry on the iniquity of his patron, he was condemned to death. But Virginius, pitying a wretch, who had offended at the instigation of a powerful magistrate, and a sovereign, from whom he had no appeal, changed the sentence of death into that of perpetual banishment, upon his confessing that he had been suborned. After this, Dulcius, one of the tribunes, advised his col-

- a legues to carry vengeance no farther ; and accordingly a general amnesty was granted, and the state enjoyed a profound tranquillity at home the remaining part of the year.

AFFAIRS being thus settled, the two consuls took the field against the Æqui, Volsci, The Æqui, the Volsci, and the Sabines, defeated by the consuls. and Sabines, who, during the late intestine divisions, had pillaged the Roman territory. Valerius defeated the two former, and Horatius the latter. But the senate, dissatisfied with their too popular administration, and moved by a speech of C. Claudius, who inveighed bitterly against them, refused them a triumph. But this opposition served only to gain the people a new prerogative, the right of decreeing triumphs. For the consuls applied to them, and the tribunes espousing their cause, Iulius declared
 b in the name of the people of Rome, that the consuls should, in spite of the senate, have the honour of a triumph, which was thought so legal a one, that it had a place in the Fasti Capitolini. The tribunes did not stop here, but formed a design of getting themselves continued in the tribuneship after the expiration of their year. This was a conspiracy not unlike that of the decemvirs ; but to prevent any suspicion, that their aim was to make themselves sole masters of the government, they were for having the people continue Valerius and Horatius in the consulate. Dulius, one of their college, a man of great moderation, and very zealous for the public liberty, opposed this project, and made it abortive, by prevailing upon the consuls to declare publicly, that they would not hold the consulate after their year was expired, though the people
 c should desire it. After this Dulius held the assembly for electing tribunes, and by his influence got five new ones chosen, in spite of the cabals of the old tribunes. However, the latter prevailed so far by their intrigues, as to hinder any other of the candidates from having the necessary number of voices. Hereupon the nomination of the five tribunes yet wanting was referred to the five actually chosen, according to the direction of a law, which expressly provided, that if upon a day of election the full number of tribunes could not be chosen, those who were elected should have power to name their colleagues. Agreeable to this law the new tribunes no sooner entered upon their office, but they named their colleagues, and among them, to the great surprise of all, S. Tarpeius, and A. Æternius, both patricians, old senators, and even consulars. Two patricians chosen tribunes of the people.
 d Some writers are of opinion, that these patricians had got themselves adopted into plebeian families ; but this is a groundless conjecture ; for Livy tells us, that the five first tribunes were directed by the senate in the choice of their colleagues, whence it is more likely, that the senators privately joined with Dulius, who acted all along in concert with them, to get some of their body into the tribuneship, in order to counterbalance the power of the plebeian tribunes. The election of the consuls followed that of the tribunes, when Lartius Herminius, and T. Virginus, were chosen without any disturbance. In their consulate, L. Trebonius, one of the tribunes, dissatisfied to see two patricians in that college, gave himself intirely up to cross the senate in every thing, whence he acquired the surname of Asper, or the Crabbed. In order to e exclude patricians for the future, he got a law passed, which from his name was called Lex Trebonia, by which it was ordained, that whosoever should for the future hold the Lex Trebonia. comitia for electing tribunes of the people, should not dismiss the assembly till the number of ten tribunes was compleated by the votes of the people. This law took from the tribunes, who were first chosen, the right of naming their colleagues, which the Romans called Cooptatio *.

- THE following consulate of M. Geganius and C. Julius produced nothing remarkable. But the succeeding consuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus a fourth time, and Agrippa Furius, found the people highly exasperated against the nobility on account of some insults they had offered the plebeians. The aggressors were cited to appear before
 f the people, which occasioned great contentions. Upon the news of these fresh domestic broils, the Æqui and Volsci entered the Roman territory, and ravaged the country to the very gates of Rome, the tribunes opposing the necessary levies to repulse them. Hereupon the consul Quintius, a man illustrious for several victories, and greatly respected for the purity of his manners, and the wisdom of his counsels, having convened a general assembly of the people, made an harangue to them, with which they were so affected, that they concurred unanimously in taking arms. All the youth offered themselves in crouds to be enlisted ; insomuch that on the same day the levies were raised, and the army marched ten miles on its way. The next day the consuls came in sight of the enemy, and the day following gave them battle, and gained a complete victory. However, the consuls, as Livy observes, did not demand a triumph, a nor did the senate offer them one. He conjectures, that the consuls were ashamed to ask an honour for one victory, which the fathers had refused to Valerius and Horatius for two. This would have been a glorious year for the republic, had not the Roman people dishonoured themselves by an iniquitous judgment in a cause that was referred to their decision. The inhabitants of Ardea and Aricia chose them arbitrators in a dispute concerning a large tract of land, to which they both laid claim. The tribes being assembled, and the cause heard, the votes were going to be taken, when one Scaptius, a Roman, eighty-three years old, desired to speak. He pretended, that the district in question belonged formerly to the city of Corioli, and consequently now to the Romans, who ought therefore to make no scruple of seizing it. The consuls used b their utmost endeavours to dissuade the people from taking a step, which must cast a blemish on the Roman probity. But all their efforts were to no purpose; the people, in spite of their remonstrances, adjudged the territory to themselves¹.

IN the following consulate of M. Genucius Augurinus, and C. Curtius Philo, the tribunes carried their pretensions farther than ever. For they not only demanded that the law, prohibiting patricians and plebeians to intermarry, might be repealed, but likewise, that plebeians might be admitted to the consulate. Canuleius, the most active of the tribunes, declared to the senate, in the most solemn manner, that he would constantly oppose all levies of troops, let the want of them be never so pressing, till these concessions were made to the people. The consuls and patricians c declared with great warmth against these new claims of the incroaching tribunes; but the Ardeates, the Æqui, the Veientes, and the Volsci, invading at the same time the Roman territory, the senate found it necessary to let the law concerning marriages pass, hoping that this concession would induce the tribunes to give over intirely the pursuit of the law relating to the consulship, or at least to suspend it till the conclusion of the war. But their hopes proved vain; for the tribunes, though the alarm from abroad daily increased, still opposed the levies, and pushed their point with the same zeal as before. Nay, at the instigation of Canuleius, they all bound themselves by a solemn oath not to desist from their enterprize, till the senate had granted them their demand. C. Claudius, in a private assembly of the oldest senators, moved to have d recourse to arms and violence rather than yield to the people the dignity of the consulship. But T. Quinctius, and the majority of the assembly, thought it better to comply, than come to a rupture with the people. Hereupon Claudius, to prevent the debasing of the consular dignity, made a new proposal, viz. that instead of consuls a certain number of military tribunes should be chosen, partly out of the senate, and partly from among the plebeians, and that these new magistrates should be invested with consular power. This project being approved, the senate was assembled, and the tribunes called to it to give their reasons in behalf of the new laws in question. After they had spoke, Claudius's scheme was proposed, and received with great applause both by the patricians and plebeians. A decree was immediately passed for e this fourth revolution in the Roman government, and the comitia were held without delay. But when the people came to vote, they refused to give their votes to any but patricians, so that only three military tribunes were chosen, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Atilius, and S. Cecilius, or, as some style him, Clelius. But they did not long continue in office. Curtius, the late consul, who had presided at the election, declared three months after, that the auguries preceding it had been inauspicious, which made their promotion void. This was probably an artful contrivance of the nobility to restore the ancient form of government. However that be, the three new magistrates readily resigned their office, and an inter-rex was named, that the commonwealth might not remain without a head. T. Quinctius the inter-rex assembled f the people to determine whether the consular government should be restored, or that of the military tribunes continued? The senate were for the former; the tribunes for the latter; but the people, being resolved to confer the supreme dignity only on patricians, were indifferent whether it should be called consulship or tribuneship. At length all agreed to restore the old form of government, and L. Papirius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus, brother to one of those patricians, who had laid down the military tribuneship, were appointed consuls for the remaining part of the year. Under the succeeding administration of T. Quinctius Capitolinus, a fifth time consul,

- a and M. Geganius a second time, the Censorship was established. There had been no census for seventeen years, which occasioned great disorders. These the new consuls undertook to remedy; but as they had many civil and military affairs on their hands, they desired the senate to discharge them of the care of numbering the people, and to lay it upon two magistrates created for that purpose, who, with the title of Censors, should, every five years, take a general review of the whole Roman people, and an account of their effects. The senate approved the motion; and the tribunes, tho' always upon their guard against every thing offered by the senate, thought the employment of too little importance to oppose it. They did not even demand, that the plebeians should be allowed a share in it, not foreseeing to what a pitch of power and grandeur the office of censor would in time arrive. As men generally study how to enlarge their authority, the censorship was no sooner made a distinct magistracy, than the censors began to take upon them the reformation of manners, and by that means subject to their tribunal the senators and knights, as much as the meanest of the people. Papirius and Sempronius, the consuls of the preceding year, were the first censors, this dignity being unanimously conferred upon them, to make them amends for the short duration of their consulate ^a.

- While the consuls were thus easing themselves of the burden annexed to their office, a neighbouring city found them employment enough abroad. The Ardeates, who had lately renewed their alliance with Rome, were unhappily involved in a civil war, which arose from a very slight cause. Two citizens of Ardea, one of a noble family, the other of a plebeian, had fallen in love with the same young woman. As she was a plebeian, her guardians were for giving her to a man of her own rank; but her mother, an ambitious woman, was fond of matching her with a man of quality. The dispute about this marriage engaged all Ardea, the nobility declaring for one of the suitors, and the people for the other. At length the cause between the mother and the guardians was tried, and sentence pronounced by the judges in favour of the former, who, they said, had a right to dispose of her child to whom she pleased; but the latter, refusing to stand to this determination, had recourse to violence, gathered together some plebeians, and entering the widow's house, carried away her daughter. The nobility, on the other hand, taking the mother's part, ran to arms, fell upon the plebeians, and having killed several of them, brought the young woman back to her mother's house. Hereupon the plebeians, leaving the city in great numbers, encamped on a neighbouring hill, and from thence sent out parties to lay waste the lands of the nobility. The mutineers being joined by the Volsci, chose themselves a commander, named Cluilius, and laid siege to Ardea. In this distress the nobility applied to the Romans, and the senate sent immediately an army to their relief, under the command of the consul Geganius, who invested the besiegers, obliged them to surrender their arms, and made them pass under the yoke. After this, the consul returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph, with uncommon pomp and solemnity ^b.

- The succeeding consuls, M. Fabius, and Posthumius Ebutius, made the Ardeates some amends for the wrongs the Romans had done them, on occasion of their contest with the Aricians; for they sent a colony to re-people their city, much depopulated by the civil war, and privately agreed, that no lands, except those formerly in dispute, should be divided among the new colony, and even of those only a small part; and that the rest should be restored to their ancient proprietors. As this was disannulling the judgment of the people, Agrippa Menenius, F. Clatius, and M. Ebutius, who had put the decree in execution, were cited to appear before the people; but these three patricians, to avoid the prosecution, declared themselves citizens of Ardea, and continued there. The following year, when the government was in the hands of C. Furius and M. Papirius, proved a year of peace. But in the succeeding consulate of Proculus Geganius and L. Menenius, great disturbances arose, occasioned by a Roman knight, named Sp. Mælius, who had the confidence to aspire to the sovereign power. A dreadful famine happening in Rome, the people, to prevent the evil consequences of it, created, with the consent of the senate, an extraordinary magistrate, with the title of Superintendent of provisions. The person they named for this office, was one L. Minucius, an active and prudent man, who immediately sent his agents into the neighbouring countries to buy corn, but with little success, Sp.

Mælius, who was one of the richest men in Rome, having been before-hand with him ^a at the markets. The corn Mælius bought, was, by his order, distributed among the meaner people; so that his house quickly became the place of refuge for the poor, the idle, and those who had undone themselves by debauchery. Minucius, who was continued in his office under the new consuls T. Quinctius Capitolinus the sixth time, and Agrippa Menenius, found out, that Mælius, under cover of an extraordinary liberality, formed assemblies at his house, and that great quantities of arms had been conveyed thither by night. Upon this intelligence, he inquired further into the matter, and at length discovered, that a conspiracy was formed to subvert the present government; that Mælius aspired to the sovereign power; that the people were to take arms in his favour; and that even some of the tribunes had consented to sell ^b the public liberty. Minucius, without loss of time, gave an account of his discoveries to the senate; and the senate, following the advice of Quinctius Capitolinus, empowered him to name his brother Quinctius Cincinnatus dictator. It was thought necessary to take this step in so critical a juncture, to prevent Mælius from escaping the punishment due to his wicked attempt. He might have appealed from the consuls to the people, who, as they were intirely devoted to him, would have saved him; but from the dictator there was no appeal. Cincinnatus, being then past fourscore, would have declined the office; but the consuls and the whole senate insisting upon his charging himself with the care of the commonwealth, he at length acquiesced, and named Servilius Abala to be his general of the horse, and the next day ^c placed guards in all the quarters of the city. This precaution surprized those who knew nothing of the conspiracy; but Mælius, and his associates, being well apprised, that the power of the supreme magistrate was wholly bent against them, used their utmost endeavours to engage the multitude in their favour. Hereupon the dictator, having caused his tribunal to be carried into the forum, sent his master of the horse to cite Mælius to appear before him. Mælius, instead of obeying the summons, attempted to make his escape. Whereupon Servilius commanded a lictor to seize him; and his orders were put in execution: but the multitude having rescued him out of the lictor's hands, he was very near making his escape, when Servilius, throwing ^d himself into the crowd, overtook him, and killed him on the spot. This action pleased the dictator, who, on seeing his master of the horse all sprinkled with the blood of the criminal, told him, that to him Rome was indebted for her liberty. He then convened a general assembly of the people, and having acquainted them with the conspiracy, declared, that Mælius had been justly slain. His house was, by the dictator's orders, razed to the ground, and the prodigious quantities of corn found in it, sold to the people at low rates. As for Menenius, a statue was erected to him without the gate Trigemina, as a reward of his vigilance; but three of the tribunes, provoked at the murder of Mælius, made loud complaints in the assembly of the people, and obstinately opposed the election of the consuls; insomuch that the patricians, to avoid a tumult, were forced to consent, that military tribunes should be ^e chosen for the next year. The tribunes hoped, that the people would now divide the government between the patricians and plebeians; but they chose only three patricians, viz. Mamercus Æmilius, L. Quinctius, the son of the dictator, and Julius Julius. During their administration, the city of Fidenæ, not only revolted from Rome, but putting themselves under the protection of Tolumnius king of the Veientes, murdered four ambassadors sent by the senate to ask the reason of their conduct. As a war was unavoidable, it was thought more proper to chuse consuls than military tribunes for the next year; and accordingly M. Geganius a third time, and L. Sergius, were elected. It fell to the latter to make war upon the Veientes; but though he gained some advantages over them, he lost a great number of men; which determined the senate to remove him from the command of the army, and to create a dictator in his room. The consuls named Mamercus Æmilius for that dignity, who chose young Quinctius Cincinnatus for his general of the horse, and appointed Quinctius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus, two great commanders, his lieutenant generals. He soon after took the field, came to an engagement with the united forces of the Falisci, Fidenates, and Veientes, and gave them a total overthrow. Tolumnius himself was slain in the battle by Cornelius Cossus, a legionary tribune, who stripped him of his armour and royal robes, and carried these spoils, called spolia opima, on his shoulders ^f

- a in the dictator's triumph. When the triumph was over, he deposited them in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, they being the second of the sort known in Rome. In the following consulate of M. Cornelius and L. Papirius, one Sp. Malius, a tribune of the people, and a near relation of the famous Malius, cited Minucius, and Servilius Abala, to answer for his death. Some historians tell us, that these prosecutions served only to bring the tribune into contempt; but the greater part say, that Servilius was condemned to banishment, and afterwards recalled. As for Minucius, we do not find any punishment inflicted upon him.

- THE Veientes and Fidenates renewed the war in the following consulate of Julius Julus the second time, and L. Virginus, while the Romans were greatly distressed by a plague; but Q. Servilius Priscus being created dictator, gave them battle near Numentum, routed them, and took the city of Fidenæ. This success was followed by a census of the Roman people, which, after the establishment of the censors, never failed to be renewed every five years. The following year Mamercus Æmilius was named to the dictatorship a second time, upon a report, that all Hetruria was preparing for war; but these fears proving vain, Æmilius, who had no hopes of gaining glory abroad, resolved to do something remarkable at home, and proposed to the people the shortening the duration of the censorship, and reducing it from five years to eighteen months. This motion was received with applause, and passed into a law. Then Æmilius, to shew the dislike he had to magistracies of long continuance, resigned his own, and retired to his house, amidst the loud acclamations of the multitude. However, this wise law cost him dear; the censors, who were the inspectors of the manners of the people, struck him out of the roll of his tribe, took from him the privilege of voting, deprived him of all the rights of a Roman citizen, and loaded him with a tribute eight times greater than he used to pay; but this persecution gave him a new lustre, and stirred up the people against his persecutors, Furius and Geganus, to such a degree, that they would have tore them in pieces, if Æmilius had not been so generous, as to use his interest with the multitude to save them. The tribunes of the people, by renewing their ordinary harangues against the electing of consuls, prevailed to have military tribunes chosen for the next year. However, the people raised to that dignity only three patricians, M. Fabius, M. Fastius, and L. Sergius. Nothing memorable happened during their administration, but a plague, which ceased in the following year, when the republic was again governed by three military tribunes, all patricians, viz. L. Pinarius, L. Furius, and Sp. Posthumus. Hereupon the rich plebeians complained of the poorer sort, for not chusing any but patricians to that magistracy, notwithstanding the law, which allowed three plebeians to be elected. They met at the houses of the tribunes of the people to consult upon this matter, and there resolved to propose a law, forbidding any pretenders to the superior offices to go about in garments of an extraordinary whiteness, to solicit the votes of the people. It was customary for those, who aspired to any office, to shew themselves to the people on market-days in a habit of an extraordinary whiteness, and, in that dress, to court the meanest of the citizens, to call them by their names, to shake hands with them, &c. From this habit they were called candidati, or candidates, a word derived from the Latin candidus, signifying white. As this way of canvassing for offices was used only by the nobility, the principal plebeians undertook the abolishing of such a custom, hoping thereby to put an end to the various arts used by the patricians to gain the favour of the people. The law prohibiting the use of white garments passed, in spite of the opposition of the patricians, who seeing the people highly incensed against the nobility, began to fear, that they would no longer refuse their voices to the chief plebeians for the military tribuneship; wherefore, to avert this danger, they turned their thoughts on getting consuls chosen for the next year, the formidable preparations which the Æqui and Volsci were making at this time for war, favouring their design. As no plebeians had ever commanded armies, the people were quite indifferent, whether consuls or military tribunes were chosen; for they were determined to give their suffrages to none but old captains, and consequently to patricians. Thus the election being left to the senate, the consulship was restored, and T. Quinctius, the son of Lucius, and C. Julius Mento, were promoted to that dignity. They were both officers of great experience and courage; but a misunderstanding arising between them, they were defeated by the enemy near mount Algidus. Hereupon the senate thought it necessary to name a dictator; but the consuls obstinately refusing to comply with their desire in this particular, as being piqued at the diffidence they shewed of their abilities, the senators had recourse to the tribunes of the people, exhorting them to interpose their authority, and oblige the consuls to name a dictator. The tribunes, who were then in the senate, charmed with a motion, which tended to increase their authority, having withdrawn a while to consult, returned with this declaration, that it was the pleasure of the tribunes, that the consuls should obey the senate, or be led to prison, if they persisted in their disobedience. Hereupon the consuls submitted; but justly reproached the senators with betraying the interests of their own body, and subjecting the consular authority to the tribunitian power. Another difficulty still remained: the consuls could not agree about the person who should be dictator; so that they were obliged to draw lots for the privilege of nominating. It fell to Quintilius, and he named his father-in-law Posthumius Tubertus, who appointed L. Julius Vopiscus to be his general of the horse. The dictator soon raised an army, with which he marched against the enemy, and having defeated them in a bloody battle, returned in triumph to Rome, and laid down his employment P.

THE next year, when C. Papirius and L. Julius Vopiscus were consuls, the Æqui desired to enter into an alliance with the Romans, on the same foot with the Latins and Ilernici; but all they could obtain was a truce for eight years. Nothing remarkable happened at Rome during the present consulship, but the making a law to settle the value of oxen and sheep paid by way of fines for disobedience to magistrates. The fines were ordered to be paid in money for the future, each ox being valued at an hundred asses of brass, and each sheep at ten. The tribunes were the first projectors of this new law; but the consuls having notice of their design, proposed the new regulation themselves, and by that means gained the favour of the people. The next year the republic enjoyed a profound peace, under the administration of L. Sergius a second time consul, and Hosius Lucretius, which was not disturbed even by the tribunes. The next year, when T. Quintilius a second time, and Cornelius Cossus, were raised to the consulate, was remarkable for nothing but an extraordinary drought, which occasioned a famine, that was followed by a dreadful plague. On this occasion the Romans had recourse to deities unknown, and introduced new superstitions; but the senate, apprised of the danger of innovations in religion, ordered the ædiles to take care, that no gods were worshipped, but those of the country; and by this means a stop was put to all foreign superstitions. The Veientes had obtained a truce for eight years, after their defeat near Nomentum, as we have related above; but, before the time was expired, had ravaged the lands of the republic. The senate therefore, in the consulate of L. Papirius a second time, and Servilius Abala, resolved to punish them; but a dispute arising between the people and the senate concerning the right of declaring war, those enemies of the republic escaped vengeance this year. The next, the tribunes insisted upon having the government placed in the hands of military tribunes; and accordingly four patricians were chosen, T. Quintilius Cincinnatus, C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and A. Cornelius Cossus. The latter staid at Rome, and the other three marched against the Veientes; but as they did not act in concert, they were routed, and obliged to keep within their camp. The people, upon the news of their defeat, insisted upon their being deposed, and a dictator appointed in their room; but as there were then no consuls, whose prerogative it was to nominate a dictator, recourse was had to the augurs, who declared, that Cossus, who had had no share in the late shameful disaster, might nominate a dictator. Accordingly he named Mamercus Æmilius, who had been in the same post twice before, and whom the censors had degraded. The new dictator appointed Cossus his general of the horse, and soon after took the field against the Veientes, whom the Fidenates had joined, after having massacred the Roman colony in their city. The dictator coming up with them near the city of Fidenæ, gained a complete victory over their united forces, and made himself master both of the city of Fidenæ, and of the camp of the Veientes. We are told, that the left wing of the Roman army was at first greatly terrified, and put into confusion by the enemy's new manner of fighting; for the Fidenates, having all on a sudden opened one of the gates of their city, sent out some soldiers with lighted torches in their hands, and dressed like furies. These running through the Roman battalions, and threatening them with fire and sword at the same time, occasioned no small disorder; but the dictator upbraiding his men with cowardice, What, a said he, are you as much afraid of smoke, as a swarm of bees? Make use of your swords to wrest the torches out of the enemies hands, and then go and set fire to their city with them. These words inspired the Romans with new courage; and Cossus falling upon the enemy at the same time with his cavalry, the latter were intirely defeated. This glorious expedition being finished in sixteen days, Amilius led back his troops to Rome, had the honours of a triumph, and then laid down his employment ⁹.

NOTWITHSTANDING the ill conduct of the last military tribunes, the tribunes of the people prevailed so far, as to have the same government continued the two following years; but had still the mortification to see patricians only elected. These
b were the first year, A. Sempronius, L. Furius, L. Quin. ius, and L. Horatius; the second, Ap. Claudius, Sp. Nautius, L. Sergius, and Sex. Julius. The tribunes of the people used their utmost endeavours to dissuade them from this preference of the patricians to them in the elections. The richest and most eminent men among the plebeians gave out, that, if they could be once chosen, they would not fail to get the public lands divided among the poor citizens. This made no small impression upon the multitude; but the patricians, who were then in possession of the military tribuneship, to avoid the shame of having plebeians for their successors, agreed among themselves to lead out of Rome those, who aspired to that dignity, under pretence of making an incursion into the territory of the Volsci. In their absence, Appius Claudius, son of the decemvir, and one of the military tribunes, held an assembly for electing consuls, when C. Sempronius Atratinus, and C. Fabius Vibulanus, were chosen. They had scarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome, that the Volsci had taken the field with a very numerous army, and were advancing towards the frontiers, with a design to lay waste the lands of the republic. The consul Sempronius, a man of greater courage than conduct, was sent against them; but he, desiring an enemy whom the Romans had so often vanquished, and attacking them with the infantry alone, was surrounded on all sides, and would have been cut off with all his men, if one Tempanius, an old officer of the horse, had not taken upon him the command of the cavalry. This brave officer, observing the danger the legions were in, d leaped from his horse, and addressing himself to his companions, Follow my lance, said he, as if it were a standard, and let us shew the enemy, that we can fight on foot as well as on horse-back. At these words the whole body of horse dismounted, and following their leader, fell upon the enemy with incredible fury. The general of the Volsci ordered his men to retire in good order to a neighbouring hill; but Tempanius, after having rescued the legions from the danger they were in, continued to press the enemy with such vigor, that they could no longer withstand him. Then the Volscian commander, who was a man of great experience in war, sent orders to his troops to open their ranks, and give passage to the troops Tempanius led, and then to close again, in order to separate them from the rest of the Roman army. His e orders were obeyed, and Tempanius rushing still forwards, found himself at last cut off from the Roman main body. He did his utmost to force his way through the enemy's ranks; but not being able to break their order, he retired to an eminence, and there drawing up his men in a circle, defended himself with incredible bravery, till night coming on, put an end to the conflict. The brave Roman did not doubt but the enemy would renew the attack as soon as the darkness was dispelled, and therefore encouraged his men to behave like Romans, and since they must perish, to sell their lives dear; but he was much surprized, when at day-break he saw neither friends nor enemies. He could not imagine what was become of the two great armies, which, a few hours before, had covered the plain. He went down with a few of his men f to take a view, first of the Volscian, and afterwards of the Roman camp. Not a man was to be seen in either, except such of the wounded as had not been able to follow the main body of their respective armies. Both the Romans and Volscians had fought till night, and being equally afraid to renew the fight the next morning, had quitted their camps, leaving many of their wounded, and a great part of their baggage behind them, and retired to the nearest mountains. Tempanius, not knowing to what place the consul was retired with his troops, took up the wounded Romans, and marched freight to Rome, where he found the people actually assembled. Some runaways having got to the city before him, had given out, that the consul was defeated; and the whole body of cavalry cut in pieces. The tribunes of the people, ^a thinking this to be a favourable opportunity of humbling a consul, obliged Tempanius to appear in the assembly, before he set foot in his own house, and asked him aloud several questions concerning the conduct of Sempronius. Tempanius answered, That it did not become a private officer to judge of the capacity and behaviour of his general; that he had seen him fight at the head of his legions with great bravery; and that, by what appeared to him upon a view of the field of battle, he could assure them, that the Volsi had lost at least as many men as the Romans. Notwithstanding this favourable testimony of Tempanius, L. Hortensius, one of the tribunes of the people, cited Sempronius, as soon as the year of his consulate was expired, to answer ^b for his conduct in the late battle; but when he appeared upon his trial, Tempanius, who had been chosen tribune of the people, with three other officers of the horse, in reward of their services, generously made themselves his advocates, and asked their colleague, why he prosecuted a brave general, whom he could reproach with nothing but bad fortune? Sempronius, said they, was our general and our father; and therefore, like true children, we will appear in the habit of criminals as well as he, and, as we have shared his fortune, partake of his disgrace, if any befalls him. No, replied Hortensius, that shall never be; the Roman people shall never see their tribunes in mourning. I have done; I have nothing further to say against a general, who ^c understood so well how to gain the affection of his soldiers: and thus he dropped his accusation. Sempronius, and his colleague Fabius, had been succeeded by military ^e tribunes, L. Manlius, Q. Antonius, L. Papirius, and L. Servilius; but this year Rome having such moderate tribunes of the people, returned to her ancient form of government, and chose, without any disturbance, T. Quinctius Capitolinus, son of the famous Quinctius Capitolinus, and Numerius Fabius, consuls.

THE peace, which continued this year, gave the new tribunes an opportunity of raising disturbances about the quaestorship. Hitherto there had been only two quaestors, and those chosen annually from among the patricians. Their office was to collect the taxes, defray the expences of the war, and to keep exact accounts of the receipts and disbursements of the public money, for which they were accountable. To this time they had never stirred out of Rome; the consuls therefore proposed, ^d that two new quaestors should be added, to attend the generals in the field, take account of the spoils, sell the booty, and, above all, provide for the subsistence of the army. This motion was received with great applause both by the senate and people; but when it came to be passed into a law, the tribunes demanded, that two of those magistrates should always indispensibly be plebeians. The senate was willing, that, in the election of quaestors, as in that of military tribunes, the people should, if they thought fit, chuse as many plebeians as patricians; but the tribunes obstinately requiring, that the people should not be left at liberty to chuse plebeians or patricians, the senate thought it adviseable, rather than submit to this, to drop the motion. The tribunes, by way of revenge, protested against holding the comitia for electing ^e consuls, and insisted on having military tribunes for the next year. The obstinacy of the two parties threw the republic into a kind of anarchy, the tribunes opposing even the senate's meeting to name an inter-rex. After warm disputes, the tribunes agreed to the naming of an inter-rex; and the senate chose for that office L. Papirius Mugellanus, who, by expostulations and soft persuasions, brought the contending parties to this compromise, that the senate should suffer the people to chuse military tribunes instead of consuls; and that the tribunes of the people should allow the tribes to bestow the quaestorship on patricians or plebeians, as they thought fit. Notwithstanding all the cabals and seditious harangues of the tribunes of the people, not only the military tribunes, but the quaestors too, were chosen out of the patricians only, tho' one ^f of the tribunes had proposed his brother, and the other his son. The tribunes, enraged at this preference, were for accusing A. Sempronius, who had presided at the election, of some unfair dealing in taking the votes; but, as he was a man of known probity, and then one of the military tribunes, they turned all their fury against C. Sempronius his cousin-german, who had not been acquitted on his former trial, tho' the prosecution had been dropped at the request of Tempanius. He was again cited to appear at the end of twenty-seven days, during which time he constantly attended the senate, and zealously opposed the request of the tribunes concerning the distribution

- a of lands. With the same steadiness he behaved on his trial, and pleaded his cause with great eloquence. But notwithstanding all the solicitations of the senate in his favour, and the favourable testimonies of many officers, who had served under him, he was fined fifteen thousand asses of brass. Soon after a vestal, who, by her levity, and too free airs, had brought herself under a suspicion of incontinency, was tried before the pontifices, and acquitted; but the pontifex maximus admonished her to be more reserved for the future. In the following military tribuneship of Agrippa Menenius, Sp. Nautius, P. Lucretius, and C. Servilius, a plot was formed by the slaves to set fire to the city, and seize the capitol; but the secret being discovered by some of the conspirators, the evil consequences of it were prevented. The next year, when
- b the republic was governed by three military tribunes only, M. Papirius, C. Servilius, and L. Sergius, Labicum, a city of Latium, about fifteen miles distance from Rome, Labicum revolted, and entered into an alliance with the Æqui, who, after having pillaged the territory of Tusculum, encamped at the foot of mount Algidus. Hereupon two of the military tribunes were ordered to take the field, and the third to remain in Rome; but each of the three, thinking himself the most capable of commanding the army, despised the less glorious employment of governing the city. The senate was highly offended to see three magistrates, whose duty it was to take care of the interest of the public, sacrifice it to their private ambition; but no one of that body had weight enough to put an end to the dispute. At length Q. Servilius, who had been formerly
- c dictator, interposing his paternal authority, commanded his son C. Servilius to stay at home; and Caius, tho' very desirous of commanding the army, and raised above his father by the office he then bore in the republic, obeyed, without shewing the least reluctance, and remained in Rome. But the two generals agreeing no better in the field than they had done in the city, the army under their command was drawn into an ambush, and intirely defeated. Hereupon the senate ordered a dictator to be created; and young Servilius nominated his father, who appointed him his general of the horse. The father and son, leaving Rome, at the head of a new army, encamped within two miles of the enemy, and, a few days after, attacked them, put their army to flight, took Labicum their place of refuge by storm, and returning to Rome eight
- d days after he had left it, laid down his office. The republic enjoyed a profound peace both at home and abroad under the succeeding military tribunes, P. Lucretius, L. Servilius, Agrippa Menenius, and Sp. Veturius. But the next year, when A. Sempronius, M. Papirius, Q. Fabius, and Sp. Nautius, governed the republic, the tribunes of the people revived the old quarrel about the distribution of lands. Sp. Mæcilius, and Sp. Metilius, who were at the head of the factious, pretended, that the patri-
- e cians had usurped the lands they enjoyed, and therefore proposed a new division of them between the nobility and the plebeians. The senate met frequently to concert measures for defeating this proposal; Appius Claudius proposed gaining over some of the college of the tribunes, as the only remedy against their tyranny. His advice was received with great applause, and put in execution with success; for the fathers applying themselves to the tribunes, by entreaties and remonstrances, won over six of the ten to oppose the promulgation of the law; so that Mæcilius and Metilius were obliged to drop their petition. The same good understanding was maintained the next year between the senate and some of the tribunes, when Cornelius Cossus, Quintilius Cincinnatus, Valerius Volusus, and Fabius Vibulanus, were military tribunes. But in the military tribuneship of Q. Fabius, Cn. Cornelius, P. Posthumius, and L. Valerius, the affair of the Agrarian law was revived. The Æqui having retaken Bola, a little town, which the Romans had lately seized, P. Posthumius, one of the military tribunes, was sent with an army to recover it. After some skirmishes with the enemy in the field,
- f he sat down before the place, and, to encourage his men, promised to distribute the plunder among them, if they took the town. The place was soon after carried by assault; but the general, who hated the plebeians, of whom the greatest part of his army consisted, breaking his word, put all the spoil into the hands of the quaestors, and thereby alienated the hearts of the army from him. In the mean time Sextius, one of the tribunes of the people, having brought on anew the affair of the Agrarian law, Posthumius was sent for to Rome, to assist his colleagues in opposing the tribunes. As he was an obstinate, wrong-headed man, on his arrival, he let many inconsiderate expressions drop in the presence of the curiæ. One day Sextius having proposed a decree for dividing the city of Bola, and its territory, among the soldiers then in the
- g field, who had made that conquest, Posthumius, in a violent passion, cried out, Wo

be to my men, if any such thing be done. Sextius, perceiving by this the hasty temper of the general, took pleasure in exasperating him, and making him say many things offensive to the people and soldiers. Then the crafty tribune, turning to the people, upbraided them for thinking such a brute more worthy of the military tribuneship than their own tribunes, whose whole business was to procure them lands, houses, and a comfortable retreat in their old age. His artful discourse much lessened the partiality of the people for the nobility in the elections; but when the threats of Posthumius were related in the camp, the soldiers began to mutiny; and because P. Sextius, one of the quæstors, ordered a lictor to seize a soldier, who was more mutinous than the rest, his companions not only rescued him, but one of them wounded the quæstor with a stone. Posthumius, informed of this tumult, hastened to the camp; but, instead of appeasing the sedition, increased it by his unseasonable severity. He commanded the most guilty of the mutineers to be thrown into a shallow water, to be there covered with hurdles, and then pressed to death, by heaping stones upon them. As this was a slow kind of death, which made the criminals cry out in an affecting manner, the soldiers flocked about them, and rescued them out of the hands of the executioners. Hereupon the general, in a transport of rage, came down from his tribunal, broke through the crowd, and being attended by his lictors, endeavoured to disperse the multitude; but the soldiers, forgetting their duty, opposed force with force, and being worked up to fury, threw stones at their general, and killed him on the spot. This was the first instance of a commander killed by his troops from the foundation of Rome.

THE senate, fearing lest the people, in order to screen the murderers, should chuse military tribunes for the next year out of the plebeians, used their utmost endeavours to get consuls elected, and, after warm debates, prevailed. A. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus, were raised to that dignity. As they were both men of great prudence and moderation, they were unanimously named by the senate, people and army, to prosecute the soldiers, who had murdered their general; which they did with such circumspection, for fear of driving the army to an open revolt, that those few who died, fell by their own hands, and not by the axes of the lictors. Nothing remarkable, except a plague and famine, happened in the three following consulates of Q. Fabius and C. Furius, of M. Papirius and C. Nautius, of M. Æmilius and C. Valerius. But in the consulate of Cn. Cornelius, and L. Furius a second time, the tribunes of the people, especially three of the Scilii family, who were more active than the rest, prevailed upon the people to make use of the liberty allowed them by the laws, and to chuse three plebeians into the quæstorship. The Scilii having carried this point, encouraged the plebeians to oppose the election of consuls, hoping, that some of their body might be raised to the military tribuneship, as they had been to the quæstorship. The disputes on this head grew warm, when news was brought, that the Æqui and Volsci were again in motion, and had retaken Carventum. It was therefore necessary to raise forces, in order to stop their further progress; but the tribunes obstinately opposed the levies, till the senate consented to the election of military tribunes; but, to disappoint the Scilii, they added this clause to their decree, that none of the tribunes of the people should either be chosen military tribunes, or continued in their office the next year. As the tribunes could not object to this, without discovering their ambition, troops were raised without opposition; and tho' Carventum was not recovered, the city of Verrugo was taken from the Volsci, and some other advantages gained over them. In the mean-time the election of the military tribunes coming on, the patricians engaged some plebeians of no merit or weight to stand candidates. The plebeians, disgusted with their meanness, and ashamed to see them stand in competition with senators and consulars of the first rank, gave all their suffrages to the nobles, and chose three patricians, C. Julius Iulus, P. Cornelius Cossus, and C. Servilius Ahala. During their administration, the Volsci renewed the war, and having engaged some of the new allies of the republic to join them, encamped near Antium. The senate, apprehending the republic to be in great danger, ordered a dictator to be nominated; but as the three military tribunes had already drawn lots for the command of the army, which had fallen to Iulus and Cornelius, those two generals, offended at the distrust the fathers had shewed of their conduct, refused to name a dictator. Hereupon the senate complained to the tribunes of the people, as they had done before

- a upon the like occasion, and desired them to interpose their authority : but they gave them a scornful answer ; Who are we, said they, but contemptible plebeians, scarce to be reckoned in the number of men, much less of Roman citizens ? When the honours and dignities of the republic shall be made common to us with the patricians, we shall take care, that no proud magistrate disobey the decrees of the senate. Till then you must expect nothing from us, but do your own business the best you can. This refusal greatly perplexed the senate ; but at length C. Servilius, the third military tribune, extricated them out of the present difficulty, by taking upon him to act alone, and to name a dictator. The person he raised to that high station was P. Cornelius Rutilus, P. Cornelius Rutilus dictator gains a complete victory over the Volsci who appointed him to be general of the horse. The dictator took the field, gained a complete victory over the Volsci, and returning to Rome, laid down his office. Upon his resignation, the military tribunes resumed the functions of their employment, and to be revenged on the senate for the treatment they had met with, without consulting the fathers, ordered the centuries to assemble for the election of military tribunes against the ensuing year. The patricians, alarmed at this step, had recourse to a new artifice, to prevent the government from falling into the hands of the plebeians. They obliged the most illustrious members of their own body to stand candidates ; so that, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the tribunes, four patricians of distinguished merit were chosen, viz. C. Valerius, C. Servilius, Lucius Furius, and Fabius Vibulanus ^a.
- c THE truce with the Veientes being at this time ended, the Romans sent feciales to demand satisfaction for the injuries they had formerly done the republic ; but the feciales meeting on the road envoys from Veii, at their request proceeded no farther. These envoys being admitted into the senate, represented, that their city, being at present disturbed by domestic broils, was not in a condition to give the Romans satisfaction. These dissensions gave the Romans a favourable opportunity of falling upon their old enemies ; but they had too much generosity, as Livy observes, to take advantage of the misfortunes of a rival state, and therefore did not disturb them this year. The Volsci retook Verrugo from the Romans the same year, and put the garrison to the sword ; but the military tribunes having surprized the Volsci, while they were dispersed about the country in quest of booty, cut them all to pieces. In the following tribuneship of C. Cornelius, L. Valerius, Cn. Cornelius, and Fabius Ambustus, all patricians, the Veientes, having insulted the Roman ambassadors, and driven them out of their city with contempt, the senate ordered a declaration of war against them to be immediately proposed to the people ; but the tribunes opposed the levies, making the old affair of the Agrarian law their pretence. However, it was agreed, that three of the military tribunes should lead an army against the Volsci, who, at the approach of the legions, betook themselves to flight, and left the country open to be pillaged. Hereupon the Roman generals, having divided their army into three bodies, made incursions into it on three different sides. Fabius laid siege to Ansur, and having taken it by storm, divided the spoil equally among the soldiers of all the three armies. This piece of generosity paved the way for a reconciliation between the nobility and the people, which was intirely completed by a decree of the senate, that for the future the Roman infantry should be maintained in the field at the public expence. Hitherto all the citizens had been obliged to serve in war at their own cost and charges, which was an exorbitant burden on the poorer plebeians, and frequently ruined their families. The senate therefore, pitying their condition, and reflecting on the many disorders, which were occasioned by their refusing to list themselves even for the most necessary wars, of their own accord decreed, that the foot should have pay out of the public money ; and that, to furnish this expence, a new tax should be raised, from which no citizen whatsoever should be exempt. What pay was given at this time to each soldier, we find no-where recorded ; but in Polybius's time, that is, in the time of the second Carthaginian war, each foot-soldier was allowed two oboli a day, a centurion double that pay, and a horseman treble. Two oboli were about the third part of an Attic drachma, which was worth seven pence three farthings of our money ^b. Upon the first news of this decree, the people, transported with joy, ran in crowds from all parts to the senate-house, and kissing the senators hands, called them the true fathers of the people, protesting at the same time, that they would spill the last drop of their blood for their country, which they now looked upon as a tender mother ; but the tribunes of the people, not liking this union of the two orders, which hindered them from making a figure in the state, endeavoured to lessen the value of the favour. They insinuated to the people, that this pay was to come out of their own pockets ; that it was not just to make those citizens, who had completed the time of their service at their own charge, contribute to the support of the new soldiers ; that they would protect all those, who should refuse to pay the tax, &c. However, as the senators began by laying great sums on themselves, which they paid readily, according to the real value of their estates, the common people followed their example, without shewing the least uneasiness ^w.

AND now the senate, finding themselves in a condition to maintain an army abroad, as long as they pleased, began to form great designs. All opposition to the levies ^b being over, they resolved to besiege Veii itself, one of the strongest places of Italy, in hopes of making themselves masters of a new city and territory larger than their own. Before they embarked in this great undertaking, the people being assembled, all voted for a war, and chose for the first time six military tribunes, all patricians, viz. C. Julius Iulus, C. Æmilius Mamercinus, T. Quinctius Capitolinus, L. Furius Medullinus, Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus, and A. Manlius Vulso Capitolinus. Some of these remained at home, while others took the field against the Veientes, who declining a battle, shut themselves up in their city. The Romans invested it ; but there was little action this year, and less the following, when P. Cornelius Maluginensis, Sp. Nautius Rutilus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Valerius Potitus, C. Fabius Ambustus, and M. Sergius Fidenas, were military tribunes. These were obliged to divide their army into two bodies ; one of which continued before Veii, and the other marched against the Volsi, defeated them, took and razed the city of Artena, and then rejoined the forces left at the siege. The succeeding military tribunes, M. Æmilius, M. Furius, Ap. Claudius, grandson of the decemvir, L. Julius, M. Quinctius, and L. Valerius, pushed on the siege with great vigour. In the mean time the Veientes, changing their form of government, chose themselves a king ; which so displeased the other states of Hetruria, that they refused to send them any succours. It was at this siege that the Romans are thought to have first invented lines of circumvallation and contravallation ; at least, this is the first time we find them mentioned in history. They fortified their camp both on the side of the city they invested, to prevent sallies, and on the side of the country, to guard themselves against any succours, which the Hetrurians might send to the besieged. The military tribunes, considering likewise, that Veii could not be taken but after a long siege, and then not so much by force as by famine, resolved, as the troops were now more at their command, to keep the army in the field all winter in wooden barracks covered with skins. To this design the soldiers made no opposition, chusing rather to live in the camp at the expence of the public, than in Rome at their own ; but the tribunes of the people, disliking a project, which kept great numbers of their adherents out of Rome, and consequently lessened the strength of their party in the comitia, assembled the tribes, and inveighed bitterly against the military tribunes, accusing them of ambitious designs and cruelty, in keeping the troops all winter in the field. Appius, whom the other military tribunes had left at Rome, in a long speech, which he made to the people, exposed the seditious and unreasonable conduct of the tribunes. The people gave no great heed to Appius's remonstrances ; but a loss, which the besiegers sustained before the place, animated the plebeians, more than his prudent discourse, to pursue the siege with vigour. The Veientes in a sally surprized the Romans, slew a great number of them, set fire to their machines, and ruined in a few hours the work of many days. This misfortune, instead of sinking the spirits of the Romans, inspired them with new courage. The citizens, who had wealth enough to be placed in the first class among the knights, but had not yet received horses from the republic, which ceremony was necessary to make a man a knight, went in a body to the senate, and offered to mount themselves at their own expence, and serve at the siege of Veii. The fathers accepted the offer ; and the people, following the example of the new knights, declared themselves ready to serve, and supply the places of the soldiers who had been killed. The senate ordered the same pay to be given to the volunteers as to the rest of the army, and decreed at the same time, that for the future the cavalry likewise should receive pay out of the public treasury ^f.

- a THE election of new military tribunes furnished the army with new generals. The six chosen were, C. Servilius, Q. Sulpicius, Q. Servilius, A. Manlius, L. Virginius, and Manius Sergius. The siege of Veii was carried on by the two latter; but as these two generals could not agree, each of them had a body of troops under his command, and, as it were, a separate army. Sergius commanded the attack, and Virginius covered the siege. While the army was thus divided, the Falisci and Capenates fell upon Sergius, and at the same time the besieged sallying out, attacked him on the other side. The Romans under his command, thinking they had all the forces of Æturia to deal with, began to lose courage, and retire. Virginius could have saved his colleague's troops; for his forces were ranged in order of battle at a small distance: but Sergius was too proud to send to him for succour; and Virginius, tho' well apprised of his danger, resolved not to send him any, unless he asked it. Thus the public good was sacrificed to a private pique. The enemy made a dreadful slaughter of the Romans in their lines; but Sergius himself having the good luck to escape, fled to Rome, not so much to justify his own conduct, as to complain of that of his colleague's. Hereupon Virginius was recalled, and both commanders ordered to give an account of their conduct to the senate, where they inveighed against each other with great acrimony. The conscript fathers, to quiet the matter, thought it advisable to make a decree, that all the military tribunes of that year should lay down their dignity, and the people immediately proceed to a new election. The four, who had been guilty of no fault, made no opposition to the decree; but the two, on whose account it had been made, protested against it, declaring, that they would not resign their authority before the ides of December, the due time for its expiration. The tribunes of the people, thinking this a favourable opportunity for them to appear again, and make some figure, threatened, with an air of authority, to send the two refractory magistrates to prison, if they did not obey the senate. But Servilius Abala, one of the military tribunes, after having severely reprimanded the tribunes of the people for treating his colleagues in so haughty a manner, declared, that if Sergius and Virginius continued obstinate, he would name a dictator. Hereupon the two magistrates, finding it fruitless to resist any longer, abdicated their magistracy, and the people chose six new tribunes, viz. L. Valerius, L. Julius, M. Æmilius, Cn. Cornelius, Cæso Fabius, and Furius Camillus. These new magistrates were ordered to begin anew the siege of Veii; but when the troops came to be raised, the tribunes of the people kindled fresh broils, by dissuading the old soldiers, left in Rome to guard it, from paying the taxes, as if they were exempted from that burden by being enlisted. The disturbances raised on this occasion were so great, that the tribes could not agree in the choice of more than eight new tribunes of the people; however, the majority of these eight named two more, in defiance of the Trebonian law, which gave C. Trebonius, one of the present tribunes, an opportunity of drawing the hatred of the people upon three of his colleagues; but they diverted the hatred of the public from themselves, by turning it against Sergius and Virginius, the two generals of the last year, who were both cited to appear before the people, and condemned to pay a great fine for misconduct. This prosecution had the designed effect; for the people were so intent upon it, that they forgot the Trebonian law, and their quarrel with the three tribunes*.

- f THE tribunes, encouraged by the success that attended them in the prosecution of Sergius and Virginius, renewed the domestic broils, and proposed two laws; the first requiring a partition of the lands as formerly; the second excusing the people from any more contributions towards the soldiers pay; and, in fact, they would not suffer them to pay the taxes: so that the legions, being deprived of their subsistence, began to mutiny. But at length all was quieted, by chusing a plebeian into the military tribuneship. His name was P. Licinius Calvus. The other five were, P. Mælius, P. Mænius, Sp. Furius, L. Titinius, and L. Publilius. Licinius, tho' a plebeian, was an old senator; for some time since the considerable plebeians had begun to be admitted into the senate. The tribunes of the people were so much rejoiced to see a plebeian raised to the supreme magistracy, that they dropped their opposition to the tax; so that the soldiers, receiving their pay again, took new courage, made themselves masters of Anxur, which belonged to the Volsci, and carried on the siege of Veii with great resolution and perseverance, tho' they suffered much from the severe cold of the winter.

* Idem, c. 12.

Five plebeians military tribunes. Licinius having discharged his trust with universal approbation, the centuries chose ^a for the year following five military tribunes out of the plebeians, and only M. Veturius out of the patricians. The five were, C. Duilius, L. Atinius, Cn. Genucius, M. Pomponius, and Volero Publilius. Their administration proved very glorious; for they carried on the siege of Veii with great vigor, and intirely defeated the confederate forces of the Falisci and Capenates, who came to the relief of the besieged city; but the extreme cold of the weather, changing of a sudden to excessive heat, occasioned a mortality both among men and cattle. Hereupon the Sybilline books being consulted, the duumviri pretended to find there a new sort of expiation. Three beds were placed in a temple round a plentiful table, and the statues of Apollo, Latoa, Diana, Hercules, Mercury, and Neptune taken down from their niches, laid on the beds, and served ^b with magnificent repasts for eight days together. These public ceremonies were imitated in private families; every one kept open house for friends, strangers, and even enemies; all law-suits, disputes and animosities were suspended, and the very prisoners released to partake of the public rejoicings ^c.

In the mean time the patricians, taking advantage of the present state of affairs to recover the chief offices of the republic, and knowing the superstition of the people, attacked them on that side, and gave out, that the uncommon severity of the winter the last year, and the present year's plague, were punishments from the gods, who were displeased to see all distinctions of families confounded, and plebeians placed in the highest offices. By this means, and by proposing only such candidates to the centuries as were of superior merit, they disposed them to favour the nobility; and accordingly they restored the military tribuneship to the patrician order, raising to that office L. Valerius, L. Furius, M. Valerius, Q. Servilius, Q. Sulpitius, and the famous Camillus, all patricians. During their administration, Rome was astonished with a prodigy. It happened to be a very dry summer; but nevertheless the lake of Alba ^d swelled on a sudden to such a height, as to cover the tops of the rocks which surrounded it; whereas it had never before reached to the foot of them. This strange accident was much talked of in the camp before Veii; and as in long sieges the soldiers on both sides frequently become acquainted, they talked of the prodigy from their different camps; but an old soldier of the Veientes one day, while the others were making merry with the prodigy, cried out in an enthusiastic manner, Veii shall never be taken, till all the water is run out of the lake of Alba. A Roman centinel, who had great faith in divination, hearing him, asked, who the old man was? and being informed that he was a diviner, made him prisoner by a stratagem, and carried him before the Roman general, who sent him to the senate. The old man declared, that what he had said was agreeable to an ancient tradition written in some prophetic books of his country; and that, if the Romans could draw the water out of the lake, Veii would be taken: but he advised them to take particular care, that the drains, which should be made to carry it off, did not convey it to the sea. Tho' the senate was unwilling to trust the bare word of the diviner, yet they thought the matter of ^e such consequence, as to send a deputation of three patricians to Delphos, to consult the oracle. These returned the next year, while L. Julius, L. Furius, L. Sergius, A. Posthumius, A. Manlius, and P. Cornelius, all patricians, were military tribunes. The answer of the oracle was, to the great surprize of the senate and people, perfectly agreeable to the advice and prediction of the old man. The senate therefore immediately sent out pioneers to make a canal, which might carry off the waters of the lake, and convey them all over the fields in trenches. This wonderful work subsists to this day, and the waters of the lake Albano run through it ^f. The election of the present military tribunes being defective with regard to the auguries, they all abdicated, and, after a short inter-regnum, were succeeded by six new ones, all plebeians, viz. L. Atinius, P. Maelius, L. Titinius, P. Manius, Cn. Genucius, and P. Licinius. Atinius and Genucius marched with some troops to oppose a great body of Hebrurians, who were coming to attack the Roman entrenchments before Veii; but the two tribunes falling into an ambush, Genucius was killed, and his colleague driven out of the field. The news of this defeat so terrified the senate, that they had recourse, as usual in such cases, to a dictator. M. Furius Camillus was accordingly raised to that supreme dignity. He named P. Cornelius Scipio for general of the horse, and ordered new troops to be raised. The people strove who should first list themselves

- a under the banners of so renowned a commander. The Latins and Hernici of their own accord sent him a strong supply of their choicest youth. On his first taking the field, he came to a battle with the united forces of the Falisci, Capenates, and Hetrurians, and having intirely defeated them, sat down before Veii, and pushed on the siege with incredible vigor; but the besieged defending themselves with more courage than ever, Camillus, despairing to carry by assault a place, which had a whole army for its garison, had recourse to mines and sapping. His pioneers, whom he divided into six companies, relieving one another, and the work continually advancing without interruption, a passage under ground was opened to the very castle. The dictator then thinking himself sure of conquest, sent to the senate, to know how they would have the spoils of the city disposed of. The question was debated with great warmth; Appius Claudus was for having the rich plunder of Veii made a fund for the payment of the troops; but Licinius, thinking that this would give rise to endless murmurs and seditions, proposed, that the spoils should be divided between the army and those citizens, who should be in the camp when the town was taken. This advice prevailed, and a decree was made, giving leave to all the citizens to go to the camp, and take their share of the booty. Accordingly vast numbers flocked thither well armed, and joined the dictator's troops in the attack. The signal being given for the assault, part of the army scaled the walls, while the soldiers in the mine sallied out, and spread themselves in several bodies through the town. One fell upon those who were defending the walls; another broke down the gates, and the whole Roman army entering the city, put all those to the sword, who did not surrender their arms. Thus was the rich city of Veii taken, like a second Troy, after a ten years siege. The booty, which was exceeding rich, was divided among the soldiers; but the prisoners of free condition were sold to the best bidder, and the money arising from thence put into the public treasury; but, tho' this was the only part of the spoil from which the public reaped any benefit, the people murmured at it, and inveighed both against the senate and the dictator. The displeasure of the multitude was increased with regard to Camillus, by some singularities in the pomp of his triumph; for he entered the city in a stately chariot, drawn by four horses all milk-white, and coloured his face with vermilion. White horses, since the expulsion of the kings, had been allowed only to Jupiter and the sun; and the statues of the gods were commonly painted with vermillion. The people therefore, in the midst of the praises which they gave the dictator, could not, without a secret indignation, behold him affecting a pomp, which, in a manner, put him upon a level with the gods. What still more incensed the people against him, was his demanding back from them a tenth part of the spoil of Veii, to discharge a vow, which he had made to Apollo just before the assault, and afterwards forgot. This contribution at a wrong time irritated the people against him, and the tribunes gladly seized so favourable an occasion of inveighing against him. In the mean time it was proposed to buy such a vase of gold with the produce of what the soldiers returned, as might shew Greece the magnificence of the Roman republic; but there being little gold to be found in the city, the ladies, of their own accord, contriouted all their toys and ornaments, of which a vase with two handles was made, weighing eight talents; and three senators were sent to Delphos with it. In return for the ladies generosity, the republic granted them two favours, 1. That funeral orations should be made for illustrious women, as for great men. 2. That they should have leave to ride in chariots at the public games ^b.
- THE next year, the republic being under the government of six military tribunes, viz. P. Cornelius Cossus, P. Cornelius Scipio, M. Valerius, Cassius Fabius, L. Furius, and Q. Servilius, all patricians, Sicinius Dentatus, a tribune of the people, proposed, that half of the senators, knights and people of Rome, should remove to Veii, and settle there. The affair, according to custom, was carried before the senate; and the fathers, especially Camillus, opposed it with great warmth. They feared, that two such cities would, by degrees, become two different states, which, after a destructive war with each other, would at length fall a prey to their common enemies. They therefore protested, that they would sooner die than consent to so unreasonable a law. By this means, Camillus and the other senators, after much struggle, brought this project to nothing. Notwithstanding the opposition made by Camillus to this law, he was chosen one of the six military tribunes for the year following. His col-

legues were, L. Furius, P. Cornelius Scipio, C. Æmilius, Sp. Posthumius, and L. Valerius. The conduct of the war against the Falisci being committed to the care of Camillus, he besieged Falerii, their capital city, and surrounded it with lines; but at so great distance from the walls, that there was sufficient room for the besieged to take the air without danger. The Falisci had brought from Greece the custom of committing all their children to the care of one man, who was to instruct them in all the branches of polite literature, to take them out a walking with him, and see them perform the exercises proper for their age. The children had used often to walk with their master without the walls of the city before the siege; and their fears of an enemy, who kept quiet, and at such a distance, were not great enough to make them discontinue that exercise afterwards. But the present school-master proved a traitor; he at first led the youth only along the walls; then he carried them a little farther; and at length, when a favourable opportunity offered, he led them through the guards of the Roman camp, quite to the general's tent. As they were the children of the best families in the place, their treacherous leader, when he came into Camillus's presence, addressed him thus: With these children I deliver the place you besiege into your hands. They were committed to my care and tuition; but I prefer the friendship of Rome to my employment at Falerii. Camillus, struck with horror at the treachery, ordered his lictors to strip the traitor, to tie his hands behind him, and to furnish the youth with rods to whip him back again into the city. The Falisci, moved by this generous action, immediately sent a deputation to Camillus to treat of a surrender, tho' they had a little before protested, that they would rather undergo the fate of the Veientes, than submit to Rome. Camillus, out of modesty, referred the deputies to the senate, which they addressed in the following manner: Rome, conscript fathers, has just now gained a victory over us, which can never be shameful to us in the sight either of gods or men. We submit to you, out of a persuasion, that we cannot live more happily, than under the laws of a republic, in which justice and probity reign. The Romans and Falisci are this day giving two great examples to posterity; you in preferring justice to victory; we, in rather yielding to the charms of virtue, than to the force of arms. We surrender ourselves into your hands. Command the Falisci to lay down their arms, to give you hostages, and to receive a Roman garison, and we will obey, and open our gates. We shall never repent of subjecting ourselves to your government; nor shall you ever have reason to complain of our being unfaithful to you. The senate heard this discourse with pleasure; but left to Camillus the terms of the peace which was to be made with the Falisci, not as a conquered people, but as with a nation, which voluntarily submitted to the dominion of the republic. He therefore entered into an alliance with them, and demanded only the expences of the present campaign. He then led back his army to Rome, where his soldiers increased the number of his enemies. They had promised themselves great riches from the plunder of Falerii, and thinking Camillus had given the Falisci better terms than they deserved, they looked on their general as an enemy to the people, and as one who was no ways inclined to promote their interest; so that the hatred of the multitude to this hero increased as fast as his reputation.

The Falisci, overcome by the generosity of Camillus, submit to Rome.

The Æqui defeated.

WHILE Camillus was thus employed, two of his colleagues, Æmilius and Posthumius, having united their forces, defeated the Æqui in a pitched battle; but while the arms of the republic prospered abroad, new disturbances were raised at home. When the time came for electing tribunes of the people, the multitude was for continuing those who had proposed the law for going to Veii; and the patricians were for re-electing those who had opposed it; but the former prevailing in the comitia, by tribes, the promoters of the law were re-chosen. Hereupon the patricians, in revenge, resolved, if possible, to restore the consular government; and accordingly, in the comitia by centuries, where they had most sway, L. Lucretius Flavius, and Severus Sulpitius Camerinus, were chosen consuls. During their administration, Sicinius the tribune used his utmost endeavours to get the law passed for removing half of the people and senate to Veii. A. Virginius and Q. Pomponius, two of the tribunes of the people for the last year, who had opposed it, were cited to appear before the tribes, and fined ten thousand asses of brass. The whole senate was offended at this sentence, but especially Camillus, who advised the conscript fathers to appear in the comitium, when the tribes assembled to determine the affair, as men prepared to defend their

- a temples, their household gods, and their country. Accordingly the patricians, by tears, entreaties, and the more powerful arguments drawn from religion, prevailed to have the law rejected, tho' it was only by a majority of one tribe. And now the senate was so well pleased with the people, that the very next morning a decree was passed, assigning six acres of the lands of Veii, not only to every father of a family, but to every single person of free condition. On the other hand, the people, delighted with this liberality, made no opposition to the election of consuls. L. Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius Capitolinus, were raised to the consulate, and began their year by performing the vow made by Camillus, when dictator, to celebrate the great games. Of these there were two sorts, the one celebrated every year in the month of September, in honour of Jupiter, Juno and Minerva; the other, called votive, or extraordinary, had no fixed day, and was celebrated in honour of Jupiter only. This year the Volscii, one of the twelve Ittrurian nations, alarmed at the fate of Veii and Falerii, took arms against Rome, and being joined by the Salpinctes, made incursions into the Roman territory; but a contagious distemper made the republic suspend her revenge. The two consuls being seized with it, the superstitious multitude imagined they had been inauspiciously chosen. They were therefore ordered by the senate to resign. Upon their resignation an inter-regnum ensued, during which the republic was governed by three presidents, Valerius Potitus, (not the consul) Camillus, and Cornelius Scipio, who succeeded each other for a few days. Valerius held an assembly for the election of six military tribunes, which sort of government was now re-established, that, in case some of the supreme magistrates were infected with the contagion, there might still be others to take care of the public welfare. By a census taken this year, it appeared, that the number of citizens able to bear arms, amounted to one hundred fifty-two thousand five hundred and eighty-three. No wonder therefore that numerous armies were often raised within the walls of Rome itself. The troops, since their receiving pay, were more obedient than formerly to their commanders, who kept them in the field summer and winter. They had never had a more gallant or experienced commander than Camillus. The frontiers of the republic were now extended above sixty miles beyond the Tiber; and the people seemed to be in a settled tranquillity, and perfectly reconciled to the senate; but this unusual prosperity was interrupted by the Gauls, a memorable event, which almost ruined the Roman nation.

- Gaul* was anciently divided into three parts, viz. Gallia Belgica, Gallia Celtica, and Gallia Aquitanaica. The first reached from the British sea to the Seine; the second comprehended all the country between the Seine and the Garonne, quite to the Alps; the third contained all that tract of ground, which lies between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the western ocean. The Celtae, or the inhabitants of Gallia Celtica, were the only Gauls, who, at different times, crossed the Alps, and settled in Italy. The first invasion of Italy by the Gauls happened about the year of Rome 160, during the reign of Tarquinius Prius; when Ambigatus, king of the Celtae, finding his dominions overstocked, sent away vast numbers of his subjects to seek their fortune, under the command of his two nephews, Segovesus and Bellovesus. The former took his way through the Hircinian forest, and settled in a canton of Germany, ever since called Bohemia or Boiemia, from the word Boii, the greatest part of his followers being of that Celtic nation, which was so named; but these being afterwards driven from thence by the Marcomani or Sclavonians, retired into that country, which lies between the Inn and the Iser, and which from them took the name of Boiaria, or Bavaria. As for Bellovesus, he crossed the Rhone, and passing the Alps, possessed himself of those countries, which are at present known by the names of Piedmont and Lombardy, after having driven out the Ittrurians, who then held them. A second irruption into Italy was made by the Cenomani, or those people of Gallia Celtica, who dwelt between the mouths of the Seine and the Loire, under the conduct of one Elitovis. These new adventurers settled in the present Bresciano, Cremonese, Mantuan, Carniola, and the territories now subject to the republic of Venice. The Læves or Lævi, and the Ananes, made the third irruption into Italy; the former seized the country of Novara, on the north side the Po; and the latter that of Piacenza, on the south side of the same river. The fourth transmigration of the Gauls into Italy, was when the Boii and Lingones passed the Alpes Penninae, and settled on the south side the Po, between Bologna and Ravenna. Two hundred years after the invasion by Bellovesus, the Senones, who possessed that part of Gaul, which lies between Paris and Meaux, sions of Italy by

made a fifth irruption into Italy; which was occasioned by the following accident: a Arunx, one of the chief men of Clusium in Hetruria, had been guardian to a young Leucumo, or lord of a leucumony, and had educated him in his house from his infancy.
The Leucumo, as soon as he was of an age to feel the force of a passion, fell in love with his guardian's wife, and, upon the first discovery of their intrigue, conveyed her away. Arunx endeavoured to obtain reparation for the injury he had received; but the Leucumo, by his interest and money, gained over the magistrates; so that the injured guardian, finding no protectors in Hetruria, resolved to make his application to the Gauls. The people, among all the Celtic nations, to whom he chose to address himself, were the Senones; and in order to engage them in his quarrel, he acquainted them with the great plenty of Italy, and made them taste of some Italian b wines. Upon this the Senones resolved to follow him; and a numerous army was immediately formed, which passing the Alps, under the conduct of their Hetrurian guide, and leaving the Celtæ in Italy unmolested, fell upon Umbria, and possessed themselves of all the country from Ravenna to Picenum. They were about six years in settling themselves in their new acquisitions, while the Romans were carrying on the siege of Veii. At length Arunx brought the Senones before Clusium, in order to besiege that place, his wife and her lover having shut themselves up there. The Romans, notwithstanding the daily conquests made by the Gauls, seem to have been under no apprehension of any danger from them; for at this time the great Camillus, the only general they had capable of making head against such formidable neighbours, c was accused by Apuleius, one of the tribunes of the people, of having applied to his own use some spoils taken from the Hetrurians, particularly a brass door brought from Veii. His friends, not finding themselves strong enough to protect him, promised to pay the fine, which should be laid upon him; but Camillus, having too great a soul to bear the affront of a public condemnation, retired from Rome, and went of his own accord into banishment. He was no sooner gone, than envoys arrived from the Clusini, imploring the assistance of the Romans against the Senones. The senate, being unwilling to engage in an open war with a nation, which had never offended them, sent an embassy of three young patricians, all brothers, and of the Fabian family, to bring about an accommodation between the two nations. These embas- d sadors being arrived at the camp of the Gauls, and conducted into the council, offered the mediation of Rome, and demanded of Brennus, the leader of the Gauls, What injury the Clusini had done him? or what pretensions any people from a remote country could have upon Hetruria? Brennus answered proudly, that his right lay in his sword, and that all things belonged to the brave; but that, without having recourse to this primitive law of nature, he had a just complaint against the Clusians, who, having more lands than they could cultivate, had refused to yield to him those they left untilled: And what other motives had you yourselves, Romans, said he, to conquer so many neighbouring nations? You have deprived the Sabines, the Albans, the Fidenates, the Æqui and the Volsci of the best part of their territories. Not that we e accuse you of injustice; but it is evident, that you thought this to be the prime and most ancient of all laws, to make the weak give way to the strong. Forbear therefore to interest yourselves for the Clusini, or allow us to take the part of the people you have subdued. The Fabii were highly provoked at so haughty an answer; but dissembling their resentment, desired leave to go into the town, under pretence of conferring with the magistrates. But they were no sooner there, than they began to stir up the inhabitants to a vigorous defence; nay, forgetting their character, they put themselves at the head of the besieged in a sally, in which Q. Fabius, the chief of the ambassadors, slew with his own hand one of the principal officers of the Gauls.
Hereupon Brennus, calling the gods to witness the perfidioulness of the Romans, and f their violating the law of nations, immediately broke up the siege of Clusium, and marched leisurely to Rome, having sent a herald before him to demand, that those ambassadors, who had so manifestly violated the law of nations, should be delivered up to him. The Roman senate was greatly perplexed between their regard for the law of nations, and their affection for the Fabii. The wisest of the senate thought the demand of the Gauls to be but just and reasonable; however, as it concerned persons of great consequence and credit, the conscript fathers referred the affair to the people assembled by curiæ. As the Fabian family was very popular, the curiæ were so far from condemning the three brothers, that, at the next election of military tribunes, they were chosen the first. Brennus, looking upon the promotion of the Fabii as an g

- high affront on his nation, hastened his march to Rome. As his army was very numerous, the inhabitants of the towns and villages, through which he passed, left their habitations at his approach; but he stopped no where, declaring that his design was only to be revenged on the Romans. The six military tribunes, viz. Q. Fabius, Cæ. Fabius, Caius Fabius, Q. Sulpicius, Q. Servilius, and Sextus Cornelius, marched out of Rome at the head of forty thousand men, without either sacrificing to the gods, or consulting the auspices, essential ceremonies among a people, that drew their courage and confidence from the propitious signs, which the augurs declared to them. As most of the military tribunes were young, and men of more valor than experience, they advanced boldly against the Gauls, whose army was seventy thousand strong. The two armies met near the river Allia about sixty furlongs from Rome. The Romans, that they might not be surrounded by the enemy, extended their wings so far as to make their center very thin. Their best troops, to the number of twenty-four thousand men, they posted between the river and the adjoining hills; the rest they placed on the hills. The Gauls first attacked the latter, who being soon put into confusion, the forces in the plain were struck with such terror, that they fled without drawing their swords. In this general disorder most of the soldiers, instead of returning to Rome, fled to Veii; some were drowned as they endeavoured to swim cross the Tiber; many fell in the pursuit by the sword of the conquerors, and some got to Rome, which they filled with terror and consternation, it being believed there that all the rest were cut off. The day after the battle Brennus marched his troops into the neighbourhood of Rome, and incamped on the banks of the Anio. Thither his scouts brought him word, that the gates of the city lay open, and that not one Roman was to be seen on the ramparts. This made him apprehensive of some ambuscade, it being unreasonable to suppose, that the Romans would abandon their city to be plundered and sacked without making any resistance. On this consideration he advanced slowly, which gave the Romans an opportunity to throw into the capitol all the men who were fit to bear arms. They carried into it all the provisions they could get; and that they might last the longer, admitted none into the place, but such as were capable of defending it. As for the city, they had not sufficient forces to defend it, and therefore the old men, women, and children, seeing themselves abandoned, fled to the neighbouring towns. The Vestals, before they left Rome, took care to hide every thing appropriated to the gods, which they could not carry off. The two palladiums and the sacred fire they took with them. When they came to the Janiculus, one Albinus, a plebeian, who was conveying his wife and children in a carriage to a place of safety, seeing the sacred virgins bending under their load, and their feet bloody, made his family alight, put the priestesses and their gods into the carriage, and conducted them to Cære, a city of Uetruria, where they met with a favourable reception. The Vestals remained at Cære, and there continued to perform the usual rites of religion; and hence those rites were called ceremonies. But while the rest of the citizens at Rome were providing for their safety, about fourscore of the most illustrious and venerable old men, rather than fly from their native city, chose to devote themselves to death by a vow, which Fabius the high pontiff pronounced in their names. The Romans believed, that by these voluntary devotements to the infernal gods, disorder and confusion was brought among the enemy. Of these brave old men some were pontifices, others had been consuls, and others generals of armies, who had been honoured with triumphs. To complete their sacrifice with a solemnity and pomp becoming the magnanimity and constancy of the Romans, they dressed themselves in their pontifical, consular, and triumphal robes, and repairing to the forum, seated themselves there in their curule chairs, expecting the enemy and death with the greatest constancy^d.
- A length Brennus, having spent three days in useless precautions, entered the city the fourth day after the battle. He found the gates open, the walls without defence, and the houses without inhabitants. Rome appeared to him like a mere desert; and this solitude increased his anxiety. He could not believe either, that all the Romans were lodged in the capitol, or that so numerous a people should abandon the place of their nativity. On the other hand, he could no where see any armed men but on the walls of the citadel. However, having first secured all the avenues to the capitol with strong bodies of guards, he gave the rest of his soldiers leave to disperse themselves all over the city, and plunder it. Brennus himself advanced into the forum with the troops under his command, in good order ; and there he was struck with admiration a at the unexpected sight of the venerable old men, who had devoted themselves to death. Their magnificent habits, the majesty of their countenances, the silence they kept, their modesty and constancy at the approach of his troops, made them take them for so many deities. For they continued as motionless as statues, and saw the enemy advance without shewing the least concern. The Gauls kept a great while at an awful distance from them, being afraid to come near them. But at length one soldier, bolder than the rest, having out of curiosity touched the beard of M. Papirius, the venerable old man, not being used to such familiarity, gave him a blow on the head with his ivory staff. The soldier in revenge immediately killed him, and the rest of the Gauls, following his example, slaughtered all those venerable old men without mercy. After b this the enemy set no bounds to their rage and fury. They plundered all places, dragging such of the Romans as had shut themselves up in their houses, into the streets, and there putting them to the sword without distinction of age or sex. Brennus then invested the capitol, but being repulsed with great loss, in order to be revenged of the Romans for their resistance, he resolved to lay the city in ashes. Accordingly, by his command, the soldiers set fire to the houses, demolished the temples, and public edifices, and razed the walls to the ground. Thus was the famous city of Rome intirely destroyed ; nothing was to be seen in the place where it stood but a few little hills covered with ruins, and a wide waste, in which the Gauls, who invested the capitol, were incamped. Brennus, finding he should never be able to take a place, which nature c had so well fortified, otherwise than by famine, turned the siege into a blockade. But in the mean time his army being distressed for want of provisions, he sent out parties to pillage the fields, and raise contributions in the neighbouring cities. One of these parties appeared before Ardea, where the great Camillus had now spent two years in a private life. Notwithstanding the affront he had received at Rome, the love he bore his country was not in the least diminished. The senate of Ardea being met to deliberate on the measures to be taken with relation to the Gauls, Camillus, more afflicted at the calamities of his country, than at his own banishment, desired to be admitted into the council, where with his eloquence he prevailed upon the Ardeates to arm their youth in their own defence, and refuse the Gauls admittance into their city. d Hereupon the Gauls incamped before the city ; and as they despised the Ardeates after they had made themselves masters of Rome, they preserved neither order nor discipline in their camp, but spent whole days in drinking. Hereupon Camillus, having easily persuaded the youth of the city to follow him, marched out of Ardea in a very dark night, surprized the Gauls drowned in wine, and made a dreadful slaughter of them. Those, who made their escape under the shelter of the night, fell next day into the hands of the peasants, by whom they were massacred without mercy. This defeat of the enemy revived the courage of the Romans scattered about the country, especially of those who had retired to Veii after the unfortunate battle of Allia. There was not one of them who did not condemn himself for the exile of Camillus, as if he had been the author of it ; and looking upon that great man as their last resource, they resolved to chuse him for their leader. Accordingly, they sent without delay ambassadors to him, beseeching him to take into his protection the fugitive Romans, and the wrecks of the defeat at Allia. But Camillus would not accept of the command of the troops, till the people assembled by curiæ had legally conferred it upon him. He thought the public authority was lodged in the hands of those who were shut up in the citadel, and therefore would undertake nothing at the head of the Roman troops, till a commission was brought him from thence. To do this was very difficult, the place being invested on all sides by the enemy. However, one Pontius Cominius, a man of mean birth, but bold, and very ambitious of glory, under- f took it. He put on a light habit, and providing himself with cork to keep the longer above water, threw himself into the Tiber above Rome in the beginning of the night, and suffered himself to be carried down with the stream. At length he came to the foot of the capitol, and landed at a steep place, where the Gauls had not thought it necessary to post any centinels. There he mounted with great difficulty to the rampart of the citadel, and having made himself known to the guard, he was admitted into the place, and conducted to the magistrates. The senate being immediately assembled, Pontius gave them an account of Camillus's victory, and in the name of all the Romans at Veii demanded that great captain for their general. There was not much time spent in debates : the curiæ being called together, the act of condemnation, which g had

- a had been passed on Camillus, was abrogated, and he named dictator with one voice. Pontius was immediately dispatched with the decree, and the same good fortune, which had attended him to the capitol, accompanied him in his return. Thus was Camillus, from the state of banishment, raised at once to be sovereign magistrate of his country. He was indeed proclaimed dictator in his absence, contrary to custom. But this was a small defect in point of form only, which the necessities of the state made very excusable. His promotion to the command was no sooner known, but soldiers flocked from all parts to his camp; insomuch that he soon saw himself at the head of above forty thousand men, partly Romans, and partly allies, who all thought themselves invincible under so great a general *.
- b WHILE he was taking proper measures to raise the blockade of the citadel, some Gauls, rambling round the place, perceived on the side of the hill the print of Pontius's hands and feet. They observed likewise, that the moss on the rocks was in several places torn up. From these marks they concluded, that somebody had lately gone up to, and returned from, the capitol. The Gauls immediately made their report to Brennus of what they had observed; and that experienced commander laid a design, which he imparted to nobody, of surprising the place by the same way that the Roman had ascended. With this view he chose out of his army such soldiers as had dwelt in mountainous countries, and been accustomed from their youth to climb precipices. These he ordered, after he had well examined the nature of the place, to ascend in the night the same way that was marked out for them, climbing two abreast, that one might support the other in getting up the steep parts of the precipice. By this means they advanced with much difficulty and more danger from rock to rock, till they arrived at the foot of the wall. They proceeded with such silence, that they were not discovered or heard, either by the centinels, who were upon guard in the citadel, or even by the dogs, that are usually awaked and alarmed at the least noise. But though they eluded the sagacity of the dogs, they could not escape the vigilance of the geese. A flock of these birds was kept in a court of the capitol in honour of Juno, and near her temple. Notwithstanding the want of provisions in the garrison, they had been spared out of religion; and as these creatures are naturally quick of hearing, they were alarmed at the first approach of the Gauls; so that running up and down with their cackling and beating of their wings, they awaked Manlius, a Manlius/awakes the capitol. gallant soldier, who some years before had been consul. He sounded an alarm, and was the first man who mounted the rampart, where he found two Gauls already upon the wall. One of these offered to discharge a blow at him with his battle-ax; but Manlius cut off his right hand at one blow, and gave the other such a push with his buckler, that he threw him headlong from the top of the rock to the bottom. He in his fall drew many others with him; and in the mean time the Romans, crowding to the place, pressed upon the Gauls, and tumbled them one over another. As the nature of the ground would not suffer them to make a regular retreat, or even to fly, most of them, to avoid the swords of the enemy, threw themselves down the precipice, so that very few got safe back to their camp f.
- As it was the custom of the Romans at that time not to suffer any commendable action to go unrewarded, the tribune Sulpicius assembled his troops the next morning, in order to bestow the military rewards on those, who the night before had deserved them. Among these Manlius was first named, and in acknowledgment of the important service he had just rendered the state, every soldier gave him part of the corn, which he received sparingly from the public stock, and a little measure of wine out of his scanty allowance. An inconsiderable present indeed in itself, but very acceptable at that time to the person, on whom it was bestowed. The tribune's next care was to punish the negligent; accordingly, the captain of the guard, who ought to have had an eye over the centinels, was condemned to die, and, pursuant to his sentence, thrown down from the top of the capitol. The Romans extended their punishments and rewards even to the animals. Geese were ever after had in honour at Rome, and a flock of them always kept at the expence of the public. A golden image of a goose was erected in memory of them, and a goose every year carried in triumph upon a soft litter finely adorned; whilst dogs were held in abhorrence by the Romans, who every year empaled one of them on a branch of elder g.

Both the Gauls and Romans reduced to great straits.

THE blockade of the capitol had already lasted seven months; so that the famine ^a began to be very sensibly felt both by the besieged and the besiegers. Camillus, since his nomination to the dictatorship, being master of the country, had posted strong guards on all the roads; so that the Gauls dared not stir out for fear of being cut to pieces. Thus Brennus, who besieged the capitol, was besieged himself, and suffered the same inconveniencies, which he made the Romans undergo. Besides, a plague raged in his camp, which was placed in the midst of the ruins of the demolished city, his men lying confusedly among the dead carcases of the Romans, whom they had slain, and not buried. So great a number of them died in one quarter of the city, that it was afterwards called Busta Gallica, or the place where the dead bodies of the Gauls were burnt. But in the mean time the Romans in the capitol were more pinched with want than the Gauls. They were reduced to the last extremity, and at the same time ignorant, both of the lamentable condition to which the enemy's army was brought, and of the steps Camillus was taking to relieve them. That great general only waited for a favourable opportunity to fall upon the enemy; but in the mean time suffered them to pine away in their infected camp, not knowing the extreme want the Romans endured in the capitol, where they were so destitute of all sorts of provisions, that they could no longer subsist. Matters being brought to this sad pass on both sides, the centinels of the capitol, and those of the enemy's army, began to talk to one another of an accommodation. Their discourses came at length to the ears of their leaders, who were not averse to the design. The senate, not knowing what was become of ^c Camillus, and finding themselves hard pinched by hunger, resolved to enter upon a negotiation, and empowered Sulpicius, one of the military tribunes, to treat with the Gauls, who made no great difficulty in coming to terms, they being no less desirous than the Romans to put an end to the war. In a conference therefore between Brennus and Sulpicius, an agreement was made, and sworn to. The Romans were to pay to the Gauls a thousand pound weight of gold, that is, forty-five thousand pounds sterling, and the latter were to raise the siege of the capitol, and quit all the Roman territories. On the day appointed Sulpicius brought the sum agreed on, and Brennus the scales and weights; for there were no gold or silver coins at that time, metals passing only by weight. We are told, that the weights of the Gauls were false, and their scales untrue, which ^d Sulpicius complaining of, Brennus, instead of redressing the injustice, threw his sword and belt into the scale, where the weights were; and when the tribune asked him the meaning of so extraordinary a behaviour, the only answer he gave was, Ve victis, Woe to the conquered. Sulpitius was so stung with this haughty answer, that he was for carrying the gold back into the capitol, and sustaining the siege to the last extremity; but others thought it adviseable to put up that affront, since they had submitted to a far greater one, which was to pay any thing at all. During these disputes of the Roman deputies among themselves, and with the Gauls, Camillus advanced with his army to the very gates of the city, and being there informed of what was doing, he commanded the main body to follow him slowly, and in good order, while he, ^e with the choicest of his men, hastened to the place of the parley. The Romans, overjoyed at his unexpected arrival, opened to make room for him, as the supreme magistrate of the republic, gave him an account of the treaty they had made with the Gauls, and complained of the wrong Brennus did them in the execution of it. They had scarce done speaking, when Camillus cried out, carry back this gold into the capitol, and you, Gauls, retire with your scales and weights. Rome must not be redeemed with gold, but with steel. Brennus replied, that he contravened a treaty, which was concluded and confirmed with mutual oaths. Be it so, answered Camillus, yet it is of no force, having been made by an inferior magistrate without the privity or consent of the dictator. I, who am invested with the supreme authority over the Romans, declare the contract void. At these words Brennus flew into a rage, and both sides drawing their swords, a confused scuffle ensued among the ruins of the houses, and in the narrow lanes. The Gauls, after an inconsiderable loss, thought fit to retire within their camp, which they abandoned in the night, not caring to engage Camillus's whole army, and having marched eight miles, encamped on the Gabinian way. Camillus pursued them as soon as it was day, and coming up with them, gave them a total overthrow. The Gauls, according to Livy, made but a faint resistance, being disheartened at the loss they had sustained the day before. It was not, says that author, so much a battle as a slaughter. Many of the Gauls were slain in the action, more in the pursuit; but the greater number were cut off, as they wandered up and down in the fields, by the ^g inhabi-

- a inhabitants of the neighbouring villages. In short, there was not one single Gaul left to carry his countrymen the news of this fatal catastrophe. The camp of the barbarians was plundered; and Camillus, loaded with spoils, returned in triumph to the city, the soldiers in their songs stiling him Romulus, father of his country, and second founder of Rome ^b.

- As the houses of Rome were all demolished, and the walls razed, the tribunes of the people renewed with more warmth than ever, an old project, which had occasioned great disputes. They had formerly proposed a law for dividing the senate and government between the cities of Veii and Rome. Now this law was revived, nay, most of the tribunes were for intirely abandoning their old ruined city, and making Veii the sole seat of the empire. The people were inclined to favour this project, Veii offering them a place fortified by art and nature, good houses ready built, a wholesome air, and a fruitful territory. On the other hand, they had no materials for rebuilding a whole city, were quite exhausted by misfortunes, and even their strength was greatly diminished. This gave them a reluctance to so great an undertaking, and emboldened the tribunes to utter seditious harangues against Camillus, as a man too ambitious of being the restorer of Rome. They even insinuated, that the name of Romulus, which had been given him, threatened the republic with a new king. But the senate took the part of Camillus, and being desirous to see Rome rebuilt, continued him, contrary to custom, a whole year in the office of dictator; during which time he made it his whole business to suppress the strong inclination of the people to remove to Veii. Having assembled the curiæ, he expostulated with them upon the matter, and by arguments drawn from prudence, religion, and glory, prevailed upon them to lay aside all thoughts of leaving Rome. As it was necessary to have the resolution of the people confirmed by the senate, the dictator reported it to the conscript fathers, leaving every one at free liberty to vote as he pleased. While L. Lucretius, who was to give his opinion the first, was beginning to speak, it happened, that a centurion, who with his company had been upon guard, and was then marching by the senate-house, cried out aloud, Plant your colours, ensign. This is the best place to stay in. These words were considered as dictated by the gods themselves, and Lucretius, taking occasion from them to urge the necessity of staying at Rome, a happy omen, cried he, I adore the gods who gave it. The whole senate applauded his words, and a decree was passed without opposition for rebuilding the city ^c.

- THOUGH the tribunes of the people were defeated by Camillus in this point, they resolved to exercise their authority against another patrician, who had indeed deserved punishment. This was Q. Fabius, who had violated the law of nations, and thereby provoked the Gauls, and occasioned the burning of Rome. His crime being notorious, he was summoned by G. Martius Rutilius before the assembly of the people to answer for his conduct in his embassy. The criminal had reason to fear the severest punishment; but his relations gave out that he died suddenly, which generally happened when the accused person had courage enough to prevent his condemnation, and the shame of a public punishment. On the other hand, the republic gave a house situate on the capitol to M. Manlius, as a monument of his valor, and of the gratitude of his fellow-citizens. Camillus closed this year by laying down his dictatorship; whereupon an interregnum ensued, during which he governed the state alternately with P. Cornelius Scipio, and it fell to his lot to preside at the election of new magistrates, when L. Valerius Poplicola, L. Virginus Tricostus, P. Cornelius Cossus, A. Manlius Capitolinus, L. Æmilius Mamercinus, and L. Posthumus Albinus were chosen. The first care of these new magistrates was to collect all the ancient monuments of the religion and civil laws of Rome, which could be found among the ruins of the demolished city. The laws of the twelve tables, and some of the laws of the kings had been written on brass, and fixed up in the forum; and the treaties made with several nations, had been engraved on pillars erected in the temples. Pains was therefore taken to gather up the remains of these precious monuments; and what could not be found was supplied by memory. The pontifices on their part took care to re-establish the religious ceremonies, and made also a list of lucky and unlucky days. ^d

AND now the governors of the republic applied themselves wholly to rebuild the city. Plutarch tells us, that as the workmen were digging among the ruins of the temple of Mars, they found Romulus's augural staff untouched by the flames; and that this was looked upon as a prodigy, from whence the Romans inferred, that a their city would continue for ever. The expence of rebuilding private houses was partly defrayed out of the public treasure. The ædiles had the direction of the works, but so little taste for order or beauty, that the city, when rebuilt, was even less regular than in the time of Romulus. And though in Augustus's time, when Rome became the capitol of the known world, the temples, palaces, and private houses, were built in a more magnificent manner than before, yet even then these new decorations did not rectify the faults of the plan, upon which the city had been built after its first demolition.

C H A P. IV.

From the rebuilding of Rome to the first Punic or Carthaginian war.

Camillus a third time named dictator.

Defeats the Volsci and Latins.

ROME was scarce restored, when her citizens were alarmed by the news that all a her neighbours were combining to her destruction. The Æqui, the Volsci, the Hetrurians, and even her old allies the Latins and the Hernici, entered into an alliance against her, in hopes of oppressing her before she had recovered her strength. The republic under this terror nominated Camillus dictator a third time. This great commander, having appointed C. Servilius to be his general of horse, summoned the citizens to take arms, without excepting even the old men. He divided the new levies into three bodies. The first under the command of A. Manlius, he ordered to encamp under the walls of Rome; the second he sent into the neighbourhood of Veii, and marched himself at the head of the third to relieve the tribunes, who were closely besieged in their camp by the united forces of the Volsci and Latins. He, finding the enemy incamped near Lanuvium on the declivity of the hill Marcus, posted himself behind the hill, and by lighting fires, gave the distressed Romans notice of his arrival. The Volsci and Latins, when they understood that Camillus was at the head of an army newly arrived, were so terrified, that they shut themselves up in their camp, which they fortified with great trees cut down in haste. The dictator observing, that this barrier was of green wood, and that every morning there arose a great wind, which blew full upon the enemy's camp, formed the design of taking it by fire. With this view he ordered one part of his army to go by break of day with fire-brands to the windward side of the camp, and the other to make a brisk attack on the opposite side. By this means the enemy was intirely defeated, and their camp taken. Camillus then ordered his men to extinguish the flames, in order to save the booty, with which he rewarded his army, a bounty the more agreeable, because unexpected from the rigid dictator. He then left his son in the camp to guard the prisoners, and entering the country of the Æqui, made himself master of their capital city Bola. From thence he marched against the Volsci, whom he intirely reduced after they had waged war with the Romans for the space of a hundred and seven years. Having subdued this untractable people, he penetrated into Hetruria, in order to relieve Sutrium, a town in that country in alliance with Rome, and besieged by a numerous army of Hetrurians. But notwithstanding all the expedition Camillus could use, he did not reach the place before it had capitulated. The Sutrini being greatly distressed for want d of provisions, and exhausted with labour, had surrendered to the Hetrurians, who had granted them nothing but their lives, and the cloaths on their backs. In this destitute condition they had left their own country, and were going in search of new habitations, when they met Camillus leading an army to their relief. The unfortunate multitude no sooner saw the Romans, but they threw themselves at the dictator's feet, who, moved at this melancholy sight, desired them to take a little rest, and refresh themselves, adding, that he would soon dry up their tears, and transfer their sorrows from them to their enemies. He imagined, that the Hetrurians would be wholly taken

- a taken in plundering the city, without being upon their guard, or observing any discipline. And herein he was not mistaken. The Hetrurians did not dream that the dictator could come so speedily from so great a distance to surprize them; and therefore the Roman army passed through the territory of Sutrium, without finding any advanced guards, or meeting any scouts, and even entered the city before the enemy had any notice of their approach. In a word, he surprized the Hetrurians, who were wholly employed, either in plundering the houses, and carrying off the booty, or feasting on the provisions they had found in them, put many of them to the sword, made an incredible number of prisoners, and restored the city to its ancient inhabitants, who had not waited in vain for the performance of the dictator's promise. And
- b now after these glorious exploits, which were finished in so short a time, the great Camillus entered Rome in triumph a third time. This honour was decreed him for having conquered the Volsci, made himself master of the capital city of the Æqui, and retaken Sutrium from the Hetrurians. The greatest part of the captives, who graced his triumph, were sold, and by that means money enough raised to pay all the Roman ladies, for the jewels they had formerly contributed to make a present to Apollo. With the remainder were bought three vases of gold, which with Camillus's name inscribed on them were placed at the feet of Juno in the temple of Jupiter. Thus did the glory of Camillus eclipse that of all his rivals. Envious men had hitherto ascribed the greatest part of his victories to chance. But after these three last expeditions against three different nations, envy itself was silent^k.
- c Camillus having resigned his dictatorship, the republic chose six new military tribunes, Q. Quinctius, Q. Servius, L. Julius, L. Aquilius, L. Lucretius, and Ser. Sulpitius. During their administration the country of the Æqui was laid waste, in order to put it out of their power to revolt anew, and the two cities of Cortuosa and Contenebra in the lucumony of the Tarquinienses taken from the Hetrurians, and intirely demolished. At this time it was thought proper to repair the capitol, and add new works to that part of the hill, where the Gauls had endeavoured to scale the citadel. These orks were esteemed very beautiful, as Livy informs us, even in the time of Augustus, after the city was adorned with most beautiful decorations^l.
- d AND now Rome being reinstated in her former flourishing condition, the tribunes of the people, who had been for some time quiet, began to renew their seditious harangues, and revive the old quarrel about the division of the conquered lands. The patricians had appropriated to themselves the Pomptin territory lately taken from the Volsci, and the tribunes laid hold of this opportunity to raise new disturbances. But the citizens being so drained of their money, that they had not enough left to cultivate new farms, and stock them with cattle, the declamations of the tribunes made no impression upon their minds, so that the tribunes project vanished. As for the military tribunes, they owned, that their election had been defective, and lest the irregularities of the former comitia should be continued in the succeeding ones, they voluntarily laid down their office. So that after a short interregnum, during which M. Manlius, Ser. Sulpicius, and L. Valerius Potitus governed the republic, six new military tribunes, L. Papirius, C. Sergius, L. Æmilius, L. Menenius, L. Valerius, and C. Cornelius, were chosen for the ensuing year, which was spent in works of peace. A temple, which had been vowed to Mars during the war with the Gauls, was built, and consecrated by T. Quinctius, who presided over the affairs of religion. As there had hitherto been but few Roman tribes beyond the Tiber, which had a right of suffrage in the comitia, four new ones were added, under the name of the Stellatina, Tramontina, Sabatina and Arniensis, so that the tribes were now in all twenty-five, which enjoyed the same rights and privileges.
- f THE expectation of an approaching war induced the centuries to chuse Camillus one of the military tribunes for the next year. His colleagues were Ser. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, L. Quinctius, L. Horatius, and P. Valerius. As these were all men of moderation, they agreed to invest Camillus with the sole management of affairs, in time of war, and accordingly in full senate transferred all their power into his hands; so that he became in effect dictator. It had been already determined in the senate to turn the arms of the republic against the Hetrurians; but upon advice that the Antiates had entered the Pomptin territory, and obliged the Romans, who had taken possession of it, to retire, it was thought necessary to humble them before the republic

engaged in any other enterprise. The new dictator, if we may so call him, allotted ^a to each of the five military tribunes an employment suitable to his rank. He joined P. Valerius with himself in the command of the army, which he was to lead against the Antiates. Q. Servilius was placed at the head of a body of troops, which was to continue in Rome, and be in a continual readiness to march against the Hetrurians or Latins, and Hernici, in case they took the field. The third army wholly consisted of old men, and such citizens as were excused on account of their infirmities from taking the field. The command of these was given to L. Quinctius, who was appointed to guard the walls of the city. L. Horatius's province was to supply the troops with arms, ammunition, and provisions. Lastly, the superintendency of civil affairs, the comitia, the laws and religion, were committed to the care of Ser. Cornelius. So that ^b none of the military tribunes, who had in some measure divested themselves of their power in favour of Camillus, was left without an employment: they all readily accepted the provinces, which Camillus assigned them, only Valerius refused to be upon an equal foot with Camillus, You shall be my dictator, said he, and I will serve under you as your general of the horse. The Antiates had joined the Latins and Hernici near Satricum, so that the Romans, being terrified at their prodigious numbers, shewed themselves very backward to engage; which Camillus perceiving, he instantly mounted his horse, and riding through all the ranks of the army, fellow-soldiers, cried he, Why don't I see that joy and desire of fighting in your looks, which you used to have? Have you forgot, who I am, who you yourselves, and who your enemies are? Have not the Volsci ^c and the Latins been the occasion of your gaining immortal fame? Have you not conquered Veii, defeated the Gauls, and delivered Rome under my command? Am I not Camillus, because I have not the title of dictator? Do you but attack the enemy, and we shall succeed as usual. You will conquer, and they will fly. Having uttered these words, he dismounted, took the next standard bearer by the hand, led him towards the enemy, and cried out, Soldiers advance. The soldiery was ashamed not to follow a general, who exposed himself to the first attack, and therefore having made a great shout, they fell upon the enemy with incredible fury, Camillus, in order to increase their eagerness still more, commanded a standard to be thrown into the middle of the enemy's battalions, which made the soldiers, who were fighting in ^d the first ranks, exert all their resolution to recover it. The Antiates, not being able any longer to make head against the Romans, gave way, and were intirely defeated. The Latins and Hernici separated from the Volsci, and returned home. The Volsci, seeing themselves thus abandoned by their allies, took refuge in the neighbouring city of Satricum, which Camillus immediately invested, and took by assault. The Volsci threw down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. He then left his army under the command of Valerius, and returned to Rome to solicit the consent of the senate, and to make the necessary preparations for undertaking the siege of Antium. But while he was proposing this affair to the senate, deputies arrived from Nepes and Sutrium, two cities in alliance with Rome in the neighbourhood of Hetruria, demanding succours ^e against the Hetrurians, who threatened to besiege these two cities, which were the keys of Hetruria. Hereupon the expedition against Antium was laid aside, and Camillus commanded to hasten to the relief of the allied cities, with the troops, which Servilius had kept in readiness at Rome, in case of an emergency. Camillus immediately set out for the new war, and upon his arrival before Sutrium found that important place not only besieged, but almost taken, the Hetrurians having made themselves masters of some of the gates, and taken possession of all the avenues leading to the city. However, the inhabitants no sooner heard that Camillus was come to their relief, but they recovered the courage, and by barricadoes made in the streets prevented the enemy from making themselves masters of the whole city. Camillus in the mean ^f time having divided his army into two bodies, ordered Valerius to march round the walls, as if he designed to scale them, while he with the other undertook to charge the Hetrurians in the rear, force his way into the city, and shut up the enemy between the besieged and his troops. The Romans no sooner appeared, but the Hetrurians betook themselves to a disorderly flight through a gate, which was not invested. Camillus's troops made a dreadful slaughter of them within the city, while Valerius put great numbers of them to the sword without the walls. From reconquering Sutrium, Camillus hastened to the relief of Nepes. But that city being better effected to the Hetrurians than to the Romans, had voluntarily submitted to the former. Wherefore Camillus, having invested it with his whole army, took it by assault, put all the ^g Hetrurian

- a Hetrurian soldiers, without distinction, to the sword, and condemned the authors of the revolt to die by the axes of the lictors. Thus ended Camillus's military tribuneship, in which he acquired no less reputation, than he had done in the most glorious of his dictatorships.

- But as well established as Camillus's reputation was in Rome, yet he was not without a rival; M. Manlius, who had saved the capitol, could not bear to see his glory eclipsed by that of Camillus. He was indeed one of the bravest soldiers Rome had ever produced; but his ambition and vanity were yet greater than his valour. However, he did not attempt any thing till Camillus's fourth military tribuneship was expired. But no sooner was the government put into the hands of six new military tribunes, A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, T. Quinctius, L. Quinctius, L. Papirius, and C. Sergius, than he began to vent his spleen, and endeavour to darken the glory of a man, whom he looked upon as his rival. After all, Camillus's chief glory, said he, is his having recovered Rome out of the hands of the Gauls, which he could never have done, had I not first saved the capitol. So that his glory is founded upon mine. Nor did he conquer the Gauls, till they had been tired with a long siege. But I repulsed them from the capitol, when they were most flushed with success. A whole army shared Camillus's glory with him; but Manlius had no companion in his. By these and such-like speeches, he gave vent to his envy; but finding himself unable by noble actions to outshine Camillus in reputation, in order to satisfy his ambition, he began to court the multitude, and even entered into the faction of the tribunes of the people. Though a patrician by birth, he inveighed against the nobility, and espoused the cause of the people in the affair of the distribution of lands. He even opposed the rich, whenever they seized their debtors, and set at liberty those who were already in chains. So that he was always attended by a kind of guard made up of those whom he had so assisted. The senate, alarmed at Manlius's proceeding, thought it necessary to create a dictator, in order to prevent the evil consequences of his too great popularity, and to crush the rising faction. The army, which the Volsci had just then raised, furnished them with a specious pretence for taking such measures. The dictatorship was given to A. Cornelius Cossus, who named T. Quinctius Capitolinus to be general of the horse. The dictator came to an engagement with the Volsci in the Pomptin territory, and intirely defeated them, though much more numerous than the Romans. Among the prisoners, were found many Latins and Hernici of distinction, who being examined, confessed that they had acted by authority. Hereupon the dictator kept his army in the field, not doubting but he should be soon employed against those faithless allies. But the disturbances raised by the factious Manlius, called him back to the city without delay. It was necessary to examine into the designs of that ambitious man, whose popularity was become dangerous. A creditor had lately seized a centurion for debt, who was a man of great courage, and had distinguished himself on many occasions. As the officer was leading him to prison, according to his sentence, Manlius and his seditious company met them. Upon which the factious patrician began to inveigh against the pride of the nobility, and the cruelty of the rich, who lent money upon interest; but above all, expatiated on the merit of the insolvent centurion; what signifies my having saved the capitol, said he, if more cruel enemies than the Gauls are suffered to rob me of a brave and faithful companion in battle, and reduce him to slavery? Having uttered these words, in the presence of the officer and five witnesses, he paid the debt, admitting the prisoner, as soon as he was delivered out of his creditor's hands, to be one of the guard, that always attended him. This gave great umbrage in a republican state, where the magistrates were always upon their guard against any thing that tended to monarchy. But soon after Manlius increased their apprehensions by a yet more extravagant act of popularity. He had some lands in the territory of Veii, which were his paternal estate. These he sold by auction, and declared to the people, that he designed to apply the whole to the paying of the debts of insolvent debtors. These bounties made so strong an impression on the multitude, that they seemed ready to back him in any enterprize he should undertake. Besides, all his discourses in his own house tended only to decry the patricians and the senate. He gave out, that the nobility, not content to rob the people of their right to a share in the conquered lands, had concealed, with an intent to appropriate it to their own use, the gold, which was to have been given to the Gauls, and had been raised by the voluntary contributions of all the citizens, who were then a in the capitol: a treasure, which alone would be sufficient to discharge all the debts of the poor plebeians. He even promised to shew them in due time the place where this treasure was concealed; so that the whole care of the populace was to draw those riches out of the hands of the patricians ^b.

SUCH was the posture of affairs at Rome, when the dictator Cossus returned thither. He therefore postponed his triumph, till such time as he had re-established the public tranquillity. He made it his first business to assemble the senate, and finding the fathers inclined to suppress Manlius's insolence, he ordered his tribunal to be placed in that part of the forum, where the comitia were held, and sent a lictor to cite Man-

the dictator, lius to appear before him. Manlius obeyed the summons, but attended with his ^b usual guards, whom he exhorted to stand by him. The assembly looked like two armies drawn up in battalia against each other. Silence being made, the dictator challenged Manlius to declare, as he had promised, the persons who had concealed the pretended treasures, and the place, where they were hid; otherwise he threatened to send him to prison as an incendiary and slanderer. Manlius, instead of answering directly, extolled his own merit, and reproached the patricians with avarice and cruelty. He concluded his speech with saying, that as to the secreted treasure, the senators, who had concealed it, were better qualified than he, to discover the place. But this being only an evasion, the dictator pressed him anew, either to perform his promise to the people, or to confess that he had caluminated the senate. Manlius ^c replied, that his thus pressing him to declare the place, where the gold was hoarded, was a convincing proof that the senate had removed it beyond the reach of the most curious enquiry. Hereupon the dictator immediately ordered him to prison. We ^d have on this occasion a surprising instance of the ready submission of the Romans to the command of a lawful magistrate. The people, however seditiously devoted to Manlius, took no one step to hinder the execution of the sentence. There was not an angry expression heard, or a threatening look seen in the whole assembly. The tribunes themselves did not shew disrespect to the dictator. Only Manlius, when the lictors laid hold of him, cried out, addressing his complaints to the Gods, O Jupiter, best and greatest, O Juno, queen of heaven, Minerva, and all ye other gods and goddesses, ^e who reside in the capitol, will you suffer your champion and defender to be thus treated by his enemies? Shall this right hand, with which I drove the Gauls from your sanctuaries, be locked in chains? But these lamentations raised no disturbances among the multitude. His most zealous adherents expressed their concern only by habits of mourning, neglecting to cut their hair and beards, crouding about the doors of the prison, and there lamenting his misfortune. In this time of affliction the dictator Cossus received the honours of a triumph. But the multitude expressed nothing but a deep concern on that day of joy; some were even heard to say, that Cossus did not so much triumph over the Volsci, as over an oppressed citizen. Nothing, said they, remains to complete the general's triumph, but to have the unfortunate Manlius led before his chariot ^f in chains. In order therefore to appease the people, the senate thought it necessary to shew them some indulgence. They assembled, and of their own motion, ordered a colony of Roman citizens to be sent to Sutrium, where they allotted to every man two acres and a half of arable land. But this unexpected bounty was so far from satisfying the malecontents, that it increased their rage and jealousy. For they looked upon this liberality of the senate as an artifice to induce the citizens to abandon Manlius. So that the sedition gained ground, and the fury of the populace increased still more, as soon as Cossus's dictatorship was expired. The multitude, being now free from the dread of an uncontrollable magistrate, no longer kept within any bounds. The people surrounding the prison day and night, threatened to break it open. The senate, ^f fearing lest the incensed populace in their fury should execute what they threatened, and that Manlius being set at liberty by such violent means, should carry his fury farther than ever, thought fit to put an end to the disturbance, by releasing him them-liberty: selves. But this timorous proceeding only gave the seditious a leader provoked by the shame of his imprisonment, and incapable of following sober counsels.

DURING these seditions ambassadors arrived from the Latins, the Hernici, and from the cities of Circei and Veitra, demanding that the prisoners, taken by the dictator in the late action with the Volsci, might be delivered up to them. The different recep-

a tion they met with shews the distinction, which the Romans always made between nations in alliance with them and Roman colonies. Circaï and Velitra were upon the foot of colonies, but the Latins and Hernici only in alliance with Rome: the latter enjoyed their own laws; the former were subject to the laws of Rome. The ambassadors therefore of the Latins and Hernici were received, though their demand was rejected, nor did the Romans dispute their right of sending an embassy. But the deputies of Circaï and Velitra were ordered immediately to depart, and not appear before the people, since they had no right to send ambassadors.

b WHEN new magistrates came to be elected for the next year, the great Camillus was chosen military tribune a fifth time, the republic wanting a governor of his reputation to stem the tide of the present troubles. With him were joined Ser. Cornelius, P. Valerius, Ser. Sulpicius, C. Papirius, and T. Quinctius. The confidence of Manlius, and the strength of his faction, were now much increased by the timorousness of the senate. The mutineers met at Manlius's house, which was crowded with them day and night. There he spoke his mind without reserve, exhorting the multitude to shake off the yoke they groaned under, to abolish dictatorships and consulates, to establish an exact equality among all the members of one and the same republic, and to make themselves a head, who would govern and keep in awe the patricians as well as the people. If you judge me worthy of that honour, said he, the more power you give me, the sooner you will be in possession of what you have so long wished for.

c I desire authority with no other view, but to make you all happy. It is said, that a plot was formed to seize the citadel, and declare him king; but it is not certain that he imbarqued in so difficult an undertaking, or how far he carried his ambitious views. The senate, alarmed at the danger which threatened the republic, assembled frequently to deliberate on the best method to avert the blow. A decree was made, injoining the military tribunes to be watchful, that the republic received no damage; a form of words, which was never used but in the greatest dangers of the state, and which invested those magistrates with an authority almost equal to that of a dictator. After this different means were proposed for defeating the evil designs of Manlius. All, except the tribunes of the people, were for assassinating the author of the sedition.

d But as such an attempt would have occasioned the shedding of much blood, two of those tribunes, M. Manius, and Q. Publilius, thought it more advisable to take him off by the usual forms of law. They offered to prosecute him before the comitia, not doubting but the people, when they saw their tribunes become his accusers, would immediately desert him.

This advice was approved, and Manlius summoned to his trial before the comitia by centuries. The crime laid to his charge was his aiming at the sovereign power; and as this was a capital crime, the accused appeared before his judges in deep mourning. But neither his own brothers, nor any of his relations, changed their dress, or solicited the judges in his behalf, as was usually done by the friends of a person accused; so much did the love of liberty prevail in the hearts of e the Romans over all the ties of blood and kindred. Livy tells us, that he could not find in any author what direct proofs the tribunes brought of Manlius's aspiring to the regal power. However, he supposes that they had sufficient proofs, since nothing but the circumstance of the place, where he was tried, prevented his immediate condemnation. They could see the capitol, which Manlius had preserved, from the campus Martius, where his sentence was to be pronounced; and this sight alone abated the resentment of the centuries against the criminal; so that the people, who could neither resolve to condemn, or acquit him, put off pronouncing sentence more than once, and every time postponed this affair for three market-days. In the mean time Manlius omitted nothing that could move his judges to compassion. He produced above four hundred

f plebeians, whose debts he had paid, and whom he had delivered out of the hands of their creditors. He shewed the people thirty suits of armour, the spoils of thirty enemies, whom he had slain in single combat. He had been the first Roman who had deserved a mural crown by fighting on horseback. He had been honoured with eight civic crowns, for having saved in battle the lives of so many citizens, and had been seven and thirty times rewarded by his generals for his extraordinary valor. He had saved in battle the life of C. Servilius, when general of the horse, and had received two wounds on that occasion. But his greatest glory was his having defended the capitol against the attack of the Gauls. This important piece of service supported the criminal, notwithstanding the evident proofs of his crime. Looking often at the capitol, he called upon Jupiter and the other gods for succour, conjuring the people to turn their faces to that sanctuary, and think of the gods, who resided there, when they were going to pronounce judgment. The people, having before their eyes the very place, where, by fighting so valiantly against the Gauls, he had saved Rome, could not resolve to find him guilty. The tribunes, perceiving this, deferred the decision of the affair to another day, and appointed the place of the assembly to be in the Peteline wood, without the gate Flumentana, whence the capitol could not be seen. Then the object, which had saved Manlius, no longer dazzling the eyes of his judges, they forgot his glory, and remembered only his crime. The public welfare gained the ascendant over their gratitude, and the unhappy Manlius was condemned to be thrown headlong from the capitol itself. The sentence was no sooner pronounced than put in execution: the house, where he had held his private cabals, was razed to the ground, and it was decreed that no patrician should thenceforth dwell on the capitol, lest the advantageous situation of a fortress, that commanded the whole city, should suggest and facilitate the design of enslaving it. The Manlian family also came to a resolution among themselves, that no member of it should ever bear the prænomens of Marcus. But how inconstant is the multitude! Manlius was scarce dead, when his loss was generally lamented, and a plague, which soon followed, ascribed to the anger of Jupiter against the authors of his death.

Wars carried

Volsci.

THE punishment of the seditious Manlius neither brought any discredit upon his relations, or lessened their interest. On the contrary, his brother A. Manlius was chosen one of the military tribunes at the very next election. His colleagues were L. Valerius, Ser. Sulpicius, L. Lucretius, L. Æmilius, and M. Trebonius. During their administration, the Volsci threatened the republic with a new war; the cities of Circei and Velitrae continued in their revolt; Lanuvium itself, ever before faithful to Rome, declared against her, and all the cities of Latium seemed ready to rise in their turns. And to add to the misfortunes of the republic, the plague still raged in the city. However, the senate judged it necessary to engage the people to consent to a war. In order to this, they promised to divide the Pomptin territory among them, and nominated five commissioners to regulate the distribution of the lands, and three others to lead a colony to Nepes. But this design was not put in execution till nine years after. However, the comitia by tribes being assembled, it was decreed, that a war should be declared with the several enemies of Rome, notwithstanding the opposition of the tribunes of the people. Accordingly, an army was raised, but the plague continuing to rage, the military tribunes could not lead their troops into the field. In the mean time the inhabitants of Præneste, following the example of the other colonies, revolted, and committed great devastations in the territories of the Gabini, Tusculani, and Laticani, who continued steady in their alliances with Rome. Though these faithful allies brought complaints to the senate of the hostilities committed in their districts, yet the fathers pretended not to believe them, chusing rather to dissemble with them, than to take up arms in their present unhappy situation. But the Romans, who scarce ever suffered any attempt against their republic to escape unpunished, only suspended their resentment. For in the following military tribuneship of Sp. Papirius, L. Papirius, Ser. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, Ser. Sulpicius, and L. Æmilius, the two Papiri being sent against the Veliterni, defeated them, though joined by great numbers from Præneste, and obliged them to shelter themselves within the walls of their city. However, the generals did not think it adviseable either to attempt a doubtful siege, or to carry hostilities so far as to exterminate a Roman colony. The senate also judged it more necessary to pursue the war with vigor against the Prænestini, who had farther provoked the Romans, by assisting their irreconcilable enemies the Volsci.

THESE expeditions therefore, which were to be undertaken, made the assembled centuries cast their eyes on Camillus, and raise him a sixth time to the military tribuneship. He was indeed very unwilling to imbarque again in public affairs, being now very infirm, and apprehensive of the vicissitudes of fortune. He therefore endeavoured to decline the honour which the people had conferred upon him, pleading his age and infirmities. But the people would not hearken to his representations. We don't expect, said they, that Camillus should personally engage either on foot, or on horseback, or that he should join the bravery of the private soldier to the wisdom of the general. All

- a we now desire of him is, to assist our armies with his counsel, and command them; this is enough to make them invincible. Camillus could not help complying with their request; he accepted the military tribuneship, in which he had the following colleagues, A. Posthumius, L. Posthumius, L. Furius, L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambustus. The command of the army, which was to be employed against the Volsci, was decreed to Camillus by the senate; but it fell by lot to L. Furius to be joined with him in the command. The two generals commanded an army of four legions, consisting of four thousand men each, which marched to Sutrium, where the Volsci and Prænestini had formed a camp, and waited without fear for the Romans, being far more numerous than they, and flushed with their late success against Satricum, which they had taken, and put most of the inhabitants to the sword. Camillus, whether he waited to recover his health, for he was greatly indisposed, or to receive a reinforcement of troops, was not in haste to come to a battle. But in the mean time the Volsci appearing drawn up in battle, and provoking the Romans, the latter could hardly be restrained from sallying out of their camp, and falling upon them. Their ardor for fighting was increased by the rash discourses of young Furius, who imputed the prudent delays of his colleague to his age, which, he said, had chilled his blood. At length the Volsci not only marched out their men on their own ground near their camp, but advanced into the open fields, and carried on their lines almost to the Roman camp. This was such an insult, as neither Furius nor the legions could bear. The young general therefore addressing himself to Camillus, reproached him, that he was the only person in the army for delaying the engagement, and urged him to comply with the desires of the soldiers. Camillus answered with an air of superiority, but with great temper, that hitherto Rome had not been dissatisfied either with his conduct or success. But nevertheless, if the impetuosity, which hurried the soldiers on to an engagement, could not be restrained, he wished them success, but desired to be excused on account of his age from engaging in the foremost ranks. Furius drew up his troops in order of battle; but Camillus made it his business to prepare a corps de reserve to assist his colleague in case of distress: Furius charged with great vigor, and the Volsci, feigning to give way, drew the Roman legions half way up the hill, on which their camp was situated; then sallying out with fresh troops, by the advantage of the ground, obliged the Romans to retire in great disorder. The Volsci pursued them close to the very gates of their camp, which those brave legions, a little before so desirous of fighting, strove by a shameful flight to regain. Camillus, though greatly indisposed, no sooner heard that the Romans were defeated, than he quitted his tent, and hastening to the gate of the camp with his body of reserve, cried out to the flying legions, Is this then, Romans, the victory, you were so sure of? What god or man can you blame, but yourselves? You are come to seek for shelter in that camp, which you were so desirous to abandon. But you shall not enter it till you have repulsed the enemy. Having uttered these words, he put himself at the head of the troops, which he had kept with him in the camp, and encouraging the legions that had fled to return with him to the engagement, he obliged the enemy to retire, which was all he could do that day. But the next day he drew up his troops in the plain, and challenged the enemy to a second engagement. Furius, whom Camillus had placed at the head of the cavalry, behaved himself in the battle, which ensued, with uncommon valor. For the infantry being hard pressed, he prevailed upon his cavalry to dismount, and came so opportunely to the relief of the foot, that the numerous army of the Volsci was entirely routed, their camp taken, and their chief commanders either slain or made prisoners. Among the captives were found some Tusculans, who, as their city was in alliance with Rome, were separated from the rest, and brought before the generals. Upon examination, they declared, that they had taken arms with the consent and by the orders of their magistrates. This alarmed Camillus, who thought it necessary to go in person to Rome with the prisoners, and lay the matter before the senate. During his absence, he left the army under the command of Furius, who was now grown prudent by the ill success of his late attempt. However, it was generally believed both in the camp and the city, that the general's chief business at Rome was to accuse his colleague, whose rash conduct had like to have destroyed the army. The senate therefore was surprised to hear him speak of nothing but the revolt of the Tusculans. He was charged to punish their defection in an exemplary manner, and allowed to chuse which of his five colleagues he pleased to command with him in this new expedition. Upon which they all made interest to attend him, in order to learn the art of war under so great a general.

But the generous Camillus, to the great surprise both of the senate and army, preferred ^a Furius to all the rest, being more desirous to conceal the shame of one, who had personally affronted him, than to pursue the dictates of revenge. An instance of moderation, which gained him no less esteem and veneration than all his victories. The two generals began their march; and either the artifice of those faithless allies, or their true repentance, gave the wife Camillus a fresh opportunity of signalizing his moderation. For when he entered their territories, he found the husbandmen at work in the fields as in times of the profoundest peace, the magistrates of the city sent him provisions, and came out to meet him. When he entered the city, he found the citizens with their wives and children walking about the streets without betraying the least fear or surprise. The schools and shops were open, the markets full, and not ^b the least sign of war. The general, pleased to find the Tusculans returned to their duty, assembled the chief men of their republic, and having told them that they had found out the true secret of disarming the resentment of the Romans, advised them to send a deputation to Rome, and apply to the senate, who were the proper judges, whether their present conduct was a sufficient atonement for their past defection. Deputies were accordingly dispatched, who habited in mourning, and with their dictator at their head, addressed the conscript fathers in a suppliant manner. The senate readily forgave them, and soon after even granted them the privileges of Roman citizens (Q). Thus ended the sixth military tribuneship of the incomparable Camillus ^c.

THE military tribunes chosen to succeed him and his colleagues were, L. Valerius, P. Valerius, L. Menenius, C. Sergius, Sp. Papirius, and Ser. Cornelius, whose administration was disturbed by domestic seditions, and a foreign war. Sp. Posthumus, one of the censors, died; whereupon the other laid down his office, as the law directed, and the Romans proceeded to a new election. But as the patricians were afraid of a census, which must of course discover their riches, and excessive usury, they pretended, that there was some defect in the election, and thence took occasion to declare, that it was against the will of the gods that Rome should have any censors that year. On the other hand, the tribunes of the people used their utmost endeavours to bring on ^d a new election of censors as soon as possible. This occasioned great disturbances, during which the Prænestins entered the Roman territory, and advanced to the very gates of the city. However, the tribunes would suffer no levies to be made, till the senate had recourse to the usual expedient, in great extremities. Titus Quinctius was in all haste nominated dictator, and he appointed A. Sempronius to be his general of horse. The Prænestins no sooner understood that Rome had created a dictator, but they removed farther off, and troops were raised in the city without opposition. The enemy, hoping that the banks of the Allia would prove always unlucky for the Romans, encamped there. But their hopes proved vain, the dictator pursued them, and gave them a total overthrow. They fled to Præneste, but the dictator coming up with them before they reached that place, defeated them in a second engagement, ^e took all their strong-holds in a few days, and then appeared before Præneste itself, which capitulated. Quinctius, having thus reduced the enemy, returned to Rome, and brought with him from Præneste the statue of Jupiter Imperator, which, as an eternal monument of his glory, was placed in the capitol between Jupiter Capitolinus and Minerva. The dictator entered Rome in triumph, and then laid down his office, which had lasted but twenty-five days ^f.

(Q) He only was a Roman citizen, in the most extensive signification of the expression, who had a right of having a house in Rome, of giving his suffrage in the comitia, and of standing candidate for any office; and consequently, who was incorporated into one of the tribes. The freed-men did not enjoy all these privileges, for in the times of the republic they were excluded from dignities. The municipal towns, and Roman colonies, enjoyed the right of citizenship, which had sometimes more, sometimes fewer privileges annexed to it. The municipal cities enjoyed this privilege by a particular grant from the senate and people, without being obliged to change their own form of government. But there was this difference between them, that some of them could, others could not, either give their votes, or stand candidates for offices. This account of the municipia, and the difference between them, is agreeable to Livy, who tells us, that the inhabitants of Cære were made municipes with the right of suffrage; and elsewhere speaking of Fundi and Formia, says, that these two cities did not obtain the right of suffrage, without much application, though they had already the right of citizenship. As for the Roman colonies, they enjoyed more or fewer privileges and exemptions peculiar to Roman citizens, in proportion to their fidelity, and the services they rendered the republic.

- a THE complaints of the insolvent debtors, which still continued, occasioned this year an alteration in the government. Whether the assembled centuries divided the military tribuneship between the patricians and plebeians of their own accord, or by constraint, is uncertain; but we are told by all the ancients, that three military tribunes were chosen out of the nobility, and three out of the people. The patricians were, P. Manlius, C. Manlius, and L. Julius; the plebeians, C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. Diodorus Siculus reckons up eight military tribunes for this year, as he did for the preceding; but herein he is as much mistaken, as he is in changing Caius Sextilius's name into that of Caius Sextius. The two Manlii, without drawing lots, were appointed to command the army against the Volsci; but Rome had on occasion to repent of the choice she had made, for the two tribunes having divided their army, and incamped near each other, they sent out their cavalry to forage, without being well acquainted with the country. The enemy did not think proper to intercept, as they might, the foragers, but by a stratagem found means to draw the whole Roman army into an ambuscade. They sent to the Roman camps a Latin foldier, disguised like a Roman, to acquaint the generals, that their foragers were surrounded by the enemy, and must be inevitably cut off, if not relieved, without delay. This was giving a general alarm; the two commanders without so much as thinking of detaining the messenger, who brought this false news, marched out of their camps with precipitation, and in disorder, hurrying their troops into narrow passes, where the Volsci lay in wait for them. The Romans, though in disorder, fought with incredible bravery, and were by their desperate courage alone preserved from total destruction. But while they were wholly intent on defending themselves against one body of the enemy's forces, the other took and plundered the two Roman camps without resistance. The ill conduct of the Manlii made the senate deliberate whether a dictator should be nominated; but the enemy attempting nothing farther, it was resolved to recall the army, and its commanders. During these misfortunes abroad, a profound peace reigned at home, which, no doubt, was owing to the share the plebeians had in the government.

Three military tribunes chosen out of the people.

- THE ensuing year the centuries chose only patricians, viz. Sp. Furius, Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, P. Clælius, M. Horatius, and L. Geganius. The people therefore renewed their ancient complaints, and in order to free themselves from the oppressions of the rich, got at length two censores chosen, Servilius Priæcus, and Clælius Siculus, who took an exact account of the people and their effects, and concluded the census with a lustrum, which the Fæsti Capitolini call the nineteenth from its institution. So that nothing now remained for the censores to do, but to put an end to the disputes between the patricians and plebeians, by relieving the poor debtors, who were oppressed by the excessive usury of their avaricious creditors. But in the mean time news being brought to Rome, that the Volsci had entered the Roman territory, and were committing ravages there, the censores suspended this work, under pretence, that it was of more consequence to the state to guard against hostilities abroad, than dissensions at home. But the tribunes of the people pursued their point, and playing their usual game, opposed the levies; so that the senate was obliged to issue a decree, that no person should be disturbed for debt, or even the payment of the usual taxes, during the campaign. The levies were then made without opposition, and two armies raised, which marching by different ways into the country of the Volsci, laid it waste, and returned to Rome with an immense booty, the enemy not daring to appear in the field. The patricians no sooner found themselves free from the terror of a foreign war, but they cited their debtors to appear before the judges as usual, the tribunes of the people not being able to lend them any assistance, so long as peace continued abroad.

The country of the Volsci laid waste.

- f THE following year the centuries chose six patrician military tribunes, viz. L. Æmilius, S. Sulpicius, P. Valerius, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, C. Veturius, and C. Quinctius. During their administration, the Latins and Volsci, entering into a new confederacy against the republic, took the field, and incamped near Satricum. It is surprising, that the tribunes of the people should not lay hold of the opportunity, which the discontents and complaints of the debtors gave them, to oppose the raising of troops. The patricians had in all likelihood at this time the ascendant over the plebeians; for three armies were raised without the least opposition; one to guard the walls; another to be ready to march on the first notice; and the third, which was the most numerous, to attack the enemy in the neighbourhood of Satricum, under the command of P. Valerius, and L. Æmilius. These two generals found the Latins

and Volsci advantageously posted; but nevertheless did not delay giving them battle, which lasted till it was interrupted by so violent a rain, that neither party could keep the field. It was renewed next day, and at first with pretty equal success on both sides, the Latins, who had been long in alliance with the Romans, having learnt of them the art of war. At length the Latin battalions were broke, and put in disorder by the Roman cavalry, which occasioned the defeat of the whole confederate army. The fugitives retired in great disorder first to Satricum, about two miles from the field of battle, and from thence to Antium, with a design to secure themselves in that city. But the Antiates, not thinking their city to be in a condition to hold out a long siege, were for surrendering to the Romans on honourable terms. The rest of the Volsci, being also weary of the war, expressed an inclination to peace. Hereupon the Latins, obstinately bent upon pursuing the war, separated from them in a great rage, which they vented upon Satricum, though belonging to the Volsci, and the very place, which had served them for a retreat after their overthrow. They reduced the place to ashes, sparing only a temple of the goddess Matuta, whom the Greeks, as Plutarch informs us, worshipped under the name of Leucothea or Ino the daughter of Cadmus. From Satricum they marched into the country of the Tusculans, surprised their city, and put all the inhabitants they met with to the sword for having renounced the Latin confederacy, and accepted the privileges of Roman citizens. Great numbers of the Tusculans retired with their wives and children into the citadel, and from thence sent to acquaint the Romans with their misfortune and surprize. Hereupon an army, which had been kept ready against any unforeseen accident, was immediately sent to their relief under the command of L. Quinctius and Ser. Sulpicius, two of the military tribunes, who took the place by assault, and put all the Latins within the walls of Tusculum to the sword, not one of them escaping. The tribunes, having thus recovered the city, led back their army to Rome.

The lower sort of people oppressed by the rich.

THE peace concluded with the Antiates, and the defeat of the Latins, gave the republic an interval of rest from foreign wars. But at home the avarice of the patricians increased the misery of the poorer sort of people. As all the debtors were pressed to pay their debts at the same time, one friend could not assist the other; so that most of them, becoming insolvent, were delivered up to their creditors, and reduced to slavery; which melancholy scene so depressed the spirits, not only of the meaner plebeians, but even of the most considerable of that order, that far from standing in competition with the nobles for the military tribuneship, they even neglected to sue for the plebeian magistrates. Inasmuch that the patricians seemed to have engrossed to themselves for ever the whole administration of public affairs. But at this very crisis a trifling accident gave the plebeians an opportunity of shaking off the yoke they groaned under, of raising their drooping spirits, and carrying their pretensions higher than ever. Fabius Ambustus, an illustrious patrician, but very popular, had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, a patrician, and at this time military tribune; the younger to Licinius Stolo, a rich plebeian. It happened, that while the younger sister was paying a visit to the elder, Sulpicius came home from the forum, where he had been discharging the duties of his office, attended by a croud of clients, and by the lictors, who, thundering at the door with the staff of the fasces, as was usual, gave notice that the magistrate was coming. This noise, to which the wife of Licinius was not accustomed, put her into a fright, which her sister taking notice of, could not forbear laughing at her, seeming much to wonder at her ignorance. This laughing, how innocent soever, was construed by the younger sister as an insult upon her on account of the ignoble family into which she was married. This imaginary affront greatly provoked her, and her uneasiness was increased by the croud of people that came to pay their court to her sister, and receive her commands. Her father happening to see her, and perceiving by her countenance, that something troubled her, kindly asked what it was, and whether all was well at home. At first he could get no satisfactory answer from her, but at length prevailed upon her with soft words to disclose the secret: You have married me, said she, into a family, which is excluded from enjoying the chief honours of the republic. What a vast difference is there between my sister's condition and mine? Her father, who was very fond of her, did all that lay in his power to comfort her; Don't be uneasy, said he; you shall soon see as much state at your own house, as you was surprized to find at your

- a sister's. From this time he entered into an association with Licinius, his son-in-law, and L. Sextius, a young plebeian of extraordinary parts, who wanted nothing but a nobler birth to qualify him for the highest offices of the republic. Their design was to abolish the military tribuneship, restore the consulship, procure for the plebeians a share in that supreme dignity, and in short, to put the patricians and plebeians upon an equal foot. To compass this design, it was thought expedient, that Licinius and Sextius should begin, by getting the plebeian tribuneship for the next year, which would enable them to pave themselves a way to the highest dignities. The two candidates were accordingly admitted; and having carried that first point, they immediately bent all their thoughts and power to destroy the grandeur of the patricians, and promote the interest of the people. The first step they took was to propose a law for suppressing the military tribuneship, restoring the consulate, and requiring that of the two consuls to be annually chosen, one should always be a plebeian. In order to engage the people to pass this law, they added two others to it relating to the debts and the conquered lands. The first was this; let the interest already paid be reckoned as a discharge of so much of the principal; and let the remainder of it be paid at different equal payments. The second restrained any Roman citizen from possessing more than five hundred acres of land. Whatever lands any one held beyond that restriction, were to be taken from him, and divided among the poorer citizens. The patricians, alarmed and terrified, frequently met in order to deliberate on the most proper means to avert the impending evil; but could fix upon no other except that of dividing the tribunes of the people, and engaging one part of the college to oppose the attempts of the other. Accordingly, they gained over the other eight: Licinius and Sextius assembled the tribes several times, in order to get their law passed; but were always opposed by their colleagues, who, as soon as the law began to be read, never failed to cry out, We protest against it. These protests of one part of the tribunes against the other were often repeated at different comitia; insomuch that the two popular tribunes were not able to get their laws heard by the people. Being therefore at length tired with such frequent disturbances and interruptions, they resolved to protest in their turns. Very well, said Sextius to his colleagues, since you are so delighted with hearing the word Veto, I forbid or protest, we shall soon find occasion to repeat it too, and to the advantage of the people. Accordingly, when the centuries assembled to elect military tribunes for the next year, Sextius and Licinius cried out in their turns, We protest against it, which put a stop to all proceedings. As these two were continued in the plebeian tribuneship, they renewed the same opposition for five years successively; so that the republic fell into a kind of anarchy, none but plebeian officers being elected, that is, tribunes and ædiles. Thus the patricians were intirely excluded from the government; and this intermission of superior magistrates placed Licinius and Sextius, who were at the head of the tribunes of the people, in some degree at the head of the republic. So that Fabius's promise to his daughter may be said to have been performed from this time.

- In the sixth year Licinius and Sextius were just elected tribunes of the people a sixth time, when the inhabitants of Velitræ declared war against Rome, over-ran the lands of the republic, and even laid siege to the city of Tusculum. As the Tusculans had long been allies, and lately admitted citizens of Rome, Sextius and Licinius, ashamed to refuse them assistance, waved their opposition, and suffered an assembly to be held by an inter-rex for electing military tribunes. Six patricians were chosen, viz. L. Furius, P. Valerius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpicius, C. Valerius, and Ser. Cornelius. These having made the necessary levies, marched against the enemy, defeated them, raised the siege of Tusculum, and invested Velitræ. But as the generals, who began the siege, could not make themselves masters of the place before their year expired, six new military tribunes were created, without the least opposition, to pursue the war with the Veliterni, till their city was reduced. It happened very unfortunately for the patricians, that Fabius Ambustus, the father-in-law of Licinius Stolo, was chosen military tribune. His five colleagues were, Q. Servilius, M. Cornelius, C. Veturius, Q. Quinctius, and A. Cornelius. The promotion of Fabius encouraged the tribunes to pursue their point with more vigor than ever. They found means to gain over three of their colleagues; so that of the ten tribunes five were now for the publication of the laws, and five against it. Licinius and Sextius were now the eighth year in office; and as they were by long habit thoroughly practised in the art of managing the people, they held frequent assemblies, and in the presence of the multitude, asked the patricians the following

following questions : Whether they did not think it unreasonable, that they should a possess above five hundred acres of land, whilst a great number of the plebeians had scarce ground enough whereon to build themselves a small habitation to live in, or a sepulchre for their family ? How can you, patricians, said they, even in point of interest, account for your making your miserable debtors languish in chains, and absolutely putting it out of their power to pay you, by keeping them in prison ? And yet what is more common than to see these wretched citizens delivered up into the hands of their creditors by your courts of justice ? Are not the houses of the patricians become so many prisons ? When they perceived that these inquiries made a great impression b on the minds of the people, they immediately added, and what remedy can be provided against these misfortunes ? Since our tribunes are not able to protect us, we must introduce some of the plebeians into the highest offices. Nor will it be sufficient that plebeians be qualified by law to be consuls. Was not the number of military tribunes increased on purpose that the plebeians might have a share in that magistracy ? and yet how few have been raised to it ? And how much easier will it be for the patricians, when there are but two places to be filled, to secure them both to themselves ? It is therefore necessary, that a law be passed, laying Rome under a necessity of chusing one of her supreme governors out of the people. From that very day, and not till then, may the Roman people be deemed to have banished kings from Rome, and established liberty on a lasting basis. When the tribunes found that the people listened to these discourses with great pleasure, they added a fourth law to the three already mentioned, importing, that c decemviri should be elected instead of duumviri, to preserve and interpret the Sybilline books, and that five of them should be always plebeians. However, all proceedings on this, as well as on the other regulations, were suspended, till the reduction of Velitra, that the soldiers employed in that siege, who made so great a part of the people, might not be excluded from giving their votes, when such important innovations were on foot.

THE year expiring before the return of the army, for the siege went on but slowly, the republic chose six new military tribunes, L. Quinctius, Sp. Servilius, Serv. Cornelius, L. Papirius, Serv. Sulpicius, and L. Veturius. As for the tribunes of the people, Licinius and Sextius were still continued in their employment, the people being eager to d have these two opposers of the patrician party carry on their designs, and complete them. The Roman army was no sooner returned from the siege of Velitra, than Licinius and Sextius summoned the people once more, declaring that they would proceed to the publication of the law without any regard to the opposition of their colleagues. The patricians, seeing their case desperate, had recourse to the last refuge, which was to nominate a dictator. The man, who seemed most proper to sit at the helm of affairs in so tempestuous a season, was Camillus, and accordingly the fathers with unanimous consent raised him to that dignity the fourth time. Camillus was not very forward to accept the charge, being unwilling to quarrel with those very men, whose valor he had so often employed in war. As affairs then stood, he could expect e nothing, but either to disoblige the commons, if he succeeded, or to contribute to the ruin of his party, if he did not. However, that zealous patriot did not refuse to assist his country, when it so much stood in need of his authority. From the day he was nominated dictator, the power of the tribunes of the people ought to have been suspended. But Licinius and Sextius, without paying any regard to the dictator, continued still to assemble the people, who being met in the forum on the day appointed, the four laws were read to them. The tribes had already begun to give their suffrages in order, and the first tribe had actually voted in favour of the laws, when the dictator, full of anger and indignation, and attended by a great body of patricians, repaired to the assembly, and there seated himself in his tribunal. As the f tribunes were divided among themselves, some declaring for the laws, and others protesting against them, the dictator rising up, declared that he was come to support the privileges of the people, and that he would never suffer one part of the tribunes to deprive the other of their right of opposition. The two heads of the tribunes laughed at this artful speech, and pursuing their measures with great steadiness, continued to take the suffrages of the people, which so provoked Camillus, that he ordered his lictors to drive away the tribes from their respective places, threatening at the same time, that if they did not disperse immediately, he would assemble them in the campus Martius, inlist them, and make them march into the field without delay. On the other hand, the tribunes, to encourage the people, had the boldness g to

- a to threaten the dictator, that as soon as his dictatorship was expired, they would get him condemned in a fine of fifty thousand drachmæ, if he prevented the people from giving their suffrages. However, the tribes, terrified at the menaces of a magistrate, who had power of life and death, retired, and the comitia were postponed to another day. But Camillus, seeing the people too much enraged to be brought to any terms either by authority or persuasion, withdrew to his own house, and soon after laid down his office. Lays down his office. Some authors are of opinion, that remembering his exile, he was intimidated by the threatenings of the tribunes, and did not care to venture himself again in an affair of so much heat. But Livy tells us, that he was informed there had been some defect in the ceremony of taking the auspices, when he was created dictator, and that on this account he would not, as he was very scrupulous in these matters, retain a dignity conferred upon him contrary to the laws of his religion. The senate, after a short inter-regnum, named P. Manlius to succeed Camillus. Manlius presently discovered himself to be a great favourer of the people; for the first thing he did was to name a plebeian, C. Licinius, not Licinius the son-in-law of Fabius, for his general of the horse. Sextius and Licinius no longer doubted but they should be able to bring their designs to a happy conclusion under the administration of a dictator, who favoured them, and the protection of his general of horse, provided they could get themselves continued in the tribuneship. In order to this, they pretended, that they would no longer serve, representing to the people, that they were grown old in the tribuneship to no purpose, and that after struggling nine years with the senate for the good of the people, the only recompence they had met with was neglect and ingratitude. Shall our laws, said they, wholly tend to your benefit, and we receive no manner of advantage from them ourselves? Is it consistent with modesty for you to ask great advantages by our means, while you resolve to leave us without honour, or even the hopes of honour? To be plain then, the laws we have proposed are inseparable. If you are resolved to pass them conjointly, then continue us in the tribuneship. We shall in that case make use of the authority you shall invest us with, to finish the work we have begun. But if you are determined to pass those laws, which concern usury, and the conquered lands, without any regard to our interest, we will accept of the tribuneship no longer; and be assured that you shall not obtain your desires. The people were very earnest to pass the laws concerning the debts and conquered lands; but as to the other two laws, relating to the re-establishment of the consulate, on condition that one of the consuls should always be a plebeian, and the changing of the duumviri into triumviri, the people did not give themselves much concern about them, being well apprised, that the endeavours of the tribunes, to open a way for the plebeians to arrive at the consulate, were chiefly intended for their own private interest. The tribunes therefore would not by any means suffer the laws to be proposed separately. Appius Claudius, grandson to the famous decemvir, made a long speech, full of invectives against the two tribunes, expatiating on the insolence of the declaration they had made, viz. that the people should not be allowed to pass such laws as they approved, unless they would at the same time pass others, which they did not approve. But notwithstanding his harangue, the two tribunes were chosen the tenth time, the multitude being afraid of losing such able and zealous defenders. Not long after their re-election, they obtained the passing of that law, which related to the care of the Sibylline books. This advantage contented the people for the present; and six military tribunes, all patricians, were created for the next year without the least disturbance, viz. A. Cornelius, L. Veturius, M. Cornelius, P. Valerius, M. Geganius, and P. Manlius. In the very beginning of their administration, the tribunes used their utmost efforts to get the other laws passed, and the debates were carried to such a height on both sides, that the citizens were upon the point of taking up arms against each other, when news was brought to Rome, that a numerous army of Gauls was in full march from the coasts of the Adriatic, with a design to revenge the defeat of their countrymen. The approach of so dreadful an enemy suspended the divisions of the commonwealth. The common danger united both patricians and plebeians, and prompted them to name a dictator. The great Camillus was raised to this dignity the fifth time. He was indeed now fourscore years old, and had very lately laid down the dictatorship before the usual time. Camillus dictator for the fifth time. But nevertheless, his zeal for the welfare of his country induced him to sacrifice the remaining part of his life to the public good. He did not now plead infirmity, as he formerly had done, to decline the charge, but readily undertook it; and having made the necessary levies, marched out of Rome with all the vivacity of a young man, after he had named T. Quinctius to be his general of the horse. As soon as he came near the camp of the Gauls, which was on the banks of the Anio, he posted the smallest part of his army upon a hill of easy ascent, and concealed the rest in the vallies, and behind the rocks. The poor appearance of the Roman troops made the Gauls so confident, that they pillaged the country quite up to his very trenches, which Camillus, in order to increase their confidence, suffered them to do for several days together, keeping himself quiet within his camp, which was well fortified on all sides. At length, perceiving that a great part of the enemy were scattered in the country to pillage, and being informed, that those who remained in the camp, did nothing night and day but drink and revel, he ordered his light-armed men to march in the night-time into the plain, and to prevent the enemy from drawing up in order of battle, when they should first sally out of their camp. Early in the morning he marched down the hill with his main body, and drew them up in battalia. The Gauls hastened out of their trenches, but the light-armed Romans, falling upon them before they could range themselves in their usual order, obliged them to begin the fight in confusion. In the mean time Camillus charged them with his heavy-armed legions, and made such a slaughter in the foremost ranks, that the rest fled, and dispersed themselves over the champaign country, the Romans being possessed of the hills. Those who escaped the pursuit of the conquerors, fled into Apulia. Some writers are of opinion, that from this time the Gauls began to spread themselves into Illyricum, Pannonia, Thrace, Greece, and Asia Minor. After this victory the dictator led his victorious army against Velitra, the siege of which city had been interrupted. But the Veliterni submitted to him without making the least resistance; he returned therefore to Rome, where the honours of a triumph were decreed him both by the senate and people.

BUT the republic was in too great a ferment for the senate to consent to his abdicating the dictatorship. The patricians thought, that under the shelter of his great name, and absolute authority, they should be better able to contend with their adversaries. For the people, proud of their late victory, were more obstinately bent than ever on passing the laws, so long disputed. Sextius and Licinius, seeing themselves backed and supported by the multitude, grew more audacious than ever, and took a most extraordinary step to effect their purpose. As the dictator was one day sitting on his tribunal in the forum, an officer, sent by those tribunes, commanded him to rise and follow him, laying his hand upon him at the same time, as if he designed to seize him, and carry him away by force. Hereupon such a noise and tumult arose in the forum, as never had been heard before, the patricians, who attended Camillus, driving back the officer, and the multitude at the foot of the tribunal crying out, Pull him down; pull him down. The tribunes design was by this violence to frighten Camillus into an abdication; but he, though at a loss what to do in this exigence, would not lay down the authority, which had been legally conferred upon him. In the midst of this uproar, he took refuge in the senate-house, whither the patricians followed him; and there the pretensions of the people and their tribunes were taken into consideration. On this occasion Camillus made a vow to build a temple to Concord, in case he succeeded in quieting these commotions. As the populace could not be prevailed upon by any means to abate of their pretensions, it was resolved, after many long and warm debates, to comply with their request, and to accept the three laws in question, as the only means to extinguish their obstinate fury. Thus the government was changed, the consulate revived, and the military tribuneship laid aside for ever.

THE people having thus carried their point, the comitia were held for the election of consuls, when L. Emilius Mamercinus, and L. Sextius, the plebeian tribune, were raised to that dignity. However, when the election of Sextius came to be confirmed by the senate, the conscript fathers absolutely refused to consent to it. The new disputes between the two parties on this occasion were carried to so great a length, that the people were ready to leave Rome, and separate themselves from the patricians, as they had formerly done. All the wisdom of a dictator universally esteemed was therefore necessary to bring about an accommodation; and Camillus found out an expedient, to which both parties agreed. The consuls, and military tribunes, who long supplied their places, were generals of the Roman armies, and at the same time judges of civil

- a affairs; but as they could not always attend to the latter branch of their office, being commonly during the summer in the field, Camillus's expedient was to separate this function from the consulate, and to create a judge, with the title of Prætor, to whom it should be appropriated. He advised the senate to suffer one consul to be chosen annually out of the plebeians, on condition that the prætors should be alway patricians. This motion was agreed to by both parties, the election of Sextius was confirmed, and all feuds and dissensions in the republic laid aside (R).

- TRANQUILLITY being thus re-established, the senate, in gratitude to the gods, The great ordered the great games to be celebrated. These shews formerly lasted only three games. days; but now a fourth was added to them; and on that account their name was b changed from ludi magni, or great games, into that of ludi maximi, or the greatest games. The present ædiles refused, for what reason we know not, to make the necessary preparations for the great games, tho' that was a branch of their office. Hereupon the young patricians cried out, That since the affair in question was to take care of the worship of the gods, they should think it no dishonour to be chosen ædiles. The dictator accepted the offer, and proposed to the people the establishing of two patrician ædileships, which they agreed to. These patrician ædiles, from the ivory chair, called sella curulis, had the name of ædiles curules, and were of greater account, The curule being curule magistrates, than the plebeian ædiles. Their business was to take care of ædiles.
c the temples, theatres, games, markets, tribunals of justice, and the repairing of the city walls, and also to see that no novelty was introduced into religion. In after-ages they examined the fables, or pieces written for the stage, and seem to have been the judges of other writings. To them the generals of armies, upon their return, delivered the corn and provisions taken from the enemy, as they did the prisoners to the prætor, and the money to the quæstor. Nothing now remained but to mark out a place for the temple of Concord, which Camillus had vowed. It was built at the The temple of expence of the public, upon an eminence at the foot of the capitol; so that it was seen Concord. from the forum, and the places where the assemblies were held, and justice was administered. Thus ended a year so glorious for Camillus. He had overcome the most formidable enemies of Rome, restored peace to the republic, and calmed the people, d without exasperating the nobility. Full of glory therefore and of years, he laid down the dictatorship, wholly bent on spending the small remainder of his days in the repose and tranquillity of a private life.

- THE ensuing year all continued quiet both at home and abroad, except that the tribunes of the people complained, and could not bear, that for one plebeian consul granted to the people, the patricians had got three curule magistrates, viz. a prætor, and two ædiles. Their complaints, backed with the murmurs of the people, made an impression on the senate; and the patricians consented, that the curule ædiles should be chosen out of the plebeians every second year. Afterwards they left the people at full liberty to chuse them every year out of either body. These establish-e ments being once made, Rome enjoyed a profound peace under the administration of the new consuls, L. Genucius a plebeian, and Servilius Ahala a patrician. This year a dreadful plague broke out, which swept away great numbers; among the rest one censor, three tribunes of the people, and one curule ædile; but the most fatal stroke of all was the death of the great Camillus, who was much regretted by all ranks Death of Ca- millus.

(R) The prætorship was then looked upon as the second dignity in the republic, the prætor being elected in the comitia by centuries, and under the same auspices as the consuls; so that they were in a manner colleagues. The consul had the management of political and military affairs. The prætor was the chief magistrate concerned in the administration of justice. Before the establishment of the prætorship, the consuls were called prætores; nay, the dictator himself assumed the title of prætor maximus, the word prætor being derived from the Latin verb præire, signifying to go before: Hence the old Latins called their commanders prætores. At first one prætor only was appointed. Afterwards, that is, about the year of Rome 401, another was added; and then one of them applied himself to the administration of justice among the citizens, with the name of prætor urbanus, while the other decided the differences which arose amongst foreigners, with the title of prætor peregrinus. Upon the taking of Sicily and Sardinia, two more prætors were created to assist the consuls in the government, and as many more upon the intire conquest of Spain. Sylla increased their number to eight; Julius Cæsar, first to ten, and afterwards to sixteen; and the second triumvirate to sixty-four. From this time we meet sometimes with twelve prætors, and sometimes with eighteen; but, in the declension of the empire, they were reduced to three. When the number of the prætors was thus increased, the prætor urbanus undertook the cognizance of private causes, and the others that of crimes; whence they were also styled Quæstiores. Besides these, there were also provincial prætors, whose business it was to administer justice in the Roman provinces, and command the troops there in time of war, till their office, which was annual, expired.

of people. He was deservedly styled a second Romulus, the first having founded, ^a and he restored the city. He is said never to have fought a battle without gaining a complete victory, never to have besieged a city without taking it, and never to have led an army into the field, which he did not bring back loaded both with glory and booty. He was a zealous patriot, and tho' persecuted by his ungrateful country, would never hearken to his just resentments. The necessities of the public no sooner obliged the people to have recourse to him, than forgetting the affronts he had received, he took upon him the conduct of the most difficult and laborious undertakings. He was a patrician by descent; but not actuated by party-zeal, his love for the public being the only rule of his conduct. He favoured the plebeians, when the interest of the public required him to do so, but without flattery or self-interest. ^b He had nothing in view but to do every one justice, and put an end to the dissensions which weakened the republic; so that he left his country in the enjoyment of a perfect tranquillity at his death, by means of the equality he had wisely introduced, and the just balance he had settled between all orders of men in the republic. In short, Rome may be said to have furnished the world with many noble patterns of probity; but none perhaps more perfect than that of the incomparable Camillus.

THE Roman republic, at the time of Camillus's death, had scarce gained any increase of territory, except on the other side of the Tiber, in the country of the Hetrurians; nor did her jurisdiction even there reach far beyond Veii and Cære; so that it was confined within six or seven leagues of the capital. Ever since the taking and ^c sacking of Rome by the Gauls, her allies had been continually wavering in their fidelity. The eternal jealousies between the nobility and people retarded their conquests, and revived the hopes of the nations they had conquered. The tribunes of the people were ever opposing the enterprizes of the consuls or military tribunes. The senate had often recourse to a dictator, and then the experience of the Roman troops, and their valour, made them victorious; but the return of domestic seditions gave the people, whom they had conquered, an opportunity of shaking off the yoke. Thus were the Romans, without interruption, running in the same round of wars against the same enemies, without reaping any advantage from their conquests. Such was the state of Rome, when C. Sulpicius, and C. Licinius Stolo, were raised to the consulate. ^d The first was a patrician, and the latter the famous plebeian tribune, son-in-law to Fabius, who, jointly with his colleague Sextius, had first contrived the four laws, then maintained them, and at length, in the ten years he had been tribune, obtained the publication of them. And now the promise which Fabius had made to his younger daughter, that she should see the same honours paid to her husband, which she had beheld with envy paid to the husband of her elder sister, was fulfilled. She had the pleasure to see for a whole year the lictors with their fasces march before her husband, and to have her house adorned with those ensigns of the supreme power and authority.

As the plague still continued to rage, the Romans had recourse to an old superstition ^e called lectisternium. This was a religious entertainment made for the gods in their own temples, where tables were spread, and beds placed round them, on which the gods, according to the Roman fashion, were to lie, and eat. The beds were placed near the altars, and strewed with leaves and odoriferous herbs, as well as the temples; whence this ceremony had the name of lectisternium, that is, a strewing of a bed. The statues of Jupiter and the other gods were laid upon these beds, as if they had been to partake of the feast. The goddesses were placed on chairs, after the manner of the Roman women, this being thought the more decent posture for their sex; but as the ceremony of the lectisternium did not remove the plague, the superstitious Romans ^f endeavoured to appease the anger of the gods, by instituting new sports, which were called scenici, from their being represented on a scene, that is, a stage built in the shade. The performers were brought out of Hetruria, in the language of which country bister signified a player; whence came the Latin word bistrion. These bistriones or actors danced to the flute, and kept time with their motions and gestures; but their dances, in these early times, were not accompanied by any verses or discourses. Afterwards the Roman youth imitated these foreign dances, and mixed such jokes and raillery with them, as were suitable to the gestures and postures they mimicked. This mixture of dances and merry verses were very agreeable to the people, which prompted some to undertake the composing of verses for the stage; but the first speakers fell into the corrupt taste of the Fescennini, a people of Hetruria, who threw rude and ^g

- a unpremeditated jokes at one another, without any order or regularity. These were soon succeeded by satires written in verse, and set to the flute; which satires were repeated with suitable gestures. Some years after, Livius Andronicus turned the satires into regular plays; and then the farces, which had made people laugh, were despised (S).

- THE scenic plays, which were introduced at this time, were performed in a part of the circus, near the banks of the Tiber, which happening to overflow, the people concluded, that the new remedy was not efficacious to appease the wrath of heaven. They therefore revived an old religious ceremony, which was said to have proved effectual in the like calamity. This was, the driving of a nail by a dictator into that part of the wall of Jupiter Capitolinus's temple, which divided it from the chapel of Minerva under the same roof. This odd ceremony was borrowed from the Volsinenses in Hebruria, who reckoned their years by nails, which they drove into a temple of the goddess Nortia or Fortune. When Brutus and Horatius Pulvillus were consuls, immediately after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the Romans built the famous temple of Jupiter, Juno and Minerva, and resolved to mark down in it, and thereby transmit to posterity, the number of years, which had passed since the foundation of Rome; but as they were then unacquainted with the numeral letters, they drove as many nails into the wall of the temple, as there had passed years since their city was founded. Every year afterwards, on the ides of September, the chief prætor, or consul for the time being, drove a nail into this wall, which shewed the year of his consulship. Livy tells us, that the law, which enjoined this ceremony, was written in antique characters, and obsolete words, and fixed up in the chapel of Minerva, whom the Romans looked upon as the inventress of numbers. This ceremony of driving the nail was afterwards transferred from the consuls to dictators, as magistrates of greater dignity and power; and as it had been long discontinued, it was thought necessary to revive it at this time, some of the old people reporting, that it had formerly put a stop to a violent plague. A dictator was accordingly named for the performing of this ceremony, and the person raised to that dignity was T. Manlius, who, from his haughty spirit and imperious air, was surnamed Imperiosus. He chose L. Pinarius Natta for his general of the horse, and, with great pomp and solemnity, drove the nail into the wall of the temple; but the proud dictator, unwilling to have the whole business of his office confined to one religious ceremony, ordered troops to be raised, and even forced the citizens, tho' worn out with long sickness, to enlist themselves, under pretence, that the Hernici were preparing to shake off the Roman yoke; but as he had been nominated dictator to perform a religious ceremony, and

(S) However, the Roman youth revived these farces, and acted them at the end of their serious pieces. When the professed actors had finished their parts, some young Romans came upon the stage masked, and began to repeat merry verses as formerly, but such as were free from obscenity. These pieces were first brought from Atella, a city of Campania, and called exodia, that is, verses not belonging to the play. The Roman youth never suffered the professed actors to bear any part in their exodia, for fear of dishonouring them; so that the persons who acted these pieces, were not liable to the penalties inflicted on the histriones. Their names were not blotted out of the tribes, in which they were incorporated; nor were they excluded as infamous persons from serving in war. In short, they were not upon the foot of actors hired to entertain the public. The profession of an actor was indeed honourable among the Greeks. Æschines acted on the stage of Athens in his youth, and yet became one of the greatest orators of his time, and equalled Demosthenes himself (9). Aristodemus, tho' an actor, was sent on an embassy to Philip king of Macedon, in the name of the republic of Athens (10). But this was not the case with the Romans. Cornelius Nepos shews us the difference in his preface, where he says, that in Greece it was no dishonour to a man to appear upon the stage in the habit of an actor; whereas among the Romans it was infamous, and unworthy of an honest man. Hence Tully says of Roscius the comedian, that he seemed to be the only man of his profession who deserved to be encouraged, and have a numerous audience, adding, that to mean an employment was unworthy of so honest a man, and that he deserved a more honourable station, and more suitable to his probity (11). The professed actors could not be incorporated in any tribe, and consequently had no right of suffrage. None, who acted on the stage, were capable of serving in the legions, or bearing any civil or military employment. A senator, if he acted but once on the stage, was immediately degraded; and a knight forfeited all his privileges. An actress was infamous, and subject to the same laws as common prostitutes. These punishments were decreed, and inflicted by an edict of the prætor; As prætor, says Ulpian, Qui in scenam prodierit, infamis est (12). But the actors of the Atellana were not comprised under this law, the Roman nobility confining the acting of these performances to themselves. If any actor in these pieces did not perform his part well, the people did not oblige him to unmask, which they had a right to do with respect to the professed actors.

not to command an army, the tribunes of the people repelled force with force, and at length obliged him to lay down his office; which he had no sooner done, than he was cited by M. Pomponius, one of the tribunes, to answer before the people for the violence and cruelty, which he had exercised over the citizens; for he had imprisoned some, and caused others to be barbarously whipped. He was also accused of treating inhumanly one of his own sons, by name Titus, whom he had confined to the country, obliging him to work among his slaves, for no other reason, but because he was of slow parts, and had an impediment in his speech. This shews, that the absolute power which fathers, by the laws of Rome, had over their children, was kept within bounds by the superior authority of the magistrates. Manlius had, according to custom, a copy of the heads of his accusation given him, and the usual time of three market-days, or twenty-seven days, allowed him to prepare for his defence. All were highly exasperated against so severe a dictator, and so barbarous a father, except the son himself, who, moved with filial piety, and under the greatest concern that he should furnish matter of accusation against his father, resolved upon a most extraordinary method to deliver him. Early in the morning he left the country-house, to which he had been banished by his unnatural father, came to the city, and stopped nowhere till he got to the house of Pomponius, who was yet in bed. However, Manlius was immediately admitted by the tribune, who did not doubt but he was come to discover to him some new instances of his father's severity. After they had saluted each other, Manlius desired a private conference; whereupon every body was ordered to withdraw. Then the young man drawing out a poniard, and holding it close to the tribune's throat, threatened to stab him that moment, if he did not swear to desist from the prosecution he was carrying on against his father. Pomponius was so terrified, that he readily swore whatever the other was pleased to dictate, and thinking himself obliged even to comply with an involuntary obligation, dropped the prosecution. The people was not displeased at the bold enterprize of a son in favour of a father, by whom he had been used in the basest manner. They all extolled his piety, and not only, for his sake, pardoned the father, but the same year raised him to one of the most important posts in the Roman army, that of legionary tribune *.

This year the Hernici revolted; but while the Romans were preparing to bring them back to their duty, an unforeseen accident threw the city into the utmost consternation. The earth opened all on a sudden in the midst of the forum, probably by the violence of an earthquake. The citizens having laboured in vain to fill up the chasm by throwing abundance of earth into it, had at last recourse to the augurs, who declared, that they would never be able to compass their design, till that thing, in which the strength and power of the Roman people consisted, was thrown into the place; and that such a victim would secure the eternal duration of the Roman state. While they were all consulting about the meaning of this oracle, M. Curtius, a brave young patrician, having first asked them, Whether Rome had any thing more valuable than arms and valour? armed himself completely, and mounting a horse richly caparisoned, came to the forum, and, in the sight of the people, who were assembled in crouds, devoted himself to death for his country, and rode full speed into the gulph; an action, which some historians would willingly magnify with a miracle; for they tell us, that the ground immediately closed; but the most judicious writers own, that the opening was afterwards filled up with earth and rubbish *. After M. Curtius had thus devoted himself, the Romans did not doubt but they should soon humble the Hernici: but they were disappointed; for Genucius, the first plebeian consul, who had ever been intrusted with the command of an army, fell into an ambuscade, and was killed, after the legions, seized with a sudden fright, had abandoned him. Some historians seem to doubt, whether he did not fall by the hand of a Roman; at least, it is certain the melancholy news of his defeat did not so much grieve the patricians, as raise their pride. They exclaimed in all places, that the misfortunes of Rome were owing to the violation of human and divine rights in the consecration of a plebeian consul. To wipe off the disgrace, which Rome had received, it was resolved to create a dictator. Servilius, the surviving consul, named to that office Appius Claudius, the most inveterate enemy of the plebeian party, that he might repair the losses, which the republic had sustained by the mismanagement of a plebeian consul. While the dictator was raising a second army, the Hernici, elated with their late success, advan-

- a ced with great boldness to besiege the vanquished in their camp; but C. Sulpicius, who had been lieutenant to Genucius, and had, after the defeat and death of his general, collected the scattered troops, rallying out upon them, obliged them to return to their own intrenchments. Appius soon after arrived with a new army, which he had just raised in the city, and having exhorted his men to imitate the bravery of Sulpicius, and the soldiers under his command, prepared for a general engagement. The Hernici, hearing that a dictator was created to carry on the war against them, exhausted their country of men to reinforce their army, none, who were able to bear arms, being excused from taking the field. Out of this multitude they chose three thousand two hundred men, whom they divided into eight cohorts, of four hundred
- b men each. This was the flower of the enemy's troops; and their generals, to distinguish them from the rest, and by that means engage them to exert themselves in battle, not only allowed them double pay, but exempted them from all the laborious offices of the army. The dictator no sooner began to draw up his men, but the Hernici did the same, in a plain which lay between the two camps, and was about three miles over. This was the field of battle; and never were forces more equal, or the victory more doubtful. The Roman knights engaged the eight cohorts; but, notwithstanding their utmost efforts, the enemy kept both their ground and ranks. The bad success of this first onset made the Roman cavalry change their way of fighting. They all dismounted, and, with permission of their general, posted themselves in the first line, at the head of the infantry. The eight cohorts still made head
- c against them with incredible bravery, the rest of the soldiers in both armies being idle spectators of a battle fought by the flower of the two nations. The victory was a long time doubtful, many falling on both sides; but at length the better fortune of the Romans, as Livy expresses it, prevailed; the cohorts first retreated in good order, and then, being warmly pressed, gave way, and fled in confusion. The conquerors pursued the enemy to their camp; but night coming on hindered them from attempting to force it. The next morning the Romans found it abandoned, the Hernici having retired under the walls of their cities. This victory cost the Romans dear; for they are said to have lost a fourth part of their army, and a great number
- d of knights. The dictator returned to the city; but did not obtain a triumph, the people being in all likelihood unwilling to bestow that honour on the most declared enemy of the plebeian party.

The Hernici defeated by Appius Claudius dictator.

- NOTWITHSTANDING the misfortune of Genucius, the centuries chose another plebeian consul, viz. C. Licinius Stolo a second time, and with him C. Sulpicius, surnamed Peticus. As the most violent enemy of the plebeians had been nominated dictator the last year by the patricians, so the most enterprising adversary of the nobility was now raised to the highest office by the suffrages of the people. The two consuls entered the enemy's country together; but, finding no enemy in the field, they besieged and
- e took Ferentinum, formerly a city of the Volsci, which had been given up to the Hernici by the Romans. After the surrender of this place, they took the road to Rome; but, when they came to Tybur, they were surprized to find the gates of that city shut against them. Upon inquiry, they found, that the Tyburtes were in secret intelligence with the Gauls, who were again in motion. The apprehension of a war with so formidable an enemy, made them determine to create a dictator. T. Quinctius Pennus was the person nominated to that dignity, and he appointed Serv. Cornelius to be his general of the horse. While the Romans were preparing for the war, the Gauls advanced as far as the banks of the Anio, within three miles of Rome. The Roman army, under the command of the dictator, immediately advanced to meet them, and encamped on the opposite banks of the river. Both armies lay near one
- f of the bridges of the Anio, which neither of them offered to break down, lest it should seem to argue fear; so that this bridge became the scene of several combats between the champions of both parties. One day a Gaul of gigantic stature, advancing upon the bridge, cried out with a loud voice, Let the bravest man in the Roman army enter the lists with me; the success of our combat shall determine which is the more valiant nation. His extraordinary size and fierce looks struck the Romans with such terror, that, for a long time, not one in the whole army offered to accept the challenge. At length young Mamilius, who had so remarkably signalized his piety to his father, touched with a just sense of the affront offered to the Roman name, quitted his post, and flying to the dictator, asked leave to encounter the Gaul. Tho' I were sure of victory, ^a said he, I would not fight this proud Gaul without your orders; but, if you will give me leave, I will make this huge beast know, that I am of the blood of that Manlius, whose valour proved so fatal to the Gauls on the capitol. The dictator, who had been very uneasy that no Roman had accepted the challenge before, readily complied with the request of the brave youth. Go, Manlius, said he, and humble the pride of this insulting enemy. Revenge the cause of the city where you first drew your breath, as successfully as you relieved him to whom you owe it. Upon this the young Roman, having changed his round buckler, which he wore as a Roman knight, for a square one, and armed himself with a short sword, fit both for cutting and stabbing, advanced against the Gaul, who was strutting about in his armour, and making an ostentatious ^b shew of his strength. Both Romans and Gauls retired to their respective posts, leaving the bridge free for the two champions. The Gaul, says Livy, began the combat, by discharging a great blow with his long sword at Manlius, which made much noise, but did no execution. Hereupon the young Roman, dexterously slipping under his enemy's shield before he recovered his heavy sword, stabbed him in two places; so that he soon fell, and covered, to use Livy's expression, a vast piece of ground with his huge body. The conqueror cut off his head, and without troubling himself about the rest of his spoils, only seized a golden collar, which he tore from his neck, and, bloody as it was, put it about his own, in token of victory; and hence he got the surname of Torquatus, which he transmitted to his posterity. The event of this combat ^c so discouraged the Gauls, that they abandoned their camp in the night, and retired into Campania.

The Gauls
defeated.

As soon as the consuls for the new year entered upon their office, the one, viz. C. Patellius Libo, was sent with an army to punish the Tyburtes; and the other, M. Fabius Ambustus, was ordered to march against the Hernici, who persisted in their revolt. The two consuls had no sooner left Rome, than the Gauls appeared again, and venturing to advance into the neighbourhood of Rome, blocked up the gate Collina. However, the senate did not think proper to recal either of the consuls. A dictator was created to make head against those dangerous enemies, and the consuls pitched upon Servilius Abala, who having named T. Quinctius to be his general of ^d horse, and armed all the youth that were left in Rome, came to an engagement with the Gauls under the very walls of Rome. As the Romans fought in sight of their parents, wives and children, who were on the ramparts, they behaved with extraordinary valor. The battle was very bloody, and the field all covered with dead bodies; but at length the Gauls gave way, and fled towards Tybur, where the consul Patellius fell upon them, with a design to prevent them from taking refuge in that city: but the Tyburtes sallying out, covered their retreat; so that they escaped, but not without great loss, the pursuit of the conquerors. On the other hand, Fabius fought the Hernici with success, and overcame them in a general action. Thus was the republic this year victorious on all sides. The honours of a triumph were chiefly ^e due to the dictator; but he either despising them out of pride, or declining them out of modesty, on his return to Rome, highly commended the two consuls both to the senate and people, and then, without mentioning his own exploits, abdicated the dictatorship. Patellius solicited for a triumph, and obtained it; but his colleague Fabius, who had conquered the Hernici, was content with an ovation.

The Hernici
subdued.

THE next year Cn. Manlius Imperiosus and M. Popilius Lenas being consuls, the Tyburtes came in the dead of the night to the very gates of Rome, and alarmed the city, the people believing that the Gauls were come again; but the return of light discovering only a small number of Tyburtes, who were come rather out of a bravado, than with any concerted design to surprize the city, the consuls marched out at two ^f different gates, and easily repulsed the bold aggressors. The consuls for the next year were, C. Fabius Ambustus, and C. Plautius Proculus. The latter marched against the Hernici, and totally subdued them; but the former, being sent against the Tarquinienses, who had entered the Roman territory in arms, was defeated by them. The Tarquinienses took three hundred and seven Roman prisoners, and, to shew their contempt of the republic, first treated them in a barbarous manner, and then cut their throats. The disadvantage Fabius had suffered, was followed by a new alarm from the Boii, who appeared all on a sudden in the plain of Præneste, and from thence

- a advanced as far as Pedum, a city of Latium, between Tybur and Tusculum, and not above ten miles from Rome; but the Latins, perhaps tired with seeing their country almost every year plundered by the Gauls, renewed very seasonably their alliance with Rome, and furnished her armies with the same quota of men they had formerly stipulated to grant. With this reinforcement the republic was in a condition to make head against all her enemies. As the consuls were both employed elsewhere, Sulpicius, surnamed Peticus, was created dictator, to conduct the war against the Gauls. The dictator named M. Valerius for his general of the horse; and having chosen out the best legions in the two consular armies, he took the field, and marched against the enemy. Both armies were very impatient to come to a battle; but the dictator
- b restrained the impetuosity of his men, being well apprised, that the Gauls must necessarily be soon distressed for want of provisions, since they had brought none with them, nor prepared any magazines; but the soldiers began to complain of their general's conduct, and even threatened openly to attack the enemy without his leave, or to quit the camp, and march back to Rome. They came in crowds to the dictator's quarters, and demanded access to him, having named Sextius Tullius to be their speaker. Sextius was an officer of distinguished courage, and had been for seven years last past the first captain of the first corps of the army. The dictator was therefore surprized to see a company of seditious men headed by an officer of his rank and reputation. Sextius, in the name of the army, reproached the dictator with the disadvantageous opinion he seemed to entertain of his troops, and pressed him to lead them against the enemy. His discourse was followed by the acclamations of the multitude, who all cried out for leave to arm, and march to battle. The dictator could not help complying with their request, and therefore promised to lead them out against the enemy the next day. Then taking Sextius aside, he asked him, What could have put him at the head of a faction? The brave centurion replied, That it was not want of respect to his general, or ignorance of the martial laws; but to divert the unruly multitude from chusing a leader, who might have done something injurious to the dignity of the dictator. He then exhorted Sulpicius to yield to the desires of those impetuous men, who were strongly inclined to seize the first opportunity of fighting without his leave. The dictator followed his advice; and having acquainted his men that he designed to engage the enemy the next day, he ordered all the muleteers of the army to put upon their mules the furniture of war-horses, to mount them, and marching up the hills in the night-time, to conceal themselves in the woods, till they received further orders. This, as Frontinus informs us, was then a new stratagem; but often practised afterwards both by the Romans and other nations. As soon as it was day, Sulpicius led his troops out of their entrenchments, and marched up against the Gauls, who did not expect to see the Romans appear so soon in the field. He drew up his army so, that all the legionaries, who used to attack the enemy at the head of their legions, with a sort of darts called pila, succeeded one another in files. As soon as one company of them was within reach of the enemy, they discharged their darts, and instantly retired, leaving a space of ground between them and the Gauls. Then a second company took the place of the other, and did the same. Thus four companies succeeded one another, discharging their darts, and falling back, without suffering the Gauls, who depended chiefly on their long swords, to come near them. This repeated discharge of darts, which put the enemy into some confusion, was no sooner over, than the rest of the legions closed in with them sword in hand. The Gauls, tho' in some disorder, sustained the attack with great bravery, and even obliged the right wing of the Romans to give ground. Then the dictator, who was there in person, flying to the foremost ranks, Is this, said he, the effect of your promises? Will all your boldness in the camp end in a shameful flight in the field? Follow your general, if you are true Romans. Having thus spoke, the brave dictator advanced sword in hand at the head of his legions, which, confounded with shame, threw themselves upon the enemy's battalions, and fought like men in despair. There was indeed more of a savage fierceness than true courage in this attack; but it succeeded. The Gauls were put to flight, and the Romans pursued them; but the enemy rallied near their right wing, which kept its ground, tho' attacked with great vigor by the dictator, at the head of his victorious troops. Then Sulpicius sent orders to his muleteers to leave their ambuscade, appear in the plain, and march towards the camp of the Gauls, who no sooner saw them, than they quitted their ranks, and hastened in confusion to the defence of their camp; but M. Valerius, general of the horse, who had posted himself near the enemy's camp, after the defeat of their left wing, intercepted their flight; so that they had no retreat left but to the mountains and woods. Valerius pursued them close with his cavalry, and put most of them to the sword, the whole plain being for some miles covered with dead bodies. This victory left the republic no enemies in Latium. The Hernici were subdued; the Gauls vanquished, and cut in pieces; and the Latins quieted. In short, Rome was now in as flourishing a condition as it had been before it was taken by the Senones. Sulpicius, when he had been honoured with a triumph, which he well deserved, resigned the dictatorship, and the government returned into the hands of the two consuls for the year ^b. During their administration, a law was passed, at the motion of Paterculus the tribune, against openly canvassing for votes; for the novi homines, or upstarts, more ambitious of offices than the patricians themselves, not only solicited the suffrages of the people in the forum, but even went to the country fairs and other public meetings to buy voices.

taken by the Romans.

UNDER the succeeding consuls C. Marcius Rutilus, and Cn. Manlius Imperiosus, the interest of money, which before was arbitrary, was, at the motion of Duilus and Mænius, two tribunes of the people, settled at one per cent. The patricians, displeased with a law, which set bounds to their avarice, in order to revenge themselves on the plebeians, cited the famous Licinius Stolo to answer for a breach of one of the four laws, which he himself had so zealously promoted, forbidding any citizen to possess more than five hundred acres of land. Licinius actually possessed a thousand; but, to cover his breach of the law, had emancipated his son, or given up his authority over him, and made him the nominal possessor of one half of them; but, as this emancipation was made purely to evade the law, he was convicted of fraud before the prætor, and fined ten thousand asses of brass, that is, about thirty-two pounds sterling ^c. This same year the consul Marcius defeated the Privernates, who had declared against Rome the year before, and took their city. His colleague Manlius marched against the Falisci, a people of Hebruria; but gained no considerable advantage over them. Nothing was talked of at Rome, but his attempt upon the constitution. He had ventured to assemble the tribes near Sutrium, and made a law in his camp, whereby it was enacted, that, for the future, the twentieth part of the price of every slave should be paid into the public treasury. The law passed by the favour of the conscript fathers, notwithstanding its irregularity; but the tribunes of the people thought this step might be of dangerous consequence to the public liberty: The tribes, said they, when assembled in a camp, and by an armed consul, are not free to vote as they please; besides, the soldiers, who are sworn to obey their generals, will of course give their suffrages as their commanders direct them. To prevent therefore these inconveniencies, the tribunes got a law passed, forbidding any magistrate to assemble the comitia any-where but in Rome, under pain of death. However, the law for paying the twentieth part of the price of every slave was not repealed. The two consuls for the following year, M. Fabius Ambustus, and M. Popilius Lænas, were employed, the first against the Falisci and Tarquinienses, and the latter against the Tyburtes. Popilius, not finding the enemy in the field, ravaged their country, and carried off a great booty; but Fabius, after having gained some advantage over the united forces of the Falisci and Tarquinienses, was obliged to retire, all Hebruria taking up arms against him. Upon his retreat, a numerous army of Hebrurians advanced as far as the salt-pits on the banks of the Tiber. Their approach obliged the Romans to have recourse to a dictator. The consul Popilius named him in the absence of his colleague, and, as he was a plebeian himself, he pitched upon C. Marcius Rutilus, the plebeian consul for the last year. The dictator likewise chose a plebeian, C. Plantius Proculus, for his general of horse. The patricians, highly provoked at these promotions, did all that lay in their power to prevent the dictator from having such things decreed him as were necessary for the war. But the people, on the other hand, hastened the preparations for the campaign; so that every thing being got ready sooner than usual, the dictator took the field without delay, marched straight to the enemy's camp, surprized and forced it, nothing being able to withstand the Roman soldiery under the conduct of a plebeian dictator, the first who had ever been raised to that high office. Historians do not tell us what number of Hebrurians perished in the battle; but leave us to guess at the multitude of the slain by the number of

- prisoners; for we are told, that eight thousand were taken in this famous action. This victory well deserved the honours of a triumph, which the patricians, jealous of the glory of a plebeian dictator, opposed to the utmost of their power: but the people, in spite of their opposition, did him justice; so that he entered Rome in triumph the day before the nones of May^d. Triumphs over the Aetrurians.

- THE time drawing near for electing new consuls, and there being none but plebeian magistrates in Rome to preside in the comitia, the nobility raised difficulties against holding them. They pretended, that it was not lawful for any plebeian, tho' a dictator, to preside in them. The pontifical laws, said they, require, that the election of chief magistrates should be consecrated by auguries, which belong of right only to the patricians. And for this time they prevailed: the dictator, and the consul Popilius, were excluded on account of their birth. As it was necessary to have some magistrate of the first rank to preside at the election, the republic had recourse to an inter-regnum, during which it was governed by six patricians, viz. Q. Servilius Ahala, M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, Sulpicius, and L. Æmilius. These governed by turns, and managed their affairs so well, that the plebeians, in the very year in which they triumphed most, were excluded from a share in the government; for C. Sulpicius Peticius, and M. Valerius Poplicola, both patricians, were raised to the consulate, tho' for the last eleven years one of the consuls had been a plebeian. The tribunes exclaimed against the election, as contrary to the laws; but Fabius, who presided in the comitia, silenced them, by quoting a law of the twelve tables, whereby it was enacted, that only the last edict of the people should be of force, and render all preceding ones null. From thence he inferred, that the Roman people, by giving their votes to two patricians, had repealed the law, which divided the consulate between the patricians and plebeians. The consuls of this year took Empulum from the Tyburtes; but did nothing else worth mentioning. When the time came for new elections, they declared, that they would not resign their dignity into any hands, but those from which they had received it. We hold the consulate, said they, of the senate and patricians, and therefore think ourselves bound, both in honour and gratitude, not to resign it into any hands but theirs. This extraordinary proceeding occasioned such commotions in the campus Martius, that the greater number of the people cried out, that they ought not only to dissolve the assembly, but leave Rome, as they had done formerly. Many actually retired, leaving only the least passionate behind them, who gave their suffrages for two patricians, M. Fabius Ambustus, and T. Quinctius Pennus, who took the field without delay against the Tyburtes and Tarquinienfes. The former were totally subdued by Fabius, and the latter defeated in a bloody battle by Quinctius, who, to revenge the cruelty they had formerly committed on three hundred and seven Roman soldiers, put all the prisoners to the sword, except three hundred and fifty-eight, whom he sent to Rome, where, by order of the senate, they were first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. These victories gained the Romans such reputation among the Italian nations, that the Samnites sent an embassy to Rome, to propose an alliance with the republic. The ambassadors were kindly received by the senate, and the alliance concluded, the Samnites engaging to furnish the republic with troops, when required, and the Romans promising to protect them against their enemies both at home and abroad. Thus Rome advanced by degrees to that immense grandeur to which at last she attained. Empulum taken from the Tyburtes, who are totally subdued.

- THE patricians had gained such an ascendant over the people, that they kept the consulate in their own hands, and promoted to that dignity C. Sulpicius Peticius, and M. Valerius Poplicola. The former marched against the Tarquinienfes, and the latter against the Volsci, who were anew in motion. The consuls had scarce taken the field, when Valerius was recalled to nominate a dictator, the senate being informed by Sulpicius, that the Carites were disposed to take part with the Tarquinienfes, and that the Falisci had already joined them. Valerius named T. Manlius Torquatus to the dictatorship, tho' he had never been consul, a necessary step to that supreme dignity; but Valerius regarded nothing but the merit of Manlius in the choice; and his nomination was not opposed, tho' contrary to law. The new dictator, having named Cornelius Cossus to be his general of horse, was preparing to march against the Carites; but they, being sensible they could not make head against the brave Torquatus, sent deputies from all their towns to implore the clemency of the Romans. The senate referred the The Samnites enter into an alliance with Rome.

deputies to the people, who being reminded by them, that Cere had been the asylum of the vestals, when Rome was taken by the Gauls, received them into favour, and granted them a truce for an hundred years. Then the dictator led his army against the Falisci; and finding no enemy in the field to contend with, laid waste their country, and returned to Rome, where all things continued quiet, till the time came for the new elections. The dictator, who was to preside in the comitia, had formed a design of excluding the plebeians; which the tribunes being aware of, opposed the assembling of the centuries, till the expiration of the dictatorship, which ended with the consuls year. Whereupon the republic fell into an inter-regnum; and those who then governed, found both parties irreconcilable. The disputes grew to such a height, as threatened an open revolt; which so terrified the fathers, that they suffered at length the Licinian law to take place, and one of the consuls to be chosen, agreeable to that law, out of the plebeians. The persons elected were, P. Valerius Poplicola, a patrician, and C. Marcius Rutilus, a plebeian, who was now raised to this office a second time ^a.

The payment of debts regulated.

THE first care of the new consuls was to regulate the payment of debts, the only obstruction to a thorough union of the patricians and plebeians. They no longer considered the relief of debtors as a private affair, but as a general concern of the public; and therefore chose out five men of known probity, and great experience, to take an account of all the debts of the plebeians. These five were called bankers, and had the command of the public treasury to enable them to discharge their commission; which they did to the satisfaction of both parties. Those who, out of sloth and idleness, had plunged themselves in debt, either borrowed money of these bankers, giving the treasury security for it, or deposited the value of their debts in their creditors hands in effects, which were valued by the bankers. By this means the greatest part of the debtors were relieved, without doing injury to any person, and with little loss to the public. ^b

TRANQUILLITY being thus established at home, the city was suddenly alarmed with a report, that the twelve leucumonies of Hetruria were entered into an alliance against the republic, and ready to enter her territories. Hereupon Julius Julius was named dictator, and he appointed L. Æmilius, surnamed Mamercinus, to be his general of the horse; but the report proved groundless, and was in all likelihood artfully spread by the patricians, that they might have an opportunity of placing a man at the head of the republic, who was able to prevent the execution of the Licinian law. And indeed Julius made use of all his credit and authority to get two patricians chosen consuls; but he was so warmly opposed by the tribunes, that both he and the consuls went out of their office, before the comitia could be assembled for a new election. In the inter-regnum which ensued, C. Sulpicius Peticus and M. Fabius governed successively, and found means to bring the people to a compliance with the patricians. Two patricians were chosen, Sulpicius himself, and T. Quinctius Cincinnatus. During their administration, the Tarquinienses and Falisci, being quite tired out with the calamities of war, submitted to the republic, and obtained a truce for forty years. And now the peace the Romans enjoyed giving them a favourable opportunity to elect new censors, the day was fixed for the comitia to proceed to this new election. None but the most illustrious patricians had ever enjoyed this dignity; but nevertheless C. Marcius Rutilus, thinking himself, tho' a plebeian, qualified for any post in the republic, after he had been twice consul, and once dictator, stood candidate for this office, and, in spite of all opposition of the nobles, was elected, with Cn. Manlius a patrician. The commons being willing to give a new lustre to an office, to which a plebeian had just been promoted, Ovinus, one of their tribunes proposed a law, depriving the consuls of the prerogative of filling up the senate, and lodging this power in the censors. The law passed; and what is very extraordinary, this important change was made in the republic without the least disturbance. And now the censorship being open to the plebeians, the patricians, in order to secure the consulate to themselves, and prevent the Licinian law from being put in execution, prevailed upon the consuls to name a dictator to preside at the next election, imagining, that he would be more respected in the comitia, and have a far greater influence over the centuries, than the consuls. The person raised to this dignity, was Fabius Ambrytus, a man distinguished by his birth, his employments, and his personal merit. He had ^c

- a been thrice consul, and honoured with a triumph but three years before. He chose for his general of the horse the famous Servilius Abala, a man no-ways inferior to himself; but notwithstanding these precautions, M. Popilius Lanus, a plebeian, who had been consul twice already, was promoted to this dignity. His colleague, L. Cornelius Scipio, falling sick soon after his election, the plebeian consul, to the great mortification of the nobility, became the sole general of the Roman troops. The Gauls at this time having entered Latium anew, and laid waste their country, were advancing towards Rome. Popilius therefore ordered levies to be made; and so great a number of soldiers enlisted themselves on this occasion, that two armies were immediately raised, one to guard the city, under the command of M. Valerius Poplicola, who was then prætor, and the first in that employment who was seen at the head of an army.
- b Popilius marched with the rest of the troops to stop the progress of the Gauls, who, upon his first appearance, offered him battle; but Popilius, who was well acquainted with their temper, and therefore willing to let their first heat abate, kept within his camp. The Gauls, thinking the Romans afraid, attacked them while they were raising their works; but were repulsed with great loss. The Gauls however returned the same day to the charge; and, in the beginning of this second attack, Popilius, exposing himself too much, was wounded with a javelin, and carried out of the field to have his wound dressed. This accident suspended the ardor of the Romans; but as soon as their general appeared again, they renewed their courage, drove the Gauls
- c into the plain, and there, drawing up into the form of a wedge, penetrated into the main body of the enemy, and obliged them to retire with precipitation. The general did not think proper to pursue the fugitives; but having taken and plundered their camp, led back to Rome his victorious army, enriched with the spoils of the conquered enemy. He was decreed a triumph at his return, which was put off till he was recovered of his wound. As his colleague Scipio continued likewise indisposed, the senate desired the two consuls to name a dictator to preside at the approaching election. In compliance with the request of the conscript fathers, they named L. Furius Camillus, son of the great Camillus, to that dignity, who appointed P. Cornelius Scipio to be his general of the horse. These two patricians used all their interest to make the election fall only on men of their order, and carried their point; for Camillus himself was chosen one of the consuls, and Appius Claudius, surnamed Crassus, another patrician, was appointed his colleague ^f.

- In the beginning of their consulate, the Gauls, who had fled for refuge to the hills of Alba, appeared again in great numbers on the sea-coast of Latium; and at the same time some Greeks, from what part Livy does not determine, made a descent on the coast, which the Gauls were plundering. The latter, jealous of their booty, opposed the Greeks at their landing, and obliged them to retire to their ships; however, they continued hovering about the coast, while the Gauls laid waste and plundered it from the mouth of the Tiber to Antium. The republic made the necessary preparations to drive such dangerous enemies farther off; but in the mean time Appius, one of the consuls, dying, the whole management of the war was committed to Camillus, whose
- e very name was looked upon as a good omen in a war with the Gauls. His first care was to raise a numerous army, consisting of ten legions, and amounting to forty-five thousand men. Of these legions he gave four to L. Pinarius the prætor, ordering him to guard the sea-coast against the Greeks; two he left to defend the city, and with the other four marched himself against the Gauls; but as he had no design to come to a pitched battle with them, he encamped in the Pomptin territory, a country full of marshes and rivers. While both armies continued inactive, a fierce Gaul, remarkable both for his stature and the richness of his armour, challenged the bravest man in the Roman legions to a single combat. M. Valerius, a legionary tribune, great-
- f grandson to the famous Valerius Volusus, accepted the challenge, and is said to have obtained the victory by means of a raven, which perching upon his helmet, and flying in the face of the giant during the fight, so blinded him with his wings, that it was easy for his rival to stab him. But the Gauls, despising the advantage Valerius had gained by the help of a bird, crowded round the body of their dead champion, to hinder the Roman from stripping him of his armour. Upon this the Romans hastened to the assistance of Valerius, which naturally led both armies to a battle, in which the Gauls were intirely defeated. Those who escaped, took their way through the country of the Volsci, and entering Campania, crossed the plains of Falernum, penetrated as far as Apulia, and retired to the coasts of the Adriatic sea. As for the brave Valerius, the general rewarded him with a crown of gold, and two oxen, a considerable present at that time. He ever after bore the name of Corvus, which signifies a raven, and his posterity that of Corvinus; which distinguished this branch of the Valerian family from all the rest.

quatus dictator

THE consul, having thus freed Latium from the Gauls, joined his army to that of the prætor Pinarius, in order to drive away the Greek pirates, who infested the coast; but the obstinacy of those adventurers, who, tho' they durst not land, continued still at sea, obliged him to keep the field longer than he expected; so that in the mean while the time for electing new consuls drawing near, he was obliged to nominate a dictator to preside in the comitia. The person he promoted to that dignity was the famous Manlius Torquatus, who chose Cornelius Cossus to be his general of the horse. As the dictator was charmed with the exploit of Valerius, so much resembling his own, and had a great influence in the elections, he prevailed with the people to chuse him one of the consuls, tho' he was but twenty-three years of age, and too young even to have a place in the senate. His colleague was Popilius Lænas, who now entered upon this office the fourth time. As for Camillus, he continued with his army on the coast, till the Greeks, wanting fresh water and other necessary provisions, and not daring to come ashore, put out to sea.

A treaty of navigation and commerce made with Carthage.

WHILE the Romans enjoyed a profound peace both at home and abroad, under the administration of the two consuls mentioned above, ambassadors came from Carthage to Rome. The Carthaginians were the first nation the Romans were acquainted with out of Italy, and with whom they entered into an alliance. As early as the first year after the expulsion of the Tarquins, when Brutus and Valerius were consuls, these two nations entered into a treaty, chiefly in relation to navigation and commerce. This treaty was yet to be seen in Polybius's time, on the base of a column in the ancient Roman language, which, as that writer tells us, was so different from what was spoke in his time, that those who were most conversant in the Latin tongue, could not, without much study and labour, understand it. The Greek historian has translated the words of this treaty with all possible fidelity, and transmitted it to us. It was conceived in these terms:

THERE shall be peace and friendship between the Romans and the allies of the Romans, and between the Carthaginians and the allies of the Carthaginians, on the following terms: The Romans, and the allies of the Romans, shall not sail beyond the Fair Promontory, unless constrained by tempest, or by an enemy. If, at any time, they shall chance to be forced ashore, they shall not be permitted to buy any thing, nor take any thing, but what they want for repairing their vessels, or for their sacrifices. None shall make longer stay ashore than five days. Those who shall come as merchants, shall pay no other duty than what is allowed to the common crier and register. These two officers shall make oath of what shall be bought and sold in their presence, as well in Africa as Sardinia. If the Romans shall chance at any time to visit such places in Sicily, as are subject to the Carthaginians, they shall not suffer any molestation whatsoever; but shall have justice done them in all things. The Carthaginians shall attempt nothing against the Ardeates, the Antiates, the Aretini, those of Laurentum, Circii, and Terracina, or, in a word, any of the Latins whomsoever, who shall be in subjection to the Romans; nor shall they attempt any of their towns that are under the Roman protection. And in case they should at any time make seizure of such towns, they shall restore the same to the Romans without any damage. They shall not build either fort or citadel in the country of the Latins; and in case they should at any time invade their lands in an hostile manner, they shall not remain there one night.

THE promontory here called the Fair Promontory, lay, according to Polybius, north of Carthage, and near it. The Carthaginians, as the same author observes, did not allow the Romans to sail beyond it, that is, to the southward of it, not caring that their coasts should lie open to all comers, lest the fruitfulness of the land, and the happy situation of the cities, should tempt them to settle there. Such was the first treaty Rome made with Carthage at the birth of the republic; and now when Valerius Corvus and Popilius Lænas were consuls, the Carthaginians crossed the sea,

- a came to Rome, and concluded a second treaty, differing from the former in some particulars. It was couched in the following terms: The Romans and their allies shall have friendship and confederacy with the people of Carthage, the Tyrians, the inhabitants of Utica, and their allies, on condition that they exercise no hostilities, carry on no traffic, build no towns beyond the Fair Promontory, Mastia, and Tarseium. If the Carthaginians shall take any town in the territory of the Latins, which is not under the protection of the Romans, they shall enjoy the pillage thereof; but the town shall be restored, and put into the hands of the Romans. If the Carthaginians shall make any captives among those Latins, who, tho' not subject to the Romans, are in league or amity with them, and shall bring such captives into any Roman port, b and these captives shall be discovered and challenged by any Roman, they shall be set at liberty. The Romans shall be treated in the same manner in the ports belonging to the Carthaginians. If the Romans shall put in at any port belonging to the Carthaginians, to take in water or other necessities, not any of those, who are comprised in this treaty of friendship, shall offer them any injury or molestation; if otherwise, it shall be deemed a public breach of the treaty. As to Sardinia and Africa, the Romans shall have no commerce there; they shall neither traffic, build towns, nor so much as attempt to land on those coasts, unless to buy necessities, and refit their ships. If they shall be compelled by tempest or otherwise to take refuge in such ports, they shall depart in five days. The Romans shall be allowed to traffic in any of the towns c of Sicily, under the dominion of the Carthaginians, and in the city of Carthage itself, where they shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as the Carthaginians themselves; and the Carthaginians shall have the like treatment in Rome ^h.

- THE whole employment of the present consuls was to negotiate this treaty with the Carthaginians. They were succeeded by C. Plautius Hypseus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, who had been twice dictator, but now for the first time consul. During their consulship the republic enjoyed a profound peace, which left them no room to gain themselves any glory by feats of arms. They therefore endeavoured to promote the public welfare by wise regulations: they reduced the interest of money from one per Cent. to half per Cent. and allowed the debtors, by paying down one fourth of their d debts, three years to discharge the remainder, by annual and equal payments. A new war with the Volsci broke out during the administration of the succeeding consuls Valerius Corvus, now a second time consul, and C. Pætelius Libo. Valerius defeated the enemy, took from them Satricum, and burnt it, sparing only the temple of the goddess Matuta. He was honoured with a triumph, in which four thousand captives e marched before his chariot. In this consulship the secular games, which had been instituted in the year of Rome 297, were celebrated for the second time. The next year's consuls, M. Fabius Dorso, and S. Sulpicius Camerinus, named L. Furius Camillus to be dictator a second time, on occasion of a war with a new enemy, the Aurunci, a petty nation near the confines of Latium, on the coast of the Tyrrhenian sea. Furius overthrew them in battle, and at his return built a temple, which he had vowed, during the action, to Juno Moneta. This name had been given to the queen of the gods a little before the taking of Rome by the Gauls. It was pretended, that from the temple of Juno had come a voice, accompanied with an earthquake, and that the voice had warned the Romans to avert the evils that threatened them, by sacrificing a sow with pig. Hence she was called Moneta, from the verb monere to warn. This temple was built on the capitol, in the place where the house of the rebellious Manlius formerly stood, and afterwards became a public mint. Hence the medals, which f were stamped for current coin in trade, were called moneta, or money. The year following, the Romans imagining, that the goddess, agreeable to her name, admonished them by prodigies of the impending wrath of the gods, C. Marcius Rutilus, now consul a third time, and T. Manlius Imperiosus a second time, appointed P. Valerius to be dictator for the solemnization of the festival called feria Latina.

THE dictator having brought the republic to an inter-regnum, for some reason not mentioned by the historians, the centuries chose two patricians, as they had done the year before, viz. M. Valerius Corvus a third time, and Cornelius Cossus, surnamed Arvina. During their administration, the enmity between the Romans and Samnites broke out. A city at that time scarce known to the Romans sowed the seeds of discord, and changed the alliance between the two nations into lasting hatred. The Sidicini, a people of Aufonia, on the other side the Liris, being attacked by the Samnites, and a not able to defend themselves with their own strength, had recourse to the people of Campania, who took up arms in favour of their oppressed neighbours, it being their interest to stop the progress of so powerful an enemy. Hereupon the Samnites, having a prospect of greater advantages in the conquest of the Campanians than of the Sidicini, turned their arms against the former; and as they were an effeminate people, defeated them in two pitched battles, and threatened to besiege the city of Capua, their metropolis. In this distress the magistrates had recourse to Rome, whither they sent an embassy to implore the assistance of the republic; but the senate returned to their humble address the following answer: The senate of Rome think you worthy of their protection; but we must have regard to our ancient friendship with the Samnites. b We cannot therefore take arms in your favour; but we will intreat the Samnites, our friends, to put an end to their hostilities. The Capuan deputies had hitherto spoken only of an alliance and confederacy with the Romans; but now, not being satisfied with the answer they had received, pursuant to the powers with which they had been invested, they made this further declaration: Since the Romans scruple to attack openly the Samnites, contrary to the faith of their treaties, let them at least not be afraid to defend their own property against the unjust usurpations of their enemies; the people of Campania, the city of Capua, our lands, our temples, every thing we have divine and human, we absolutely give and surrender to you. From this time therefore all our losses will be yours. This donation in due form, by ambassadors c authorized to make it, was of great weight with the conscript fathers. They did not think their alliance with the Samnites obliged them to refuse it; and therefore without delay dispatched ambassadors to intreat the Samnites as friends to spare a province which belonged to Rome. In case the Samnites were not prevailed upon by these gentle methods, the ambassadors were directed to give them notice in the name of the people and senate of Rome, to quit the country immediately. But the Samnites, a proud and warlike people, were so far from being intimidated by the majesty of the Roman name, that their magistrates sent for the commanders of their troops, and ordered them, in the presence of the Roman ambassadors, to go instantly and ravage Campania. This insult filled both the senate and people with indignation. All other d business was laid aside, that they might apply themselves wholly to the making preparations for a war, which was declared with all the ceremonies instituted by Numa on such occasions. Two armies being soon raised, it fell to the lot of Valerius to march with one into Campania, while Cornelius with the other carried the war into Samnium. The stress of the war lay at first on the brave Valerius, who posted his troops on mount Gaurus in Campania, and continued in that advantageous situation, till his men, by frequently skirmishing with the Samnites, had learnt their way of managing their arms. At length he assembled his troops, and having encouraged them in a long speech not to be afraid of a new enemy, to remember their ancient valour, and to gain the honours of a triumph for one descended from the great e Poplicola, marched out of his camp, and drew up his men in battalia. As the two armies were pretty equal in numbers, the victory was long disputed without any considerable advantage on either side. The Roman cavalry attempted in vain to break the enemy's battalions. Upon which Valerius, putting himself at the head of the infantry, and encouraging the legions to tread in his steps, threw himself into the midst of the Samnite cohorts, and being followed by his legionaries, made a dreadful havock. The dead lay in heaps round the enemy's standards; yet their cohorts kept their ground, being resolved to defend themselves to the last. At length Valerius ordered the Roman cavalry to attack the enemy in flank; but they stood the shock, till night put an end to the conflict. After the battle was over, the Romans f owned, that they had never engaged a more stubborn or more intrepid enemy; and would not have known that they had gained the victory, had not the Samnites deserted their camp in the night, and abandoned it to the conquerors.

overcome by
the Romans.

While the brave Valerius was thus signaling his valor in Campania, his colleague Cornelius, having imprudently left his camp, which was advantageously posted near Saticula on the confines of Samnium, marched his troops through a mountainous country into a forest, out of which there was but one passage, and that through a deep valley, which, as well as the wood, was lined with the enemy's forces; so that he found himself, when it was not in his power to alter his march, surrounded by the Samnites. This threw the consul into the utmost consternation; but it fortunately happened, g that

- a that he had a brave officer among his troops, who drew him out of the danger: This was the famous P. Decius Mus, who was yet only a legionary tribune, and who afterwards signalized his love for his country in an eminent manner. The prudent tribune, observing an eminence at a distance, which commanded the camp of the Samnites, and had been neglected by them, proposed to the consul that he might be detached with a small body to take possession of it. He added, when you see me posted there, be no longer under any apprehensions of the enemy, but continue your march. The Samnites will not dare to attack you, or dispute your passage, when exposed to our darts. As for us, we shall, by the assistance of the Roman valour, and the gods our protectors, find means to disengage ourselves from the enemy, and rejoin you. The general approved of the design, and detached a small body of troops, under the command of Decius, who taking his way through the wood, concealed his march so well, that the enemy did not discover him till he was near the post, which he was going to seize; and then the sight of the Romans climbing up the rock was such a surprize to them, that they could come to no determination, being in suspense whether they should attack the consul or Decius. In the mean time the Roman general, taking advantage of this irresolution, marched out of the valley without molestation. Decius did not doubt, but the enemy would either attack him on his hill, or at least shut up all the avenues to it; but when he perceived that they neither came to fall upon him, nor attempted to surround him, and cut off his retreat, he took a view of all the avenues
- c to the hill, and placed centinels at them, with orders to return silently to the main body at the second watch of the night. When at that hour all his men were re-assembled, he laid before them the necessity of leaving the place where they were, and put it to the vote, whether to stay for day-light, or march off immediately, and force a way through the enemy while they were asleep. The latter being universally approved, Decius put himself at the head of his troop, and marched down the rock in great silence. They had got half way through the enemy's camp, when a Roman soldier, striking his foot against the buckler of a Samnite, awaked a centinel, who gave the alarm in that quarter. The Samnites immediately ran to arms, not knowing whether it was Decius and his troop, the consul and his army, or some Samnite of the camp,
- d who had disturbed their rest. In the midst of this universal confusion, Decius ordered his men to give a great shout, which doubled the consternation of the Samnites, while the Romans gained the plain, and made their escape, none of the Samnites daring to follow or attack them. When Decius came near the consul's camp, as it was not yet day, he ordered his men to halt, telling them, that they deserved to enter the camp in a more glorious manner than in silence and darkness. The next morning the whole army marched out to meet that brave troop, which had saved their lives at the peril of their own, and conducted those valiant men in triumph to the general's tent, who having summoned all his soldiers to hear his harangue, was beginning to make the panegyric of Decius; but the brave tribune, liking better to give his general good
- e advice, than to hear his own praises, advised him to march away immediately, without losing time in harangues, and surprize the camp of the enemy, who, in all probability, had sent out detachments in quest of him. This advice was followed; the Romans surprized the Samnites rambling about the fields, and pursued them to their camp, which the consul took and plundered, after having cut in pieces above thirty thousand of them. As soon as Decius returned to the camp, the consul resumed his panegyric; but as words were not a sufficient acknowledgment of his merit, he honoured him with all the military rewards that were ever given to a subaltern. Besides a crown of gold, he had a present of a hundred oxen, and a white bull with gilt horns. As for the soldiers of his detachment, the consul assigned them a double
- f quantity of corn during their life, and gave each of them two saga or military habits. The legions likewise signalized their gratitude to their deliverer, by putting on his head an obsidional crown, which it was customary among the Romans to bestow on a general who relieved them when besieged. This crown was made of the grass growing in the place, and called corona obsidionalis. And now the detachment itself, which Decius had brought safe out of the danger into which he had led them, thinking themselves obliged in gratitude to bestow some mark of distinction on their leader, crowned him with a crown of oak-leaves, which was called the civic crown, and thought the most honourable of all military rewards. Thus, loaded with three crowns at once, he offered up the white bull in sacrifice to Mars, by way of thanksgiving, and distributed the hundred oxen among the companions of his danger, and sharers of his glory. The rest of the legions made likewise a present to the company, which had a followed Decius, consisting of some pounds of meal, and measures of wine¹.

The campaign did not end with this victory. The Samnites, who had been routed by Valerius, having raised new forces, appeared before Suessula, a town situated between Nola and Capua. Valerius hastened to the relief of the Suessulani; and, in order to deceive the enemy, encamped his troops within as narrow a compass as he could, hoping they would attack him in his intrenchments; but the Samnites, judging that the Romans must soon want provisions, kept quiet in their camp. Thus both armies continued some time inactive; but at length the Samnites themselves being distressed the first for want of provisions, Valerius attacked their camp, while the greater part of their forces were dispersed about the country in quest of necessaries, forced it, and made a great slaughter there, while his cavalry chased the several detachments which were abroad foraging. We are told, that the Roman soldiers brought to their general above forty thousand of the enemy's bucklers, the Samnites having thrown them away, that they might not incumber them in their flight. One hundred and twenty standards were likewise taken from the enemy in this action. Thus both consuls returned to Rome, where they were honoured with a triumph. The successes of this glorious campaign gave a new lustre to the republic, both among the neighbouring and distant nations. The Falisci changed the truce, which they had made with the Romans, into a treaty of alliance. The Latins, who had taken up arms, with a design to employ them against the republic, if she had been worsted in this war, turned their hostilities against the Peligni, a Samnite nation, as it were to assist the Romans, whom they had really intended to betray. And lastly, the Carthaginians sent to compliment the republic on her success, and made a present of a crown of gold of twenty pounds weight to Jupiter Capitolinus, by way of thanksgiving for her victories. This year ended with a census, by which it appeared, that the number of Romans able to bear arms, amounted to one hundred and sixty thousand. The ceremony closed with a lustrum, which was the twenty-second since its first institution by king Servius.

The following year C. Marcius Rutilus was elected the fourth time to the consulate, and with him Q. Servilius Ahala. The latter encamped in the neighbourhood of Rome, while the former marched into Campania, where he found a general depravation of manners in some cohorts of Roman soldiers, who had been left in Capua all winter. He even discovered, that they had entered into a plot among themselves to drive the natives out of Campania, and to seize that delicious country for themselves. To disappoint this scheme, he artfully contrived to send away the most mutinous and enterprising, without treating them disgracefully, or letting his design appear. At length the soldiers suspecting it, and being alarmed with the apprehension of punishment, one whole cohort deserted, and posting themselves advantageously near Anxur, in a narrow pass between the sea on one side, and high mountains on the other, were soon joined by great numbers of malecontents from the city and the camp. As they were still at a loss for a leader, they surprized by night in his bed one T. Quinctius, an excellent commander, who had retired some time since from public life to his farm, and forced him to go along with them as their general to Rome. Their approach so terrified the city, that a dictator was named to march an army against the mutineers. The person pitched upon was Valerius Corvus, who met them eight miles from Rome, came to a parley with them, and being extremely beloved by the soldiery, prevailed with them to submit. However, the rebels, besides a general pardon, which was granted by the senate, and confirmed by the people in comitia, obtained some concessions from the republic. They insisted, that the pay of the cavalry, which was then three times as much as the foot received, should be reduced; and this merely out of revenge, because not one single man of that corps had joined them in their revolt. Some writers tell us, that several laws were passed at the request of the mutineers, viz. 1. That no man, who was a legionary tribune one year, should be a centurion the next. The rebellious soldiers pressed the passing of this law, purely to revenge themselves on one P. Salinius, a strict observer of discipline, who had been a legionary tribune and a centurion alternately for several years together, and had ever opposed the seditious councils of the revolters. The senate therefore refused at first to consent to a law, which was wholly dictated by revenge against an officer, who had strictly

- g adhered to his duty. But Salonius himself, earnestly intreating the conscript fathers to have more regard to the welfare of the public, than to his honour, at his request the law passed. 2. That all usury should be abolished in Rome, and every Roman forbidden to lend money upon interest. 3. That both the consuls might be chosen out of the plebeians. 4. That no man should bear the same office twice within ten years, or hold two different employments the same year. If the plebeian faction gained these articles at this time, it is evident, that the rebel army must have been exceeding numerous and formidable.

- THE Romans, by these condescensions to the rebels, lost credit among their neighbours. Privernum revolted, but was quickly reduced by C. Plautius Hypsæus, now the second time consul. His colleague L. Æmilus laid waste the country of the Samnites, who were so weakened by the two late overthrows, that they dared not appear in the field; but sued for peace and an alliance with Rome. These being obtained, they turned their arms once more against the Sidicini, who being refused succour even upon the terms of being subject to the republic, gave themselves up to the Latins already in arms to recover their independence. The Campanians, forgetting the benefits they had received from the Romans, and their engagements with the republic, followed the example of the Sidicini, and joined the Latins. An army formed of these three united nations, entered Samnium, laying waste all before them; but not being able to bring the Samnites to a battle, soon retired for want of provisions. Their retreat gave the Samnites an opportunity of sending ambassadors to Rome to complain of her suffering the Latins and Campanians, her allies and subjects, to commit hostilities in Samnium. The senate did not intend approve of the hostilities the Latins had committed, but were ashamed to own, that they had no longer power over them. The consul Plautius therefore in the name of the senate returned the following answer: The Campanians are our subjects, and we will therefore force them not to molest you. But as for the Latins, our treaty of alliance with them does not oblige them not to enter into any war without our consent; and therefore we can promise nothing in relation to them. This answer left the Samnites in a melancholy uncertainty, offended the Campanians, and, as it seemed to betray a sense of weakness in the Romans, raised the spirits of the Latins to such a degree, that they imagined they could now demand nothing which the Romans would dare to refuse them. They secretly combined with the Campanians to fall upon the Romans, though in appearance their preparations were only against the Samnites. But the senate being informed of their intentions by some friends to Rome among them, resolved to prevent the enemy, and in order thereto to bring on the election of new consuls before the usual time. Accordingly, they obliged the present consuls to abdicate; but some religious scruples being raised concerning the holding of the comitia by consuls deposed before the expiration of their year, the government was reduced to an inter-regnum, and two presidents, Valerius Corvus; and M. Fabius, were named to govern in the mean time successively, each five days in his turn. While the latter was in office, the people were assembled in the campus Martius; and it being of the utmost importance to chuse two able men to sit at the helm in so tempestuous a season, the centuries pitched upon the famous Manlius Torquatus, and Decius Mus, the former a patrician, and the latter a plebeian. The republic promised herself a continued series of prosperity under the administration of these two illustrious magistrates. Torquatus was a man of an inflexible severity in keeping up the military discipline; Decius had a more humane temper; and both colleagues were equally famous for great piety towards the gods, and a tender love for their country. In the beginning of their consulate, Alexander, king of Epirus, and brother to Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, came into Italy on the invitation of the Tarentines, to assist them against the Brutians. This prince hoped to have subdued all Italy with the same ease as his nephew had reduced Persia; but was not so successful in his scheme, having to do with more warlike nations. He gained indeed some small advantages over the Lucanians and Brutians at his first coming; but soon found it necessary to court the friendship of the more powerful nations of Italy, and particularly of the Romans, with whom he concluded an alliance of friendship ^h.

AFTER this the two consuls made it their whole business to prevent the revolt of the Latins; and the first step they took, in order thereto, was to summon ten of the Latin chiefs to appear at Rome, and give an account of their preparations for war.

The Latins revolt, and join the Campanians.

The two consuls march against the Latins.

The Latin council sent one L. Annius, a man of great credit among them, with ten more to Rome, to demand as a condition of renewing the alliance between the two nations, that one of the consuls, and half of the senate, be for the future chosen out of the Latins. This demand was rejected with indignation, and war immediately declared. The consuls ordered levies to be made, and having formed two armies, consisting intirely of Romans, they marched through the territories of the Marfi, entered the country of the Peligni that way, and incamped in Campania at the foot of mount Vesuvius, at a small distance from the enemy's camp. The night before the battle, which soon ensued, both consuls are said to have dreamt the same dream. A man of a gigantic stature, and majestic mien, appeared to them, and told them, that the victory was decreed to that army of the two, whose general should devote himself to the Dii Manes. When it was day the two consuls communicated their dreams to each other. Perhaps they had courage enough to feign an apparition, which must cost one or the other of them his life, purely to raise the courage of their soldiers; for the love of the Romans for their country, and their desire of glory, were apt to suggest to them such schemes. But be that as it will, it is pretended, that the aruspices made such discoveries in the entrails of the victims, as confirmed the dreams. Hereupon it was agreed in a council of war, that Manlius should command the right wing, and Decius the left, in the ensuing battle; and that he, whose troops should first give way, should devote himself to save his country, and rush into the midst of the enemy's battalions. In the same council of war, consisting of the two consuls, all the lieutenant generals, and legionary tribunes, it was likewise determined, that the ancient discipline should be strictly observed in the present war, and that no officer or soldier should dare to fight the enemy without express orders, or out of his rank, upon pain of death. This was done, because the enemy they were now to engage with spoke the same language, were armed after the same manner, observed the same way of fighting (T), and were personally acquainted with most of the Roman officers, having served

(T) The order of battle, in which the Romans drew up their army before an engagement, in Mausolus's time, was as follows: They formed the whole body of their troops into three lines, distinguished by the names of Hastati, Principes, and Triarii. The Hastati, who composed the first line, were so styled from the javelins called Hasta, which they bore. The Principes, who made the second line, were so called, according to Varro (13), because in more ancient times they were placed in the front of the battle, and began the attack. They were in those times the richest of the Roman youth. The Triarii were so named, because they made the third line. They were commonly Veterans, and the main strength of the army. The Principes were armed with swords, and the Triarii with javelins, called Pila, whence they borrowed the name of Pilani Milites, and the soldiers of the two lines before them that of Milites Antepilani. In after-ages, the Hastati, Principes, and Triarii, seem to have bore much the same arms, since Polybius has not divided them in his description, but speaks of them all together. Each of these three lines was anciently intire without any intervals between the manipuli or companies that composed it. Neither were there any void spaces left between the lines; so that the whole body of infantry was close and compact, like the Macedonian phalanx. But at the time of this war with the Latins, there was a space of fifty foot between the first and second lines, and of an hundred foot between the second and the third. And as spaces were left between the lines, so likewise between the different manipuli, or companies of each line, these companies being divided from each other by spaces thirty foot wide; so that in a line of ten manipuli, there were nine of these spaces. But these openings were not so disposed as to yield a direct passage to the enemy from the front of the army to the rear. The manipuli of the second line stood behind the openings of the first, and the manipuli of the third behind those of the second; so that the order of the whole resembled that of trees called by gardeners Quincunx, which is elegantly compared to it by Virgil (14). When the Hastati happened to be overpowered, they retired in good order, still facing the enemy, toward the Principes, fell into the intervals of their ranks, and, together with them, renewed the fight. If the Hastati and Principes thus joined were too weak to sustain the fury of the onset, they fell back into the wider intervals of the Triarii, and then all together being united into one close body, made another effort much more vigorous than any before. If this assault proved ineffectual, the day was intirely lost as to the foot, there being no farther reserves. The whole secret of the Roman art of war lay in disposing their armies after this manner, and leaving these spaces open in the first and second lines. It was almost impossible, that this method should prove unsuccessful, if duly observed; for fortune in each engagement must have failed them three different times, before they could be routed. As for the Roman cavalry, they were always posted at the wings of the army, and fought sometimes on foot, sometimes on horseback, as occasion required, like our dragoons. At this time they were not numerous among the Romans, there being but twelve hundred horse in an army of twenty thousand men. As to the stations of the commanders, the consuls and lieutenant-generals took their posts in the middle of the space between the Principes and the Triarii, where the Roman eagles stood. The legati and tribunes were usually posted by them, unless the former were ordered to command the wings, or the others some particular part of the army. The centurions stood every man at the head of his century or company. The common soldiers were placed in several ranks, at the discretion of the centurions, according to their age, strength, and experience, every man having three foot square allowed him to manage his arms in. The Latin troops being drawn up in the

- a served under them in former wars. It happened soon after these orders were proclaimed through the camp, that young Manlius, the consul's son, being sent out at the head of a detachment of horse to observe the enemy's motions, met an advanced squadron of the enemy, commanded by one Geminus Metius, who, knowing the consul's son, challenged him to a single combat. Manlius, piqued in point of honour, and forgetting the late orders of the generals, accepted the challenge. Whereupon both parties drew back, and left the field open for the two champions. They rode full speed against each other, and Manlius's lance only glanced upon his adversary's helmet. Then the two combatants wheeling about, returned to the charge, when Manlius wounded Metius's horse on the head with his lance. The violence of the blow made the horse rear, and the suddenness of the shock threw Metius to the ground. He endeavoured to raise himself with his buckler and lance, but Manlius gave him so violent a thrust in the throat, that he drove the point of his lance out at his side; and having stripped him of his fine armour, returned to the camp full of glory for his victory, but uncertain of the reception he should meet with from the consuls. He passed triumphantly through the midst of the army, and going straight to his father's tent, accosted him thus: Father, I have followed your example; I was challenged like you by an insulting enemy; and here I lay his spoils at your feet. But the consul at these words turning his back upon his son, ordered the troops to be immediately assembled, and in their presence made him this reply: Since you, Titus Manlius, have been so rash, as to fight the enemy without my orders, you must expiate your crime yourself. You have indeed conquered, and therefore deserve to be rewarded. But your disobedience must be punished with the utmost severity. How could you despise the authority both of a father and a consul? How could you break through that discipline, to the strict observance of which, Rome has hitherto owed her preservation? Hard is the necessity you reduce me to, when you force me, either to forget that I am a father, or that I am a judge. But neither your grief nor mine shall prevail over the fidelity I owe my country. We shall be a melancholy example to posterity, but a wholesome precedent to the Roman youth. In you I lose a son endeared to me by the tender affection of a father, and by your late victory. But alas! since I must either establish the consular authority by a rigorous act of justice, or weaken it by your impunity, die as bravely as you have conquered. If you have but one drop of the Manlian blood in your veins, you will not refuse to repair the breach you have made in the military discipline, by undergoing the punishment due to your offence. This said, he first crowned his son as victor, and then ordered the lictors to tie him to a stake. All present were stunned at the cruel sentence, as if it had been pronounced against themselves; and when the lictor lifted up his ax to strike off the young conqueror's head, a great outcry was raised by the whole army, as if the stroke had been to fall upon each officer and soldier then present. However, they offered no violence either to the consul or the lictor; but seeing the young man's head struck off, and his blood gush out, vented their rage against the general in imprecations and invectives. They covered the dead body with the spoils of his conquered enemy, and expressed their affliction by the most pompous obsequies they could perform for him in the field. It is scarce to be imagined how tractable this severity of Manlius made his army for the future: his orders were observed and put in execution with all possible exactness, which greatly contributed to the victory he gained a few days after ¹.

WHEN the day of battle came, both armies drew up in the plains at the foot of mount Vesuvius, in the road leading to the town of Veferis. As they were pretty equal in numbers, and quite uniform in their way of fighting, the onset was furious on both sides, neither party for some time gaining any advantage over the other. At length the left wing of the Romans, commanded by Decius, being vigorously pressed by the Latins, gave ground; so that the first line was forced to retire, without turning their backs to the enemy, into the intervals of the second line. This disadvantage put Decius in mind of his agreement with his colleague, viz. that the consul, whole wing the same manner as the Roman, it was probable, that the centurions of the two armies would encounter each other. But the Romans not being men of so much bodily strength as the Latins, Livy tells us, that the centurions of the Roman legions obtained leave of the consuls to have each of them a sub-centurion to defend and assist him (15).

first gave way, should devote himself to the Dii Manes. He therefore called out to a Valerius, the pontifex maximus, to perform on him the ceremony of consecration, that he might devote himself in due form. Valerius ordered him to quit his military habit, and put on the robe he wore in the senate. Then he covered his head with a veil, ordered him to put forth his hand under his robe to his chin, and standing with both his feet upon his javelin to repeat after him the following words: O Janus, Jupiter, Mars, Romulus, Bellona, and ye Lares, and Novensiles (U): O all ye heroes, who dwell in heaven, and all ye gods, who rule over us and our enemies, especially ye gods of hell, I honour you, invoke you, and humbly intreat you to prosper the arms of the Romans, and to transfer all fear and terror from them to their enemies; and I do for the safety of the Roman people, and their legions, devote myself, and b with myself the army and auxiliaries of the enemy to the infernal gods, and the goddesses of the earth. Decius, having finished this prayer, ordered his listors to go and acquaint his colleague, that he had devoted himself for the safety of the army. Then tucking up his robe, and girding it round him, he mounted his horse, and rode full speed into the thickest of the enemy's battalions. Both the Romans and Latins were surprised at this sight. The consul broke through the first line of the enemy's army, and penetrated to the centre, the Latins being terrified at this new sight, and seeming as if they were thunderstruck. At length, recovering from their surprise, they discharged a shower of darts at the devoted consul, who fell to the ground with numberless wounds. The death of the consul gave new courage to the Romans. Those c who had retired, returned to the charge with more vigour than ever. However, the Latins still kept their ground, and in some places had the advantage. When the news was brought to Manlius of his colleague's death, he shed some tears, giving him the praises he deserved; and then, as he was now left to command alone, he ordered a body of volunteers to advance into the first line, reserving the triarii, or those of the third line, who were the main strength of the army, to the last extremity. The Latins being hard pressed by these fresh troops, and taking them for the Roman triarii, ordered their own triarii to advance; and this mistake determined the victory, hitherto doubtful, in favour of the Romans. For the Latins being quite tired out, and having for the most part broken or blunted their weapons, in repulsing the Romans d once more, when they thought themselves sure of the victory, the Roman triarii, by order of Manlius, appeared on a sudden, and having given a shout, which dismayed the enemy, fell upon them, while fatigued, with such fury, and made so terrible a slaughter, that scarce a fourth part of their army remained alive. The Samnites, for whose sake this battle was fought, had no share in it; but continued drawn up in battalions at some distance from the Roman army at the foot of mount Vesuvius, and only served to keep the enemy a little in fear. The chief honour of the victory undoubtedly belonged to Manlius, both Latins and Romans agreeing afterwards in this, that the former would have conquered, had Manlius been their general ^a.

The Latin army routed by the consul Manlius in two engagements,

THE Latins, who escaped the slaughter, fled to Minturnæ, a little above the mouth e of the Liris. There Numicius, their general, by causing letters to be spread about in Latium, and the country of the Volsci, representing the flight of the Latins only as an honourable retreat, drew many to his camp, who had not been present at the late action. Having thus formed a new army, he took the road to Capua, being determined to try the fortune of arms once more with the Romans, and hoping to surprise them with his sudden return. But Manlius, being informed of his motions, met him on his march, at a village called Trifana, in the neighbourhood of Sinuessa, gave him a second overthrow, and then entering Latium, laid it waste, without opposition. All the Latin cities surrendered at discretion, as did Privernum, in the territory of the Volsci. All Campania, with Capua its capital, was brought into subjection f to its former masters. The consul dispossessed the Campanians, Latins, and Privermates of their lands, and distributed them among the people of Rome. However, the Laurantini in Latium, and the Campanian knights, who were the flower of the nobility

the nine deities brought to Rome by the Sabines, viz. Lars, Vesta, Minerva, Feronia, Concord, Good Faith, Fortune, Chance, and Health. Some read Novensides instead of Novensiles, and understand thereby another kind of gods who presided over novelties

- a of the country, and had not been concerned in the revolt, were continued in their possessions and privileges; nay, these faithful knights, to the number of sixteen hundred, were made citizens of Rome, but without right of suffrage. And that this grant might be the more authentic, it was engraved on brass, and fixed up in the temple of Castor and Pollux. An annual pension of forty-five denarii, that is, 1 l. 9 s. was also assigned to each of them out of the public revenues of Campania. It is not to be doubted, but Manlius, after so many signal conquests, obtained the honors of a triumph, notwithstanding Livy's silence on this head. He soon after fell sick, and as a Roman general was wanted in the field to oppose some fresh incursions of the Antiates, he nominated L. Papirius Crassus, then prætor, to the dictatorship; who
- b having appointed L. Papirius Cursor for his master of the horse, kept his troops some months in the enemy's country upon free quarter, and then returned to Rome to preside at the election of new consuls for the next year, when Q. Publilius a plebeian, and Tib. Aulus, a patrician, were chosen. During their administration the Latins The Latins revolted. revolted, and formed two armies. Publilius, succeeding in an expedition against one of them, was honoured with a triumph. But Æmilius, having only gained some slight advantages over the other, was refused that honour, which so incensed him, that no tribune of the people ever inveighed more bitterly against the nobility, than the patrician consul did on this occasion. Hereupon the senate, to prevent disturbances, ordered him to name a dictator. Æmilius obeyed, but in revenge named to
- c that dignity his plebeian colleague, who appointed Brutus Scæva, another plebeian, to be his general of the horse. The dictator, who was intirely devoted to the people, employed all his power and influence to establish their rights on a solid foundation: This he effected by three laws, which he either made or revived. The first was, that the decrees made by the people at the request of their tribunes, should bind all the subjects of the republic in general. The second, that for the future the laws, which were to be passed by the centuries, should be first approved by the senate, and that the people should put the last hand to them. Hitherto the comitia used to pass the laws first, and the senate had a power of accepting or rejecting them. The third law was, that one of the censors should always for the future be a plebeian. The senate,
- d to pique Æmilius, tender of his honor, ordered the next year's consuls, L. Furius Camillus, grandson to the great Camillus, and C. Mænius, a plebeian, to put an end to the war which he had left unfinished. And that the new consuls might not fail of success, they plentifully furnished them with men, ammunition, arms, &c. by which means the united forces of the Latins were defeated, the town of Pedum taken by assault, and all Latium brought under subjection. The consuls having finished the war with great glory, returned to Rome, where they were honoured, not only with a triumph, but also with two equestrian statues erected in the forum ^a.
- THE consuls having yet some time to continue in their office, employed it in determining the fate of the conquered. Camillus was inclined to clemency, and advised the
- e fathers rather to increase the subjects of the republic, by admitting the Latins to the privileges of Roman citizens, than to exterminate them, and reduce their country to a desert. The chief men in the senate were for following the consul's advice. But as some cities had been more criminal than others, it was thought proper to make a distinction in the treatment of them. Lanuvium, Aricia, Nomentum, and Pedum, were made Roman Municipia, their soldiers had the privilege of being incorporated in the legions, shared all the advantages of the Roman soldiery, and were no longer upon the foot of auxiliaries. The Tusculans were restored to the enjoyment of their ancient privileges, the senate being unwilling to condemn a whole country for the faults of a few, who had joined the enemies of the republic. Velitra was razed, and its senate and inhabitants
- f removed into another city beyond the Tiber. The Antiates were granted the freedom of Roman citizens; but their fleet, consisting of six gallies, was partly burnt, and partly carried into the Roman ports. With the brass beaks of their vessels, called in Latin Rostra, the consul Mænius adorned the pulpit, from whence the Roman magistrates harangued the people; and hence it was ever after called the Rostra. The inhabitants of Tybur and Præneste were deprived of all their lands, not so much on account of their late revolt, as for having formerly assisted the Gauls. And lastly, all the Latins in general were forbidden to assemble their diets, as usual, to marry out of their respective tribes, or to have common markets, or fairs for trade. As for the cities of Campania, their lands were taken from them, and divided among the Romans. Thus were the two most fruitful provinces of Italy subdued by the republic, and the Latins from allies of Rome, made her subjects ^a.

A plebeian

The Sidicini
conquered.

IN the following consulate of C. Sulpicius Longus, and P. Ælius Pætus, Pubilius, though a plebeian, obtained the prætorship, the only great dignity which the plebeians had not before shared with the nobility. And thus the people being arrived at the height of their desires, all pretences for faction were intirely taken away. The consuls of the new year, L. Papirius and Cæso Duilius, led an army against the Sidicini and Aurones, who had invaded the country of the Aurunci at this time in alliance with Rome, defeated them in the field, and having obliged them to take shelter behind the walls of their cities, returned to Rome. In the following consulate of M. Valerius Corvus, ^b now raised to that dignity a fourth time, and M. Atilius Regulus, the former laid siege to Cale, the metropolis of the Aurones, which he took by means of covered galleries, and moveable towers, which he invented on this occasion for the screening of his men, and the carrying on of the attacks without molestation. After this both consuls marched against the Sidicini; but their year being expired before they had finished their conquest, their successors, T. Veturius Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albinus, putting themselves at the head of the troops, which Valerius had commanded, entered the enemy's country, and laid it waste, without opposition. Upon the return of the consuls to Rome, a report being spread, that the Sidicini had assembled a formidable army, and were joined by the Samnites, a dictator, viz. P. Cornelius Rufinus, was appointed to ^c march out against them. But his authority did not last long; the augurs found his nomination defective in some circumstances, and obliged him to abdicate. Nay, as a plague raged at this time in Rome, the aruspices, carrying their superstition still farther, declared, that all the auspices of the year had been infected by the contagious air, and that the inauguration of the consuls themselves had been faulty. On this superstitious prejudice, the chief magistrates of Rome were displaced, and the republic reduced to an inter-regnum. The next year the fasces were transferred, according to the Fasti Capitolini, to L. Papirius Cursor, and C. Pætelius Libo Visolus, who, in all likelihood, reduced the Sidicini, for we find no other epoch of their reduction. Livy neither mentions these consuls, nor gives us any account of this year; which is a great ^d omission, and would confound the whole chronology of the republic, were it not for the Fasti Capitolini, which name the above-mentioned consuls. They were succeeded by A. Cornelius, a second time consul, and Cn. Domitius, who were obliged to name a dictator upon a groundless report, that the Gauls were preparing for a war with the republic. Papirius Crassus was the man they pitched upon, and he chose Valerius Poplicola for his master of the horse. While the dictator was raising an army, more certain news came, that all was quiet on that side. However, as the Samnites had raised a formidable army to oppose Alexander king of Epirus, the dictator kept his army in the field, till the Samnites, upon the retreat of that prince, disbanded their troops. In this same year, the number of Roman citizens being greatly increased after the reduction of the Latins, two new tribes, the Mæcian and Scapian, were added to the twenty-seven already in being. ^e

two new tribes.

DURING the tranquillity, which Rome enjoyed, after the reduction of the Latins, there sprung up in her bosom a new kind of monsters, more to be dreaded than any foreign enemy. Some women of distinction, according to some three hundred and sixty, according to others a hundred and seventy, plotted together, upon what provocation, we know not, to take off their husbands by poison, and took the opportunity of an epidemical distemper to put their wicked design in execution. People were surprised in Rome to see so many men of note die, and all with the same symptoms; but had no suspicion of this kind of assassination, as we may call it, so contrary to ^f their manners, that there was then no law against it. At length the wickedness of these furies was discovered by a woman, who was in the service of one of these criminals, and assisted her in preparing her poison. This slave applied herself to Q. Falsus, who was at that time curule ædile, and having upon promise of impunity discovered to him the whole mystery of iniquity, the ædile imparted the secret to the consuls, and the consuls to the senate; by whose order the slave, attended by some officers, went to the houses of above twenty Roman ladies, who were all found busy in preparing poisons. Among these were two patrician women, Sergia and Cornelia, who being their husbands.

- a brought before the assembly of the people, and there examined, maintained that they had prepared only medicines for the sick, in which there were no poisonous ingredients. Hereupon the slave, finding herself suspected of calumny, proposed, that the two ladies should take their own potions. The experiment being, at her request, ordered to be made, Cornelia and Sergia desired to confer with their accomplices; which being granted, they all by agreement drank their own poison, and so delivered themselves from a more cruel death. Nothing could be more surprising to the Romans than such an excess of wickedness in a sex, which had hitherto preserved its reputation unsullied. The republic ascribed this unheard-of prodigy to a spirit of madness, sent as a punishment by the angry gods; and therefore, to appease their wrath, had
- b recourse to the ceremony, which she had formerly practised in the time of plagues, and general calamities. The senate ordered the consuls to nominate a dictator to drive a nail into the wall of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. Accordingly, Cn. Quintilius was raised to that dignity, and L. Valerius Potitus made his general of the horse, only to renew this superstitious ceremony; which was no sooner performed, than he resigned his transient dignity, and gave way to the consulate of L. Papirius Crassus, a second time consul, and L. Plautius Venno. In the beginning of their year, the Privernates, in conjunction with some of the inhabitants of Fundi, revolted at the instigation of Vitruvius Vaccus, a native of that city, but who enjoyed all the rights of a Roman citizen, and had even made himself an inhabitant of Rome. The Privernates, on
- c the approach of the two consuls, retired into their city. Hereupon Plautius, with one part of the army, entered the territory of Fundi, where he was met by the senate of that city, who protested that they had no share in the revolt. The consul wrote to Rome in their favour, and then marched to join his colleague, who had already blocked up Privernum. But while that siege was carrying on, one of the consuls was called back to Rome to preside in the comitia for electing new consuls, the city being alarmed at the news of the Gauls being in motion. The new consuls, L. Æmilius, a second time, and C. Plautius, entered upon their office the very day they were chosen, though before the usual time, and drew lots for their commands. It fell to Æmilius to act against the Gauls; and to his colleague to carry on the siege of Privernum.
- d Æmilius made the levies with the utmost vigor, admitted of no excuse, but put all, without distinction, who were able to bear arms, upon the military roll. Such was the terror the very name of the Gauls struck into the Romans. But the great army, raised on this occasion, marched no farther than Veii, where the consul received certain advice, that all was quiet among the Gauls. He then joined his colleague before Privernum, which, being already fatigued with a long siege, surrendered, and Privernum delivered up Vitrius, the author of the revolt, who was by an order from the senate first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. The two consuls, on their return to Rome, were honoured with a triumph, and Æmilius moreover with the surname of Privernas. What now remained was to punish the Privernates. Such of the senators,
- e as had continued in the place after the revolt, were removed beyond the Tiber, and forbid to pass the river under the penalty of a great fine. As for the innocent multitude, and the prisoners taken in the war, the consul Plautius used all his interest in their behalf. He led the captives to the door of the senate-house, and made a moving harangue in their favour. But the senators were divided in opinion, some inclining to clemency, others to severity. The only resource of those unhappy men was humble supplications. But they were Volsci, that is, a nation as proud, and capable of as generous sentiments, as the Romans themselves. For one of them being asked by a senator, who was for putting them all to death, what punishment he and his fellow-captives deserved? answered with great intrepidity, We deserve that punishment, which is due to men, who are jealous of their liberty, and think themselves
- f worthy of it. Plautius perceiving that his answer exasperated some of the senators, endeavoured to prevent the ill effects of it, by putting a milder question to the prisoner. How would you behave, said he, if Rome should pardon you? Our conduct, replied the generous captive, depends upon yours. If the peace you grant us be an honourable one, you may depend on a constant fidelity on our parts: if the terms of it be hard or dishonourable, lay no stress on our adherence to you. Some of the judges construed these words as menaces, but the wiser part, finding in them a great deal of magnanimity, cried out, that a nation, whose only desire was liberty, and only fear that of losing it, was worthy to become Roman. Accordingly, a decree
- g passed in favour of the prisoners, and Privernum was declared a municipium. Thus the bold sincerity of one man saved his country, and gained it the privilege of being incorporated into the Roman state.

The Palæopolitans make an irruption into the Roman territories.

THE next year, in the consulate of C. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula, the Romans gave umbrage to the Samnites, by planting a colony in Fregella, which stood in their neighbourhood, and proved the occasion of that bloody war, which soon after broke out between the two nations. In the mean time the Palæopolitans, taking advantage of this new discontent of the Samnites, committed hostilities in the Roman territories. These people were originally Eubæans, who, coming into Italy, built Cumæ, and thence spreading themselves farther, founded the city of Naples or Neapolis, that is, the New City. In the neighbourhood of Naples, they found a town ready built, which they possessed themselves of, calling it Palæopolis or Palaiopolis, that is, The Old City. These Palæopolitans were the first of all the Greeks, who ventured to attack the Romans. Their confidence was founded upon a report spread abroad, that the Samnites would soon be at war with the Romans. The news of this unexpected invasion was brought to Rome just before the comitia by centuries were assembled to appoint new consuls, and the comitia by tribes to chuse new tribunes of the people. The latter chose one Q. Flavius, a man of a most infamous character, who had been accused not long before of offering violence to a woman of distinction, and debauching her. C. Valerius, one of the curule ædiles, was his chief prosecutor; and the evidence being clear, fourteen of the twenty-nine tribes had already voted him guilty, when the accused cried out with great protestations, that he was innocent. Upon this Valerius, who bore him an irreconcilable hatred, cried out with a louder voice, What is that to me, whether thou art guilty or innocent, provided thou be destroyed? The tribes were so offended at these words, that they immediately acquitted Flavius, tho' evidently guilty, by a great majority of suffrages. A few months after he lost his mother, and, as it was then customary to offer sacrifices in honour of the dead, he offered a greater number of victims than usual, and distributed the flesh among the people, who had favoured him at his trial. This gratitude proved more beneficial to him than he expected. The people remembered him in the comitia, and chose him, though absent, for one of their tribunes.

The consul Publius marches against them.

THE comitia by centuries raised to the consulate L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publius Philo a second time. The latter marched against the Palæopolitans, and in order to cut off their communication with Neapolis, from whence they were supplied with men and provisions, encamped on a narrow tract of ground between those two cities. His colleague posted himself with another army near Capua to keep the Campanians in awe. In this camp he received undoubted intelligence, that the Samnites, jealous of the progress of the Roman arms, had solicited the inhabitants of Prævernium, Fundi, and Formia to revolt. Upon this the senate sent an embassy into Samnium, complaining of a conduct so contrary to the faith of treaties. The ambassadors met with a haughty reception; but without losing their temper, after having heard the complaints of the Samnites, which chiefly related to the rebuilding and fortifying of Fregella, returned the following answer: The injuries you complain of require a great deal of time to be examined. As therefore we have common friends and allies, let us refer our differences to their arbitration. Arbitrators, cried the Samnites, we will have none but the gods and our swords. Battles will determine our pretensions better than words. Mars shall put an end to our disputes in the plains of Campania. Go, Romans, tell your consuls that we wait for them between Capua and Suessula. Our swords will then determine, which of the two nations ought to give law to the rest of Italy. The ambassadors replied, We shall not take our orders from you; our generals will lead us whither they think fit, and we shall follow them. In the mean while the time for the new elections drawing near, the senate, without recalling the consuls, ordered a dictator to be named to preside in the comitia. The consul Cornelius nominated M. Claudius Marcellus, a plebeian, who chose Sp. Posthumius Albinus for his master of the horse. But the augurs pretending that the nomination was invalid, Marcellus was obliged to abdicate the dictatorship, and Posthumius the command of the horse. The people, imagining that the view of the augurs was only to wound the plebeian interest, made loud complaints, and murmured at that ambitious college; but in the end superstition prevailed, and the government falling into an inter-regnum, C. Patellius Libo, and L. Papirius Mugellanus, were chosen consuls for the ensuing year. These putting them-

- a selves at the head of the army, which Cornelius had commanded, entered Samnium, and being joined by the Lucanians and Apulians, two nations, to which the Romans had been hitherto utter strangers, penetrated farther into the enemy's country, ravaged their lands, and seized three of their cities, viz. Allifæ, Callifæ, and Rufrium. On the other hand, Publius, being continued by the people, at the motion of their tribunes, at the head of the same army he had commanded the year before, with the title of proconsul, took at length Palæpolis, by a stratagem laid and executed by two of the citizens. Four thousand Samnites, and two thousand of the inhabitants of Nola, a city of Campania, having got into the town before it was invested, under pretence of strengthening the garison, kept the inhabitants in a cruel state of slavery, and committed all sorts of debaucheries, which they extended even to the wives of that unhappy people, and their children of both sexes. In this distress the Palæopolitans, having long waited in vain for relief from the Tarentines, resolved at length to have recourse to their enemies, in order to deliver themselves from the oppression of their defenders. Nymphius and Charilaus, the two chief magistrates of the city, took upon them, with the consent of the principal inhabitants, the execution of the enterprise. Charilaus escaped as a deserter to the Roman camp, where he imparted to the proconsul the resolution his countrymen had taken. Publius received him kindly, and put him at the head of three thousand Romans, who, at a proper time, were to attack the town in that part, where the Samnites defended it. In the mean time Nymphius, who had staid in Palæpolis, and all along kept a private correspondence with his colleague, contrived another stratagem, and with his Grecian artifice so blinded the Samnite commanders, that they fell without any suspicion into the snare he had prepared for them. He advised them to equip the fleet, which lay in the port, and make a descent in the Roman territories, in order to oblige the Romans to quit Samnium, and the neighbourhood of Palæpolis. This motion being approved, Nymphius contrived to employ the Samnite troops in the laborious work of setting the ships afloat, which lay dry on the shore. By this means, that part of the wall, which the Romans were to attack, being but weakly guarded, Charilaus, being acquainted therewith by his colleague, advanced at the head of three thousand Romans, and being favoured by his friends, made himself master of the place. The Samnites, who were employed on the shore, finding themselves shamefully over-reached, fled with precipitation for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans, and arrived in their own country without either arms or baggage, where they were exposed to the ridicule of all their neighbours, who continually reproached them with the equipment of the Palæopolitan fleet. Some writers tell us, that the Samnites, and not the Greeks, delivered the place up to the Romans. But the authors of best note relate this adventure, as we have done. Besides, Neapolis, one of the chief cities of Great Greece, entered at this time into an alliance with Rome, a manifest proof that the Greeks surrendered voluntarily, and not compelled by any foreign force. For this success, Publius, in spite of the nobility, obtained a triumph, though he was neither consul nor dictator. He was the first, as Livy observes, who was decreed a triumph for exploits performed in an inferior station. But he was a plebeian, and the idol of the people, and therefore triumphed in sight of the consuls of the year, who were refused that honour, though they had made considerable conquests in Samnium. Thus the plebeians revenged the affront they had received the last year, when a plebeian dictator was by the augurs obliged to lay down his office.

- f THE taking of Palæpolis stirred up new enemies against the Romans in Great Greece. The Lucanians The Tarentines, having lost their protector, Alexander king of Epirus, and being jealous of the growing power of Rome, by an artful stratagem seduced the Lucanians, who had gone over to the Romans, into a league with the Samnites. They bribed a company of young Lucanians of good families to tear their backs with whips, and then shew themselves to the people, pretending that they had been treated in that cruel manner by order of the Roman consuls, to whose camp curiosity had led them. The Lucani, who were but a stupid people, suffering themselves to be imposed upon by so gross a cheat, immediately convened a national assembly, and without examining into the truth of so improbable a fact, decreed, that war should be declared with the Romans, and their ancient alliance with the Samnites renewed. Pursuant to this resolution, an embassy was sent to the latter, who could scarce believe the deputation real ; and therefore would not hearken to their proposals, till hostages were delivered, ^a and Samnite garisons put into all their towns. The Lucanians complied with all their demands without discovering the imposture, till it was too late to repent.

WHILE the affairs of the republic were prosperous abroad, the poor debtors had the good fortune to shake off the only yoke, which now lay heavy upon them. By one of the laws of the twelve tables, creditors were empowered to seize their insolvent debtors, and keep them in their houses, till by their services or labour they had discharged the sum they owed. These poor citizens were in all respects slaves, except in name. They were called Nexi, that is, bound, their liberty being, as it were, bound, and suspended for a time ; whereas the slaves were called Servi. A young plebeian of extraordinary beauty, and of a good family, by name Publius, ^b had voluntarily made himself a slave to one L. Papirius, in order to pay his father's debts. Papirius, conceiving a detestable passion for the young man, and not being able to get the better of his virtue by promises and caresses, caused him to be whipped most unmercifully. After this cruel treatment, Publius, having found means to make his escape, complained publicly of the inhuman usage he had met with, and told the occasion of it. The people, filled with compassion for the young plebeian, and with resentment against his master, forced the consuls to assemble the senate, and presenting Publius before them with his back all bloody and torn, demanded justice on their knees. The senate had regard to their cries, and without decreeing any thing against Papirius, whose crime was not sufficiently proved, passed a decree, which was ^c readily accepted and confirmed in the comitia. It enacted, That for the future no person whatsoever should be held in fetters or other bonds but for some crime that deserved it, and only till the criminal had suffered the punishment due by law ; and that creditors should only have a right to attach the goods, and not seize the persons of their debtors.

The Vestini defeated by the consul Brutus.

IN the following consulate of L. Furius Camillus, and D. Junius Brutus, the Vestini, a people on the coast of the Adriatic sea, took arms against Rome, but were defeated by Brutus, who took from them the two cities of Cutina and Cingilia. Camillus, who was to act against the Samnites, falling sick, named to the dictatorship L. Papirius Cursor, who appointed Q. Fabius Rullianus to be his general of the horse. The dictator took the field against the Samnites, but soon after returned to Rome on account of some ^d religious scruples relating to the auspices consulted before his departure. Before he left the army, he forbade Fabius, whom he intrusted with the command of it, to venture a battle in his absence. But Fabius, disdainful to have his hands so tied up, notwithstanding the dictator's prohibition, attacked the Samnites, and gained a complete victory, having killed above twenty thousand of them on the spot. The young conqueror, elated with this success, instead of lodging the spoils of the enemy in the quaestor's hands, caused them all to be burnt, that they might not increase the pomp of the dictator's triumph. Besides, he did not send any account of his victory to the dictator, under whose auspices he had fought, but only to the senate. Hereupon the dictator set out in all haste from Rome to punish his disobedient general of the ^e horse. But Fabius, having timely notice of his coming, and of his design, called together the troops, and in a seditious harangue committed to them the defence of his life and fortune. His speech was applauded by the legions ; they all promised him their assistance, and protested, that nothing but death should separate them from a commander, under whose conduct they had gained so signal a victory. In the mean time the dictator arrived, and having assembled the troops, ordered the crier to call the general of the horse to appear before him. Fabius obeyed the summons, and being questioned by the dictator concerning his disobedience, returned only dark and confused answers. As he could offer nothing in defence of so bad a cause, Papirius ordered the lictors to strip him, and prepare their rods and axes. But while the executioners ^f were tearing off his cloaths, he found means to escape out of their hands, and to retire among the Triarii. A loud shout was immediately heard from the place whither Fabius had fled, which was answered by the whole army. The soldiers all to a man declared in his favour ; but expressed their sentiments very differently. Some threatened the dictator ; others begged pardon for the offender. Those who stood next to the tribunal, desired, in a suppliant manner, Papirius to spare the life of his general of the horse, and not condemn all the troops in him. The lieutenant-generals of the army, who surrounded the dictator, intreated him to put off the execution till the next day, to give the soldiers time to cool, and to take some time himself to calm his mind. But the dictator continued inflexible ; nay, he commanded, with ^g

- a an angry tone, the lieutenant-generals to leave the tribunal. Hereupon the sedition increased, and the soldiers grew more furious. The dictator commanded silence, but neither he nor his criers could be heard. The legionaries were ready to offer violence to their general, but night coming on put an end to the tumult. Fabius, not thinking it prudent to stand another trial, escaped to Rome, where his father immediately got the senators assembled, in order to obtain a favourable decree for him. But Papirius, arriving on a sudden, took his place in the senate, and ordered the lictors to seize young Fabius. In vain did the senators intercede for the criminal; Papirius was inexorable. Hereupon the father, having no other resource, appealed to the people in comitia. There had never yet been any instance of an appeal from the sentence of the dictator. But nevertheless Papirius did not think fit to disallow the superior authority of the people, so that the cause was brought before the comitia assembled in the forum. Thither repaired the dictator with few attendants; but the Fabii were guarded by all the people of distinction in Rome. Both the Fabii ascended the rostra with the dictator. The son had a right to harangue the people from thence, as general of the horse; but the father had no right, it being the privilege of magistrates only to appear there. Papirius therefore sternly ordered him to be pulled down, as not being in office; and also the son, as a criminal, who had forfeited the privileges annexed to his office. The father, placing himself then at the foot of the rostra, broke out into bitter invectives against the haughtiness and cruelty of Papirius, cited the case of Minucius, and L. Furius, who had not been so severely punished, though they had fought contrary to the advice of Cincinnatus and the great Camillus, dictators, and omitted nothing that could be said in so bad a cause. He clamoured, he complained, he called upon the gods and men for help, and embracing his son, wept a flood of tears. The whole assembly, says Livy, was on the side of the Fabii; but Papirius had on his side the military laws, the rules of discipline, which were deemed inviolable, the dignity of his office, the dictatorial edicts, &c. He reproached the Romans with a degeneracy from that heroic love of their country, which used to prevail over all paternal affection, and private views; he urged the examples of Manlius and Brutus, who had courage enough to sacrifice their own children for the sake of the public good, expatiated on the evil consequences to the republic of admitting appeals from the dictator to the people, and especially in cases of disobedience in war, and concluded with asking the tribunes, whether they were willing to answer those consequences with their heads. These words threw both the tribunes and the people into great perplexity. They pitied the Fabii; but could not condemn the severity of Papirius. The receiving of appeals from the sentence of the dictator would indeed increase the power of the plebeians; but they were afraid of the consequences of so dangerous an incroachment on a sovereign authority. Instead therefore of taking upon them to judge in the affair, they became intercessors for the criminal, humbly beseeching the dictator to pardon his general of the horse. The Fabii themselves fell prostrate at the dictator's feet, and implored his clemency. Upon this the dictator, causing silence to be made, spoke thus from the Rostra: Both military discipline, and the authority of generals, are preserved inviolate. The temerity of Fabius exposed both to great dangers: but he has not been judged innocent; only pardon is asked for him. This I readily grant in deference to the Roman people, and to the intercession of their tribunes. They have not pronounced him innocent as judges, but intercede for him as friends. Live then, Quintus Fabius, more fortunate in this unanimous consent of all orders in the republic to save you, than in the victory you lately gained. Live, Fabius, though you have dared to commit a crime, which your father himself, had he been in my place, would have expiated with your blood. You shall be received again into my favour at your pleasure. But as to the Roman people, to whom you owe your life, you can never express your gratitude to them better, than by punctually and implicitly obeying, whether in peace or in war, your lawful commanders. Go; you are at liberty. These words were followed by universal acclamations, some congratulating Fabius, others expressing their gratitude to Papirius. Both the dictator, and his general of the horse, were conducted back to their houses by crouds of people of all ranks. The many triumphs, with which we shall see him hereafter honoured, will prove him worthy of the zeal which Rome shewed for his deliverance.

WHILE Papirius staid in Rome, the Samnites, taking advantage of his absence, insulted the Roman army, knowing that they would not stir out of their camp to engage them for fear of meeting with the same fate as young Fabius. And indeed M. Valerius, one of the lieutenant-generals, suffered a detachment of Romans, who were escorting a convoy, to be cut in pieces, though he might easily have rescued them, saying, that he dreaded the severity of the dictator more than the enemy's forces. This accident greatly contributed to increase the hatred of the soldiery to their general, who soon after arriving in the camp with his new general of the horse, L. Papirius Crassus, a relation of his own, found his men so exasperated against him, that he lost all hopes of making any great progress. The Samnites, informed of the present disposition of the Roman army towards their general, immediately marched out, and offered him battle. Papirius thinking himself obliged in honour to accept the challenge, drew up his men, and in order to supply the want of affection in his soldiers, by his skill in war, posted them so advantageously, that it was not possible for them to be intirely defeated. They fought indeed very faintly for fear of increasing the glory of their general; but after all they did not lose the battle, there being more Samnites killed than Romans, though the number of the wounded was much greater on the side of the latter. After the battle Papirius acted a part, which surprized every body. Not one officer, or soldier, who had behaved negligently in the engagement, was so much as reprimanded. Laying aside the severity and majesty of a dictator, he went about with his lieutenants, visiting the wounded soldiers, put his head into their tents, asked them how they did, and charged their tribunes to take particular care of them. As in this sudden change he did not discover the least affectation, the army, which had always had a great esteem for him, came in a short time to shew him a most tender affection. The people in the city, being informed of this unexpected alteration, thought fit to continue him six months longer in his employment, during which time he gave the enemy a total overthrow, over-ran Samnium, and reduced the enemy to sue for peace. This the dictator granted them on these three preliminary conditions; 1. that they should cloath all his troops: 2. that they should give them a year's pay: and, 3. that they should get the treaty confirmed by the senate. Papirius on his return to Rome was decreed a triumph, after which he presided at the election of the new consuls, C. Sulpicius Longus, and Q. Aulus Cerretanus, and then resigned his dignity. The Samnites, to whom the senate had only granted a year's truce, no sooner heard that Papirius had quitted the dictatorship, than they took the field. As the Apulians declared for them against Rome, the forces of the republic were divided between the two consuls. Aulus marched against the Apulians, and Sulpicius against the Samnites; but little progress was made in the war this year, both Samnites and Apulians keeping themselves close in their strong-holds. But the next year, when Q. Fabius, who had been general of the horse to Papirius, and L. Fulvius Corvus, were consuls, the Samnites, having raised a formidable army, surprized the Romans, commanded by the two consuls, in a very disadvantageous post, and obliged them to hazard a battle, which lasted many hours without either side's giving way. At length the imprudence of the Samnite cavalry turned the fortune of the day in favour of the Romans. For the consuls, having designedly sent away the baggage of the army under a small guard, the enemy's horse, not being aware of the snare, wheeled off to seize it. But when they had put themselves into disorder, and loaded their horses with the plunder, the consuls detached all the Roman cavalry with orders to fall upon them; which they did with such success, that few of them escaped. Then the Roman cavalry, marching a great way about, fell on the rear of the Samnite infantry, which had not yet given ground. This unexpected attack struck them with terror, and threw them into confusion. The Romans, pursuing their advantage, cut all those Samnites, who kept their ground, in pieces. Those who fled were for the most part put to the sword by the horse, and among the rest the general himself. The Samnites, after this defeat, repenting of their breach of the truce, endeavoured to pacify the Romans, by making restitution of what plunder they had taken contrary to the faith of the treaty. They likewise passed a decree, that Brutulus Papius, a man of distinction among them, but the chief author of the breach, should be delivered up to the Romans. But he having laid violent hands on himself, his dead body was carried to Rome with all the captives and spoil taken in the time of the truce. After this the consul Fulvius returned to Rome; but his colleague led an army into Apulia, where he must have been attended with success, since he is said in the Fabii Capitolini to have triumphed

Papirius defeats the Samnites, and obliges them to sue for peace.

The consuls Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius Curvus gain a complete victory over them.

- a triumphed over the Samnites and Apulians, and his colleague Fulvius over the Samnites only. One A. Cornelius was chosen dictator this year to preside at the games in the absence of the consuls, and during the sickness of the prætor for the year. And hence comes the mistake of some memoirs, which Livy followed. That writer, finding that the government was in the hands of a dictator at the time of the defeat of the Samnites, ascribes to him all the glory of that exploit. But the Fasti Capitolini inform us better, and upon their authority, we have rectified the mistake of the Latin historian.

- The Samnites, being refused a peace, notwithstanding the satisfaction they had made for the breach of the truce, made the necessary preparations for carrying on the war with vigor. They appointed one Pontius, an able and experienced officer, to command their troops. He was the son of Herennius, who had been at the head of their armies in his younger days, but now led a private life, and was on account of his wisdom looked upon as a kind of oracle. On the other hand the Romans in their comitia chose T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumius, consuls, who, putting themselves at the head of the army, took their rout to Calatia, a city of Campania. When they arrived at that place, Pontius, who had encamped among the woods and mountains, in the neighbourhood of Caudium, a little town in Samnium, about a league from Calatia, caused a report to be spread, that the Samnite army was laying siege to Luceria in Apulia; and the more effectually to deceive them, he sent ten of his soldiers in the habit of herdsmen to lead flocks into different parts between Caudium and Calatia, with instructions to agree all in the same report, when taken by the enemy. The stratagem had the desired effect; and the Romans in a council of war resolved to march into Apulia, and relieve Luceria. Some were for marching the farthest way about, through the open country; others, fearing lest the place should in the mean time fall into the enemy's hands, preferred the shortest way to the safest; and their opinion prevailing, the army began to march through narrow passes, and climb up rocks, which seemed inaccessible. At length they came to the fatal place, which has been since known by the name of the Caudine Forks. The consuls marched their troops through a narrow hollow way, having on each side thick forests; and from thence descended into a valley, so surrounded with hills, that it looked like an amphitheatre. The hills were so covered with trees and briars, as to be absolutely unfurmountable. The valley itself was very marshy, being continually watered by torrents rolling down from the rocks, and frequent springs. There was but one way out of it, which was narrow and steep; and the Samnites had taken care to stop it with huge stones, and trees laid across. The consuls gave orders to clear it; but finding it quite impracticable, and discovering at the same time great numbers of the enemy on the tops of the eminences, they began to fear an ambuscade. To avoid therefore being invested, they instantly turned back, and endeavoured to get out of the valley by the hollow way, through which they had entered it. But in vain, the Samnites having already blocked up the passage with trees cut down in haste, and vast heaps of large stones. The legions, finding themselves thus shut in, without a possibility of escaping, stood immoveable, fixing their eyes on one another, and wishing to discover some signs of hopes in their companions faces. The consuls, to put a good face upon the affair, pitched their tent, and ordered fortifications to be raised, as if they had a mind to continue there. The soldiers laughed at this fruitless precaution, but nevertheless raised a rampart along the water, though they were all the while scoffed at, and insulted by the enemy from the tops of the eminences. As soon as the army was encamped, the chief officers repaired of their own accord to the consuls tent; but the time of the consultation was rather spent in lamentations, than in finding out whole-some expedients, the gods themselves not being able, as Livy says, to deliver them without a miracle. In the mean time night came on, which the soldiers, instead of taking their rest, spent in discoursing about the unhappy situation of their affairs. On the other hand the Samnites, elated with this surprising success, could not agree among themselves what use to make of it. In this irresolution, it was unanimously agreed in a council of war to consult old Herennius, the general's father, and the oracle of the nation. A messenger was therefore dispatched to him with a letter, informing him of the extremity, to which his son had, by his address, reduced the Roman army, and desiring him to advise them how they should treat an army hitherto invincible, but now intirely at their mercy. The wise old man returned by the messenger the following answer: I advise my son to open a passage for the Romans, and to let them return home without doing them the least harm. The officers, surpris'd at this answer, and imagining the messenger had misunderstood Herennius, sent him back to him; and then the old man gave a very different answer from the former: Tell the council, said he, that I would not have them spare the life of one Roman; let them be all put to the sword without distinction. The strange difference between these two answers made the Samnites imagine, that there was some mystery in the matter; and press Pontius to have his father brought to the camp to explain himself. When the wise Herennius was come, and introduced to the council, he told them, that Rome was a powerful state, from whose affection they might promise themselves the greatest benefits, and from whose enmity they had reason to fear the greatest misfortunes. If we gain her affection, said he, by a signal act of generosity, we secure to ourselves a happy and lasting tranquillity. On the other hand, if we cut off all the flower of her youth, at one blow, we shall be safe, at least for a time. In good policy, there is no medium between these two extremes. Either save the Romans in such manner as to make them your friends, or destroy them so effectually, as to render them less formidable enemies. But Pontius and his officers, rejecting this advice, chose a middle way, not so generous as the former, nor quite so rigorous as the latter. They spared their lives, but at the same time treated them as conquered enemies.

WHILE the Samnites were thus deliberating about the fate of the Romans, the scarcity of provisions increased daily in the invested camp; and no hopes of relief appeared, or possibility of escaping. Some soldiers indeed attempted to get out of the snare, but were met, and driven back by the enemy's parties. In this desperate condition, the consuls sent a deputation to the Samnites to desire a peace upon equitable terms, and in case of refusal to invite them to a battle. Pontius, with a haughty air, gave the deputies the following answer: We have no battles to fight; the victory is already gained. Not a man of your legions shall escape, till you have all been disarmed, and pass'd one by one under the yoke. This is a preliminary, which I absolutely insist upon. Besides this, the Romans shall leave Samnium, and withdraw their colonies from all the cities, which they have taken from us. Tell your consuls this from me; and if they do not accept the terms propos'd, appear no more in my presence. This answer occasioned as great a consternation in the camp, as if they had received advice, that they must die. Nothing was heard but sighs and lamentations. The consuls, struck dumb, durst not declare themselves for so shameful a treaty, and yet could not reject it in the extremity, to which they were reduced. While they were thus hesitating, L. Lentulus, an officer of distinction, who by his wise conduct had rais'd himself to one of the chief posts in the army, and had been at the head of the deputation to the Samnites, broke silence, and in a long harangue, shew'd the necessity of complying with the conditions impos'd, if they desired to save their own lives, or had any regard to the preservation of Rome. His advice was follow'd; and the consuls signified to the Samnite general, that they consented to lay down their arms, and pass under the yoke; upon which they obtained a conference with him. In this interview, Pontius desired to conclude a treaty of peace and friendship with Rome; but the consuls declared, that they could not conclude any that would be binding without the approbation of the people, and the ministry of the Feciales. Our power, said they, extends no farther than to make promises, which we are ready to strengthen by giving hostages. The stipulation was accepted, and on the day appointed, the consuls, lieutenant-generals, quæstors, and military tribunes, went to the camp of the Samnites to sign it. They promised to quit Samnium, evacuate the places where they had plant'd colonies, and suffer the Samnites to live in peace, according to their own laws. To secure the performance of this convention, the Samnites demand'd six hundred Roman knights as hostages, with this condition, that they might cut off their heads, if the republic did not perform the consuls' promises. Upon the return of the consuls sorrow and rage fill'd the hearts of the Roman soldiers. They could scarce refrain themselves from offering violence to their generals, and cutting them in pieces. They form'd dreadful ideas of their future dishonour, and were ready to escape it, by laying violent hands on themselves, and perishing by each others swords. At length the fatal hour came. The six hundred knights march'd first out of the camp, unarmed, and with their under garment only. These were put into the enemy's hands, who conducted them to a place of safety. The two consuls

- a furs appeared next, and were ordered to pull off their paludamenta, or military cloaks, the ensigns of their dignity. At this sight the soldiers, though full of rage against their generals, turned away their eyes, and changed their anger into compassion. They could not see officers of so high a rank treated with so much indignity, without the utmost concern. While the legions were lamenting their hard fate, the consuls passed first under the yoke, stripped of their habits, and half naked; the inferior officers followed according to their rank, and at last the soldiers, one by one. The Samnites insulted them as they passed; and if any Roman returned but a fierce look, he was immediately knocked down, or killed. When they had all passed thus under the yoke, they were allowed to depart; and might have reached Capua the same day; but partly out of distrust of that city, though allied to Rome, and partly out of shame to be seen there in so miserable a condition, they threw themselves on the ground at some distance from that city, with a design to pass the night in the open air without food or refreshment. But the Capuans, being informed of their misfortune, and forlorn condition, immediately sent cloaths, horses, arms, and even lictors and fasces to the consuls, with great plenty of provisions for the whole army. And when, the next day, they drew near the city, the senate and people went out to meet them with all demonstrations of friendship and kindness. But the consuls and their troops, overwhelmed with shame, seemed unaffected with this friendly hospitality. With their eyes fixed on the ground, they persisted in silence, and shunned all discourse.
- c They were attended by the flower of the Campanian nobility to the frontiers of their country; but they still observed the same behaviour, and shewed the same dejection of mind; which made the Capuans conclude, that the Roman courage was for ever lost, and paved the way for a revolt. One of them however, a venerable old man, by name Ofilius Calavius, judged differently of the dumb confusion of the Romans. Their eyes, said he, fixed on the ground, shew how much they are bent on revenge; and their refusing to be comforted is a proof that they will never forgive the affront they have received.

- A T Rome the people began to be in pain for the consular army. News had been brought thither, that it was surrounded by the enemy, and some levies had been made
- d to march to their assistance. But in the mean time the senate, receiving an account of the shameful peace, a stop was put to all further preparations. The people, as soon as it was communicated to them, put on the deepest mourning, without waiting for orders from the senate. The administration of justice was neglected; the shops in the forum were shut up; the Roman matrons laid aside their jewels and gold-rings, the magistrates their robes, &c. In short, the city was in as great consternation as the army. Every one made most bitter invectives against the cowards, as they styled them, and the authors of so shameful a treaty. The multitude were even for shutting them out of the city, as wretches who did not deserve to see their native country again. But the indignation of the Roman people was soon turned into pity. For
- e their unhappy countrymen no sooner appeared at the gates, but the whole city flocked out to see them, every one lamenting with tears in their eyes the misfortunes of those unhappy men. However, they did not enter the city till night, and then every one stole home, and hid himself in his own house. Even the consuls, looking upon themselves as disgraced, and in a manner degraded, banished themselves from public society, and only performed one function of their office, which was indispensable; that is, they named a dictator to preside in the comitia for the election of new consuls, thinking themselves unworthy to appear at the head of the republic in the campus Martius. The dictator they nominated was Q. Fabius Ambustus, who chose Ælius Petus for his general of the horse; but some defect being found in his nomination,
- f Æmilius Papus was substituted in his room; and the general of the horse he chose was Valerius Flaccus. But the people were so dissatisfied with all the magistrates of this unfortunate year, that the latter promotion was as much disliked as the former. Whence it was thought expedient to let the republic fall into an inter-regnum, in order to have a more fortunate president of the comitia than either of the dictators, whom such cowardly consuls had named. And now two of the greatest men in the republic were unanimously chosen, viz. Papirius Cursor a second time, and Publius Philo a third time. They entered upon their office the very day of their election, which was a sort of degradation to their predecessors, who had deserved this affront by their ill conduct. The first business of the new consuls was to get themselves
- g invested in their office by a decree of the senate, declaring, that in point of religion

there had been no defect in their inauguration. After this the treaty with the Samnites ^a being laid before the senate, Posthumius, one of the consuls, who had been parties to it, declared, that the Roman people were not bound by it, as not being made by their order. He added, that the honour of the republic would be saved, by surrendering him and the rest of the officers concerned in the treaty to the Samnites; which he moved might be forthwith done. The senators were struck with admiration at the generosity of Posthumius, and shewed no less compassion for him than esteem. However, they approved of the proposal, and passed it into a decree. Two tribunes of the people, who had been raised to that office since their return from the Caudine Forks, opposed at first the decree, maintaining, that the satisfaction designed for the Samnites was no ways sufficient to discharge the demands they had upon Rome, and that ^b as to themselves, they were sacrosanct magistrates, inviolable, and though concerned in the treaty, not to be delivered up to the enemy. But Posthumius offered such arguments to prove the invalidity of the Caudine convention, and the sufficiency of the designed satisfaction, that the two tribunes consented at last to follow the fate of their companions, and with that view laid down their office. The Romans talked of nothing now but Posthumius; they compared his devotion to that of Decius, and thinking that their republic was obliged in justice to nothing more than to deliver up into the hands of the Samnites those who had signed the treaty, they began to make the necessary preparations for a new war. There needed no orders to raise troops; an army was soon formed almost wholly of volunteers, the Roman youth burning with ^c rage against the Samnites. The Caudine legions were again inrolled, and a powerful army marching from Rome in a few days, arrived in the neighbourhood of Caudium. As the Samnites were incamped at a small distance, preparations were made for surrendering up the Roman officers in due form by a fecialis. Cornelius Arvina, who was deputed by the republic to perform the ceremony, began with commanding Posthumius's hands to be tied. But the officer, who was to do it, not tying the cord hard enough, out of respect to so great a man, the generous Posthumius reproved him. Why do you spare me, said he? Tie me in such a manner, that the enemy may have nothing to suspect in my surrender. In this captive state, the Roman officers were led to the Samnite camp, and presented to Pontius by the fecialis, who ^d expressed himself in these words, as he had been directed: Since these men undertook to conclude a peace with you without any commission, and committed a crime in so doing, we deliver them up to you, in order to free ourselves from any share in the punishment, which they alone have deserved. Upon this Posthumius, as offended at what the fecialis said, immediately gave him a blow on the thigh with his knee, and sternly said, I am now a Samnite, and you an ambassador of Rome. I have therefore by this blow violated the law of nations; and you are thereby authorized to make war upon us. But this little low artifice served only to raise the indignation of the Samnite general, who laid before the fecialis and Posthumius the injustice and baseness of their proceedings. He told them, that they were obliged in justice either ^e to observe the treaty, or send the Roman army again to the Caudian Forks. There, said he, your consuls may reject the peace, if they dislike it. Your honour will then be untainted, and your fidelity, as well as the law of nations, will be preserved inviolate. But shall the lives of your troops be saved, and you enjoy all the advantages of the peace, while we reap no benefit from our conventions? Are these the equitable maxims, upon which your feciales are ordered to act? Is this the justice with which you proceed, in treating with other nations? As for you, Posthumius, do you think the gods will take you for a Samnite, and consider the blow you have given, as an insult offered to the Roman people by our nation? Is it thus that you sport with religion, and the faith of treaties? Are such ludicrous transactions becoming the gravity of a consul, ^f and the dignity of a great nation? Lictors, untie the prisoners, and leave them free to go where they please¹.

Posthumius and his company returned safe to the camp, where all things were getting ready to enter upon action. On the other hand the Samnites kept close within their entrenchments, having, as Livy says, a foreboding of the misfortunes which afterwards befel them. They repented, but too late, of their not having hearkened to the wise counsels of Herennius. So that Pontius, though conqueror, lost in great measure his reputation, while Posthumius, though conquered, and obliged to pass under the yoke, gained immortal glory among his countrymen. For the Romans looked

- a on the liberty he had gained them of making war, as a certain victory. Not long after the inhabitants off Satricum revolted from the Romans, and being supported by a detachment of Samnites, surprized Fregellæ a Roman colony. The Fregellani, running to arms, attempted to drive the enemy out of their city. All the inhabitants, women and children not excepted, stood up in defence of their lands, their altars and their household gods, and from the tops of their houses, made a dreadful slaughter of the enemy. The Samnites and Satricani, fearing they should be obliged to abandon the city, caused a proclamation to be made, offering quarter to all those, who should lay down their arms. Upon this many submitted; but the Samnites, not thinking themselves obliged to keep their word with any of the Roman name, caused all, who had surrendered, to be burnt alive. Only a small number of the Fregellani, who had not hearkened to the enemy's promises, retired fighting, and with their swords cut themselves a way through the midst of the Samnite troops. At the same time some of the chief citizens of Capua entered into a secret plot to shake off the Roman yoke. These commotions induced the republic to have recourse to the usual remedy in times of great danger; a dictator was named, viz. C. Mænius, who appointed M. Fostius, surnamed Flaccinator, to be his general of the horse. The dictator's commission was, contrary to custom, confined to the enquiring into crimes against the state, and punishing them. The terror of a judge, from whom there lay no appeal, so terrified the heads of the conspiracy in Capua, that they killed themselves to avoid a more severe death. As it is common for persons, who are charged with an extraordinary commission, to stretch their power to the utmost extent, the dictator pretended, that this authority extended, not only to the traitorous practices of the Capuans, but to all conspiracies whatsoever, and wheresoever, formed against the Roman state. By conspiracies the dictator, who was a plebeian, as well as his general of the horse, meant all intriguing and canvassing for offices; and accordingly summoned several of the patricians to appear before him on accusations of that kind. Hereupon, not only the accused, but the whole body of the nobility, taking the alarm, threatened to prosecute the dictator, and his general of the horse, as soon as their magistracy should be expired, for the same crime, which was laid to their charge. Our birth alone, said they, leads us to the highest posts. It is only for the common people, and such upstarts, as the dictator and his general of the horse, to raise themselves by intrigues. Mænius, tho' free from guilt, yet fearing lest his reputation should suffer by the reports that began to be spread abroad, assembled the people, and having laid before them the uprightness of his intentions, abdicated the dictatorship, that he might be brought to a trial. Fostius likewise resigned his office for the same purpose. The senate by a special commission appointed the consuls to be their judges. Those of the nobility, who appeared against them, were examined; and upon a full hearing the accused were acquitted in a very honourable manner.

- I T appears from several passages in Livy, and from the Fasti Capitolini, that the operations of the campaign this year were carried on by Cornelius Lentulus dictator, and Papirius Cursor, not in quality of consul, but of general of the horse to Cornelius. These two divided their forces; Cornelius, at the head of the troops that had passed under the yoke, encamped near Caudium; while Papirius marched with the rest of the army to Luceria in Apulia, where the six hundred Roman knights, who had been delivered up to the Samnites as hostages, were kept. Pontius would have willingly marched to the relief of Luceria; but on the other hand, he could not leave his own country open to the Romans; and besides, he was afraid the dictator would fall on his rear. He therefore resolved to put all to the issue of a battle, and accordingly, marching out of his intrenchments, he drew up his men. As soon as the Samnites appeared in order of battle, the dictator assembled his men, in order to exhort them, as was usual on such occasions, to behave themselves valiantly. But the soldiers, animated with an eager desire of revenge, demanded a battle with such clamours, that the general's harangue could not be heard. When they drew near the Samnites, they pressed their standard-bearers to march faster, and fell upon the enemy with such fury, as cannot be expressed. It was then usual to begin general actions with some discharges of darts and stones; but the ardor of the Romans was so great, that they threw down the darts they had in their hands, and without orders drew their swords, and rushed upon the enemy with an impetuosity, that seemed a kind of madness. This irregular animosity, or rather rage, did more than could have been expected from the wisest a conduct. Nothing could stand before them; the Samnite army was put to the rout at the first onset, and their camp taken and plundered. All the Samnites found in the camp were put to the sword, and as great a slaughter of them was made there as in the battle.

AFTER this victory the dictator marched his army into Apulia, to assist his general of the horse in the reduction of Luceria. And indeed the arrival of the victorious army proved very seasonable, Papirius being greatly straitened for want of provisions. The dictator dispersed his legions about the country, and by that means facilitated the bringing of provisions to the camp, and at the same time intercepted the convoys that were sent to the besieged. The Samnites, who had likewise an army near Luceria, finding it impossible for the besieged to hold out long, resolved to give the besiegers battle, which Papirius did not decline. But while every thing was getting ready for a general action, ambassadors arrived from Tarentum, ordering both parties to put a stop to all further hostilities, and protesting that their state would declare against that nation, which should obstinately persist in carrying on the war. Papirius was not a man to be terrified with the threatenings of the Tarentines. But nevertheless, he pretended to pay a regard to them, and answered the ambassadors, that he would confer with the dictator. And indeed the two generals had a conference; but it was only about the most proper measures to be taken with relation to the engagement. While the Romans were sacrificing, as was customary before a battle, the ambassadors came for their answer. Papirius accosted them, and with an air, which shewed how little account Rome made of the menaces of so insignificant a people, The chickens, said he, feed perfectly well: the gods too are much pleased with our sacrifices: under their protection therefore we are going to fight, as you perceive. He then led his troops out of the camp, in order to engage the enemy. But the Samnites being seized with a sudden fright at their approach, declared that they would keep themselves within their camp upon the defensive, out of respect to the Tarentines. The legionaries, encouraged by this timorousness of the enemy, attacked their intrenchments with such vigor and resolution, that they soon forced them, and put all to the sword, who came in their way, sparing neither men, children, slaves, nor even the beasts of burden. Scarce any of the Samnites would have escaped, had not the generals restrained the fury of the soldiers, thirsty of blood, in regard to the six hundred knights in Luceria, whom the besieged, if reduced to despair, might put to death for the sake of having the barbarous pleasure of sacrificing them, before they perished themselves w.

NOTHING now remained, in order to put a glorious end to the campaign, but the reducing of Luceria, which was vigorously defended both by the inhabitants, and by those Samnites, who had escaped from the battle, and taken refuge in the besieged city; among whom was, as some authors tell us *, Pontius himself. But notwithstanding this reinforcement, the garrison, being greatly distressed by famine, offered to capitulate, and to release the six hundred hostages, on condition that the Romans would raise the siege. But Papirius peremptorily insisted, that all the soldiers in the place, to the number of seven thousand, should, unarmed, and with one garment each, pass under the yoke, and Pontius at the head of them. These conditions were accepted, and the Romans had the pleasure of retaliating upon Pontius and his Samnites the ignominy which he had made them, and their consuls, undergo at the Caudine Forks. But their greatest satisfaction was the recovery of the hostages, which had been delivered up to the Samnites, as securities for the execution of a shameful treaty.

THE next year Papirius was raised to the consulate a third time, and Q. Aulus Cerritanus a second time. The latter defeated the Samnites in Apulia, and made himself master of Ferentum, which was either subject to or in alliance with them. The former reduced Sutricum, and put all the Samnites, who were there in garrison, to the sword. The chief authors of the revolt were first beaten with rods, and then beheaded, and a strong body of troops was left in the place to keep the inhabitants in awe. Papirius, after the reduction of this important place, returned to Rome, where he received the honours of a triumph, which he had not obtained the preceding year for far greater exploits, because he had acted under the auspices of a superior magistrate. The people were overjoyed to see him enter Rome with all the pomp due to

- a a man, who had recovered the lustre of the Roman name. Livy represents Papirius as a hero, who would have been a match for Alexander the Great, had he attempted the conquest of Italy. But be that as it will, it is certain, that no general in Italy ^{His character.} equalled him in military skill, or surpassed him in courage. He was very remarkable for his strength of body, and wonderful swiftness in running, whence he had the surname of Cursor. He was a man of a tall stature, and majestic mien, indefatigable in military labours, and always in motion, sharing with the common soldiers the severest toils of war; and whether it was owing to his robust constitution, or continual exercise, no man exceeded him in eating and drinking. No general ever kept his troops to harder service. We are told, that his cavalry, having one day desired a little relaxation from their fatigues, after they were returned from a successful expedition, he pleasantly answered; Yes, by all means, nothing is more just; when you alight from your horses, I excuse you from the trouble of stroaking their backs. Such was the character of the famous Papirius, a man greatly celebrated by all the Latin writers.

In the following consulate of L. Plautius and M. Fostius, many of the Samnite ^{The Samnites} cities sent deputies to the Roman senate to ask peace; but could only obtain a two ^{obtain a two} years truce. In Apulia the consul Plautius spread so much terror, that the cities of Teanum and Canusium surrendered, and gave hostages. At this time Capua was so divided by intestine broils, that the inhabitants desired the Romans to give them a governor, and new laws to keep them in order; and it was on this occasion that the Romans turned Campania into a præfecture, and sent thither a præfect. Two new tribes ^{Campania} were formed this year, one in Campania, perhaps to make the Campanians some sort ^{turned into a} of amends for their liberty, which they had voluntarily given up: this was called ^{præfecture.} the Falernian tribe, no doubt from the hill Falernus. The other was established in the country watered by the Ufens on the confines of Latium, and therefore called Tribus Ufentina; so that the Romans had now thirty-one tribes, all with the right of suffrage in the comitia by tribes². This year ended with a census, taken by L. Papirius Crassus, and C. Manius, censors; by which it appeared, that the number of men in Rome fit to bear arms amounted to two hundred and fifty thousand.

- d THE next year, Q. Æmilius and C. Junius being consuls, all Apulia was subdued; ^{All Apulia} so that this year proved no less prosperous for the republic than the former. At the same ^{subdued.} time Antium followed the example of Capua, in having recourse to Rome for a governor and laws, which the republic readily granted (W). The succeeding consuls, Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius, no sooner entered upon their office, but they were obliged by the senate to nominate, contrary to custom, a dictator to carry on the war. Perhaps the people had but an indifferent opinion of their ability in warlike affairs. At least, it is certain, that they did not appear at the head of the army, but continued at Rome the whole time of their administration. L. Æmilius, who was appointed dictator, and chose L. Fulvius for his general of the horse, received the command of the legions from the preceding consuls, and with those troops began the campaign, by laying siege to Saticula, a city of Campania, in alliance with the Samnites, who came with a very numerous army to relieve the place. But the dictator defeated them in a pitched battle, after which they abandoned their camp in the night, and left the Saticulans without any hopes of relief. However, the besieged made such a vigorous resistance, that the dictatorship of Æmilius expired, before he could make himself master of the place. The new consuls were, the famous Papirius Cursor, and Publius Philo, both chosen the fourth time. They had both triumphed more than once over the Samnites, were men of distinguished merit, and the greatest and most experienced generals the Romans had. But nevertheless, they had the mortification to see the carrying on of the war committed to another general, while they continued inglorious, and in a manner out of office at Rome. Such mortifications are often given to men of the greatest merit in popular governments. The people obliged the consuls of the preceding year to raise to the dictatorship Q. Fabius Maximus, who had been formerly general

(W) Antium was not made a præfecture; nor was any single magistrate sent thither to give her laws. This was left to the patrons of the colony, it being then customary not only for private families, but for cities, and whole provinces, to have patrons, who were often of the chief nobility of Rome. The patrons of the municipia were generally of the families of those consuls and generals who had conquered them; and the patrons of the colonies were the children of those who had received the commission to plant them.

of the horse to Papirius, and ever since his implacable enemy. The new dictator ^a immediately set out for Saticula, where he received the command of the legions, not from the consuls, but from Æmilius the dictator, whose office was expiring. No sooner had the Roman army changed its general, but the Samnites, who after their defeat had laid siege to Plisfia, a city in alliance with Rome, returned to Saticula, in order to try their strength with the new general. Fabius, without being alarmed in the least at the great number of their troops, continued his attacks with the infantry, while his cavalry guarded the camp under the command of Aulus Cerretanus, his general of the horse. The Samnites having one day advanced to the very gates of the camp, and there insulted the Roman cavalry, Aulus, without consulting the dictator, sallied out with the Roman knights. This was a breach of discipline, like that which Fabius himself ^b had been formerly guilty of. Aulus at first repelled the enemy, but the Samnite general rallied his troops, revived their courage, and led them back to the charge. Aulus discovering him, rushed on him, and laid him dead on the ground with one blow. The Samnites, not in the least disheartened at the death of their general, thought of nothing but revenge. Aulus, having penetrated too far into the enemy's squadrons, could not retire. Whereupon the Samnites, having surrounded him on all sides, called upon their general's brother, that he might have the glory of revenging his death. Accordingly, he dismounted Aulus, and, full of rage, stabbed him as he lay on the ground. It was then thought a singular honour to get possession of the body of a general, who had been slain in battle. The Samnites therefore exerted their utmost ^c efforts to carry off the body of Aulus. Hereupon the Roman knights alighted from their horses to recover it, and free Rome from so terrible a reproach. The example of the Roman cavalry was followed by the Samnites; so that a battle was fought between them on foot, in which the Romans at length prevailed, and carried back to the camp the body of their general. After the loss of the battle, the Samnites returned to the siege of Plisfia, which they took by assault. Fabius pursued that of Saticula, which at length capitulated. From Saticula the dictator, without loss of time, marched to besiege Sora, a city in the country of the Volsci, which had declared for the Samnites, after having massacred a Roman colony settled in their territory. The Samnites, after the reduction of Plisfia, followed him; which Fabius no sooner understood, than he ^d turned back to meet them, and came to an engagement with them near the narrow pass of Lentula, not far from the Pomptin marshes. Night put an end to it before either party could claim the victory; and both armies the next day continued their march to Sora, the one to attack, the other to defend it. In the mean time the dictator, having chosen a new general of the horse, L. Fabius, a relation of his own, he ordered him to go to Rome, to bring fresh levies from thence, and concealing his march from the enemy, to wait, in some secure place near Sora, the signal for entering upon action. The dictator's orders were obeyed, and Fabius soon arrived with a strong reinforcement. Hereupon the dictator, pretending fear, kept close in his intrenchments, in order to draw the enemy's army near his camp. Accordingly, the Samnites ^e marched up to the very rampart, when the Roman general all on a sudden, without informing his legions of the succours Rome had sent him, hung out a red standard over his tent, which was the signal for battle. By the fright the dictator shewed, and his sudden resolution of giving battle, the soldiers thought themselves in great danger, and imagined they had no remedy left but to make a brisk sally on the enemy. The dictator confirmed them in this opinion, by telling them, that their case was such, that they must either conquer or perish; that he had ordered fire to be set to their baggage and tents; but that they might soon make up the loss by the plunder of the cities, which had shaken off the Roman yoke, and sided with the enemy. However, he gave private orders to set fire to those tents only, which were next to the ramparts; ^f and this was the signal for the general of the horse to put his troops in motion, and fall upon the enemy's rear. As every thing was executed with wonderful harmony, the enemy was at the same time attacked in the front and the rear with such fury, that they were forced to give way, and leave the Romans, not only masters of the field, but also of their camp, which was taken and plundered. After this the dictator led his troops back to their own camp, where, to their great joy and surprize, they found that only a small number of their tents had been burnt. After this victory, Fabius laid siege to Sora, which was continued by his successors in the command of the army, M. Pætilius Libo, and C. Sulpicius Longus, the new consuls. We know not what motives could induce the public to disappoint Fabius of the honours of a triumph, which he ^g had

- a had well deserved, but did not obtain on his return to Rome. The two consuls incamped close to the walls of the besieged city, in order to keep the garison continually in play. But the inhabitants, not in the least intimidated either by the nearness of the Romans, the number of their troops, or the late defeat of the Samnites, defended themselves with incredible bravery. While the consuls were under great perplexity, as not knowing in what part to make their attacks, the walls being every-where well guarded, a deserter from the town came to the Roman camp, and offered to put the place into their hands with the help of ten chosen men only. The consuls, having examined and approved of his scheme, removed by his advice their camp some miles from the city, which brought the garison into a kind of security. Then the deserter, at the head of his ten men, stealing in the night time into a part of the upper city, where the wall was unguarded, because thought inaccessible, placed them in a narrow steep path, leading from the citadel to the lower town. This done, he ran down into the lower town, crying, To arms, to arms; the enemy are in possession of the fortress. The inhabitants, seized with fear, thought of nothing but saving their lives by flight. Men and women, leaving their houses, rushed in confusion out at the gates, which the Romans on their approach finding open, entered the city without resistance, and put all those to the sword whom they met in the streets. The consuls sent the authors of the revolt, and of the massacre of the Roman colony, to Rome, where they were all, to the number of two hundred and twenty-five, by an order from the senate, first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. From Sora the consuls marched into the country of the Aufones, and upon an accusation, without proof, of their having formed a design to revolt, sent detachments to surprize their three chief cities, Aufona, Minturna, and Vesuvia. As the troops employed in this enterprise were out of their commanders sight, they set no bounds to their fury. The three cities were taken on the same day, and at the same hour; the Roman soldiers, having got into them under various disguises, put all the inhabitants to the sword without distinction of sex or age; and this upon the bare suspicion of a rebellion. Luceria, which had revolted, and massacred the colony which Rome had sent thither, was taken the same year by assault; and both the inhabitants and Samnites, who defended it, put to the sword. The senate was at first inclined to raze a city, which had so often revolted; but it was afterwards resolved, that a colony of two thousand five hundred men should be sent thither from Rome to secure that important city, which kept all Apulia in awe ^a.

- THE Campanians, notwithstanding these examples of severity, prepared once more, as they were a restless and factious people, to shake off the Roman yoke. Rome therefore thought fit to name a dictator to keep the inhabitants in subjection by arms, and the fear of an absolute magistrate. C. Manius was raised to that dignity the second time; and he chose the same general of the horse, M. Fostius, whom he had named to that post in his former dictatorship. The dictator entered Campania, and encamped near Capua, while the consul Sulpicius, at the head of another army, drew near Caudium, where the Samnites waited for the insurrection of the Campanians. The two armies came soon to an engagement, in which the Samnites gained at first the advantage; but by the prudent conduct of the consul Sulpicius, were in the end intirely defeated, with the loss of thirty thousand men killed or taken. After this victory the consul marched to Bovianum, one of the chief cities of Samnium, and having posted his troops round it in quarters of refreshment, returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph ^b.

- THE ensuing year L. Papirius Cursor a fifth time, and C. Junius Brutus a second time, were raised to the consulate. But nevertheless a dictator was nominated to carry on the war against the Samnites. The person honoured with that dignity was C. Pætilius Libo, surnamed Visolus, who, having chosen Pætilius Libo, one of the last year's consuls, for his general of the horse, set out for Bovianum, where the legions were cantoned; but in a short time quitted that post to retake Fregellæ, which the enemy abandoned at his approach. After he had placed a strong garison in it, he led his army against Nola, which he quickly reduced, as he did likewise the cities of Atina and Calatia, both in the same province. The following year, when M. Valerius Maximus, and P. Decius Mus, were in the consulate, the Romans, being alarmed with the apprehensions of a war with all Hetruria, appointed C. Sulpicius Longus, dictator, to conduct it. But the Hetrurians continuing quiet within their own bounds, no hostilities ensued on either side, the dictator being unwilling to stir up new enemies against his republic.

Appius Claudius censor admits the sons of freedmen into the senate, and debases the priesthood.

At home the city was greatly disturbed by the innovations of Appius Claudius, at this time censor. He was a man extremely wedded to his own opinion, and had boldness enough to undertake any thing, and steadiness to maintain whatever he undertook. He was an able civilian, and looked upon as the oracle of Rome in all knotty points of law; but a lover of reformatations, and one who took delight in overturning the most ancient institutions, and setting up for a legislator. This great man, for he was really so, notwithstanding some faults, in his censorship took upon him to humble the pride of the senate. It belonged to the censors to draw up and read, after every lustrum, a list of those citizens, who had a right to sit and vote in the senate. Hitherto none but patricians, or the most considerable among the plebeians, had been admitted into it. But Appius introduced the libertini, that is, the sons of those, who, having been slaves, had obtained their liberty. Having thus debased the senate, he attacked the priesthood, which was confined to the nobility alone. The most ancient priesthood in Rome was that of the temple of Hercules, and of the altar, which had been consecrated to him under the name of Ara Maxima by Evander, in memory of his victory over Cacus. This priesthood, when first instituted, had been conferred upon a venerable old man of the Aborigines, named Potitius, and had continued ever since in his family. But Appius prevailed upon the Potitii to resign this venerable priesthood to the slaves belonging to the public, a most contemptible race of men. By this means he gave the nobility a fatal blow, the priesthood being the only dignity, which the plebeians at this time did not share with the patricians. Livy, who has affected to fill his history with wonderful events, speaks of a tradition, that the whole name of the Potitii, consisting of twelve families, in which were thirty persons, at or past the age of puberty, perished within the year, Hercules thus revenging himself on the family, which had despised him. The same author adds, that Appius was struck blind some years after by the angry gods, as a punishment for his profaneness. But Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Appius confined himself to his house, and that he only pretended to be blind, lest, if he appeared in public, he should be reproached by the patricians, whom he had highly exasperated. Thus Appius brought a blemish on the senate and priesthood; but made his country amends by the useful works he undertook with success. For by an aqueduct seven miles long, he supplied Rome with plenty of wholesome water, which it wanted before, and made the famous road from Rome to Capua, which lasted intire above eight hundred years. The remains of this wonderful work are the admiration of all the nations in Europe to this day (X).

(X) The aqueduct of Appius began seven miles from Rome, and after having run a great way under ground, discharged part of its waters between the gates Capena and Trigemina, and conveyed the rest quite to the campus Martius. It was dug under-ground, and laid very deep, says Frontinus (16), either because the art of levelling was not then brought to perfection; or because the Roman territory was yet too much exposed to the incursion of her enemies, who might have destroyed the stately arches, and intercepted the water. This water was for many ages called Aqua Appia from the censor's name. The other work he undertook was equally useful to the republic. The road from Rome to Capua was almost impassable, especially for the Roman armies, which were often obliged to cross the Pomptin marshes to make war in Samnum, and in the east of Italy. The censor therefore levelled a way through rocks and hills, and built bridges over the rivulets and marshes for the conveniency of the troops and of travellers. This road was called the Appian way, and also the queen of roads. Procopius gives us the following description of it (17): This way was made, says he, nine hundred years ago, by the order and direction of Appius Claudius, who was then censor. It reached from Rome to Capua, that is, about a hundred and forty-two miles. It was broad enough for two chariots to go abreast without incommoding each other. The stones which Appius employed in this great work, were brought from a great distance, and as hard as flints. These great pieces of rock were squared and smoothed by the most skilful workmen. The stones were so artfully joined together without any cement, that they looked like one single stone for several miles together. This vast work continues intire to this day without having received the least injury from carts and carriages. Thus far Procopius. This famous road began at the gate Capena, and did not for a great while reach farther than Capua, though the author of the lives of illustrious men gives Appius the honour of carrying it from Rome quite to Brunnsium, in the extreme parts of Italy on the Adriatic sea. But that writer is herein certainly mistaken, the provinces, through which he must have carried this work, in order to bring it to the sea, not being at that time subject to the Romans. In the beginning of Augustus's reign it reached indeed to Brunnsium, that is, two hundred thirty-eight miles further. But no historian tells us who was the author or manager of this second work. Most writers guess, that it was done by Julius Caesar; for Plutarch tells us, that the

- a THE succeeding consuls, C. Junius Brutus a third time, and Q. Æmilius Barbula a second time, cancelled, with the consent and approbation of the people, the new list of senators, which Appius had made, and restored that venerable body to its former lustre. This same year the people recovered a privilege, which the consuls and dictators had usurped from them. A law had been formerly made, by which the people assembled in the comitia were empowered to chuse six legionary tribunes (Y) out of the twenty-four in the consular armies consisting of four legions. Each consul had two legions under his command, which made a consular army; and each legion was commanded by six tribunes. The generals had for some time taken upon them to nominate all the legionary tribunes without any regard to the right of the people.
- b L. Atilius therefore, and C. Marcus, two tribunes of the people, got a decree passed in the comitia, empowering the people not only to chuse six tribunes, as formerly, but sixteen out of the twenty-four. But this law was not of long duration. Though the republic at this time stood in no need of a fleet, having no wars to maintain but with the Samnites and Hetrurians, yet the people, at the motion of Decius Mus, one of their tribunes, appointed two officers, styled by the Latin historians Duumviri Navales, to take upon them the care of naval affairs^d. Duumviri Navales.
- c IN the mean time the two consuls took the field, Brutus against the Samnites, and Æmilius against the Hetrurians. The latter found the enemy ready to lay siege to Sutrium with a very numerous army, all the leucumones, except that of Arretium, having furnished their contingents of troops. The consul no sooner appeared, but the Hetrurians, depending on their numbers, offered him battle, which Æmilius did not decline. Both Romans and Hetrurians behaved with extraordinary courage and resolution. The latter, being obstinately bent to conquer or die, fell in great numbers round their colours without giving ground, or being put into disorder. The battle lasted till night put an end to it, when both armies retired in good order to their respective camps. But as the Hetrurians had lost more men than the Romans, they thought fit to retire in the night, and leave the consul master of the field. Livy robs Æmilius of the glory of a triumph for this victory, which he represents as very inconsiderable; but it is certain from the Capitoline marbles, that he entered Rome triumphantly on the ides of the month Sextilis^e; whence we are inclined to think, that this victory was more complete than that writer makes it. As for the other consul, he took from the Samnites first Cluvia, and then Bovianum. All those in the former, who were able to bear arms, were put to the sword; the latter was given up to be plundered by the soldiers, but the lives of the citizens were spared. And now the Samnites had no refuge but in artifice; they endeavoured to draw the Romans into new Caudian Forks, and with this view spread a report in the Roman camp by their emissaries, that they had conveyed all their provisions and effects into the forest of Avernus between Cumæ and Puteoli in Campania. The Roman troops, allured by the hopes of booty, entered the forest, where they were all on a sudden surrounded by the enemy's forces, who lay concealed among the bushes. But the legions, rallying in an instant, threw all their baggage into a heap, and without waiting for the word of command, drew up in battalia, and falling upon the enemy, obliged them to seek an asylum in those very woods, which they intended to have rendered fatal to the Romans. the Roman people committed the inspection of the Appian way to him, and that he spent great sums of money upon that work. The Appian way is still in many places for several miles together as entire as when it was first made (18). It was paved with several beds of great stones, and bounded on each side with a deep ditch to receive and carry off the water.

(Y) There were, generally speaking, six legionary tribunes in each legion, which they commanded by turns; that is, first, two of these tribunes commanded in chief at a time, and then were succeeded by two others; and so round. Varro tells us, that these officers were called tribunes from the beginning of the monarchy, because a legion then consisted of three thousand men only, and had but three tribunes, there being as many legionary tribunes as thousands of men in each legion. Polybius tells us, that of the twenty-four tribunes, who were in each consular army, consisting of two legions, fourteen were chosen out of the equites or knights, who had served five years, and the other ten out of such as had served in the foot full ten years. The former were called Tribuni Juniores, and the latter Tribuni Seniores. But these qualifications were not rigorously insisted on till the latter ages, when the Roman discipline became more regular.

nels of the forest, the Romans massacred them without mercy, and left twenty thousand of them dead upon the spot. For this victory Junius Brutus enjoyed the honours of a triumph, though Livy does not mention it, on the nones of the month Sextilis^f. During the administration of the following consuls, Q. Fabius a second time, and C. Marcius, the censor Appius obstinately refused to quit his office, though his eighteen months, the legal time for its duration, were expired, presuming on the favour of the people, who were greatly pleased with his aqueduct and new road. Nevertheless Sempronius Sopbus cited him to appear before the people for this infraction of the law. Seven of the tribunes were for committing him to prison; but the other three taking him under their protection, he carried his point, and kept the censorship alone, his colleague having resigned it in compliance with the law, more than three years longer.

Q. Fabius gives the Hetrurians a total overthrow, and penetrates into the Ciminian forest.

DURING these disturbances, the Hetrurians, having drawn together all their forces, encamped in the neighbourhood of Sutrium. But the consul Fabius falling upon them gave them a total overthrow, took thirty-eight standards from them, and made himself master of their camp, and all their baggage. Those, who escaped the slaughter, took refuge in the Ciminian forest. Whereupon Fabius proposed in a council of war to pursue the conquered even into the most impenetrable parts of the wood. But not one officer was for marching in quest of the Hetrurians at the hazard of finding the Caudian Forks of Samnium in Hetruria. And indeed the Ciminian forest, says Livy, was at that time more impassable and dreadful than the Hercynian forest in Germany. No body, not even the merchants, had ever attempted to pass through it. However, Fabius resolved to enter it, thinking his victory was not complete so long as the enemy could conceal themselves in this thick forest. He had then with him a near relation, by name Cæso Fabius, who knowing perfectly well the Hetrurian language, as he had been brought up at Cære, undertook to examine the forest and places about it. He took only one slave with him, who having been brought up with him, had learnt the language of the country, as well as himself. Before they set out, they disguised themselves in the habit of shepherds, bearing each a hatchet and two javelins, after the manner of the peasants. But their chief security against a discovery was the general notion that no stranger would dare to enter that forest. In this disguise they set out, and travelled as far as Camerinum in Umbria; where Fabius discovering himself to be a Roman, treated with the magistrates of the place in the name of the consul, and obtained a promise, that if the Roman army should come into those parts, they would supply it with a reinforcement of men, and thirty days provisions. Upon the report made by Fabius at his return, the consul resolved to enter the forest, and carry the war that way into the very heart of Hetruria, and executed his design with a great deal of address. He ordered all his baggage to be removed out of the camp in the evening, and the infantry to follow it to the place where he designed to enter the forest. He continued himself in the intrenchments with the cavalry, which he marched early in the morning to the skirts of the wood, where the enemy had placed some centinels. Having by this means kept the enemy in play, he returned, after some slight skirmishes, to his camp; but soon marched out of it again by another gate to join his infantry, which he came up with before night, and together with them entered the narrow passes on the opposite side to the enemy. The next morning by day-break he reached the top of the hill Ciminus, which gave name to the forest. From thence he surveyed with pleasure the vast and fruitful plains of Hetruria; was charmed that he had broke through a barrier, which had been hitherto impenetrable to the Romans, and promised himself much spoil, and great conquests. From mount Ciminus he sent a detachment of legionaries, who not only brought off an immense booty, but defeated a tumultuous army, that had got together to rescue it out of their hands. After this expedition, Fabius returned to his camp, where he found two tribunes of the people sent thither to forbid him in the name both of the senate and people to venture upon so dangerous an expedition. But the tribunes, extremely pleased to find that the prohibition was come too late, and that the success of the project had put an end to the public fears, returned to Rome with the joyful tidings that a way was opened into Hetruria.

THE detachments, which Fabius had sent out to plunder, having alarmed all Hetruria, and the people on the confines of Hetruria, these two nations took the field together, and came to the camp before Sutrium, where they drew up in the plain, and

- a offered the Romans battle. But Fabius, pretending fear, kept close within his intrenchments, and having by this means lulled the enemy into a false security, he drew up his men, about the fourth watch of the night, within the intrenchment of the camp, caused the ramparts to be levelled, and the ditch to be filled, and then marched out and surprised the enemy while half asleep, and lying scattered over the plain. Of the Hetrurians were sixty thousand men slain, or taken prisoners. Their camp was seized and plundered, those who had the good luck to escape, flying to the wood. The Hetrurians overcome by Fabius. Historians do not agree about the place where this important victory was gained, some contending that it was beyond mount Ciminus near Perusia. But be that as it will, this overthrow was so great, that the three leucumonies of Cortona, Arretium, and Perusia, immediately sent deputies to Rome to desire a suspension of arms, which they obtained for thirty years.

THE consul Marcus was not attended with the same success against the Samnites. For though at first he gained some advantages over them, and took Allifæ, a considerable place on the Vulturnus, with several other castles and villages, he had the mortification to hear of the misfortune which befel the Roman fleet, the first Rome had ever put to sea. It was commanded by P. Cornelius, who having made a descent at Pompeii beyond cape Palinurus, suffered his troops to penetrate too far into the country, and thereby gave the inhabitants time to assemble, and cut off their retreat. The Romans were forced to relinquish their booty; several of them were slain, and those who escaped The Samnites gain considerable advantages over the Romans.

- c were driven to their ships. This news, with a report spread among the Samnites, that Fabius had met with the Caudine Forks in the Ciminian forest, revived their courage to such a degree, that they gave Marcus battle, which is allowed by all historians to have been a very bloody one, and to have cost both parties very dear. At Rome the Romans were thought to have lost it. A great number of the Roman knights, and several legionary tribunes, were killed; one of the lieutenant-generals was left dead upon the spot, and the consul himself was dangerously wounded. In order therefore to prevent the misfortunes which were thought imminent, the republic judged it necessary to chuse a dictator, and cast her eyes on Papirius Cursor, whose fate it was to be the refuge of his country in times of public danger. The difficulty was how to get him nominated. It was doubted whether the consul Marcus was alive; and besides, the Samnites had stoppt up all the avenues to his camp. As for Fabius, it was much questioned whether he could be prevailed upon to raise his mortal enemy to the dictatorship, and whether Papirius would accept of that dignity from the hands of his old rival in glory. Under these difficulties the senate thought fit to pass a decree, commanding Fabius to nominate Papirius to the dictatorship, and enjoining Papirius to accept it. This decree was sent by the senate to Fabius's camp at Sutrium, with a deputation of their own body, consisting of such persons as had all been consuls. When they read to him the decree of the senate, he was struck with surprise and confusion; but kept his temper, and retired to his tent without coming to any determination. At length his love for his country getting the better of his private resentment, at midnight, according to the superstitious custom, he declared Papirius dictator; who having appointed C. Junius Bubulcus to be his master of the horse, without loss of time marched away with an army, which had been suddenly raised upon the alarm of Fabius's danger in passing the Ciminian forest, and arrived at Longula on the frontiers of the Volscei, where Marcus delivered up to him the troops under his command. Papirius offered the enemy battle, but they declining it, both armies continued some days quiet in their camps watching each other. Papirius Cursor dictator.

IN the mean time Fabius, who was continued in the command of the army in Hetruria with the title of proconsul, carried the war into Umbria, at that time in alliance with the Hetrurians, and gained a complete victory over the Umbrians, who no more appeared in the field. While Fabius was waging war in Umbria, the Hetrurians assembled the most numerous army they had ever raised, on the banks of a little lake called Vadimonius. All the soldiers, who composed it, had made a vow to conquer or die. At least this is supposed to be the meaning of their sacred law, by which they are said to have bound themselves. But whatever we understand by it, it is certain, that the Hetrurians shewed by their obstinacy in maintaining the fight, how much power their sacred law had over their minds. What helped to promote unanimity, and create emulation among their troops, was the leave which was given to every private man to chuse himself a companion to fight by him. But Fabius was not afraid to engage an enemy who had even made it a point of religion not to give way. Both armies armies were so warmly bent on trying each other's strength, that, as soon as they drew near, they rushed upon one another sword in hand, without losing time in throwing darts, as was usual, by way of prelude to the battle. The success was long doubtful, and this uncertainty increased the ardor of both parties. The Romans could scarce believe that they were contending with the same people they had so often conquered. On the side of the Romans, their first line was cut in pieces, and second repulsed; so that the proconsul was obliged to bring his triarii to the charge, which was never done, but in the utmost extremity. Nor was even this sufficient; it became necessary for the Roman cavalry to dismount, and support the foot. But when the Roman knights, who were quite fresh, passing over heaps of dead bodies, had placed themselves in the front of the battle, they fell upon the enemy with such fury, that the Hetrurians began at length to give way. Hereupon the legions, shattered and fatigued as they were, returned to the charge, overpowered the enemy, and obliged their whole army to fly in the utmost disorder and confusion. The Hetrurians lost the flower of their youth in this action; their camp was taken and plundered, and their whole nation thrown into the utmost consternation ^e.

Papirius gains
a complete victory over the Samnites.

THE dictator Papirius was no less successful against the Samnites, whose general, to raise the courage of his men, had given them finer arms than usual. He divided his army into two bodies, one of which he clothed in stuff of various colours, and furnished with gilt bucklers; the other was armed with silvered bucklers, and clad in white habits. That this novelty might not surprise the Roman soldiers, their officers put them in mind, that true glory consisted in martial courage, that gold and silver were of no use in battle but to enrich the conquerors, and that those, who at the beginning of an engagement were the poorest, often proved the richest at the end of it. The officers having thus raised the courage of their men with the hopes of booty, Papirius drew up his army in the plain. He commanded the right wing himself, and his general of the horse, Junius Bubulcus, the left, which faced the white battalions. Bubulcus advancing with his legions, cried out, I devote all these white men to the black Pluto; and immediately falling upon them, forced them to give ground; which the dictator observing, cried out, What! will you, who have a dictator at your head, suffer the chief glory of the action to be gained by another? This said, he pressed his soldiers to advance, and encouraged them with his example. At the same time his two lieutenants, M. Valerius on the right, and P. Decius on the left, who had both commanded armies in chief as consuls, putting themselves at the head of the cavalry, each on his own side, attacked with great fury the enemy in flank. Then the Samnites, seized with terror, broke their ranks, and fled with all speed to their camp. All the plain was covered with gilt and silvered arms, and dead bodies in white cloth, and stuffs of various colours. The victory was so complete, that the Samnites abandoned their camp, which before night was taken and burnt. Papirius, having thus retrieved the glory of the Roman arms in Samnium, returned to Rome, where he was decreed a triumph, which was embellished with the fine arms he had taken from the Samnites. About the same time Fabius arrived from Hetruria, and triumphed the same year as the dictator; the former on the ides of November, and the latter on the ides of October. Papirius, after his triumph, retired for the rest of his life from public business; whence we shall not see him appear on the stage any more. The circumstances and time of his death are unknown; but all agree that in him Rome lost one of the greatest generals she ever had ^h.

WHEN Papirius's dictatorship was expired, Q. Fabius the third time, and Decius Mus the second time, were raised to the consulate. Samnium fell by lot to the former, and Hetruria to the latter. Fabius took Nuceria, which had some time since joined the Samnites; whom he defeated afterwards in a battle, but without gaining any great advantage over them. As for Decius, he was attended with such success in Hetruria, that the whole nation desired an alliance with Rome. But as the way was now open for making the conquest of this rich country, the consul granted them only a truce for one year; and even that cost them dear: for Decius made them pay his troops, and furnish every soldier with two suits of cloaths. While all was quiet in Hetruria, the Umbrians, having armed all their youth, without concerning themselves about the consul, who was in Hetruria, formed a design of marching directly to Rome. This put both the consuls in motion. The prudent Decius, leaving Hetruria, by long

- a marches came and incamped in a place called the Pupinian field, lying in the way between Umbria and Rome, and there quietly waited for the arrival of the enemy. But the bold and enterprising Fabius no sooner received orders from the senate to cover Latium, than he left Samnium, crossed Sabinia, and entering Umbria, encamped in the very heart of the country near a city called Mevania, on the banks of the Clitumnus. His sudden and unexpected appearance among them so terrified them, that some retired into their strong-holds, and others fled to the woods. However, a considerable body of the most resolute had courage enough to offer the consul battle, in which they behaved more like women than men. The Romans rushing upon them, beat them down with their bucklers, without making any use of their swords. They took the standards from those who guarded them, and carried the standard-bearers to the consul. They even surrounded whole bodies of troops, and made them prisoners without striking a blow. For the words, Lay down your arms, were no sooner heard in the ranks, but they all obeyed, and even delivered up to Fabius the authors of the war. So that little or no blood was spilt, but the whole army were made prisoners, and the rest of the nation soon after submitted to Rome. After this Fabius hastened back to Samnium to oppose the enterprises of that warlike people ¹.

- WHEN the time came for the electing of new consuls, Appius Claudius, who had kept the censorship five years in direct defiance to the laws, stood candidate for the consulate. He was no soldier, and it seemed very improper at that time to bestow the fasces upon any but great commanders. However, Appius being supported by the people, carried his point, and was promoted to the consulate the first time with L. Volumnius Flamma. But as he was not qualified for the command of the army, the senate obliged him to continue in the city, and left Fabius in quality of proconsul at the head of the army, which he had commanded the year before. Appius, upon what motives we know not, did all that lay in his power to prevent Fabius from having the sole command of the army, and advised the senate to appoint him a colleague. But his proposal was rejected; and Fabius continued without any associate in the command of all the troops in Samnium, where he made the campaign with great success. The Samnites had advanced as far as Allifæ on the banks of the Vulturnus, and there the proconsul attacked them, and gained a complete victory. The conquered fled to their camp, which Fabius, as the day was already far spent, did not attack then, but kept it invested all night. Early next morning, while he was preparing to force it, the Samnites thought fit to capitulate, and surrender upon articles; the chief of which was, that all the natives of Samnium should have their lives spared, and be sent home; but that they should march out of the camp with only one garment, and pass under the yoke. As for the allies of the Samnites, the proconsul made no terms with them; so that they were all, to the number of seven thousand, made slaves, and sold by auction. The Hernici were separated from the rest, and sent to Rome to be examined, whether they had joined the Samnites as volunteers, or by a public order of their nation. The conscript fathers, after having examined them, kept them as slaves, and distributed them about in the villages and municipal towns near Rome ².

- WHILE Fabius was thus employed against the Samnites, the consul Volumnius made war on the Salentines in the farthest part of Italy; with whom he fought some battles with success, and paved the way for his successors to make an intire conquest of that fruitful country. In the mean time the consular year being expired, the fasces were transferred to Q. Marcius Tremulus, and P. Cornelius Arvina, and at the same time Appius was created prætor, a post, which, as he was an able civilian, and eloquent orator, well suited his talents. Marcius marched against the Hernici, who had taken up arms, provoked at the severe treatment which some of their countrymen, made prisoners in the late battle with the Samnites, had met with at Rome. The Hernici, formerly so formidable, were now, it seems, become a contemptible people. For Marcius in a few days took three different camps from them, and obliged them to surrender at discretion. The consul having ended this war, hastened to join his colleague, who stood in great want of his assistance, having suffered himself to be invested by the Samnites in narrow passes, where all his convoys were intercepted. The enemy, hearing of his march, went to meet him, and gave him battle, while his troops were fatigued with long marches, and in some disorder. The battle began with the usual fury of men under a necessity of conquering or dying; both the Samnites and Romans fighting with incredible resolution. As the attack was made not far from the camp ^a of Cornelius, by the shouts he heard, and the clouds of dust which were raised, he judged that his colleague was engaged with the enemy. Whereupon he immediately ordered his troops to arms, marched out of his intrenchments, and falling upon the enemy in flank, broke through them, and made his way to their camp, and set fire to it. At the sight of the flames the Samnites were so discouraged, that they betook themselves to a disorderly flight, every man shifting for himself in the best manner he could. The Romans pursued them, cutting them in pieces, till they were tired with slaughter, and then returned to their camp. In this action the Samnites lost thirty thousand men. While the Roman generals were congratulating each other on their victory, news was brought that a new body of Samnites appeared near the field of ^b battle. These were new levies raised all over Samnium, and sent to recruit the army. They no sooner appeared, than the victorious legions, forgetting the fatigues they had already undergone, assembled before they had received the consuls orders, drew up in battalia, and falling upon the new-comers, dispersed them with great slaughter. The Samnites, now quite disheartened, sent deputies to the consuls to sue for peace. The consuls referred the suppliants to Rome, after having obliged the vanquished to supply, by way of preliminary, the two armies with three months provisions, to give them a year's pay, and furnish each soldier with one habit ¹.

The two consuls being in the field, when the time came for electing new magistrates, P. Cornelius, surnamed Barbatus, was appointed dictator to preside in the ^c comitia. He chose Decius Mus for his general of the horse, and the people Posthumius Megillus and Tib. Minucius Augurinus for their next year's consuls. At the same time the senate determined the fate of the Hernici. The cities of Alatrium, Ferentinum, and Verulum, which had continued faithful to the Romans, were allowed to chuse whether they would be governed by their own laws, or have the right of Roman citizens; and they preferred the former. The inhabitants of the other cities were obliged to be governed by the laws of Rome, and declared Roman citizens, but without the right of suffrage. They were forbid to hold any assemblies, or to marry out of their own cities. This law the Romans used to impose on conquered nations to prevent a too strict union among them. At this time deputies arrived from Carthage with a com- ^d pliment and presents, which the republic accepted, and made others in return. The new consuls were both ordered into Samnium, each at the head of a consular army, that is, of an army consisting of two legions. The Samnites, notwithstanding their losses, had entered Campania, and laid waste the fruitful country of Fulcrum. Marcus therefore encamped in the neighbourhood of Bovianum, and Posthumius took his rout towards Tifernum. The latter came to an engagement with the Samnites, the success of which being equal, Posthumius pretended to be worsted, and in order to deceive the enemy, decamped in the night-time, and retired to the mountains. The Samnites followed him, and posted themselves within two miles of his camp. Hereupon Posthumius, having finished his intrenchments with the utmost dispatch, and left a sufficient ^e number of troops to defend them, marched out at midnight with the rest of his army, and joined his colleague Minucius, who lay in sight of another body of Samnites. Minucius, being thus reinforced, marched with his two legions alone into the plain, and offered the enemy battle; which they accepted, not knowing that the other consul was arrived. The victory was disputed with great warmth on both sides. But when the Samnites were much fatigued, Posthumius and his troops falling upon them with fresh vigor, they could no longer hold out, but were forced to save themselves by flight. The Romans made a dreadful slaughter of them, and took one and twenty ensigns. After this victory the consuls without delay led their victorious troops to Posthumius's ^f camp, and from thence sallied out upon the body of Samnites, which was posted there. This battle was more bloody than the former; the consul Minucius was killed in it, and Statius Gellius, the Samnite general, made prisoner. At length the Romans carried the day, and took twenty-six ensigns from the enemy. Upon the news of Minucius's death the people at Rome immediately appointed Fulvius Curvus to succeed him, who took Bovianum, and other cities, for which he triumphed on his return to Rome. Why Posthumius, who seems to have deserved the same honour, did not triumph with him, we know not. The Fastus Capitolini do not allow him this honour, though Livy does; but as that author makes him triumph with Minucius,

- a who was killed in the battle, we have chose to follow the Fasti ^m. In the succeeding consulate of Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpicius Saverrio, the Samnites, quite exhausted with the war, sent deputies to Rome to desire a renewal of their ancient confederacy with the republic. The senate granted them their request, after they had given certain proofs of their sincerity, by receiving every-where the consular army under the command of Sempronius with marks of respect, and supplied the troops with all sorts of provisions. The consuls being now disengaged from the Samnitic war, marched against the Æqui, who, seduced by the bad example of the Hernici, had declared against Rome, and joined the Samnites. They were no more that formidable nation, which had often struck terror into the Roman legions; long inaction had incruvated them so that they had not courage enough to keep the field, but sheltered themselves behind the walls of their cities, which the two consular armies invested, overrunning their country, and laying it every-where waste. The conquerors made themselves masters of forty-one towns in fifty days, most of which they razed or burnt, and thereby almost extirminated the whole nation of the Æqui. These rapid conquests spread such terror among the neighbouring nations, that the Marfi, Peligni, Frentani, and Marrucini, sent to demand an alliance with Rome, which they easily obtained. By this memorable expedition the consuls merited and obtained the honours of a triumph.

The Æqui subdued.

- THE renowned Q. Fabius, being this year censor with P. Decius Mus, reformed an abuse introduced by Appius, who had dispersed great numbers of freedmen, and the meanest of the people, among the country-tribes, and by that means had got a great influence in all elections, those men being intirely devoted to him. Fabius re-incorporated into the four city tribes the rabble Appius had taken from thence, so that for the future they could influence no more than four tribes, and in these their party was not the strongest. This reformation was so agreeable to the republic, that the Romans gave Fabius for this single act the surname of Maximus, a title which he had not acquired by subduing the Hetrurians, the Samnites, and the Umbrians. This surname was ever after preserved in his branch of the Fabian family. The next year, when Cornelius Lentulus and L. Genucius were consuls, was spent chiefly in sending colonies to the conquered cities. In the succeeding consulate of Livius Dentor and Æmilius Paulus, the art of painting was introduced at Rome by C. Fabius, afterwards consul, who painted the walls of a new temple dedicated to the goddess of Health, and thence got the surname of Pictor, or, The Painter. The following year the republic had no consuls, but was governed by two dictators successively created, Q. Fabius and Valerius Corvus. The former marched an army against the Marfi, who had revolted, and by one single victory brought them back to their duty. The latter was created dictator to conduct a war against the Hetrurians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, though flushed with the advantage which they had gained a few days before over Sempronius Sophus his general of the horse, who had fallen into an ambush, and lost a great number of men, and some standards. The Hetrurians, humbled by this overthrow, sued for peace, but could obtain only a truce for two years. Valerius on his return entered Rome in triumph the fourth time, on the tenth of the calends of December.

Q. Fabius being censor, acquires the surname of Maximus.

The Marfi reduced, and the Hetrurians defeated.

- AT the next election Valerius Corvus was promoted a fifth time to the consulate, and Q. Apulius Panfa appointed to be his colleague. During their administration, all being quiet abroad, two tribunes of the people of the same family, and probably brothers, endeavoured to stir up the people against the nobility. The one was named Quintus Ogulnius, and the other Cneius Ogulnius. These two complained that all the pontifices and augurs were created out of the patricians, and urged, that the plebeians might also partake of those offices. The nobility were highly offended with this proposal, which tended to deprive them of the only distinction between them and the plebeians; but made no great opposition to this new incroachment, knowing that their attempts to exclude them from these dignities would prove fruitless, the people having carried their point in all their struggles with the nobility. However, the famous Appius Claudius, though wholly devoted to the plebeian party, became on this occasion, no doubt out of pure caprice, a most zealous defender of the nobility. He had debased the senate by introducing the sons of freedmen into it, and profaned the priesthood by lodging it in the hands of the public slaves. But now he exerted all his eloquence in favour of the nobility. On the other hand P. Decius Mus, a plebeian of great distinction, who had been twice consul, once dictator, and once censor, spoke in behalf of the people, with all the weight and dignity, which his employments, his credit, and the reputation of his virtue, gave him. The debate was in the assembly of the curiæ; but the tribes being afterwards summoned, the affair was almost unanimously determined by them in favour of the plebeians, and a decree passed for chusing four new pontifices and five new augurs out of the plebeians; so that the college of the pontifices was made now to consist of eight persons, and that of the augurs of nine; which regulation continued to the dictatorship of Sylla, who increased the number both of the pontifices and augurs to fifteen. Decius Mus was chosen one of the new pontifices^a.

Other laws revived in favour of the people.

THE Ogulnian law was the work of the two tribunes: but the consul Valerius undertook to revive another law, which had been made by Valerius Poplicola, and had afterwards been revived by another of his ancestors. By this law it was enacted, that in capital causes the accused should have a right of appealing to the tribunal of the people. The patricians had, by their interest, rendered this law ineffectual, and often prevented the execution of it; so that it was become obsolete. Valerius therefore now restored it once more, and drew it up in more distinct terms than before. But the only punishment denounced against the transgressors of it, was, that they should be deemed guilty of a dishonest action. A slight punishment indeed for a more corrupt age, but sufficient at this time to restrain the Romans, who piqued themselves on their virtue, and were never chosen for great employments, unless they had preserved their reputation pure and untainted.

THE consuls chosen for the new year were M. Fulvius Patinus and T. Manlius Torquatus. The former marched into Umbria to carry on the siege of Nequinum, which Apuleius, one of the former consuls, had begun. This city was, with regard to its situation, one of the strongest in Italy. It was built upon the edge of a steep rock, and surrounded in great part by the river Nar. But the treachery of two Nequinians facilitated taking of a place, which was deemed impregnable. These traitors from their houses, which were near the ramparts, dug by dint of hand-labour, a passage under-ground quite to the advanced guard of the Romans, on the side of the town, where there were no rocks. The consul before whom they appeared quite unexpected, after having examined them, detained one of them as an hostage, and sent the other back to the city through the subterraneous passage with two Roman soldiers. These upon their return made such a report as increased the confidence of the consul, who ordered three hundred chosen men to follow them, and enlarge the way under-ground; which they did accordingly, and having entered the city in the night, seized one of the gates, and let in the rest of the army. The consul having by this means made himself master of the city without striking a blow, for the Nequinians immediately threw down their arms, obliged the inhabitants to receive a Roman colony, which might keep the rest of Umbria in awe. This was the only punishment he inflicted upon them. The colony changed the infamous name of Nequinium, derived from Nequitia rogues, into that of Narnia from the river Nar. For this exploit Fulvius was rewarded with a triumph, which he obtained on the seventh of the calends of October^o. In the same consulate the Hetrurians broke their truce with Rome; but while they were preparing to enter the Roman territories, they were obliged by an irruption of the Gauls to suspend the execution of their design. However, their animosity against the republic was so great, that they chose rather to gain over these new enemies by money, than to repel them by force. Accordingly, they paid them large sums, on condition that they should not only forbear pillaging Hetruria, but join them against Rome. The Gauls accepted the offers made them, took the money, and left Hetruria in tranquillity. But when they were to march towards Rome, they excused themselves, unless the Hetrurians would secure them a retreat in their country, by assigning them lands to settle on. This the Hetrurians absolutely refused. The Romans, being informed of these negotiations between the Hetrurians and Gauls, ordered the consul Manlius to march into Hetruria, and punish the inhabitants for their breach of faith. But Manlius being killed by a fall from his horse, the centuries met to appoint him a successor; and all to a man, which had never happened since the foundation of Rome, gave their suffrages in favour of Valerius Corvus, who was now the sixth time raised to the consulate. The Hetrurians no sooner understood that the formidable Valerius was marching against

- a them, than they quitted the field, and retired within the walls of their cities. The brave consul over-ran the whole country, committing every-where great devastations, in order to draw the enemy into the field. But they, more concerned about preserving their lives than their estates, kept close within their strong-holds. This was a kind of victory, which brought great glory to Valerius, and was the last of his exploits. On his return to Rome, as he was now in a very advanced age, he retired to enjoy the tranquillity of a private life after so many labours, and so plentiful a harvest of glory. In what year he ended his days is not known; but it is certain that he lived above an hundred years. He was a true pattern of the zeal men in public stations owe their country. He was one and twenty times promoted to offices, that intitled him to sit
- b in the curule chair, which can be said of no Roman but himself. When the republic seemed to forget him, he took advantage of those intervals of rest to improve his paternal estate, and manure his lands. He was great in peace, and greater in war, and may be said to have appeared eminent among those heroes, whom Rome produced in her most glorious and virtuous age P.

TOWARDS the close of this year the republic, whether by the death of Valerius or some other accident is unknown, fell into an inter-regnum. When the comitia were assembled to elect new magistrates, Appius took it into his head to prevent any plebeian from being chosen to the consulate. But Curius Dentatus, one of the tribunes, withstood the eloquence and authority of Appius, and obliged the senate to confirm

c the custom of chusing one of the consuls out of the plebeians; so that L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, a plebeian, were raised to that dignity. During their administration, the republic was engaged in a war with the two most formidable nations in her neighbourhood, the Hetrurians, who had broke the truce, and the Samnites, who notwithstanding their treaty of alliance, had openly declared war. Scipio marched against the Hetrurians, who met and engaged him in the plains of Volaterra. The battle lasted all day, and when night put an end to it, the victory was still doubtful. But an unaccountable terror seizing the enemy, they retired in the night-time in small companies to their respective leucomonies. Hereupon the consul plundered and laid waste the whole country. This is the account Livy gives of the campaign in Hetruria. But a more authentic monument than Livy's history, ascribes the defeat of the Hetrurians to Fulvius the plebeian consul; and adds, that having finished his expedition against the Hetrurians, he hastened into Samnium, and there obtained a complete victory over those ancient enemies of his republic, while his colleague Scipio continued inactive at Rome. On his return a triumph was decreed him for having conquered the Samnites and Hetrurians. He triumphed on the ides of *November*¹. A report being spread, before the comitia assembled for electing new consuls, that both the Hetrurians and Samnites were making mighty preparations to repair their losses, the first care of the Romans was to chuse consuls of valor and experience, to disappoint the designs of the two nations more enraged against Rome than ever.

The Hetrurians and Samnites renew the war, but are defeated.

- e The centuries immediately cast their eyes upon Fabius; but he, from what motive is hard to guess, declined the honour, and would not accept of it, till he was in a manner forced by the people and their tribunes. He then desired that they would oblige him so far as to give him a colleague to his own mind, and proposed to them Decius Mus, who was at his request unanimously chosen. While the two new consuls were preparing to take the field, the Hetrurians came to a resolution to ask a peace. Hereupon the consuls marched both into Samnium, Fabius by the territory of Sora, and Decius through the country of the Sidicini. Fabius was informed on his march that the Samnites lay in an ambush on the banks of the Tifernus, and there waited for his coming into a deep valley with a design to attack him from the hills. This advice
- f did not make the brave Fabius change his rout: he chose to surprise and attack the enemy in their ambuscade. Accordingly, having lodged his baggage in a safe place, he marched with his troops in battle-array towards the enemy, who, finding their project discovered, left their ambush, and drew up in the plain. Their first onset was terrible: they had assembled all the forces of their country, and looking upon this battle as the decisive stroke, exerted their utmost efforts. The brave resistance of the enemy gave Fabius no small uneasiness. He therefore commanded the cavalry to rush full speed on their battalions. But this proved ineffectual, the Samnite infantry still keeping their posts without losing an inch of ground. Fabius, finding he could not by force break those impenetrable battalions, had recourse to stratagem, and ordered Scipio, one of his lieutenants, to march with the bastrati silently round the top of a neighbouring hill, and from thence to fall on the enemy's rear. The consul's orders were executed with such address, that neither the Samnites nor Romans perceived this motion. In the mean time the former, proud of having repulsed the Roman cavalry, took new courage, and obliged the first line of the consular army to give way, and retire through the spaces of the second line. Then the principes, who formed that line, engaged in their turn, and as they were quite fresh, put a stop to the impetuosity of the Samnites for some time. But they likewise were obliged in the end to give way. When the Samnites thought themselves secure of the victory, they discovered at a distance the ensigns of a body of troops, which advanced in good order to the field of battle. This was the detachment commanded by Scipio, coming down the hill to attack the enemy's rear. The consul, in seeing it, cried out, What unexpected good fortune ! I see my colleague Decius hastening to our assistance. The general's words, passing from legion to legion, were soon carried through the whole army, and heard by the enemy's battalions. The Romans took fresh courage ; but the Samnites, already tired with fighting, and afraid to engage another consular army, were so discouraged, that without waiting for their generals order's, they dispersed, and fled in confusion, leaving only three thousand four hundred men dead upon the plain, a very inconsiderable loss. The Romans took twenty-three standards. On the other hand Decius gained a considerable victory over the Apulians, as they were marching to join the Samnites. After this the two consular armies entering Samnium, laid the whole country waste. Decius changed his camp forty-five times, and Fabius his eighty-six. By this means the fields were every-where laid waste, and the country, which had been in a flourishing condition, during a pretty long interval of peace, utterly ruined. Fabius took also the city of Cimetra, and razed it. Two thousand four hundred prisoners were taken in these expeditions, and all the inhabitants, who were found with arms, put to the sword.

THE campaign being ended, Fabius was recalled to preside in the comitia for the election of new consuls. Upon his arrival he found that Appius had once more formed a scheme to exclude the plebeians, and confine the consulate to the patricians. In order to this, having secured his own election beyond a possibility of failing, he engaged the centuries to continue Fabius in his office for the ensuing year. As the Romans, especially the patricians, had a great esteem and veneration for that able commander, the first centuries, consisting chiefly of the nobility, unanimously voted in his favour. But Fabius himself opposed his election, protesting that he would never give the republic so pernicious a precedent as to suffer himself to be elected in the comitia, where he presided. The whole body of the patricians surrounded his tribunal, conjuring him to restore the consulate to its ancient lustre. But Fabius could not by any means be prevailed upon to fall into Appius's scheme ; so that Volumnius Flamma, a plebeian, was joined with Appius in the consulate. However Fabius and his colleague Decius were continued, with the title of proconsuls, in the command of the armies in Samnium for six months longer ; which Fabius spent in keeping in awe the Lucanians, who had revolted, and preventing them from joining the Samnites. As for Decius, after having laid waste all Samnium, he pursued the small army that unhappy people had still on foot from place to place, in order to draw them to a battle, and so harassed them, that they were at length obliged to disband, and retire into the neighbouring countries. Then Decius, having no enemy in the field to contend with, laid siege to their cities, and made himself master of Murgantia, Romulea, and Ferentinum, three important cities ; in the first he made two thousand one hundred and ten prisoners ; in the second he put two thousand three hundred of the inhabitants to the sword, and took six thousand ; in the third about three thousand men, who defended the place, and made a desperate resistance, were killed upon the ramparts. Thus Samnium was reduced to the last extremity ; and to complete the destruction of this unhappy country, the new consul Volumnius entered it with another army of two legions, and fifteen hundred auxiliaries.

THE Samnites, being thus driven out of their own country, took refuge in Hetruria ; where, in a diet held at their request, they prevailed upon the several leucomonies to join in a war against Rome, and offered to serve under them at their own

- a expence. The Hetrurians, looking upon this reinforcement as sent them from heaven, raised a formidable army, and even engaged with sums of money some troops of Gauls to join them. The senate, being informed of these motions, dispatched Appius, to whom Hetruria had fallen by lot, to make head against so powerful an enemy with an army consisting of two legions, and twelve thousand auxiliaries. Appius came and posted himself within reach of the enemy. But as he neither knew how to time a battle, nor to chuse his ground, he was worsted in every skirmish and slight action, in which he ventured to engage. These small advantages increased the enemy's confidence, and gave them certain hopes of victory in a general action. In short, things were come to that pass, that the soldiers distrusted their general, and the
- b general his soldiers. In this extremity, Appius is said *, for the fact is not absolutely certain, to have written to his colleague, begging him to leave Samnium, and hasten to his assistance. Volumnius, upon the receipt of the letter, immediately came and joined him, to the inexpressible joy of the troops of Appius. But Appius himself pretending to be surpris'd, asked his colleague sternly, what had brought him from Samnium, disowned his letter, and told him that he had acted a dishonourable part in quitting his own province, in order to gain credit by giving assistance to others, who did not want it. Hereupon Volumnius was for returning immediately into Samnium; but the officers of both armies prevailed upon him to stay in Hetruria, where the common cause called for his assistance, and to despise the reproaches and unaccountable
- c behaviour of Appius. At the request of the officers the two consuls afterwards had an interview in that part of the camp, where the generals used to harangue their soldiers, and there in the presence of the army made their complaints of each other. Volumnius, though naturally no orator, spoke on this occasion with great eloquence; for he had the better cause. Upon which Appius, who had had Volumnius for his colleague in the consulship ten years before, could not forbear rallying him: Wonderful indeed! said he, I have made a dumb man speak. Volumnius in our first consulate scarce opened his mouth for some months. He had then no tongue; but now is become eloquent, a perfect master of oratory. What a miraculous change have I wrought in him! Since you have taught me to speak, replied Volumnius, I wish I could, in return for your kindness, teach you to fight. In our present situation, it is of small importance to be able to talk well. If you have a mind to know which of us understands best the conduct of an army, we have wars to carry on in two places, Samnium and Hetruria; make your choice; it is indifferent to me in which province I command. At these words the soldiers cried out with one voice, that both consuls should carry on the war in Hetruria. Volumnius answered, that he was willing to stay, but desired the troops to signify to him their inclinations by a general shout. Instantly the army made such loud acclamations, as were heard in the enemy's camp, who, taking the alarm, drew up in order of battle. Volumnius immediately marched out with his troops to engage them. But Appius was for some time in suspense, whether
- d he should join in the battle or not; and nothing determined him but the fear of being deserted by his troops, who shewed a strong inclination to follow Volumnius, in defiance of their general's orders. It fell to Volumnius to engage the Hetrurians, and to his colleague to oppose the Samnites, who, full of rage, advanced against him. Emulation for glory, and the shame of being obscured by a rival, roused Appius to such a degree, that he behaved himself with more courage than could have been expected. He gave his orders like a good commander, fought with intrepidity, inspired his men with ardor, and in short equalled his colleague both in bravery and conduct. The united Samnites and Hetrurians, not being able to withstand two consular armies, were intirely defeated, and their camp taken and plundered. The
- e enemy left seven thousand three hundred men dead upon the field of battle; and two thousand of them were made prisoners. It must be owned, that Appius bore a good share in this glorious action, and that if he inspired Volumnius with eloquence, Volumnius inspired him with courage. After this victory, which put an end to the misunderstanding between the two consuls, Volumnius was obliged to return into his own province, and oppose the Samnites, who, notwithstanding their late losses, had raised a new army, and were actually ravaging Campania. Volumnius surpris'd them near the Luturnus, slew six thousand of them, and recovered all the spoil they had taken †.

THE republic being alarmed by accounts from Appius, of the vast preparations for war, which the Hetrurians, and their allies the Umbrians, Gauls, and Samnites, were making, turned their eyes again upon Fabius, and in the comitia, which were held soon after, raised him the fifth time to the consulate. The colleague they designed to give him was Volumnius, who presided in the comitia; but Fabius refusing to accept the office, unless he had again Decius for his colleague, Volumnius, tho' the first tribes had already voted for him, approved of Fabius's request; and making a fine elogium upon Decius, exhorted the tribes to chuse him; which they did accordingly, bestowing that honour upon him the fourth time. Appius, who was then in Hetruria, was appointed prætor; and Volumnius continued in the command of the army in Samnium, with the title of proconsul. It was customary for the new consuls to draw lots for their respective provinces; but it was natural to suppose, that Decius would compliment Fabius with the command in Hetruria, where the stress of the war lay, induced thereunto by gratitude, as well as by the age and superior merit of his colleague: and this he was very willing to do; but the patricians making it a point of honour not to permit any other than Fabius to have the conduct of the Hetrurian war, the plebeians would not suffer him to have it, unless it fell to him by lot, fearing lest the patrician consul should, for the future, claim a right of chusing his province. How difficult is it for a man to avoid being carried away by the stream of a party in which he once engages! The pacific Decius was compelled, contrary to his temper and inclination, to go with the current of his party, and insist on its being determined by lot, whether he or Fabius should command in Hetruria. The affair was first brought before the senate, where it was determined in favour of Fabius. Hereupon Decius appealed to the people; and the comitia being assembled, the two competitors pleaded each his own cause more like soldiers than orators. When they had both done speaking, the people began to vote, when Fabius rising up again, desired them, in a few words, to hear Appius's letters read, before they decided on the present dispute. Appius, in the letters he had lately written from Hetruria, had painted the danger with which the republic was threatened in very lively colours, and given a very particular account of the four armies which were to fall upon Rome. The bare relation of the danger determined the people to have recourse to the surest remedy; and Fabius was instantly appointed to command the army in Hetruria. And now all the Roman youth were eager to serve under so great a commander; but he would carry with him no larger a reinforcement than four thousand foot, and six hundred horse. At the head of this small body he marched towards the camp, which the fearful Appius was still strengthening with new fortifications. As he drew near it, he met a detachment sent to cut wood in a neighbouring forest. Whither are you going, fellow soldiers? said Fabius. The soldiers answered, To cut wood to fortify our camp. What! replied the general, is it not already fortified? We are already surrounded, returned the soldiers, with a double ditch, and a double rampart, and yet we are still afraid. Since that is the case, said Fabius, return to the camp, and level the first rampart. The detachment immediately returned, and put their new general's orders in execution; which greatly alarmed Appius: but Fabius arrived the same day, to the inexpressible joy of the army, every one hoping affairs would take a better turn under so able a general. The next day Appius set out for Rome, to take upon him the prætorship, which had been assigned, and better suited his talents, than the conduct of an army. Fabius, instead of shutting up his soldiers within lines, which, he said, betrayed fear, kept them in constant motion, by frequent marches and counter-marches; but, before he entered upon action, he returned to Rome, for what reason is uncertain. Upon his arrival, the senate, alarmed at the dreadful representation, which Appius had made of the enemy's forces, judged it necessary to strengthen him by a second army. Fabius, when this was first proposed to him, told the conscript fathers, that he should acquiesce in what they thought proper, on account of the fears of others, not his own; but desired, that, if another general was to be joined with him, Decius might be the person, shewing thereby, that his late contest with him had not lessened the esteem he had for so great a man. The senate and people readily granted him his request; and then the two consuls, before they left Rome, made the following regulations: they sent the proconsul Volumnius with two legions into Samnium, and, in order to cover the city on the side of Hetruria, directed two camps to be pitched, one near Rome, on the hill Vaticanus, and the other on the banks of the Tiber, in the country of the Falisci. After these regulations, the two consuls set out for the camp in Hetruria.

Fabius sent against the united forces of the Hetrurians, Umbrians, Samnites and Gauls.

- a ria. Upon the road they were informed, that a legion, which Fabius had left under the command of Scipio, had been intirely cut off by the Gauls called Senones. However, the two generals, without being discouraged by this accident, continued their march; and as their army consisted of four legions, a good number of Roman knights, a thousand Campanian horse, and a body of auxiliaries, more numerous than all the Roman forces, they divided it into two parts, and encamped separately, but within reach of each other, in the plain of Sentinum, about four miles from the enemy. We are told, that the forces of the Gauls and Samnites, who encamped together, amounted to one hundred and forty-three thousand three hundred and thirty foot, and forty-six thousand horse. What the number was of Hetrurians and Umbrians, who jointly
- b made another camp, we find no-where recorded. As these confederates were separated in their camps, they agreed, that the Gauls and Samnites should engage the Romans, while the Hetrurians and Umbrians attacked their two camps in the heat of the action. Fabius being informed of this design by deserters, immediately sent orders to the two proprætors Fulvius and Posthumius, who commanded in the camps that covered Rome, to enter Hetruria without delay, and lay it waste. Hereupon the Hetrurians and Umbrians hastened to the relief of the unfortunate people, whose houses were burnt, and land ravaged. Fabius having thus obliged the enemy to divide their forces, took advantage of the diversion he had made, and, in the absence of the Hetrurians and Umbrians, brought the Gauls and Samnites to a battle.
- c Fabius commanded the right wing, which faced the Samnites, and Decius the left, which engaged the Gauls. Both parties sustained the first onset with equal bravery, and the resistance of the enemy made the Romans sensible, that they could never have withstood the four armies, had they all engaged at once. The advantage first appeared in favour of the Gauls, who surprized the Romans, soon after the action began, with a new way of fighting, never heretofore used in the wars of Italy. They drove full speed armed chariots against the Roman cavalry, which, with the noise of the wheels, and the novelty of the sight, frightened the horses, and put them into disorder. They fell afterwards on the first line of the infantry, and broke into the ranks, carrying every-where terror and confusion. The consul Decius, having in vain endeavoured to rally his terrified soldiers, resolved to follow the example of his father, and in the same manner devote himself to the dii manes. Pursuant to this resolution, he commanded the pontifex M. Livius to pronounce the words used in devotements; and having repeated them after him, rode full speed into the thickest of the enemy's battalions, where he was killed, after having received numberless wounds. How great is the power of credulity and superstition! The Romans, after the death of their general, looking upon the enemy as devoted to destruction, took new courage, and returned to the charge, as it were to put the decrees of the gods in execution. The pontifex Livius, who was himself an able commander, taking advantage of their prejudices, put himself at their head, crying out, We have conquered; the death of Decius has secured to us the victory; the Samnites and the Gauls are devoted to the manes, and must inevitably perish. Having thus spoke, he renewed the battle with great fury, and being seconded by some troops sent by Fabius from the rear, under the command of L. Cornelius and C. Marcus, he soon changed the fortune of the day in favour of the Romans in the left wing.
- d In the right wing Fabius had attacked the Samnites but faintly, or rather kept himself upon the defensive, till the enemy had quite spent their strength, and were exhausted; and then becoming in his turn the aggressor, he ordered his cavalry to wheel about, and flank the wings of the enemy, while he, at the head of the legions, attacked them in front. All the troops being thus put in motion at once, the shock was so violent, that
- e the Samnites, not being able to stand it, fled in disorder to their camp, leaving the Gauls to shift for themselves. These brave men, not disheartened at the rout of their allies, still kept their ground, and covering their heads with their bucklers, formed a tortoise. Fabius therefore, to break these impenetrable troops, detached a body of five hundred Campanian horse to fall upon their rear, ordering the principes to follow the detachment, and penetrate into their battalions, when once broken. This motion succeeded so well, that the Gauls were at length obliged to retire, which they seem to have done in good order; for Livy does not tell us that they were put into confusion, but only that they gave way, and left the Romans masters of the field. Fabius did not pursue them; but led his forces against the camp of the Samnites, where he
- f made a dreadful slaughter. Twenty-five thousand of the Samnites and Gauls were killed in this action, and eight thousand taken prisoners. Among the former was a Gellius Egnatius, an eminent commander of the Samnites, who had negotiated the alliance of the four nations. On the side of the Romans, the number of the dead, in the left wing, amounted to seven thousand; but in the right, where Fabius commanded, only twelve hundred were killed. As for the two proprætors, Fulvius and Posthumius, they gained no small advantages over the Hetrurians and Umbrians; and the same year the proconsul Volumnius defeated the Samnites in a pitched battle at the foot of mount Tifernus. After all these successes, Fabius returned to Rome, and triumphed the day before the nones of September. He had scarce left the country, when the Hetrurians raised a new army, which obliged him to lead his troops thither again. Upon his arrival, he attacked the Hetrurians, killed four thousand five hundred of them on the spot, took one thousand seven hundred and forty prisoners, and struck the rest with such terror, that they made no further attempts that year. This was the last exploit of a hero, who did not leave off conquering, till age disabled him from serving his country. He had a son, surnamed Gorgas, that is, the gulph, on account of his excessive intemperance in his youth. After he had squandered away immense sums in debauchery, he corrected his way of living, and became a zealous reformer of manners, in order to wipe off the shame of his past excesses. In his ædileship, he accused before the people a great many patrician women of adultery, and having convicted them, perpetuated the shame of the criminals, by building, with the money accruing from their fines, a temple to Venus, as a lasting monument of their infamy c.

again defeated.

In the mean time the Samnites, notwithstanding their losses, brought two new armies into the field. With one they encamped on the banks of the Vulturnus; with the other they entered Campania, and pillaged the territories of Vesuvia and Formia. Hereupon Appius the prætor was ordered into Samnium, at the head of the army which Decius had commanded. The proconsul Volumnius, who was already on the spot, joined his forces to those of Appius; and both these generals, by pursuing the Samnites from place to place, obliged them to unite their two armies in the Campi Stellates, between the Vulturnus and the Savo. There the Samnites resolved to put the whole to the issue of a battle; and as they looked upon it as a decisive stroke, they d behaved with extraordinary courage and resolution: but the Romans at length prevailed, after having lost two thousand seven hundred men. Of the Samnites there fell in the battle and pursuit sixteen thousand three hundred.

But take the field anew.

Rome had now made war with the Samnites for forty years almost without interruption, and always with success. The last campaign seemed enough of itself to extinguish their martial ardor. They had lost four battles in one year; the bravest of their generals had been killed; all the flower of their youth cut off; the Hetrurians, Umbrians and Gauls, whom they had drawn into a confederacy, were not now in a condition to lend them any assistance. However, they were not so far discouraged, as to lose all hopes of being able one day to conquer. They made great preparations e to take the field once more. The senate being alarmed, ordered the two new consuls, L. Posthumius Megellus, who was raised to that dignity a second time, and M. Atilius Regulus, to carry the war jointly into Samnium; but Posthumius falling sick, the whole management of affairs was committed to Atilius, who hastening into Samnium, met the Samnites on the confines of Campania. The consul was no sooner encamped, than the enemy, tho' so often vanquished, undertook to execute what the Romans themselves would scarce have attempted; they formed a design of forcing the consul's lines, and marching out of their camp undiscovered, by means of a thick fog, surprized the advanced guards, made themselves masters of the Decuman gate, and penetrated to the quæstor's tent, where the military chest was kept. In the mean time the alarm f spreading to the general's quarters, he put himself at the head of some manipuli, and obliged the enemy to retire by the gate through which they had entered. The Romans would have pursued them; but Atilius fearing some ambuscade, would not suffer them to march out of their entrenchments. The Samnites, not doubting but fortune would favour their bold attempts another time, encamped close to the Roman lines, and kept the consular army so closely shut up, that they could not enter Samnium to live upon free quarter there, as they had designed; but were obliged to bring their provisions from the countries behind them, to which alone they had access.

- a THE senate and people of Rome, alarmed at this disadvantageous situation of the army, dispatched Posthumius, tho' not yet perfectly recovered, with another consular army, to the assistance of his colleague. Upon his arrival, the Samnites, who were not in a condition to make head against two consular armies, decamped in haste, and left their country a prey to the enemy. Hereupon the two generals separated, to pillage and lay waste the whole country. Posthumius, having committed every-where great devastations, made himself master of Milonia and Triventum, two places of great strength. The former was taken by assault, after a vigorous defence, and given up to be plundered by the soldiers; three thousand two hundred Samnites were cut in pieces on the ramparts, and four thousand two hundred made prisoners. Triventum was abandoned by the inhabitants; so that the consul made himself master of it without striking a blow ^w.

- WHILE Posthumius was thus employed, Attilius marched to the relief of Luceria in Apulia, besieged, as he was told, by the Samnites. On his march he met the enemy, and came to a battle with them, the success of which was such, that neither army cared to try a second engagement. The Samnites were wholly bent on decamping the next day, and returning home; but as the place where they were encamped was a kind of defile, and the Romans were between them and Samnium, after much deliberation, they resolved to march directly to the Roman camp, take their rout by the side of it, and thence advance into the plain. The consul no sooner perceived them, c than he gave orders to his legions to prepare for battle, not doubting but they were coming to attack him. But now Attilius perceived how much the action of the day before had discouraged his troops; his officers told him, that they were ready to obey his orders; but that the soldiers were extremely fatigued and intimidated, and that they would certainly be overcome as soon as attacked. This gave Attilius great uneasiness; he went in person to visit them in their tents, and endeavoured, by soft words, to rouse their courage; but all to no purpose: he could not, by any means, prevail upon them to stir. In the mean time the Samnites drawing near, the Romans observed, that they were loaded with stakes and fascines. Whereupon the consul, believing they designed to shut him up in his camp, protested, that he would march d out, and meet the enemy alone; and that, if he were cut in pieces, he should at least escape the mortification of seeing his camp at the mercy of a people so often conquered. His words, and the shame of abandoning their general, induced them at length to take to their arms, and march out; which they did with great reluctance, and very slowly, the battalions not being close, but broken in several places. This motion of the Romans was a great disappointment to the Samnites, who were no less afraid than they, and equally desirous to avoid a battle; but when they found it was necessary to fight, they acted like brave men, threw down all their baggage in a heap, and placing it in the centre, drew up in battalia. When the two armies drew near, they both betrayed so little inclination to fight, that they would have retired e without action, had they not feared, that the first which drew off, would be attacked in the rear by the other. However, they charged at length each other, but in a very faint manner, and without drawing so near as to come to a close engagement. The Romans soon began to give ground, which so encouraged the Samnites, that they now exerted their usual vigour, and pressing upon the legions, drove them back quite to their entrenchments, which they would have entered, and left the Samnites masters of the field, had not Attilius ordered a body of horse to advance to the gate of the camp, with directions to kill every Roman who should attempt to enter it. By this means the run-aways being obliged to return to the charge, rallied, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that the Samnites, who pursued them, were forced to fly in f their turn. Thus the victory fell in the end to the Romans, after they had lost seven thousand three hundred men. Four thousand eight hundred of the Samnites were killed upon the spot, and seven thousand taken prisoners, whom the consul made all pass under the yoke. The consul Attilius would have gained but little honour this campaign, had he not repaired his losses by a new advantage; for, on his march homewards, having accidentally fallen in with a body of Samnites, loaded with the booty which they had made in the country of the Volsci, he cut them in pieces, recovered the booty, and released many Roman prisoners, whom they had taken in this incursion. After this, he left his army in winter-quarters, and returned to Rome, to preside at the elections. In the mean time Posthumius, uneasy to find nothing to do in Samnium, left that country, without orders from the senate, and marching into Etruria, where there was more booty and more glory to be gained, defeated the Etrurians, took Ruffella, and obliged the three leucumonies of Volturni, Perusia, and Arretium to sue for peace. Nevertheless the senate, on his return, refused him a triumph, on account of his irregular proceedings; but he appealed to the people, who, in spite of the senate, decreed him a triumph for his victories over the Samnites and Etrurians ^a.

IN the new consulate of L. Papirius Cursor, son of the famous Papirius, and Sp. Carvilius, Samnium became again the seat of war. That martial nation resolved to make a new and more vigorous effort than ever. They published a law, commanding all who were of age to bear arms, to appear upon the first summons from the general of their nation, upon pain of death. The heads of those who disobeyed this law were devoted to Jupiter, and it was lawful for any one to kill them, where-ever they were found. The general rendezvous was appointed in the neighbourhood of Aquilonia, a city of Hirpinia, whither fear brought all the youth of the country, to the number of forty thousand and upwards. In order to inspire them with courage, the heads of the nation obliged sixteen thousand of the bravest men among them to take the following oath, which was administered to them with great solemnity; May all the curses of the gods fall upon me and my posterity, if I do not follow my generals where-ever they shall lead me; if I ever turn my back, or do not kill those whom I shall see attempting to fly. Those who hesitated at loading themselves and their posterity with such imprecations, were immediately stabbed, and their bodies thrown among the carcases of the many victims that were sacrificed on this occasion. Those who took the oath were called legio linteata, or the linen legion, because they had bound themselves by it under a canopy or covering of linen. Magnificent bucklers were given them, and that they might the better be distinguished in an engagement, their helmets were adorned with stately crests. In the mean time the consul Corvilius, having left Rome, and put himself at the head of the army which Attilius had commanded, took his way towards Samnium, which he entered without opposition, the enemy not having yet finished their preparations. His first exploit was the taking of Amiternum, a city in Sabinia, but subject to the Samnites, where he cut in pieces two thousand eight hundred men, and made four thousand two hundred and seventy prisoners. On the other hand, Papirius, having hastened his levies in Rome, took the field, made himself master of Furconia, in the neighbourhood of Amiternum, and then joined his colleague. After they had laid waste that part of the Volscian territory which was subject to the Samnites, they parted again, Corvilius turning off towards Cominium, on the confines of the eastern part of Samnium, with a design to besiege it; and Papirius marching towards Aquilonia, the place of the enemy's general rendezvous. The latter encamped within sight of the enemy, and tried their strength and courage in some slight skirmishes before he came to a general action; which he at length resolved to venture, and therefore sent an express to his colleague, desiring him to press the siege of Cominium, lest the enemy should send detachments from thence to reinforce their army near Aquilonia. He then called his troops together, and so animated them, that they all cried out to him, that they were ready to follow him whithersoever he should lead them. From the general to the meanest soldier all were equally eager to engage; they were only uneasy to see the battle put off to the next day. Even the augur, whose business it was to observe the presages, chose rather to make a false report, than to check this general ardor. It was then customary to judge of the success of battles before-hand, by the haste or slowness with which the sacred chickens picked up their food. The augur observed, that the chickens fed but slowly, which was a bad omen; but as the ministers of religion are not always the most scrupulous, or the most credulous, the augur, depending more on the ardor of the soldiers, than the greediness of his chickens, declared, that they had fed greedily. Papirius heard the augury with joy, and immediately ordered his men to prepare for battle; but the next day, when the army was ready to march out and engage, the report being spread among the troops, that the presages were not favourable, the Roman knights, thinking it a matter of such importance as ought to be communicated to the general, prevailed upon young Papirius, the consul's nephew, to discover to him the error he

- a was in concerning the auguries. Be of good courage, answered the general, and behave yourself in the action like a brave man. If the augur has made me a false report, he has drawn the vengeance of the gods upon himself by his irreligion. As for me, I conclude the augury to be favourable, since it was so declared. Thus spoke Papirius, and then ordered the unfaithful keeper of the sacred chickens to be placed at the head of the first line, where he was killed by an unknown hand, before the two armies came to a close engagement. He was probably killed by order of the consul, who pretending to look upon his death as a stroke from heaven, cried out, when the news was brought him, The vengeance of the gods has spent itself on the person who deserved it. We have nothing more to fear from their anger. In the beginning of the action, the linen legion, which lay under
- b the most sacred engagements not to give way, made a most gallant resistance, and, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Romans, kept their ground, till all on a sudden they discovered, at some distance, a cloud of dust, such as is raised by the marching of an army, but was now occasioned by the servants and muleteers of the Roman camp, whom the consul had mounted upon mules and other beasts of burden, ordering them to appear in the heat of the action, and raise as great a cloud of dust as possible. Papirius, tho' the author of the stratagem, seemed to be surprized at this new sight. As the servants of the army had provided themselves with branches of trees, which they trained on the ground to raise the greater dust, nothing could be seen but the tops of some standards and lances, and something like cavalry, which
- c seemed to flank a body of infantry. While both armies were under no small apprehension of this fresh body of troops, Papirius all on a sudden cried out with an air of joy, Cominium is taken, and my colleague is coming to my assistance. Courage, fellow-soldiers, let us gain the victory ourselves, before another army comes to share with us the glory and the spoils. At these words, both the infantry and cavalry fell with new vigour on the linen legion, which was at length obliged to give way, the fear of the enemy, who had penetrated into the midst of their battalions, not suffering them to attend to any other apprehensions. Their example was followed by the rest of the Samnite army; their foot in the left wing retired to Aquilonia, and those in the right regained the camp; but their horse, which consisted of the nobility of the country,
- d fled to Bovianum, a city which was a great way from the field of battle. Twelve thousand of the Samnites, according to Orosius, were slain in this battle; but, according to Livy, above thirty thousand. Their camp was taken; and soon after the city of Aquilonia, where most of the fugitives had taken shelter.

- In the mean time Corvilius made himself master of the strong and important city of Cominium. The besieged, after having made a vigorous defence, were at length obliged to surrender at discretion, to the number of fifteen thousand four hundred, after four thousand three hundred and eighty had been slain in the attacks. After this, the two consuls joined their forces to complete the destruction of the Samnites, who had no army to oppose them. Their scheme being approved by the
- e senate, Corvilius took Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum, all cities of great note. Papirius made himself master of Sepinum, a town situated at the foot of the Apennines, and deemed impregnable. But in the mean time the Hetrurians taking arms again, it was thought necessary to recal one of the consuls with his army from Samnium. They were accordingly ordered to cast lots for the conduct of the Hetrurian war, which fell to Corvilius, who thereupon hastened to Rome, which he entered in triumph, and thence continued his march into Hetruria, where he took Troffulum by assault, and obliged the Falisci to sue for peace, but granted them only a year's truce, for which he made them pay three hundred and ninety thousand asses of brass. After this he returned to Rome. Papirius arrived much about the same time from Samnium, and
- f obtained a triumph, the chief ornaments of which were the spoils taken from the Samnites, especially from the linen legion * (Z).

(Z) Papirius, on his return to Rome, dedicated a temple to Quirinus, which his father, when dictator, had vowed. Upon this temple was fixed a sundial, the first that had ever been seen at Rome. The Romans, for some ages, marked only the rising and setting of the sun; afterwards they observed the hour of noon, but in a very gross manner. When the sun shone between the rostra and the house appointed for the reception of ambassadors, one of the consuls heralds used to proclaim with a loud voice, that it was mid-day; but now they could mark the several hours of the day: and the water-clock, invented soon after, enabled them to reckon the hours of the night.

IN the next election of consuls, the persons chosen by the centuries were, Fabius Gurgus, the son of Fabius Maximus, and Junius Brutus, surnamed Scæva, of an illustrious, tho' plebeian family. It is undoubted that Fabius the father, who was then prince of the senate, opposed the promotion of his son. Perhaps he did not think him well qualified for so high a station, or was induced thereunto, as Valerius Maximus is of opinion ^a, by a republican principle, judging it a pernicious precedent to heap so many honours on one family; for he himself had been five times consul, and his father and grandfather had been likewise promoted to that dignity. Junius Brutus, the other consul, was no better qualified for the consulate than his colleague; so that now the government of the republic was in the hands of two persons of small abilities, especially for war; which was at this time a very impolitic choice. They had ^b scarce entered upon their office, when the Falisci in Hetruria, encouraged by a plague which raged in Rome, broke their truce; and the old enemies of Rome, the Samnites, taking arms again, entered Campania. The consuls having drawn lots for their provinces, Hetruria fell to Brutus, and Samnium to Fabius. The former being assisted by Corvilius, whom the republic appointed to be his lieutenant, over-ran Hetruria, defeated the Falisci, and returned to Rome, loaded with spoils. But, on the other hand, Fabius, having rashly, and even without drawing up his troops, attacked the Samnites, was by them put to flight, after he had lost three thousand men in the action. The number of the wounded was greater, and most of them died for want of attendance, the consul having left the servants of the army, and the baggage, a great way ^c behind him. The news of an action so ill conducted exasperated the people and senate to such a degree, that the consul was recalled, and would have been deposed, had not his father spoke in his behalf, with all the dignity of a man of his age, merit and employments, and even offered to serve under his son the remainder of the campaign, in quality of his lieutenant. This offer was immediately accepted, and Fabius set out with his son for Samnium; which they had scarce entered, when they were met by the enemy, who offered them battle. The Samnites, whom no adverse fortune could discourage, made their first onset with such vigor, that the Romans could scarce withstand them. Pontius Herennius, their general, elated with his first victory, made ^d incredible efforts to gain a second. On the other hand the consul, to wipe off the shame of his late defeat, fought as a private soldier in the first line. But Pontius, having broke through the troop which covered young Fabius, was surrounding him on all sides; which the father perceiving, threw himself into the midst of the enemy's battalions, and, by his example, animated the legions to exert themselves with such vigor, that Gurgus was rescued, and the enemy put to the rout. Twenty thousand of the enemy were slain, and four thousand taken prisoners. Among the latter was Pontius himself, who had done in this fatal engagement all that could be expected from an experienced commander, and gallant soldier. Rome would have been more sensibly affected with this victory at any other time; but the plague, which made a dreadful havock of her citizens, much damped her joy. To appease the wrath of the gods, ^e recourse was had to the usual remedy, superstition. The Sibylline books were consulted, and there it was read, that, to put a stop to the plague, the god Æsculapius should be brought to Rome from Epidaurus, a city of Peloponnesus, where he was worshipped under the figure of a serpent. An embassy was accordingly appointed for that purpose ^f.

But Fabius Maximus gives them a dreadful overthrow.

Æsculapius brought to Rome.

THE consular year being near expired, and the two consuls busied in carrying on the war in their respective provinces, a dictator was appointed to supply their room; but his nomination proving defective, the republic fell into an inter-regnum, when L. Posthumius, one of the magistrates named to govern the state till the new election, held the comitia, and, by his intrigues, got himself elected the third time. ^f His colleague was Junius Brutus, surnamed Bubulcus. Posthumius, who was a man of a haughty, enterprising and untractable temper, assumed to himself the command of the war in Samnium, without drawing lots with his colleague, or waiting for a decree of the senate in his favour. About this time the god Æsculapius, who had been expected a whole year, arrived from Epidaurus, to the great joy of the people; and the plague is said to have ceased soon after (A). The two consuls set out for their respective

(A) Æsculapius was a native of Messene, a city of Peloponnesus. As soon as he was born, his parents exposed him, according to the barbarous custom of those times, in a forest, where he was found by some

a respective provinces, Brutus for Hetruria, and Posthumius for Samnium. The former performed nothing which historians have thought worth transmitting to posterity. In Samnium the two Fabii gained great advantages, and were actually besieging Cominium, which the Samnites had rebuilt, when Posthumius arrived with a new consular army. Fabius Gurgus had been continued in the command of the army in quality of proconsul; but nevertheless Posthumius sent him orders to desist from the siege, and leave that enterprize to him. Fabius had recourse to the senate, acquainting the conscript fathers with the orders he had received from the consul; whereupon the senate immediately dispatched a messenger to Posthumius, injoining him to bend his forces another way, and not disturb Fabius in the enterprize he was carrying on; but Posthumius, without paying any regard to the authority of the senate, gave their messenger this haughty answer, Tell the conscript fathers, that it is their duty to obey their consul, and not his to submit to their commands. He then marched towards Cominium, resolved to give the Fabii battle, if they did not yield to his obstinate humour. Young Fabius, being warranted by the authority of the senate, was for sustaining the attack of the rash aggressor; but his father prevailed upon him, for the sake of the public good, to give way to his imperious rival. Then Posthumius, having a clear stage, pressed Cominium with such vigor, that he made himself master of it in a few days. From thence he turned his arms against Venusium, an important place on the

some hunters, who, touched with compassion, caused him to be suckled by a bitch. When he became capable of instruction, he was committed to the care of the famous Chiron, who taught him physic or surgery; for these two arts were then confounded. The disciple soon excelled his master, and being grown an able physician, settled at Epidaurus, a city of Argos, and practised his art there. He made some discoveries in the cure of diseases and wounds; for he is said to have invented the probe, to have first made use of bandages, and to have been the first who invented purges, and the art of drawing teeth. For these discoveries the people were pleased to call him the son of Apollo, and, after his death, to rank him among the gods. He had a temple erected to him in Epidaurus; and the priests, who presided over the worship of this new god, bred one of those snakes, which were easily tamed, and taught to follow any persons where they pleased. This snake the silly vulgar honoured as the god himself. His usual hole was under the feet of the fine stony statue of Æsculapius, which the famous sculptor Thrymides of Paros had made; and whenever he came out of it, his appearance was understood to prognostic the cure of the sick person. The Roman envoys were brought into the temple, and it is probable, that the Epidaurians made them pay dear for the relief they desired, their reputation and interest being then very small in Greece. But however that be, the Epidaurians suffered them to carry away the snake, which drew all the people in the neighbourhood into the city. We are told, that the snake came out of its hole, while the ambassadors were viewing the statue of Æsculapius, left the temple of its own accord, passed all through the city, went directly to the port, where the Roman ship was at anchor, and entering the vessel, curled himself into several circles in the cabin of Ogulinus, who was at the head of the embassy, and continued quietly there. The other adventures of the pretended Æsculapius, in his passage from Epidaurus to Rome, have been celebrated both by the poets and historians. It is pretended, that the voyage was exceeding prosperous and happy, till the vessel approached the coasts of Italy, when a violent storm arising all on a sudden, forced the mariners to put in at the port of Antium, where there was a temple dedicated to Æsculapius. The snake, which had hitherto confined himself to Ogulinus's cabin, here made his escape, and gliding along, came to the court of the sanctuary where he was worshipped. As the place was planted with myrtles and palm-trees, the pretended Æsculapius got upon one of the largest of them, and twisting his long body round it, continued there three days. At length he returned to the galley of his own accord, and suffered himself to be carried to the place intended. The joy the Romans shewed upon the arrival of this salutary god is not to be expressed. Altars were erected all along the banks of the Tiber, and numberless sacrifices offered. The Romans designed to receive him within their walls, and there build him a temple; but the god is said to have chose his own abode in the midst of the Tiber, on an island formed in the infancy of the republic by straw, trunks of trees, sand, and the rubbish of the city. Thither the serpent retired, swimming gently through the water. From that time it was called the island of Æsculapius, and a temple was soon erected to him there, and enriched with numberless presents. It was built in the shape of a ship, the higher part of it resembling the stern, and the lower the prow. Pliny tells us, that the Romans, who had an aversion to physicians and their art, would not suffer Æsculapius to be brought within their walls; and indeed it must be owned, that the Romans had not that regard for physic, which an art of that importance deserves. For a long course of years they left the practice of it wholly to persons of a servile condition, or freedmen. This contempt for physicians was chiefly owing to the roguery and ignorance of the empirics or quacks, who, under the title of physicians, abused the credulity of the people, made their market of them, and at the same time much endangered the sick under their care. However, the temple of the god of health was much frequented by the common people at Rome. The sick came and passed a night in it; and either imagination, or the strength of nature, sometimes wrought cures there, which were ascribed to the power of the god. Those who recovered sacrificed to the god by way of thanksgiving a cock; for this bird was sacred to Æsculapius, and a symbol of the vigilance, which is necessary for the cure of diseases. It was in allusion to this, that Socrates, when condemned to die, and thereby delivered from all the evils and distempers attending this life, ordered a cock to be sacrificed to Æsculapius. There were some remains of the ancient temple of Æsculapius to be seen in the sixteenth century, near the church of St. Bartholomew in the island of the Tiber (19).

confines of Apulia, Lucania, and Samnium, and brought it under subjection to the Romans. He then wrote to the senate, giving them an account of his conquest, which, he hoped, would have reconciled the conscript fathers to him, and made them forget his disobedience. In the same letter he proposed, that a colony might be sent to Venusium, to keep the neighbouring provinces in awe. His proposal was approved, but occasion taken from it to mortify him, and make him sensible, that the senate preferred obedience to valour. It was customary for the conqueror of a city to be one of the triumviri sent thither to settle a colony; but, in the case of Venusium, the senate, without any regard to Posthumius, named three others, allowing him no share in that honour. Nor was this all; to humble the proud Posthumius yet more, they granted the honours of a triumph to young Fabius his rival, who entered Rome triumphantly on the calends of the month Sextilis. The brave Pontius, famous for having surprized the Roman legions, and made them pass under the yoke at the Caudine Forks, followed the chariot of the conqueror, and by an act of inhumanity unworthy of a civilized nation, was condemned to lose his head. While young Fabius was riding in his triumphal chariot, his father followed him on horseback. He had formerly, in his first triumphs, carried his son in his chariot with him, and was now overjoyed to march after him, to mingle in the crowd, and to hear the acclamations of the people, and the songs of the soldiers in praise of the triumphant victor; however the spectators did him justice, saying, that the son was honoured with a triumph, but that the father deserved it ^e.

Posthumius seeing his rival thus honoured, and himself treated with so much contempt, vented his rage in bitter invectives against the senate, and invented a new kind of revenge, which was to distribute among his soldiers all the booty he had taken in the two conquered cities, without lodging any part of it in the public treasury. He then, out of spite, disbanded his troops before his successor could arrive. His colleague Brutus presided in the comitia, when P. Cornelius Rufinus, and Manius Curius Dentatus were chosen. Posthumius was no sooner out of office, than he was brought to a trial before the comitia by tribes. Before he left Rome, he had employed a detachment of his troops in the servile work of grubbing up a forest in his own estate. His accusation chiefly turned on his employing in so mean an office men of free condition, and who owed no service but to the public. As this crime offended the people more than his disobedience to the senate, they condemned him to pay a considerable fine ^d.

The republic enters into an alliance with the Samnites. Year after the flood 2714. Before Christ 285. Of Rome 463.

THE war with the Samnites had already furnished the Roman generals with matter for twenty-four triumphs, but had cost the conquerors a great deal of blood, many fatigues, and vast expences; so that the republic was quite tired with engaging every year the same enemy. In order therefore to put an end to this tedious war, both consuls were ordered into Samnium, where they acted separately, each at the head of a consular army, ravaged the country, took several cities, gained some battles, and at length obliged that gallant nation, which, after the loss of their brave general and able governor Pontius, was no longer in a condition to oppose the progress of their arms, to sue for peace. The republic readily consented to enter into an alliance with them for the fourth time; but left the settling of the articles to Curius Dentatus, a man of great probity, and who, without any vanity or ostentation, lived in that voluntary poverty, and unaffected contempt of riches, which the philosophers of those times cried up and recommended. The Samnite deputies found him sitting on a poor wooden seat near the fire, dressing his own dinner, which consisted of a few roots, and offered him a large sum of money; but Curius expressed his indignation with a disdainful smile. Without doubt, said he, my poverty inspires you with hopes of corrupting me; but your attempts are vain. I had rather command the rich, than be rich myself. Carry back with you this fatal metal, which men make use of only for their destruction; and tell your countrymen, that they will find it as difficult a matter to corrupt as to conquer me. The conditions Curius imposed upon them are not known; but it is probable they were no-ways favourable to that warlike and restless nation. The treaty was no sooner concluded, than the consul returned to Rome, where he triumphed, to the unexpressible joy of the people, who found themselves disburdened of a war, which had lasted forty-nine years, and given the republic more trouble than their wars with all the other states of Italy together. ^f a AND NOW the conquest of Samnium drew after it the intire reduction of the Sabines, The Sabines

reunited. whose confederacy with Rome was as ancient as the city itself; but, notwithstanding their alliance with the republic, they had joined the Samnites. Curius being therefore sent against them, brought the whole country under subjection; but as they were old allies, and had not aggravated their offences by any long revolt, or obstinate hatred, the weight of the yoke was lessened, and the right of Roman citizenship bestowed upon them, but without the right of suffrage. For the conquest of the Sabines Curius had a second triumph decreed him the same year, an honour which no general before him had ever enjoyed. As Curius was by birth a plebeian, some patricians attempted to cast a stain upon his reputation, accusing him of appropriating to himself part of the spoils taken from the enemy. As the proofs were not clear, Curius was put to his oath, and then he confessed, that he had kept a little wooden oil vessel for making libations to the gods; but protested that he had reserved nothing more. Such was the character of his disinterestedness, that he was believed, the malice of his accusers serving only to heighten the lustre of his virtue*.

b IN the following consulate of M. Valerius Corvinus and Q. Cædicius Noctua, Curius Dentatus was sent into Lucania, in quality of proconsul, to assist the Thurini against the Lucanians, who had invaded their territory. In this expedition, being attended with his usual success, he defeated the Lucanians, and obliged them to retire into their own country. The two consuls spent their whole year in works of peace, and in sending colonies to the conquered cities; namely to Adria, a maritime town, which is said to have given name to the Adriatic sea; to Castrum in Picenum, and to Sena, another city on the Adriatic, at the mouth of the Seno, in the country of the Senones. As men were grown more vicious, and the number of malefactors daily increased, as is usual in time of peace, three new judges were appointed to relieve the prætor, and try criminals. The punishments these judges could inflict were confined to pecuniary fines; but nevertheless they were styled triumviri capitales, because the care of the Triumviri capitales. prisons, where the greatest criminals were kept, was committed to them, and they had the direction of their execution. These new magistrates were chosen annually in the comitia by tribes; and from their sentence there lay no appeal. The time of this general peace was also thought a proper season to take a census of the Roman people, d by which it appeared, that the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms, amounted to two hundred and seventy-three thousand†.

e THE fruit of this new peace abroad was trouble and dissention at home. The people, oppressed by the usuries of the rich citizens, revived a quarrel, which had begun near two hundred years before. They kept themselves at first within bounds, only demanding that some abuses should be reformed with respect to contracts, whereby creditors exacted an immoderate interest for money lent. But the year ensuing, when Q. Marcus Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina were consuls a second time, a new accident drove them to extremities. T. Veturius, one of those unfortunate consuls, who had been surprized in the Caudine Forks, died insolvent; and his son, who had been educated with great care, and formed to virtue, borrowed a considerable sum of one C. Plotius, to defray the expence of his father's funeral. Plotius, who had also lent great sums to the father, soon after pressed the son to pay both his father's debts and that which he had lately contracted himself. Young Veturius, having neither money nor credit, was forced to submit to slavery, and work for his creditor, till he had discharged the whole debt. He bore his servitude with great constancy, and made it his study to please his creditor in every thing, till that infamous wretch solicited him, as he was a youth of great beauty, to gratify a brutal passion he had conceived for him; but then Veturius, remembering his birth, and the lessons he had been f taught in his earliest infancy, rejected his shameful addresses with the utmost indignation. His constancy was immovable, tho' his cruel master treated him most unmercifully for his virtuous resistance. One day, being covered all over with blood, and torn with stripes, he made his escape out of the house, appeared in the forum, and there shewed the people the marks of his barbarous creditor's cruelty, and discovered the infamy of his tyrant. The people laid hold of this opportunity to decry the usurers, and to demand the abolition of the law, which impowered them to reduce insolvent debtors to slavery. This inhuman law had been annulled once before on a like occasion; but the patricians had, by their authority and interest, revived it. As for the execrable Plotius, the tribunes accused him before the assembled centuries, and a got him condemned to death. The plebeians, not content with this first victory, insisted on the abolition of the above-mentioned law. The patricians opposed it to the utmost of their power: This is robbing us, said they, of our security for what we have lent. Debts must be paid, according to the old law, either in body or goods. The people, finding the patricians obstinate and inflexible, had recourse to an expedient, which had ever proved effectual. They left the city, and posted themselves on the hill Janiculus, with the Tiber between them and their prosecutors. By this removal of the people, the city being left destitute of artificers and labourers, and no provisions being brought thither from the country, for the country-people had likewise their complaints, the patricians and rich citizens found themselves obliged to humour the multitude. The consuls therefore of this year, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Nautilus Rutilus, were ordered to name a dictator, in order to appease the revolted populace. The person they named was Q. Hortensius, who immediately entering into a treaty with the separatists, made them the following concessions, viz. that the law in question should be repealed, and that two other laws, which had been formerly made, but no ways regarded by the patricians, should be strictly observed for the future. These were, that the decrees made by the tribes should be equally observed both by the patricians and plebeians; and that all laws should first pass in the senate, and be afterwards brought to the comitia, to be there approved or rejected. The country-people complained, that justice was not administered at Rome on market-days; and that, when any causes were depending, they were forced to leave their work, and return to the city again. This was rectified, and the dictator promised, that market-days should no longer be vacation days for the judges, that the husbandmen might have their causes heard before they went home. When these articles were drawn up, and the people's minds began to be calmed, Q. Hortensius died. It being therefore necessary to nominate another dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus was raised to that dignity, who chose for his general of the horse a famous plebeian, named Volumnius Flamma. By the interposition of these two great men, the work, which Hortensius had begun, was soon accomplished; and the people having attained to the highest pitch of their desires, returned to the city, and thought only of enjoying the sweets of tranquillity. The balance of power leaned now rather to their side. The nobility had no other advantage over them but that of great riches, and the respect which is naturally paid to persons of high birth. The peace of the city being therefore no more interrupted by intestine contests, we shall see the republic increase her dominions abroad with incredible rapidity. The great Fabius died soon after he had happily accomplished the accommodation. In his life-time he had been looked upon as a prodigy of valour, wisdom and virtue; and upon his death the people contributed to the expence of his obsequies with so much generosity, that his son, with the victims offered at his funeral, gave a public entertainment to the whole city. It is probable, that, after the reconciliation, the dictator Fabius presided at the election of the new consuls M. Valerius Potitus and C. Atilius Patus, whose year proved barren of remarkable events; as did also the following, when C. Claudius Canina and M. Aemilius Lepidus were consuls. But in the following consulate of C. Servilius Tucca and L. Caelilius Metellus, the Tarentines, jealous of the prosperity of the Romans, and apprehending, that they aimed at the conquest of all Italy, stirred up both old and new enemies against the republic, and engaged her in one of the most formidable wars she had ever sustained.

Tarentum was a city of Great Greece, which comprehended the greatest part of the south coast of Italy. Most of the cities in this great province had been founded by Greeks, who brought thither with them the Greek language, customs and manners. The Tarentines in particular were a colony of Spartans, who settling on the continent of Italy, under the conduct of one Phalantus, made themselves masters of a city first called Oebalia, and afterwards Tarentum, from one Taras, or, as others will have it, Tarentus, who is said to have increased and embellished the city after the Greeks were masters of it. These transplanted Spartans soon forgot the severe discipline of Sparta, and plunged themselves into all the debaucheries with which the rest of the Greeks were reproached. The heat of the climate, the fruitfulness of the country, and the opportunity of supplying themselves by sea with all the delights of Greece, sunk them into a idleness, and all the vices that attend it. Their whole life was spent in feasts, sports, and public entertainments. Buffoons and prostitutes governed the state at their pleasure, and often determined the most important affairs by a joke, or an indecent gesture. They bore a mortal hatred to the Romans, and dreaded their dominion, not so much out of fear of losing their liberty, as of being disturbed by that warlike and rough people in the pursuit of their pleasures. They therefore employed all their Græcian subtlety to draw such a number of enemies upon them, as still to keep them at a distance from themselves, and this without appearing to be concerned.

b At the same time the Senones, having raised a formidable army, marched into Hebruria, with a design to besiege Aretium, a city about forty leagues from Rome, at a small distance from the Arnus. The Aretines had immediately recourse to the Romans, who, they knew, would never suffer the Gauls to make conquests in Hebruria, and thereby open themselves a way to Rome. The republic, alarmed at the least motion of so powerful an enemy, dispatched, without loss of time, the consul Lucius Cæcilius with an army to the assistance of the Aretini; but, before any act of hostility, a deputation was sent to the Senones, to dissuade them from their design. But the proud Gauls, instead of listening to the mediation of Rome, killed the deputies, and brought their troops before Aretium. Hereupon the consul advanced with his army, and came to an engagement with the enemy, in which he himself was killed, with seven legionary tribunes, the best part of the Roman knights, and thirteen thousand private men. Upon the news of this dreadful overthrow, the famous Curius Dentatus was ordered with new troops into Hebruria, to supply the place of the consul Cæcilius; but that wise commander, instead of marching to the relief of Aretium, and engaging the enemy flushed with their late victory, held his rout along the confines of Hebruria, and entering the country of the Senones, took advantage of the absence of their best troops to ravage it without opposition. He plundered and burnt their houses, laid waste their fields, put all those to the sword, who were able to bear arms, carried the women and children into captivity, and, in short, reduced the whole country to a vast desert, in which there scarce remained any appearance of its having ever been cultivated or inhabited. Thus he took ample revenge for the murder of the Roman embassad rs.

c THE next year, in the beginning of the administration of the new consuls P. Cornelius Dolabella and Cn. Domitius Calvinus, the Boii, the Hebrurians, and the Samnites, once more declared against the republic, being stirred up under-hand by the Tarentines; but, notwithstanding this great confederacy, the senate and people reposed so great a confidence in the new consuls, that they did not think of creating a dictator, as was usual in times of great danger. Nor was their confidence ill grounded; for Domitius taking the field, and meeting the Senones, who had raised the siege of Aretium, and were marching strait to Rome, to revenge the devastations made in their country, gave them a total overthrow, and covered the field of battle with their dead bodies. Only a small number of them escaped, and saved themselves in the country of the Boii, whom they pressed to take arms immediately, and revenge the common cause of the Gauls. Accordingly the Boii, having raised all the young men in their territory, who were able to bear arms, and being reinforced by a great body of Hebrurians, pursued the attempt, which the Senones had begun, and marched towards Rome; but the consul Cornelius, who waited for them on the banks of the lake Vademonis in Hebruria, now il Lago di Bassano, engaged them, killed almost all the Hebrurians, and the greater part of the Boii. The latter made some faint efforts against the Romans the next year; but being defeated a second time, they were forced to sue for peace. As for the Senones, they were so utterly destroyed, that there scarce remained any footsteps in Italy of a nation, which had distinguished itself so much by the taking of Rome.

The Senones entirely defeated.

And also the Boii and Hebrurians.

In the following consulate of C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus, almost all Italy rose in arms against the imperious republic; but Fabricius being sent into Lucania, defeated there the confederate forces of the Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnites, and made himself master of their camp. Twenty-five thousand of the enemy, with their general Statilius, were slain. The Romans, imagining that the god Mars had fought in person for them, returned him solemn thanks for his assistance by public supplications (B).

found it a difficult enterprize to force their camp. The means, by which he succeeded in it, and which had

The Tarentines, in a hostile manner, fall upon a Roman fleet.

And insult their ambassadors in a most outrageous manner.

They take Thurium.

As for the Tarentines, tho' they were the real authors of this war, they had not yet appeared in the field, nor openly declared against Rome; but an accident made them at length throw off the mask, and brought on, after a long series of events, their utter ruin. Valerius, or, as others call him, Cornelius, one of the maritime duumviri, or admirals of the Roman fleet, happened to come to the mouth of their harbour with ten ships, while the idle inhabitants of the city were assembled, as usual, in the theatre, which looked towards the harbour. The Tarentines, imagining that Rome, having at last discovered their secret plots, had sent that fleet to punish them, they all, with one consent, ran down to the port, fell upon the Roman fleet with the fury of madmen, sunk one ship, and took four, the other five escaping. All the prisoners fit to bear arms were put to the sword, and the others sold for slaves to the best bidder. The Romans, upon the news of this unexpected act of hostility, sent a deputation to Tarentum, to demand satisfaction for the insult offered to the republic; but the Tarentines, instead of hearkening to their demands, insulted the ambassadors in the most outrageous manner. They admitted them to an audience in the theatre, where Posthumius Megellus, who was at the head of the embassy, and had been thrice consul, harangued the assembly in Greek. His advanced age, his personal merit, and, above all, the character of an ambassador from a powerful people, ought to have gained him respect; but the Tarentines, heated with wine, not only gave no attention to his discourse, but burst into loud laughter, and impudently hissed him, whenever he dropped an improper expression, or pronounced a word with a foreign accent. Nor was this all: when he began to speak of reparation of injuries, they flew into a rage, and rather drove him out of the assembly, than dismissed him. As he was walking off with an air of gravity and dignity, which he preserved, notwithstanding the reception they gave him, a buffoon, named Philonides, coming up to him, urined upon his robe, a new source of immoderate laughter to the mad and drunken multitude, who clapped their hands, applauding the outrageous insolence. Posthumius, turning about to the assembly, shewed them the skirt of his garment so defiled; but when he found that this had no effect but to increase the loudness of their contumelious mirth, he said, without the least emotion, Laugh on, Tarentines, laugh on, now while you may; the time is coming when you will weep. It is not a little blood that must wash and purify this garment. This said, he withdrew, left the city, and embarked for Rome. When the Tarentines came to themselves, and began to reflect on the enormity of their conduct, and at the same time on the inability of their neighbours to defend them against so powerful a republic, they cast their eyes upon Pyrrhus king of Epirus, whose great reputation for valour, and long experience in war, had gained him the reputation of one of the heroes of Greece. They therefore immediately dispatched ambassadors to him, but rather to sound his disposition, and observe the situation of his affairs, than to enter, without farther deliberation, into any engagements with him. As Pyrrhus naturally loved action, and the bustle and hurry of war, the ambassadors found him in a disposition to hearken to any proposal, which would furnish him with employment worthy of his ambition.

IN the mean time the Tarentines, to amuse the Romans till the return of their ambassadors from Epirus, besieged Thurium, which was defended by a Roman garison, and made themselves masters of it. This news was brought to Rome a little after the return of Posthumius and the other ambassadors, who had been so ill treated at Tarentum. The new consuls therefore, L. Aemilius Barbula, and Q. Marcius Philippus, having assembled the conscript fathers, laid before them the situation of the affairs of the republic on one hand, and the shameful indignity which had been offered the ambassadors on the other. It was dangerous to engage in a new war, when the republic had so many nations to contend with. The Hietrurians were still in arms; f had something of the air of a miracle, was probably a stratagem of his own contriving. While he seemed to be in suspense what measures to take, a young man, full of strength and vigor, wearing feathers in his helmet, appeared on a sudden in the midst of the legions, exhorted them to decline no danger for the honour of their country, and then seizing a ladder, advanced to the rampart through a shower of darts, planted his ladder against it, and mounted the wall. This bold action intimidated the confederates, and inspired the Romans with such intrepidity, that they soon made themselves masters of the camp. After the victory, the consul ordered the young man to be sought for, in order to reward him for having first mounted the rampart; and because he was not to be found, the Romans immediately imagined, that he was the god Mars himself.

- 1 the Samnites, without regard to the faith of treaties, had declared anew against the republic; and the Lucanians and Brutians were grown more confident since the taking of Tburium. On the other hand, the hostilities committed by the Tarentines, and the insult offered to Posthumius, whose robe was produced in the senate, left no room to deliberate whether they should enter into a war with that people or not. They were all unanimous as to the necessity of chastising them; but whether it was advisable for the republic to shew her resentment immediately was doubted. Some of the senators were for declaring war forthwith; others for deferring it, till the provinces bordering on the Tarentine territories were subdued. Never was debate more tedious, or more perplexing. The same question was discussed, and warmly debated, from sun-rising to sun-set, for several days together. At length the opinion of those, who were for beginning the war immediately, prevailed; and the decree of the senate being confirmed by the people, orders were dispatched to the consul Æmilius, who was on his march into Samnium, to lay aside that expedition, and turn his arms against Tarentum. The Tarentines, upon the approach of a consular army, carried on their deliberations with more seriousness; and when the consul sent once again to demand satisfaction before he began hostilities, the better sort of citizens declared for peace. Æmilius offered them moderate terms; and, after all, it was but equitable, that they should repair the injuries, and wipe off the reproach they had thrown on a considerable republic without any provocation; but the populace, who had nothing to lose, insisted on a war; and their clamours prevailed over the just reasons of the wisest men in Tarentum. The proposal of bringing Pyrrhus into Italy was revived, and a decree passed for inviting that prince to Tarentum. One Meton, a citizen of good sense, and no ways infected with the general corruption, which prevailed in the city, endeavoured to divert his countrymen from this mad design (C); but was thrust out of the assembly, and ambassadors were immediately dispatched into Epirus, not only in the name of the Tarentines, but of all the Greek colonies in Italy, with magnificent presents for the king, and with instructions to acquaint him, that they only wanted a general of fame and experience; and that as for troops, they could themselves furnish a numerous army of twenty thousand horse, and three hundred and fifty thousand foot, made up of Lucanians, Messapians, Samnites, and Tarentines. As soon as the news of this deputation was brought to the Roman camp, Æmilius, who had hitherto made war on the Tarentines but gently, in hopes of adjusting matters by way of negotiation, took other measures, and began to commit all sorts of hostilities. He took cities, stormed castles, and laid the whole country waste, burning and destroying all before him. The Tarentines brought their army into the field; but Æmilius soon obliged them to take refuge within their walls. However, to induce them to lay aside the design of receiving Pyrrhus, he used the prisoners he had taken with great moderation, and even sent them back without ransom. These highly extolled the generosity of the consul, insomuch that many of the inhabitants were brought over to the Roman party; and they all began to repent of their having rejected a peace, and sent for Pyrrhus. But in the mean time the Tarentine ambassadors arriving in Epirus, pursuant to the powers they had received, made an absolute treaty with the king, who immediately sent before him the famous Cyneas, with three thousand men, to take possession of the citadel of Tarentum. This eloquent minister, whose character we have given in our history of *Epirus, soon found means to depose Agis, whom

(C) Meton, on the day that a public decree was to pass for inviting Pyrrhus to Tarentum, and when the people were all placed in the theatre, putting a withered garland on his head, and having a flambeau in his hand, as was the manner of the drunken debauchees, came dancing into the midst of the assembly, accompanied by a woman playing on the flute. This silly sight was sufficient to divert the Tarentines from their most important deliberations. They made a ring, and called out to Meton to sing, and to the woman to play; but when they, expecting to be entertained with a song, were all silent, the wise citizen, assuming an air of great seriousness, You do well, Tarentines, said he, not to hinder those from diverting themselves, who are disposed to mirth, and, if you are wise, you will yourselves take advantage of the present liberty you enjoy to do the same. When Pyrrhus comes, you must change your way of life; your mirth and joy will be at an end. These words made an impression upon the multitude, and a murmur went about, that he had spoken well; but those who had some reason to fear, that they should be delivered up to the Romans, in case of an accommodation, being enraged at what he had said, reviled the assembly for suffering themselves to be so mocked and affronted; and crowding together, thrust Meton out of the assembly (10).

the Tarentines had chosen to be their general, and the governor of the city, tho' a sincere friend to the Romans. He likewise prevailed upon the Tarentines to deliver up the citadel into his hands; which he no sooner got possession of, than he dispatched messengers to Pyrrhus, soliciting him to hasten his departure for Italy. In the mean time the consul Æmilius, finding that he could not attempt any thing with success against the Tarentines this campaign, resolved to put his troops into winter-quarters in Apulia, which was not far from the territory of Tarentum, that was soon to become the seat of the war. As he was obliged to pass through certain defiles, with the sea on one side, and high hills on the other, he was there attacked by the Tarentines and Epirots, from great numbers of barks, fraught with ballistæ, that is, engines for throwing stones of a vast weight, and from the hills, on which were posted a great many archers and slingers. Hereupon Æmilius placed the Tarentine prisoners between him and the enemy; which the Tarentines perceiving, soon left off molesting the Romans, out of compassion to their own countrymen; so that the Romans arrived safe in Apulia, and there took up their winter-quarters. As for the consul, he repaired to Rome, where his colleague Marcus had a triumph on the calends of April, for having vanquished the *Hetrurians*¹.

Pyrrhus.

THE next year P. Valerius Lævinus and Tib. Coruncanius were chosen consuls. The latter was raised to the consulate purely for his merit; for he was of a mean descent, and not even a Roman by birth, but a native of Camerium, a Roman municipium in Latium. It fell to his lot to carry on the war in Hetruria, and to his colleague's to conduct that against the Tarentines. Æmilius, who had acted against the Tarentines the last year, was continued in the command of his own troops with the title of pro-consul, and ordered to make war upon the Salentines, who had declared for the Tarentines. The present exigence of affairs obliged the Romans to enlist the proletarii, who were the meanest of the people, and therefore, by way of contempt, called proletarii, as being thought incapable of doing the state any other service than that of peopling the city, and stocking the republic with subjects. Hitherto they had never been suffered to bear arms, but were now, to their great satisfaction, inrolled as well as others. In the mean time Pyrrhus arrived at Tarentum, having narrowly escaped shipwreck; and being conducted into the city by his faithful Cyneas, was received there with loud acclamations. Thus began the memorable war between the Romans and that famous commander, the first foreigner they had to deal with. It was carried on with great vigor on both sides for the space of six years, during which time the following consuls were at the head of the Roman armies; the first year P. Valerius Lævinus and T. Coruncanius; the second P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Decius Mus, whose father and grandfather were both famous for their devotements; the third C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius, two men of the most distinguished merit; the fourth Cornelius Ruffinus and C. Junius Brutus, the former a man extremely covetous and self-interested, but nevertheless promoted by the interest of Fabricius, because he was a much abler commander than any of his competitors; the fifth Q. Fabius Gurgæ and C. Genucius; and lastly the sixth the famous Curius Dentatus and L. Cornelius Lentulus. But as, in our history of Epirus, we have given a very particular account of this war, and the various events which attended it, from the landing of Pyrrhus in Italy, to his return into his own dominions^m, we shall here only relate what happened after the latter period, referring the reader for an account of the war itself to the above-mentioned history.

The triumph of Curius.

Pyrrhus having thought it adviseable to leave Italy, after the last battle, in which he was defeated by Curius Dentatus, with the loss of twenty-three thousand men, Curius returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph, it being the most magnificent one that had ever yet been seen; great quantities of rich spoil, vessels of gold, purple carpets, statues, pictures, and, in short, all the fineries of the Greek cities, were carried before him. Among the captives were Epirots, Thessulians, and Macedonians, not to mention the Lucanians, Brutians, Tarentines, and other Greek nations. The appearance and dress of so many foreigners gave the spectators great pleasure; but nothing so much raised their admiration, as the elephants with towers on their backs, animals which had never before been seen in Rome. As for the triumphant victor, he rode in a chariot, and the acclamations the people gave him were very sincere; they thought they could never give him sufficient proofs of their gratitude. The senate impowered

- a him to appropriate to himself fifty acres of the conquered lands ; but he declined this favour, saying, That he ought to be looked upon as a dangerous subject, who could not live upon the produce of seven acres. Of all the spoils he reserved only a little vessel of beech for his domestic sacrifices. This magnificent triumph of Curius was followed by that of his colleague Lentulus, who had made a successful campaign in Lucania, and taken from the Samnites the famous city of Caudium. This happy consulate ended with a census and a lustrum. The virtuous Fabritius and his constant colleague Æmilius Papus being censors, they made a new list of senators, and struck out the names of all those, who led dissolute lives ; nay, Cornelius Rufinus, who had been consul and dictator, was excluded, only for having ten pounds weight of silver in plate. Happy times for the republic, when riches and luxury were branded with ignominy ! By the census there appeared to be in Rome two hundred seventy-one thousand two hundred and twenty-four citizens fit to bear arms ⁿ.

- The Romans, apprehending that the king of Epirus would soon appear in Italy again with a more numerous army than ever, continued Curius Dentatus in the consulate for the next year, giving him for his colleague Cornelius Merenda. In the mean time the Tarentines, being now well apprised, that Pyrrhus, under pretence of going to fetch new supplies, had intirely deserted them, obliged Milo, whom the king had left in the city with a strong garison, to confine himself to the citadel. These divisions made Curius believe, that the Tarentines and Epirots would destroy each other ; and upon this belief he neglected to besiege Tarentum, and turned his arms against the Samnites and Lucanians, who retired for refuge to their mountains ; but they appeared again in the field the next year, when G. Fabius Dorso and G. Claudius Carina were consuls. The latter defeated them, once at least, in a pitched battle ; for we read in the Fasti Capitolini, that Claudius Canina triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians on the day of the Quirinalia, or the festival of Romulus, that is, on the seventeenth day of February. And now the reputation of the Romans being spread into foreign countries, Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, sent ambassadors to congratulate the republic on her success, and to ask the friendship of the Roman people. The Romans, not to be outdone in civility, sent four ambassadors to Egypt, chosen, with the utmost circumspection, by a senate studious to preserve their reputation abroad intire. Fabius Gurgus was at the head of this embassy, and with him were joined three curule ædiles, two of them brothers of the Fabian family, and the third Q. Ogulnius. Their reception was equal to their merit, and worthy of so magnificent a prince. He invited them to his table, and presented each of them with a crown of gold ; which they accepted, being unwilling to disoblige the king by a refusal ; but placed them the next morning on the heads of the king's statues, that were erected in the public places of the city. This contempt of riches gained the Romans great reputation in Egypt ; however, the king would not suffer them to depart without new presents, both for themselves and their republic ; which they, upon their return to Rome, deposited in the public treasury ; but the senate and people ordered the quæstors to restore to the ambassadors what had been given them for their own use.

Embassadors
from Ptolemy Philadelphus.

- The next year the Romans, still under the apprehension that Pyrrhus would once more return into Italy, raised to the consulate two great men, who had already bore that office, and commanded with great reputation the armies of the republic. These were L. Papirius Cursor, the worthy son of an illustrious father, and Sp. Corvilius, surnamed Maximus. These generals had scarce entered Samnium with two armies, when a certain account came of the death of Pyrrhus. This news threw the Samnites into despair ; they now looked upon their liberty as lost, and, like men in that unhappy situation, put all to the hazard of a battle, in which they were intirely defeated. An historian, in speaking of this victory, says it was so complete, that Samnium itself was no more. And thus ended this bloody war, which had lasted seventy-two years, and procured the Roman generals thirty-one triumphs. After the intire reduction of Samnium, the Lucanians and Brutians gave way in their turn, and submitted to the yoke ; so that only Tarentum remained unpunished ; which the consuls soon invested. There was a kind of civil war between Milo in the citadel, and the Tarentines in the city ; and the latter, as it is thought, had implored the assistance of the Carthaginians, who lay with a fleet before the town, pretending to have no design but against the Epirots and the citadel. The Romans, on the other hand, attacked the city, taking care to prevent the Carthaginians from reducing the citadel. With this view Papirius privately signified to Milo, that, if he would surrender the citadel to him, he and his garison should not only have their lives spared, but be safely transported, with all their baggage and effects, into Epirus. Milo readily listened to this offer, and even undertook to put the city as well as the citadel into the consul's hands. Accordingly he assembled the Tarentines, and prevailed upon them to depute him to the consul, promising to make such advantageous terms for them, that they should neither lose their lives nor their goods. Milo was as good as his word; for Papirius, in order to hinder the Carthaginians from getting any footing in Italy, promised him all he asked. The Romans, being soon after admitted into the city, did no violence to the inhabitants. As for the Carthaginians, when they found themselves disappointed, they retired with their fleet, leaving the Romans under just suspicions, that, notwithstanding their ancient alliance, they intended to rob the republic of a city, which, by right of conquest, belonged to them. The Tarentines were all disarmed, their ships taken from them, and their city dismantled, and made tributary to Rome.

AND now the Sabines, Volsci, Campanians, Hetrurians, and Samnites being utterly subdued, the republic was at leisure to wipe off the dishonour thrown upon her by a Campanian legion soon after the arrival of Pyrrhus in Italy. While that prince was at Tarentum, and the Carthaginians infested all the Ionian sea, the inhabitants of Rhegium, situated in the southern extremity of Italy, near Sicily, applied to the republic for a Roman garison to defend them from an invasion. A legion was raised in Campania for that purpose, and sent to them under the command of one Decius Jubellus. These soldiers, having been used to a laborious life, began soon to envy the inhabitants the pleasures and ease in which they lived; and it was not long before they formed and executed a scheme to make those advantages their own. They forged letters from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, importing an offer to put the place into his hands; and under this pretence they massacred all the chief men of the city at a banquet, and then falling upon the rest, either put them to the sword, or drove them out of the place. As for the women, they obliged them to marry the murderers of their fathers and husbands. This news was brought to Rome at a time when the affairs of the republic would not allow her to take vengeance of the perfidious legion; but the republic, having now no enemies to fear, as soon as the new consuls C. Quinctius Claudius and L. Genucius Clepsina entered upon their office, ordered the latter to turn his arms against Rhegium, and besiege it. The usurpers not only called to their assistance the Mamertines, who were originally Campanians, and had acted the same part at Messina, as we have related in the history of Sicily, but opened an asylum for all the profligate wretches of the country, who flocked to the city in great crouds from all the neighbouring countries. The Campanians being thus reinforced, made a vigorous defence, and held out, till provisions beginning to fail in the camp of the Romans, Genucius was obliged to have recourse to Hiero king of Syracuse, who, by supplying him not only with the corn he wanted, but with a reinforcement of some Sicilian troops, enabled him at last to make himself master of the place. Of about four thousand men, of which the guilty legion had at first consisted, only three hundred remained now alive, the rest having been killed in the several attacks made upon the city. These, as the Campanians enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens, were sent prisoners to Rome to be tried there. The senate condemned them all to be first beaten with rods, and then beheaded; but, in order to prevent a mutiny, which so bloody an execution might raise among the populace, the criminals were put to death on different days in the forum, by fifty at a time. By this means Rome cleared herself of the suspicion of having sent the Rhegians succours with no other view but to seize their city. Such of the inhabitants as had escaped the cruelty of the Campanian legion, were, by a decree of the senate, reinstated in the possession of their estates, liberties and laws.

The Sarcinates defeated.

THE following year C. Genucius and Cn. Cornelius were raised to the consulate. The former gained a victory over the Sarcinates, a people of Umbria, and was on that account honoured with a triumph. The succeeding consuls Q. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Pictor, were sent against one Lollius a Samnite, who having made his escape from Rome, where he was kept as a hostage, had seized a strong place in Samnium, and being joined by the Caricini, a people of that country, laid the neighbouring pro-

- a vinces under contribution. The consuls besieged the city of the Caricini, which made so vigorous a resistance, that they were very near failing in the enterprize; however, being at length privately admitted into the city by some deserters, they made themselves masters of it; but not without the loss of many legionaries, the besieged defending themselves to the last with incredible bravery. Under the same consuls, the Romans, who had hitherto used no money in commerce, except pieces of brass, stamped with the figures of a bull, a ram, and a boar, began to coin silver, and introduce it into commerce. The place appointed for the mint was the temple of Juno Moneta, of which we have spoken elsewhere; and hence came the word money.^{Silver money coined at Rome}
- b THE following consuls, P. Sempronius Sophus, and Appius Claudius Crassus, son to the famous Appius Claudius, entered Picenum jointly; but new commotions in Umbria obliging them to separate, Appius entered that country; and having made himself master of Camerinum, sold all the inhabitants for slaves, contrary to his agreement with them, deposited the money accruing from the sale in the public treasury, and seized all their lands. But the senate had too much equity to authorize so wicked a fraud; they caused all those unhappy wretches to be carefully sought out, allowed them the privileges of Roman citizens, granted them a place upon mount Aventine for their habitation, and allotted each of them as much land in property as they had lost in Umbria. In the mean time the other consul, Sempronius Sophus, carried on the war against the Picentes with great success. He gained a complete victory over them, which however cost him very dear; for he lost the greater part of his troops in the action (D). Asulum, the capital of Picenum, submitted to the conqueror, and the whole nation gave themselves up to Rome; a great increase of power to the republic, this country alone being able to supply her armies with three hundred and sixty thousand men. After this the Romans, the better to secure their new conquests, and keep the conquered nations in awe, sent out two colonies, one to Ariminum in the country of the Picentes, and another to Benventum in that of the Samnites. This same year the Sabines, who had hitherto had no other privilege but that of being incorporated in the legions, instead of serving as auxiliaries, were admitted to the right of suffrage in the city, which made them intirely Romans.^{Picenum conquered.}
- d THE consuls of the following year, L. Julius and M. Atilius Regulus, began a war with the Salentines. Their pretence was, that this nation had favoured the descent of Pyrrhus, and espoused the cause of the Tarentines, a pretence invented by the ambitious republic to rob her neighbours of their liberty. The chief cities of the Salentines were Hydruntum, Aletium and Brundisium. This last port was what the Romans chiefly coveted. It was so advantageously situated, that, by being masters of it, they were in a condition to contend with the nations beyond sea, and to carry war into Africa, Asia and Greece. The Salentines disputed their country inch by inch; and tho' Atilius Regulus took Brundisium, yet neither he nor his colleague had the glory of subduing that gallant nation. Their successors, Numerius Fabius and D. Junius Pera, took Aletium and Hydruntum, with other cities, and by that means obliged the Salentines to submit to the yoke. The same campaign they subdued the Sarcinates in Umbria; and, on their return to Rome, were honoured each with two triumphs for the reduction of two nations, a thing unheard-of before in the republic.^{The Salentines subdued.}
- e AND now the republic was mistress of all the countries in Italy, from the remotest part of Hebruria to the Ionian sea, and from the Tyrrhenian sea to the Adriatic. But these nations did not all enjoy the same privileges; some were intirely subject to Rome, and had no laws but what they received from thence; others retained their old laws and customs, but in subjection to the republic; some were tributary, and others allies, and were obliged to furnish the Roman army with troops, and maintain them at their own expence. Some had the privilege of Roman citizenship, their soldiers were incorporated in the legions; others had likewise a right of suffrage in the elections made by the centuries in the campus Martius. These different degrees of

(D) We are told, that while the two armies were in sight of each other, and ready to engage, a sudden earthquake greatly terrified the Romans, and damped their ardor for fighting; but Sempronius Sophus, not surprized at a natural effect, encouraged them, saying, That the earth shook only for fear of changing its masters; and then vowing a temple to the goddess Tellus, they quickly recovered their former ardor, and tell upon the Picenses with their usual intrepidity (21).

honour, privileges and liberty, were founded on the different terms granted to the conquered upon their surrender, and were afterwards increased, according to their fidelity, and the services they did the republic.

The Apollonates court the friendship of the republic.

THE fame of the Roman name being, after this great increase of power and dominion, spread into foreign countries, their friendship was courted by free cities, and whole nations on the other side the sea. Apollonia, situated over-against Brundisium, was the first city of Macedon that sent ambassadors to desire the protection of Rome. These ambassadors were kindly received by the senate; but, upon some occasion not mentioned in history, insulted by Fabricius and Apronius, two young patricians, and at this time ædiles. The republic would not suffer this breach of the law of nations to go unpunished; they were both tried, and the sentence passed upon them was, that they should be put into the hands of the Apollonates, carried into Macedon, and there punished at the pleasure of the people, whom they had offended in the persons of their ambassadors. The republic obliged the offenders to abdicate the ædileship, before they set out from Rome; and lest the ambassadors should be insulted on the road by the friends and relations of Fabricius and Apronius, they were conducted to Brundisium, together with the prisoners, by a detachment of troops under the command of a quæstor. This was shewing the Apollonates great regard; and they, in their turn, shewed a prudent respect for the republic. The prisoners were hospitably received, and then sent back to Rome. This event gave rise to a law, which lasted as long as the republic, whereby it was enacted, that if any citizen, of what quality soever, insulted an ambassador, he should be delivered up to the injured nation. ^a Provincial Quæstors created.

THE republic enjoying now a profound tranquillity both at home and abroad, the new consuls, Q. Fabius Gurgæ, and L. Mamilius Vitulus, applied themselves wholly to the regulating of the public revenues. These arose from the tributes each nation was to pay from the rents of certain arable and pasture lands, which the republic reserved for herself as her demesns, whenever she distributed any conquered lands among the citizens; from the tenth of the produce of all lands, which were dependent upon her; and lastly, from the imposts upon all merchandize imported into her dominions. The four quæstors already appointed to receive and pay the public monies, were hardly sufficient to go through the business, even before the late conquests. It being now ^d therefore absolutely necessary to augment the number of these officers, four new ones were created, with the title of provincial quæstors, to take charge of the four provinces, into which the republic had divided her conquests. The quæstor of the first province resided at Ostia, and his quæstorship reached from the springs of the Tiber and the Arno to the mouth of the Liris, and comprehended Ætruria, Latium, Sabinia, Umbria, and in short all the coasts of the Tuscan sea, and all the lands between that sea and the Apennines. The quæstor of the second province resided at Cale in Campania, and had under his jurisdiction all the country between the Liris and the gulf of Tarentum; that is, Campania, Samnium, Lucania, the country of the Brutii and Oenotria. The third province reached from the Apennines to the shore of the Adriatic sea, and was called ^e the Gallie quæstorship. It contained the countries formerly conquered by the Gauls, especially the Senones, from the Rubicon to the Æsis, and also Picenum, the country of the Frentani, and all the other countries as far as Apulia. The fourth quæstorship, of which we have not so distinct an account as of the other three, could only comprise Apulia, Calabria, and the territories of the Salentines, Messapians and Tarentines. For these four provinces Rome created four new quæstors; and it was then settled, that all the eight quæstors should for the future be chosen in the comitia by tribes. After the elections, which were renewed every year, the eight quæstors drew lots in the presence of the people, to decide who should have the Roman, who the military, and who the provincial quæstorships. The military quæstors attended the consuls ^f in their expeditions, kept the military chest, paid the troops' and sold the prisoners and spoils taken from the enemy. The Roman quæstors had care of the public treasury. The provincial quæstorships were mostly desired by the ambitious, before Rome had extended her conquests beyond Italy; but little coveted after the republic had brought the east and west under subjection, and great kingdoms were become so many provinces under her dominion.

WE have often observed, that it was the fate of the Romans to be afflicted with domestic misfortunes, when they were not engaged in any war; and this was the case at present: a contagion broke out, which made a dreadful havock both in the city

- a and country. Hereupon recourse being had to the Sibylline books, according to custom, it was there supposed to be found, that some secret crimes had drawn down the wrath of heaven upon the republic. A vestal, named Caparania, was found, upon diligent inquiry, guilty of incontinence, and condemned to be buried alive without the gate Collina. The guilty vestal, to avoid so cruel a death, strangled herself; but the same ceremonies of interment were performed over the dead body, as if she had been living ^w. Notwithstanding the havock made by the plague, we are told, that, by a census taken this year, the number of citizens fit to bear arms appeared to be two hundred ninety-two thousand two hundred and twenty-four. Either the plague did not make great ravages in Rome, or in this enumeration the Sabines were
- b comprehended, to whom the right of suffrage had been lately granted; for the number of citizens in this census was greater than ever^x. With this census, and the lustrum which followed it, ended the magistracy of the two censors C. Marcius Rutilus and Cn. Cornelius Blasio, who had been now five years in their office, and were both men of great probity. The former had been, on account of his extraordinary merit, elected, contrary to custom, and his own earnest remonstrances, a second time to this high station; and hence he acquired in all likelihood the surname of Censorinus, which was perpetuated in his family. But in order to put a stop to so dangerous a practice, Marcius got a law passed, forbidding any person to hold the censorship a second time.
- c WHILE the two consuls, Fabius Gurgus and Mamilius Vitulus, were employed at home in works of peace, an unexpected war sprung up in the very bowels of the republic. Volturni, one of the capital cities of the twelve Hebrurian leucumones, had been allowed by the Romans to enjoy her ancient laws and form of government; but as the inhabitants no longer considered themselves as a free and independent people, they despised the public offices, and suffered their freed-men to usurp them, giving themselves wholly up to their pleasures. These freed-men became, by degrees, tyrants in that little republic, and made it their whole business to humble their old masters. They took away their wives from them by force, and carried their insolence and licentiousness so far, that they passed a law, that no virgin daughter of a man free-born
- d should be married to a husband of the like condition, till she had submitted to the passion of a freed-man. To these indignities they added the banishments and proscriptions of the most worthy citizens. The Volturniensis, despairing of being able to redress their grievances themselves, sent deputies to Rome, to implore the assistance of the republic. The deputies set out privately, and carried on their negotiations with great secrecy; but nevertheless the freed-men, getting notice of the whole, put the deputies to death at their return; and when the consul Fabius, who was sent against them with a small army of volunteers, appeared before their city, they even ventured to face him in the field, and give him battle. Fabius put them to the rout; but as he was entering the town with the runaways, he received a mortal wound from an
- e unknown hand. Thus fell a great man, who had been honoured with triumphs, embassies, and three consulates, and who, contrary to the expectation of the great Fabius his father, did no ways degenerate from the virtue of his ancestors. The consul was no sooner carried out of the croud, than the freed-men facing about, fell upon the Romans with such fury, that they obliged them to retire. Then Decius Mus, lieutenant to Fabius, invested Volturni, and began to besiege it in form; but it was not taken till the arrival of M. Fulvius Flaccus, one of the consuls for the next year, who forced the freed-men to surrender at discretion, and put all those who had acted any part in this scene of villainy to death. The ancient citizens, and those who had not been concerned in the revolt, were transplanted to another place, and their city razed.
- f This conduct of Flaccus was so agreeable to the republic, that she granted him the honours of a triumph. He entered Rome in state on the calends of February in the year succeeding this, which was the year of his consulate. We have anticipated this latter part of history, to avoid blending an affair of so little importance with the great events we are going to relate in the following chapter, namely, those of the first Punic or Cartaginian war.

The history of Rome, from the first Carthaginian war to the second.

The occasion of the first rupture between Rome and Carthage.
Year of the

THE Carthaginians, when the war first broke out between their republic and that of Rome, were possessed of extensive dominions in Africa, had made considerable acquisitions in Spain, were masters of Sardinia, Corfica, and all the islands on the coasts of Italy, and had extended their conquests to a great part of Sicily. The occasion of the first rupture between the two republics was as follows: The Mamertines, of whom we have spoken at length in the history of *Sicily, being vanquished in battle, and reduced to great straits by Hiero king of Syracuse, had resolved to deliver up Messana, the only city which they now possessed, to that prince, with whose mild government and strict probity they were well acquainted. Accordingly Hiero was advancing, at the head of his troops, to take possession of that important place, when Hannibal, who at that time commanded the Carthaginian army in Sicily, prevented him by a stratagem. The cunning African came to meet Hiero, as it were, to congratulate him on his victory, and amused him, while some of the Carthaginian troops filed off towards Messana. Hereupon the Mamertines, seeing their city supported by a new reinforcement, were divided into several opinions. Some were for accepting the protection Carthage offered them, others were still for surrendering to the king of Syracuse; but the greater part were for calling the Romans to the assistance of a city, whose inhabitants were originally Italians; for the Mamertines were a party of Campanian mercenaries, who having served under Agathocles king of Sicily, on their return home, seized on the city of Messana, into which they had been admitted, and entertained as friends, massacred the inhabitants, and took possession of their lands, houses and wives. The arrival of their deputies at Rome occasioned great debates in the senate; the conscript fathers thought it would cast no small blemish on their reputation to protect a company of villains, who had formerly got possession of Messana by the same treachery and cruelty, as the perfidious Campanian legion had made themselves masters of Rhegium. Shall we, said they, countenance the same actions in some, which we have, with the utmost severity, punished in others? But, on the other hand, looking upon the Carthaginians with an eye of jealousy, and being well apprised, that they undertook the defence of that important place, only with a view to seize it for themselves, they were long deliberating what to determine in so nice a point. Messana, said they, will be soon subject to the Carthaginians; and if we tamely suffer them to get possession of a place, which is divided from Italy only by a narrow strait of the sea, we shall soon be obliged to engage in a war with them for the defence of our own continent. This selfish consideration made most of the senators forget the regard they had hitherto shewn for rigid probity, and come into the measures of the people, who, from the very beginning, were eagerly bent upon driving the Carthaginians out of Messana. Accordingly it was decreed, that Appius Claudius, surnamed Caudex, who was then consul with M. Fulvius Flaccus, should be sent over into Sicily, to attempt the deliverance of Messana. The consul nevertheless continued at Rome, and dispatched in his stead one Claudius, a legionary tribune, a man of great boldness and experience in military affairs. The tribune, not thinking it adviseable to expose the few triremes he could get together to the insults of the Carthaginian fleet, which infested the straits, went over to Messana in a fisher-boat, in order to discover the disposition of the inhabitants. Upon his arrival, he convened the Mamertines in the usual place of their assemblies, and acquainted them, that he came as a deputy from the Romans, to offer them the assistance which they had desired, and assured them, that the forces of his republic should be withdrawn, as soon as their city and estates were in safety. The Mamertines, intimidated by the presence of the Carthaginians, who were already in possession of the citadel, made answer, That his

- a offers were come too late ; and that every free city had a right to call whom she pleased to her assistance. A free city ! replied Claudius with a sneer ; are you then in possession of your liberty ? What do I see here but foreign troops, who begin to make you feel the weight of that slavery, which you cannot avoid without our assistance ? The Mamertines being struck dumb at these words, Claudius, with great intrepidity, declared, that he looked upon their silence as a tacit consent ; and quitting the assembly, returned strait to Rbegium, and from thence to Rome, where the senate, upon his report, judged that the Mamertines were disposed to receive succours from the republic. The same tribune was therefore ordered to set sail, and steer with the Roman fleet to Messana (E). But how weak and inconsiderable was this fleet, in comparison of that which the Carthaginians had brought into the streights ! How ignorant were the Romans at that time of sea affairs ! Nevertheless the bold tribune weighed anchor ; but being attacked by Hanno the Carthaginian admiral, and having at the same time a storm to struggle with, most of his ships were taken, others dashed in pieces, and he obliged to return to Rbegium. While Claudius was busy in refitting his fleet, Hanno sent back the ships he had taken from him, with a view either to pique the Romans in point of honour, or to divert them from sending succours to Messana ; but as the deputies, who came to restore the ships, reproached the Romans with having first infringed the treaties of friendship between the two nations, and declared, that the Carthaginians would never suffer the Romans to be masters of the streights between Italy and Sicily, nay, not even to wash their hands in them, Claudius rejected the present with the utmost indignation, and carried on his preparations with great vigour. Having refitted his small fleet in the best manner he could, he put to sea again, and timed his enterprize so well, that he eluded the vigilance of the Carthaginians, and got safe into the port of Messana. Hanno, who was now become commander of the land forces, upon the arrival of Claudius, abandoned the city to the Romans, and retired into the citadel. Claudius, seeing himself in possession of the city, desired the Mamertines to summon an assembly, and to invite Hanno to it. The Carthaginians for fear of shewing a distrust of those whom he pretended to protect, complied with the summons, and appeared in the assembly. The two generals reproached each other in bitter terms, till at length Claudius was so provoked, that he ordered some brave legionaries, who attended him, to arrest Hanno, and keep him prisoner. The Mamertines applauding the resolution of the Roman, Claudius made good use of this declaration in his favour. What by menaces, and what by persuasions, he prevailed on the Carthaginian to surrender up the citadel to him ; a piece of cowardice which cost the unhappy Hanno dear ; for he was, on his return home, crucified by order of the senate. The Carthaginians, resolved at all events to drive

(E) Polybius tells us (12), that the Romans were utter strangers to naval affairs, and quite ignorant of the art of building ships, before the first Punic war. He adds, that it would have been impossible for them to build and equip a fleet, had not fortune, who always espoused their cause, by a mere accident, instructed them in the method ; for a Carthaginian galley, which was out a cruising, venturing too near the shore, chanced to be stranded, and was taken by the Romans before the mariners could get her off. This galley served them for a model ; for they built by it, says he, a fleet of a hundred and twenty gallees. The equipment of this fleet seemed to him a prodigy, and made him resolve to write the history of the first Punic war. But that author was certainly mistaken, when he wrote, that the Romans had no ships at sea before the first Punic war ; nay, it is no easy matter to reconcile him with himself on this subject ; for when he elsewhere (13) speaks of the articles of a treaty agreed on by the Romans and Carthaginians, in the consulship of Brutus and Horatius, immediately after the expulsion of the Tarquins, he tells us, that one of the articles was to this effect, that the Romans, and the allies of the Romans, should not sail beyond the Fair Promontory, unless constrained by weather, or by an enemy. In two other treaties, of which he gives us the transcripts, there are several clauses to the same effect. These precautions on the side of the Carthaginians manifestly suppose, that the Romans had at that time ships, traded to Africa, and were not so utterly unacquainted with naval affairs, as Polybius represents them to have been at the beginning of the first Punic war. Neither can Polybius be understood as speaking only of ships of war, it being plain from the reasons of the Tarentine war agreed on by all historians, that the Romans had at that time a fleet of ten gallees ; nay, we are told by all the ancients, that, long before the Tarentine war, the consul Manius, having ruined the port of Antium, carried part of the fleet of the Antiates, which consisted of twenty gallees, to Rome, and laid them up in the place appointed for building ships. It is no less certain, that many years before the first Punic war, the Roman people appointed the duumviri navales, whose province was confined to the inspection and repairing of ships of the republic. It is therefore false, that the first time the Romans had a fleet, or ventured to sea, was in the time of the first Punic war ; however, it is certain, that the Romans, wholly intent upon the reducing of the neighbouring states, were but little acquainted with naval affairs, till they began to make war out of their own continent.

the Romans out of Messana, raised both sea and land-forces, and dispatched them into a Sicily under the command of another Hanno, who arriving with his fleet at Lilybaeum, prevailed upon Hiero king of Syracuse, to enter into an alliance with his republic, and to invest Messana jointly with him. Hitherto the consul Appius had not appeared in the dispute, so that had the Carthaginians stopt their proceedings: all the steps, taken only by a tribune of the army, might have been disowned. But a monstrous piece of cruelty, committed by Hanno, determined Rome to keep no longer any measures with her rival. That general, upon the refusal of Claudius to surrender up Messana to him, caused all the Italians, who served in his army, to be inhumanly massacred; which was no sooner heard at Rome, than the consul Appius hastened his departure from thence, and came to Rhegium. As he apprehended both danger and dishonour in the b enterprise, he sent from Rhegium deputies to king Hiero, conjuring him by the ancient friendship between the Romans and him, to desist from the siege he had undertaken.
Hiero in answer reproached the Romans not only with ingratitude to him, but with deviating from their pretended equity in protecting the treacherous tyrants of Messana, eminently guilty of the same crime which Rome had severely punished in the Campa- nian legion at Rhegium. Appius having received this answer, resolved to pass over into Sicily, pursuant to the orders of the senate; but to conceal his design, he gave out, that he could not venture upon that enterprise before he consulted the senate.
This report reaching the Carthaginian fleet, made them watch the streights with less care and vigilance. In the mean time Appius, going on board a galley, built unskillfully, c and in great haste, pretended only to coast along the shore in his way to Rome; but as soon as he was out of sight, he tacked about, and being favoured by a dark night, reached with some transports the nearest shore of Sicily, and landed his forces without being perceived by the enemy either at sea or land. For this bold enterprise he got the surname of Caudex, which then signified a boat ill-built. Claudius, encouraged by this success, advanced in all haste with his legions against the king of Syracuse, who blocked up Messana on the side of mount Chalcis, and having surprised and defeated him, entered triumphantly into Messana, highly delighted with gaining the first victory the Romans had ever obtained out of their continent. After this defeat Hiero, d thinking himself betrayed by the Carthaginians, who had suffered him to be surprised; by not guarding the streights, decamped hastily in the night, and giving way to his distrusts, returned to Syracuse. Claudius receiving next morning intelligence of his retreat, resolved to lose no time, but forthwith to attack the Carthaginians. Pursuant to this resolution, he made a brisk sally, and routed them with great slaughter. Having thus raised the siege of Messana, he over-ran the lands of the Syracusians like a torrent, pillaged and laid waste the whole country, and having no enemy in the field to contend with, advanced to the very gates of Syracuse. But the year being already far spent, he soon returned with his troops to Messana, and having left a strong garison in that city, passed over to Rhegium, and from thence pursued his journey to Rome.
Eutropius ² and Silius Italicus ³ tell us, that he received the honours of a triumph for e his Sicilian expedition; but we find no mention made of it in the triumphal tables.

The Romans
make an alliance with Hiero.

THE succeeding consuls, Manius Octavius Crassus, and Manius Valerius Flaccus, were ordered to transport into Sicily two consular armies, consisting each of eight thousand legionaries, and twelve hundred horse, with a great number of auxiliaries.
Upon their arrival most of the towns that had submitted to the Carthaginians and Syracusians, delivered themselves up to the Romans; insomuch that in a few months they saw themselves masters of sixty-seven places, among which were Taurominium and Catana, two cities of great importance. Encouraged by this success, they resolved to undertake the siege of Syracuse, the capital of the island, and at that time one of f the greatest cities in the world. They had no sooner invested it, than Hiero, being now sensible that he had formed a wrong judgment touching the issue of the war, and that the hopes of the Romans were founded on better measures than those of the Cartha- ginians, sent out deputies to treat with the former of a peace. The consuls readily embraced the overture, knowing, that by entering into an alliance with Syracuse, they should be plentifully supplied with provisions, for want of which they had been the last year reduced to great streights by the Carthaginians, who were masters at sea.
They therefore agreed to a treaty with the king on the following conditions; that Hiero should release all the Roman prisoners without ransom, and pay the republic a

- a hundred talents of silver. Upon these conditons, which were approved of by the Roman senate and people, Rome promised to acknowledge Hiero as a friend to their republic, and to protect his dominions from all hostilities ^a.

THE Romans, having now no enemies to contend with but the Carthaginians, and being supplied with all manner of provisions by Hiero, now their friend and ally, made themselves masters of all the places on the western coast of Sicily. The inhabitants of Segesta and Aliena massacred the African garrison, and opened their gates to the consuls. The cities of Hilara, Tyrita, and Asclea, were besieged in form, taken by assault, and treated with great rigor. The campaign being ended, the two consuls carried back most of their troops with them, and putting them in winter quarters on the coast of Italy, returned to Rome, where Valerius was decreed a triumph, which he enjoyed on the sixteenth of the calends of April. His surname of Messala, and this mark of distinction, which he alone received, plainly shew that he had signalized himself above his colleague in the defence of Messana, and the wars with Hiero and the Carthaginians ^b. This year Cn. Fulvius Centumalus was created dictator, who chose Q. Marcius Philippus for his general of the horse. But their only business was to drive a nail into the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, to stop a plague which raged at Rome.

- THE new consuls, L. Posthumius Megellus, and Q. Mamilius Vitulus, were both ordered into Sicily. But the republic, depending on the alliance of king Hiero, thought it adviseable to lessen the number of troops in that service, and therefore appointed them two legions only. They set out from Rome, and imbarquing at Rhegium, landed at Messana, without meeting with any opposition in their passage. They no sooner came ashore, than they assembled the reinforcements they were to receive in the country, and with them marched strait to Agrigentum, which the Carthaginians had made their magazine of arms and provisions. The place was very strong by nature, and had been rendered almost impregnable by the new works, with which the Carthaginians had secured it during the winter, with a view to make it their asylum or place of refuge, in case of any miscarriage or disaster. Besides, it was defended by a very numerous garison under the command of Hannibal, a general of known valour, and great experience in war. However, the Romans came and incamped before the place, blocking it up on all sides. As it was then harvest time, and the fruitful fields of Sicily were covered with corn, the consuls gave their soldiers leave to go and reap it in small parties, in order to provide against the wants which usually attend long sieges. Hannibal resolved to take advantage of this relaxation of military discipline, and made two sallies at the same time, one upon the reapers, and the other upon the Roman camp. The reapers, not being able to rally soon enough, were overpowered by the Carthaginians, and for the most part cut in pieces. But the Romans in the camp repulsed the enemy with great slaughter, and pursued them to the very gates of the city. After this action the Carthaginians were more cautious in their sallies, and the consuls took care not to suffer their men to go out and forage in small parties. And now the Carthaginians making no more sallies, the Romans thought it adviseable to divide their army into two bodies. With one they encamped near the temple of Æsculapius, at some distance from the city, with the other on the road to Heraclea. A large ditch was thrown up round the city to guard the camps against the sallies of the besieged, and a second line beyond the two camps to secure them from any surprize from without, and to prevent provisions from being conveyed into the city. The Romans were plentifully supplied with all necessaries from Erbesa, a city not far from Agrigentum, whither they were brought from all parts of Sicily, and safely conveyed from thence to the camps. Thus the Romans continued before the place five months, hoping to reduce it by famine. And indeed, as there were no fewer than fifty thousand souls in Agrigentum, the city was soon reduced to great streights. But Hannibal kept up their courage with promises, and from time to time dispatched, notwithstanding the vigilance of the Romans, messengers to Carthage to solicit speedy succours. Hereupon the Carthaginians, having levied what troops they could in Africa, Spain, Gaul, and Liguria, put on board a fleet, under the command of Hanno, fifty thousand chosen foot, six thousand horse, and sixty elephants, ordering them to sail to Sicily, and attempt at all adventures the relief of Agrigentum. Hanno without loss of time set sail, and landing his forces at Lilybæum, marched from thence to Heraclea within twenty miles of Agrigentum. There he received a deputation from some of the inhabitants of Erbesa,^a where the Romans had their magazines, offering to put the town into his hands. The Carthaginian, overjoyed at this message, marched with all his forces strait to Erbesa, which was accordingly delivered up to him, so that the Romans, who were the besiegers, became themselves besieged: all their convoys were intercepted, and they reduced to such streights, that they often deliberated about raising the siege, and had certainly abandoned the enterprize, had not Hiero afforded them what help he could, which with great parsimony supported them, but was not enough for their convenient subsistence; so that distempers, the usual consequences of scarcity, spread in the Roman army, and daily swept off great numbers. But in the mean time Agrigentum being reduced to the utmost extremity by famine, Hannibal found means to acquaint Hanno with the deplorable condition of the place, who thereupon resolved to put the whole to the issue of a general engagement, thinking himself now a match for the Romans, who were greatly weakened by sickness and distempers. Accordingly, having acquainted Hannibal with his design, and ordered him to make a sally the moment the Romans appeared in the plain, he marched with all his troops from Heraclea, sending his Numidian horse before with orders to advance to the very intrenchments of the Romans, as if they designed to force them; but in case the Romans sallied out upon them, they were to retire towards the army. These orders were punctually executed, and the Roman cavalry sallying out upon the Numidians, and pursuing them too far, were surrounded by the whole army, and either taken or cut in pieces. Notwithstanding this advantage, Hanno posting himself on mount Taurus, about a mile and a half from the Romans, continued there two months without shewing any inclination to come to a decisive action. At length Hannibal giving him notice, as well by signals from the town, as by expresses, that the garison could no longer hold out, and that they deserted by companies to the Romans, Hanno was forced to venture an engagement, to which the Romans were equally disposed, being in great want of provisions. The two armies therefore drew up in a large plain between the two camps, and engaged with incredible fury. The success continued doubtful, till the mercenaries, who were in the van-guard of the Carthaginian army, gave way and fled. In their flight they fell in among the elephants, which they put into disorder, and by that means intirely broke the line that sustained the rear. By this accident the whole army being discomposed, the Carthaginians, quitting their ranks, betook themselves to a disorderly flight, the Romans pursuing them with great slaughter. Hannibal attempted to make a sally, and bring his forces to the assistance of Hanno; but was repulsed by the troops, which the consuls had posted at all the avenues to the city, and obliged to return after he had lost a great number of his men. In this battle the Romans took eleven elephants, wounded three, and killed thirty. As to the number of men killed in the action and pursuit, it is not exactly known. The enemy after the defeat retired to Heraclea, which they gained with much difficulty, the plain being all covered with dead bodies^d.

Hannibal, perceiving that the Romans after the fatigues of so glorious a day were less upon their guard, sallied out at midnight with the greatest part of his troops, and filling up the Roman trenches with faggots, made his escape, and retired with his forces to a place of safety. The Agrigentines, to revenge themselves for being thus abandoned, and at the same time to make their court to the consuls, massacred the Carthaginians, who were left in the city. But such cruelties not being agreeable to the Romans, the consuls gave up the city, after it had surrendered at discretion, to be plundered; and above twenty-five thousand persons of free condition were made slaves. Such was the success of a siege, which had lasted at least seven months, and was the most remarkable and difficult the Romans had ever yet undertaken. The conquest was both an important and a glorious one: but it cost the besiegers dear; for they are said to have lost, what in the battle and in the frequent skirmishes, and what by famine and other hardships, about thirty thousand men Romans and allies*. The campaign being ended with the taking of Agrigentum, the consuls returned to Messana, and from thence to Rome. Eutropius tells us, that they both triumphed; but the silence of all other writers, especially of the triumphal tables, inclines us to believe, that the senate and people did not grant them that mark of distinction for reasons unknown to us. Per-

- a haps they intended by this refusal to punish them for suffering Hannibal to make his escape, which was intirely owing to their neglect in keeping the guards with the usual vigilance.

THE reduction of Agrirentum inspired the Romans with hopes of conquering all Sicily. The only difficulty was how to make themselves masters of the maritime cities without the assistance of a fleet, equal at least to that of Carthage. Hitherto they had transported their troops on board of vessels borrowed of their neighbours, the Tarentines, Locrians, Neapolitans, &c. But now the republic formed a design of being as formidable at sea as she was by land, and ordered a hundred and twenty vessels to be built after the model of a Carthaginian galley, which venturing too near the shore, had been stranded and taken. The Romans immediately set about this laborious piece of work, cut down trees in their forests, and conveyed them to the sea-side with an expedition peculiar to themselves. This fleet was equipped, as Polybius informs us, in two months time, reckoning from the day the trees began to be cut in the forests, and consisted of a hundred galleys with five benches of rowers, and twenty with three. While some were employed in building the galleys, others assembling those who were to serve in the fleet, instructed them in the use of the oar after the following manner, which at first seemed somewhat ridiculous: They contrived benches on the shore in the same fashion and order as they were to be in the galleys, and placing their seamen with their oars in like manner upon the benches, an officer by signs with his hand instructed them how to dip their oars all at the same time, and how to recover them out of the water. By this means they became acquainted with the management of the oar; and as soon as the vessels were built and equipped, they spent some time in practising on the water what they had learnt ashore *.

BUT while the galleys were yet on the stocks, the new consuls, L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Otacilius, brother to M. Otacilius, who had been consul two years before, set out for Sicily, where they easily reduced all the cities that were at any distance from the sea. But while they were subduing the inland countries, the Carthaginians either kept steady in their interest, or brought under subjection, all the places on the coast. So that both parties were equally successful.

- d IN the beginning of the consulate of Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Duilius, the fleet being equipped, and all things ready for their departure, the two consuls chose their different commands by lot. The command of the fleet fell to Cornelius, and that of the land-forces to Duilius. The latter immediately set out with two legions, and passed the straits. Cornelius followed him with seventeen of the new-built galleys, steering his course along the coast to Messana to give directions there for the reception and security of the fleet. Upon his arrival at that port, he was informed, some say by men hired for that purpose by Hannibal, that the island and city of Lipara would surrender to the Romans upon the first summons. Cornelius, giving credit to this report, immediately set sail with his squadron for Lipara, and entered that port. But at break of day he found himself blocked up by a greater number of Carthaginian vessels under the command of one Boodes a senator. In this surprize Cornelius saw no remedy but to submit, and accordingly yielded up himself and his squadron to the enemy. Thus far Polybius †. But Livy ‡ tells us, that the Carthaginian invited Cornelius and his tribunes, that is, the commanders of his galleys, on board his ship, to confer about the differences between the two republics in an amicable manner; and that the consul, being weak enough to trust to the honour of Boodes, was seized by him with all his officers, and sent to Carthage: this author adds, that the squadron, being thus deprived of all its commanders, surrendered without fighting. Thus the first attempt of the new fleet proved very disadvantageous and unsuccessful. In the mean time the hundred and three Roman galleys, which had remained in the ports, set sail according to the orders Cornelius had given, and coasting along Italy, made the best of their way towards the mouth of the straits. Hannibal, upon advice that the Roman fleet was at sea, sailed out with a squadron of fifty galleys to take a view of their new-fashioned vessels. But his curiosity cost him dear. For the Roman fleet appearing, when he least expected it, immediately attacked his squadron, which was dispersed about, with great vigor, and either sunk or took the greatest part of his galleys, Hannibal himself escaping with great difficulty, when his whole fleet believed him lost. Thus the Carthaginian admiral, upon the first trial he made in person of the skill of the Romans at sea, was obliged to quit the action with shame, and retire, after having been in great danger himself. The Romans, after this victory, pursued their course to Sicily, and being informed of the defeat and captivity of Cornelius, who was to have commanded them, they sent an express forthwith for Duilius, who had the command of the land-forces in the island. Duilius, being now left sole commander both at sea and land, went immediately, without hesitation, on board the fleet. But the reflection he made on the heaviness of his galleys did not a little abate his confidence. For the Romans plainly saw even in the battle, wherein they had all the advantage, that their vessels were not built with great art, but were very unwieldy in working, and wanted the lightness of those they were to engage with. But while he was ruminating on this matter, an engineer in the fleet found means to make amends for this defect by devising that machine, which was afterwards called corvus. All historians agree, that the use of this contrivance was to stop the enemy's ships as soon as the Romans came up with them, and thereby give them an opportunity of boarding them. But it is no easy matter to find out how these machines were built. Polybius gives us the following description of them: They erected, says he, on the prow of their vessels a round piece of timber about a foot and a half diameter, and about twelve foot long, on the top whereof they had a block or pulley. Round this piece of timber they laid a stage or platform of boards, four foot broad, and about eighteen foot long, which was well framed, and fastened with iron. The entrance was longways, and it moved about the abovesaid upright piece of timber, as on a spindle, and could be hoisted up within six foot of the top. About this was a sort of parapet knee high, which was defended with upright bars of iron sharpened at the end, towards the top whereof there was a ring, through which fastening a rope, by the help of the pulley, they hoisted and lowered the engine at pleasure. With this they attacked the enemy's vessels sometimes on their bow, and sometimes on their broad-side, as occasion best served. When they had grappled the enemy with those iron spikes, if they happened to swing broadside to broadside, then they entered from all parts; but in case they attacked them on the bow, they entered two and two by the help of this engine, the foremost defending the forepart, and those who followed, the flanks, keeping the bows of their bucclers level with the top of the parapet. Thus Polybius describes the corvus.

The consul Duilius gains a complete victory at sea.

THE invention of this machine, of which a trial was made, giving the consul more confidence, he left the command of the land-forces to his subalterns, and going on board the fleet, set sail for Myla to encounter the enemy, who had made a descent on that coast. The Carthaginians, who despised the Romans as quite ignorant of sea-affairs, were overjoyed when they first descried their fleet. They did not so much as give themselves the trouble to draw up their ships in line of battle, but advanced with a squadron in disorder up to the unwieldy triremes of the Romans, dreaming of nothing but certain victory. As they approached, they were at first surprised at the sight of the engine we have described above, and stood some time in suspense, not knowing the use of it. But the boldest of the Carthaginians, looking upon those machines as some foolish invention of persons not acquainted with the sea, rowed up with confidence to the Roman galleys, and by the boldness with which they attacked them, shewed how little account they made of their engines. But the Romans grappling with them by the help of their corvi, and boarding their ships with great ease, fought hand to hand with them upon deck as on firm ground. As the Romans were more expert in this kind of fight than the Carthaginians, and better armed, they soon gained the ascendant over them, and took thirty ships, with all those who were on board of them. Among these was the admiral's own galley, which was a septiremis taken formerly by the Carthaginians from king Pyrrhus. Hannibal himself was on board of it; but when he saw the Romans entering his galley, he leaped into a small boat, and escaped, when he was by all given for lost. At length the rest of the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of a hundred and twenty galleys, came up, and fell upon the Roman fleet. As they had greatly the advantage in the lightness of their vessels, they nimbly rowed round the Roman galleys, in order to avoid the corvi. But the Romans having learnt the art of working their ships so as to present their machines to the enemy, which way soever they approached them, they took fifty more of the Carthaginian ships, and obliged the rest to retire into the neighbouring ports of Sicily. In these two engagements the Romans took seven thousand prisoners, killed seven thousand men,

- a sunk thirteen ships, and took eighty. After this victory Duilius, going ashore, put himself at the head of the land-forces, relieved Segesta besieged by Hamilcar, and made himself master of Mucella, though defended by a numerous garison. The campaign being ended, Duilius returned to Rome, but left his legions in Sicily. During his absence a dispute arose between them and the Sicilian auxiliaries. The Sicilians complained that the Romans were always placed in the most honourable posts, that is, in the most dangerous. The difference came to such a height, that the Sicilians separated from the Romans, and encamped by themselves. Hamilcar, who was too vigilant not to draw advantages from this misunderstanding, attacked the Sicilians in their intrenchments, and put four thousand of them to the sword. He then drove the Romans from their posts, took several cities from them, and over-ran great part of the country. In the mean time Hannibal, after having been overcome in the sea engagement by the Romans, leaving Sicily, sailed with the remains of his shattered fleet to Carthage. But in order to secure himself from punishment, sent one of his friends with all speed, before the battle was known there, to acquaint the senate, that the Romans had put to sea with a good number of heavy ill-built vessels, carrying some machines, which the Carthaginians had never seen before, and consequently knew not the use of them. After the messenger had given the senate this account of the Roman fleet, he asked them whether it was their opinion, that Hannibal should attack them? The answer was unanimous; Let our admiral, they cried out with one voice, fight the Romans, and punish them for daring to brave us on our element. Then Hannibal's friends acquainted them with what had happened. What you now command, said he, Hannibal has ventured to do. Fortune indeed has not favoured him; but who can be answerable for the event of things? Hannibal thought as you do. And shall the uncertainty of fortune be deemed a crime? As the senators could not condemn him without condemning themselves, they spared his life, but deprived him of the command of the fleet ¹.

The Carthaginians gain some advantages over the Romans.

- WHILE the Carthaginians were thus disgracing their unfortunate admiral, the Romans were heaping honours on the brave Duilius. A victory gained by sea was more valued at this juncture, than all the conquests their consuls and dictators had formerly made by land. The consul entered the city in triumph, attended with the acclamations of all Rome. A mark of distinction was granted him, which had never been heard of before. Whenever he returned from supper, he was attended with music and flambeaux. This honour was granted for once only, to those who triumphed; and this was when they returned home in the evening from the solemn feast, which was prepared at the expence of the public for the close of the triumph. But to Duilius this distinction was continued as long as he lived. Cicero ² and Florus ³ seem to insinuate, that Duilius assumed this uncommon mark of distinction without the consent of the senate and people. But it is not probable, that either the patricians or plebeians, who called the least step towards an independency a state crime, would have suffered a private person to assume this singular privilege. It is more probable, that Duilius demanded it as a reward for his services. To perpetuate the memory of his triumph, medals were struck, and a pillar of white marble was erected to his honour in the Forum Romanum (F).

The Columna Rostrata was accidentally recovered in 1560, and placed by the care of cardinal Alexander Farnese in the capitol. Justus Lipsius and Ciaconius have endeavoured to fill up the chasms of the inscription on the pedestal, which are in old Latin. The substance of it, according to their interpretation, is as follows: Caius Duilius consul, the son of Marcus, general of the Roman army in Sicily against the Carthaginians, forced Hamilcar to raise the siege of Segesta, a city in friendship and alliance with the Roman people, and obliged him to return on board his fleet, after he had left his camp, and nine elephants, to the mercy of the enemy. Then he took Macella, one of the strongest places in Sicily. He fitted out a fleet in the space of sixty days, defeated the Carthaginians

Rome.

THE consuls for the next year were L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aquilius Florus. The command of the fleet fell by lot to the former, and that of the land-forces to the latter. They were both ordered into Sicily, but Cornelius had leave to make an attempt upon the islands of Corfica and Sardinia, if an opportunity offered. While he was getting ready the fleet in the different ports of Italy, his colleague was detained at Rome to suppress a dangerous conspiracy. The republic had caused a great number of men to be brought to Rome, from all the provinces subject to her, to serve as rowers on board her galleys. Among these were four thousand Samnites, who being unwilling to enter into the sea service, and finding a plot already formed by the discontented slaves to burn and plunder the city, readily entered into the conspiracy, and joined the slaves, who were three thousand in number. As they wanted a head, they pitched upon one Errius Potitius, who commanded the auxiliaries, and was a man of known experience. Errius seemed to go heartily into their measures, till he had learnt the whole secret, and then he discovered it to the senate. All the slaves were put in irons by their masters, and the Samnites imprisoned.

The Romans

fica and Sardinia.

DURING these distractions at Rome Cornelius had weighed anchor, and was already on the coasts of Corfica. As men are generally fond of new undertakings, the consul thought the two islands of Corfica and Sardinia worthy of a campaign. And indeed, no conquest, next to that of Sicily, could so well answer the end the republic then had in view, which was to gain the empire of the sea. The Carthaginians, who were then masters of them, had fortified some cities there, in order to be nearer to Italy, and make themselves formidable to the maritime cities. The first the consul attacked was Corfica, which he easily reduced, after he had made himself master of Aleria, the only strong place in the island. From Corfica he sailed to Sardinia, and appeared with his fleet off Olbia, a large city on the east side of the island. But as the place was defended by a numerous garison, and the consul wanted land-forces, he sailed back to Italy, took on board his fleet as many troops as he could conveniently carry, and returning to Sardinia, made a descent, and laid siege to Olbia. Hanno, who had behaved so well in Sicily, defended the place with incredible bravery; but he being killed in one of the attacks, the Carthaginians were obliged to surrender the place to the conqueror, who gave the Africans an instance of humanity, to which they were utter strangers. He honoured the dead body of their general with magnificent obsequies, and attended it in person to the place of burial. The consul did not suffer the ardor of his troops to cool; but besieged and took most of the maritime cities, driving the Carthaginians every-where before him.

Sicily taken.

IN the mean time Aquilius, arriving in Sicily, repaired the losses the republic had sustained there since the departure of Duilius. Hamilcar had taken from the Romans the cities of Enna and Camerina, and fortified Drepanum, a place of great importance on account of its harbour. As the consul Aquilius had been detained at Rome to suppress the conspiracy, and did not arrive in Sicily till the campaign was near ended, the republic recalled his colleague Cornelius to preside at the election of the new consuls; when A. Atilius Collatinus, and C. Sulpicius Paterculus, were chosen. The command of the fleet fell to the latter, and that of the land-forces to Atilius. As for Aquilius, he was continued in the command of the army in Sicily with the title of proconsul, till the arrival of Atilius; during which short time he drove Hamilcar quite out of the field, and laying siege to Mystratum, a city of great strength, which the Romans had often endeavoured in vain to reduce, brought it to such straits, that it surrendered to his successor Atilius soon after his arrival. The proconsul upon his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, as was his colleague Cornelius for the conquests he had made in Sicily and Sardinia. From Mystratum Atilius led his army to Camerina, but on his way was all on a sudden surrounded in a deep valley by the Carthaginians, who, under the command of Hamilcar, lay concealed on the hills all round it, so that all the avenues being blocked up, he could neither advance nor retire. In this extremity a legionary tribune, called by some writers Caditius, by

*thaginians commanded by Hannibal, at sea, took from them thirty ships, with all their rigging, and the sesiremis which carried the admiral himself; sunk thirty, and took several prisoners of distinction, who walked before his chariot, and added to the glory of his triumph.*

In memory of which exploits, the Roman senate and people erected this pillar. This inscription on the basis of the pillar, which every curious stranger visits at Rome, shews us the way of writing in the early times of the republic.

- a others Laberius, but by the greatest number M. Calpurnius Flamma, desired the consul to give him three hundred chosen men, promising to find the enemy so much employment with this small company, as should oblige them to leave a passage open for the Roman army. He performed his promise with a bravery truly heroic; for having seized, in spite of all opposition, an eminence, and intrenched himself on it; the Carthaginians, jealous of his design, flocked from all quarters to drive him from his post. But the brave tribune kept their whole army in play, till the consul, taking advantage of the diversion, drew his army out of the bad situation, into which he had imprudently brought it. When the legions were out of danger, they hastened to the relief of their brave companions; but all they could do was only to save their bodies from the insults of the enemy, for they found them all dead in the place, on which they had posted themselves, except Calpurnius, who lay under a heap of dead bodies covered all over with wounds, but still breathing. His wounds were immediately dressed, and it fortunately happened, that none of them proved mortal. The brave officer recovered, and for this glorious enterprise was rewarded with a crown of græmen, which was in those happy days a greater encouragement to the Romans to serve their country, than the hopes of more substantial rewards.

- Attilius* being thus rescued from the Caudine Forks, we may say, in Sicily, pursued his march to Camerina, which he took by the help of engines sent him by Hiero king of Syracuse, and sold all the Carthaginians in the place for slaves. He then marched to Enna, the inhabitants of which place opened the gates to him, delivering the Carthaginians up to the Romans, who put them all to the sword. Sittana was taken by assault, and the army, which came to relieve it, put to flight. From thence the consul led his army into the country of the Agrigentines, and by making himself master of Camicus and Erbesa, drove the enemy quite out of that fruitful territory. Attilius, flushed with this success, rashly laid siege to Lipara, expecting it would surrender upon the first summons. But Hamilcar, having conveyed himself privately into the city with some chosen troops, made a sally, when the Romans were beginning to scale the walls, and repulsed them with great loss.

The Romans take several cities in Sicily.

- As for Sulpicius, who commanded the fleet, he completed the conquest of Corfica and Sardinia, and assisted his colleague in the reduction of the maritime cities of Sicily. But this was not enough for the brave consul. He was ambitious of signaling his campaign by a naval victory; but as no Carthaginian fleet appeared at sea, he spread a report, that he intended to go in quest of it, and burn the ships of the African republic in their harbours. This news alarmed the Carthaginians, who thereupon trusted Hannibal once more with the command of a considerable fleet. He immediately put to sea, and met Sulpicius not far from the coast of Africa. But while both fleets were preparing for an engagement, a sudden storm parted them, and drove the Roman as well as the Carthaginian vessels into the ports of Sardinia. The storm no sooner began to abate, than Sulpicius putting to sea, surprised Hannibal in the harbour, and either sunk or took most of his ships. This misfortune occasioned a mutiny among the seamen of his fleet, who seizing on the person of their commander, crucified him in the city of Sulci in Sardinia, where he had taken refuge. Such was the end of old Hannibal, as he is called by the historians to distinguish him from the second Hannibal, who proved so fatal to the Romans. Sulpicius after this victory returned to Rome, where he received the honours of a triumph.

- THE consuls of the following year, C. Attilius Regulus, and Cn. Cornelius Blasio, having, according to custom, drawn lots for their commands, that of the fleet fell to Regulus, and the leading of the land-forces to Cornelius. A. Attilius was continued in the command of the army in Sicily with the title of proconsul. Regulus, who commanded the Roman fleet, being at Tyndaris, descried that of the Carthaginians lying along the coast in disorder. Whereupon at the head of a squadron of ten galleys only, he advanced to observe their number and strength, ordering the rest of his fleet to follow with all possible expedition. But as he drew too near the enemy, he was on a sudden invested by a far greater number of Carthaginian galleys. The Romans fought with their usual bravery, but being overpowered by numbers, were obliged to yield. HOWEVER, the consul found means to make his escape, and join the fleet, which was following the unfortunate squadron in line of battle. He then had his full revenge on the enemy, who were put in disorder at the first onset, and obliged to save themselves in the port of Lipara, after having lost eighteen ships, ten of which were taken with all their crews, and eight sunk. For this victory, C. Attilius Regulus on his return to Rome received the honours of a triumph, as did also A. Attilius for his exploits at land during his consulship and proconsulship. As for the consul Cornelius, he had no opportunity to signalize himself: he is said only to have pillaged some open villages, and laid waste the island of Melita, which were too inconsiderable exploits to deserve a triumph. Rome was terrified with several prodigies, during this campaign, whereupon the senate thought themselves obliged to renew the Feria Latina, which had been for some time neglected. Q. Ogulnus was created dictator to preside at them, and he appointed M. Latorius for his general of the horse.

THE war with Carthage had already lasted eight years. The Carthaginians had lost Corfica, Sardinia, and all their dominions in Sicily, except Lilybaeum, Panormus, and a few places in that neighbourhood. Sicily had long seemed to be the utmost limits of the ambition of the Romans. But now they thought of nothing less than reducing Carthage itself. With this view the new consuls, L. Manlius Vulso, and Marcus Attilius Regulus, whose name is famous in history, were ordered to pass into Africa, and to make that country the seat of the war for the future. Their fleet for this expedition consisted of three hundred and thirty galleys of different sizes, and aboard of each galley were a hundred and twenty soldiers, and three hundred rowers. The enemy's fleet under the command of Hanno and Hamilcar, was yet more formidable; for it consisted of three hundred and sixty sail, and was far better manned than that of the Romans. With this fleet the Carthaginian admirals set sail, and arrived at the port of Heraclea in Sicily, in order to watch the motions of the Romans, and oppose at all events their descent upon the coast of Africa. The consuls nevertheless pursued their course, and appearing off Heraclea with their fleet, drew up in line of battle. Hanno and Hamilcar accepted the challenge; whereupon a bloody engagement ensued, which lasted the greater part of the day with equal success, the soldiers and commanders on both sides distinguishing themselves on this occasion in a most eminent manner. But at length fortune, which from the beginning of this war had espoused the cause of the Romans, declared in their favour. The Carthaginians were entirely routed; thirty of their ships were destroyed, threescore and three taken with their crews; and the rest obliged to take shelter in the ports of Sicily and Africa. In the whole action the Romans lost but twenty-four galleys, which were all sunk.

The Romans make a descent upon Africa.

IN pursuance of this complete victory, the consuls returning into the ports of Sicily, equipped with all possible expedition the ships they had taken from the enemy, embarked new troops, and took in fresh provisions, in order to make the intended descent upon Africa. Hanno endeavoured to amuse them by conferences about a peace, in hopes of receiving in the mean time supplies from Carthage; in order to venture a second engagement. Nay, he had the boldness to come in person to confer with the consuls, as a deputy from his republic. He no sooner arrived, than the multitude cried out, that he should be detained prisoner by way of reparation for the treachery practised five years before on the person of the consul Cornelius Asina. Hanno, alarmed at these clamours, with an air of confidence put this flattering and artful question to the consuls: What advantage can it be to you, O consuls, to imitate our perfidiousness? It will only be said, that Rome produces as bad men as Carthage. The consuls, piqued in honour at these words, replied, that though the perfidious Carthaginians had violated the law of nations, it became the probity of the Romans to observe them even with traitors, and suffered him to return untouched. But as for peace, there being no disposition to it on either side, Hanno made the best of his way to Carthage to give notice of the approaching invasion. At length the consuls set sail, and the weather proving favourable, had a fortunate passage. The first land in Africa they set their eyes on was cape Hermea; and there the fleet lay at anchor some time waiting till all the galleys and transports came up. From thence they coasted along till they arrived before Clupea, a city to the east of Carthage, and there they made their first descent. Clupea, or, as the Greek writers call it, Aspis, was very conveniently situated for a magazine of arms and provisions, and had near it several ports for sheltering such ships as should come from Italy. The Romans therefore having laid up their fleet in one of these ports, and secured it on the land-side with a rampart and a large ditch, summoned the city to surrender. Some writers tell us, that a this important place submitted upon terms; others, that it was abandoned by its inhabitants. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the consuls soon became masters of it, and fortified it after the Roman manner, in order to make it the general rendezvous of the Italian fleets, and a key to Africa. From Clupea they dispatched a messenger to Rome to acquaint the senate and people with their success, and to receive fresh instructions as to their proceedings. For at this time the consuls did little more than execute the orders of the conscript fathers, who being for the most part able and experienced commanders, were capable of directing the conduct of their new and often inexperienced generals. While the consuls waited for the return of the messenger, they marched up into the country, and ravaging the fruitful plains of Africa, where no enemy had long appeared, returned to the coast with an immense booty. We are told, that in these incursions they took above twenty thousand prisoners. While they were thus living at discretion in the enemy's country, the messenger returned from Rome with orders for Manlius to repair to Italy with the fleet, and for Regulus to pursue the war in Africa with as many troops and ships as he thought proper for that service. But Regulus, either out of some secret foreboding of the misfortunes that were to befall him, or because he was impatient to receive the honours of a triumph for his late naval victory, appeared greatly dissatisfied with the province assigned him, and desired to be recalled. His pretence, which would be now thought a very trifling one, shews the character and manners of the Romans in those times. He represented to the senate, that upon the death of the husbandman, who had the care of his little farm of seven acres of ground, he had been obliged to intrust a day-labourer with the manuring of it, who had stolen his cattle, and carried off all his stock; so that his presence was necessary at home to provide for the subsistence of his wife and children. Upon this the senate ordered his wife and children to be maintained at the expence of the public, but directed him to continue in Africa, and command the army there with the title of proconsul, when the year of his consulate should expire. Pursuant to these orders, Attilius remained in Africa with forty ships, fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse, while his colleague returned to Rome with the rest of the army, carrying aboard his fleet twenty-seven thousand prisoners.

d THE following year the republic raised Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Æmilius Paulus to the consulate; but all the attention of the republic was upon Regulus, who now, as proconsul, pushed on his conquests with incredible rapidity. To oppose his progress, Hamilcar was recalled from Sicily, and to him were joined Bostar and Asdrubal. Hamilcar commanded an army just equal to that of Regulus; the other two headed separate bodies, which were to join him, or act apart, as occasion required. But before they were in a condition to take the field, Regulus, pursuing his conquests, arrived on the banks of the Bagrada, which empties itself into the sea at a small distance from Carthage. There he had a monster to contend with, in the description of which the Latin historians have employed so much art and eloquence, that we cannot help thinking they have exaggerated their accounts beyond all measure. This monster, say they, was a serpent of an immense size, which infected the waters of the river, poisoned the air, and killed all other animals with its breath alone. When the Romans went to fetch water, this huge dragon attacked them, and twisting itself round their bodies, either squeezed them to death, or swallowed them alive; so that it was necessary to fight this furious monster in form. As its hard and thick scales were proof against their darts and arrows, they were forced to have recourse to the balistas, which they made use of in sieges to throw great stones, and beat down the walls of the besieged cities. With these machines, they discharged showers of huge stones against this new enemy, and had the good luck with one of them to break his back-bone, which disabled him from twisting and winding his immense body, and by that means gave the Romans an opportunity of accosting and dispatching him with their darts and javelins. But his dead body corrupted the air, and the water of the river, and spread so great an infection all over the country, that the Romans were obliged to decamp. We are told, that Regulus sent the skin of this frightful monster to Rome, which was a hundred and twenty foot long, and that it was hung up in a temple, where it was preserved to the time of the Nimantine war. This story has been totally omitted by Polybius, and by other Greek writers so qualified, as to have some appearance of truth. Upon the whole, this dreadful monster seems to have been a crocodile, an animal common in Africa, but never before seen by the Romans; who, surprised at the sight of it, and frightened at the mischief it might have done them, transmitted hyperbolic accounts of the whole to Rome, which were copied by the Latin historians¹.

Attilius having passed the Bagrada, besieged Adis, or Adda, not far from Carthage, which the enemy attempted to relieve; but as they encamped among the hills and rocks, where their elephants, in which the main strength of their army lay, could be of no use to them, Regulus attacked them in their camp, killed seventeen thousand of them, took five thousand prisoners, and eighteen elephants. Upon the fame of this victory, which was soon spread all over Africa, deputies came from all quarters to submit in the name of their respective cities and states to the conqueror; inasmuch b

Regulus in a few days became master of fourscore towns, among which were the city and port of Ulica. This increased the alarm at Carthage, which was reduced to despair, when Regulus laid siege to Tunis, a great city about nine miles from that capital. The place was taken in the sight of the Carthaginians, who from their walls beheld all the operations of the siege, and suffered the Romans to carry on their attacks, and batter the place, without offering to relieve it. And to complete their misfortunes, the Numidians, their neighbours, and irreconcilable enemies, took up arms, entered their territory, laid waste their fields, and committed every-where most dreadful devastations, which soon occasioned a great scarcity of provisions in the city. The public magazines were soon exhausted; and as the city was full of selfish merchants, who took advantage of the public distress to sell their provisions at an excessive price, a famine ensued with all the evils which attend it. In this extremity Regulus advanced c to the very gates of the city, and having encamped under the walls, sent deputies to treat of a peace with the senate. It may seem strange, that the consul should shew so much indulgence for a republic, which rivalled his own, at a time, when one single stroke more would, in all probability, have brought her under subjection. But it must be owned, that though the proconsul loved his country, he likewise loved his own glory and reputation. He considered, that his proconsulate was ready to expire; that at the end of the year Rome would appoint him a successor, who would rob him of the glory of a conquest, the beginnings of which had cost him a great deal of labour and fatigue, and that at Rome those who put the last hand to great conquests, were much more regarded than the generals, who had happily begun them. Upon d

these considerations, he resolved to conclude the war to his own glory, and the benefit of his republic, by such an advantageous peace, as should ever do honour to his memory. With these views he resolved to spend the rest of the campaign, which he thought was not sufficient to accomplish the reduction of Carthage, in treaties and negotiations. The deputies sent by the proconsul were received at Carthage with unexpressible joy; but the conditions they proposed were such, that the senate could not hear them without the utmost indignation; and Regulus, as if he had made a complete conquest of Carthage, would abate nothing of his first demands. The conditions were; 1. That the Carthaginians should relinquish all claims to Sardinia, Corfica, and Sicily. 2. That they should restore to the Romans all the prisoners they had taken e from them ever since the beginning of the war. 3. That if they cared to redeem any of their own prisoners, they should pay so much a head for them, as Rome should judge reasonable. 4. That they should for ever pay the Romans an annual tribute. 5. That for the future they should fit out but one man of war for their own use, and fifty triremes to serve in the Roman fleet at the expence of Carthage, when required by any of the future consuls. These extravagant demands provoked the senators, who loudly and unanimously rejected them, protesting that they would rather die a thousand times, than submit to so shameful a slavery. The Roman deputies, in leaving the assembly, told the senate, that the Roman proconsul would not alter a single letter in the proposals, and that they must either conquer the Romans, or obey them. After f

this formal declaration, the Carthaginians had nothing left but to sell their lives dear, and die with honour, in defence of their country².

BEFORE this negotiation the Carthaginian republic had sent to hire mercenaries in Greece, and this reinforcement arrived just in the height of her distress. Among these mercenaries was a Lacedæmonian, by name Xantippus, a man of great bravery and experience in war. We do not find that he had any considerable post in the troops of his own country. He was one of those subalterns, who are often more able

- a soldiers than their generals, and only want an opportunity of exerting themselves. The Lacedæmonian having informed himself of the circumstances of the late battle, declared publicly that their overthrow was owing more to their own misconduct, than to the superiority of the enemy. His discourse being spread among the people and soldiery, came to the knowledge of the senate; and the senators immediately commanded him to be brought before them. Being introduced to them, he explained himself so clearly, and talked so judiciously, that the Carthaginian generals, as well as the rest, were for putting him at the head of the army; and a decree was made for that purpose. Xantippus being thus invested with the supreme command, applied himself in the first place to the disciplining of his troops; and having taught them how
- b to march, incamp, widen, and close their ranks, and rally after the Lacedæmonian manner under their proper colours, he took the field with twelve thousand foot, four thousand horse, and about an hundred elephants. The Romans were surprised at the sudden change they observed in the enemy's conduct. However, Regulus, elated with his late success, came and incamped at a small distance from the Carthaginian army in a vast plain, where the enemy's elephants and horse had room to act. The two armies were parted by a river, which Regulus boldly passed, and by that means left his troops no way to retreat in case of a misfortune. This was what Xantippus wanted, who immediately cried out, The gods favour us, and drew up his men in order of battle. In the first line he placed his dart-men, with orders to retire
- c into the spaces between the battalions, as soon as they had made their discharge. Behind them, but at some distance, were placed the elephants in a long front, carrying wooden towers filled with men. Behind the elephants was the Carthaginian phalanx, consisting of the best infantry of the army; and these were the main body. As for the wings, Xantippus posted his light-armed troops in the left, and the mercenaries in the right. These two wings were supported by the African cavalry. Regulus on the other hand drew up his troops after the Roman manner; but was guilty of one great fault: to prevent the elephants from breaking in upon him, he made his main body too narrow and too deep, which exposed it to the danger of being surrounded *.

- Xantippus* began the attack, ordering the leaders of the elephants to advance, and
- d attempt the breaking of the enemy's first line. The Romans stood the shock of those dreadful animals with great bravery. But in the mean time the Roman cavalry in the wings being charged by the Carthaginian, which was greatly superior in number, were overpowered, put into confusion, and obliged to fly. On the other hand, Regulus's left wing falling upon the mercenaries, whom Xantippus had posted in his right, broke them, and pursued them to their camp, whither they retired in disorder. But in the mean time the main body of the Romans, which Regulus commanded in person, being attacked in front by the elephants, and in the rear by the African cavalry, was put into disorder; the elephants bore all down before them, and such of the Romans as attempted to make their escape to avoid the fury of those monstrous
- e animals, fell in among the horse, and were cut in pieces. The main body being thus broke, and cast into confusion, the whole army was put to the rout, and the slaughter was universal. Of all the Roman army, only two thousand, who pursued the mercenaries, escaped, and arrived safe at Clupea. Regulus himself with five hundred chosen men who kept constantly about him, was surrounded by the enemy, and taken. The rest, to the number of thirty thousand men, were cut in pieces either in the battle, or the pursuit. The loss of the Carthaginians was scarce above eight hundred men, most of them mercenaries in the right wing, which was routed. The victorious army returned to the capital of Africa, which Xantippus entered, as it were, in triumph, leading the Roman consul with him among the rest of the prisoners. All the people
- f of Carthage ran to meet their deliverer, and could scarce believe their own eyes. They beheld with unspeakable pleasure the proud Roman in a state to implore that compassion, which he had refused them. As for Xantippus, they looked upon him as a hero sent by the gods to rescue a miserable people from despair and oppression, and bestowed on him all the honours which a sincere gratitude could suggest. But the wise Lacedæmonian, foreseeing that the service he had done them, which was too great for a reward, would create him both envy and danger, resolved to content himself with the glory of so noble a victory, and without waiting for any other reward, to return to Lacedæmon. His departure is differently related, but all accounts reflect an eternal shame and dishonour on the Carthaginian nation. Some say, that the Carthaginians, jealous of his glory, put privately on board with him assassines, who murdered him, and threw his dead body into the sea. Others tell us, that a leaky vessel was got ready for him; but that the artful Greek, being apprised of their wicked design, went on board another galley, and arrived safe in his own country. However that be, neither Xantippus's victory, nor the monstrous ingratitude of the Carthaginians, will ever be forgot. As for Regulus, he was treated with all the cruelty revenge could dictate. After they had made him the sport of the multitude, and exposed him to the insults of an enraged and cruel populace, they shut him up in a public prison, affording him no more food than was barely sufficient to prolong his life, and in all other respects treating him as the criminals, who were under the same confinement. b

THE defeat and captivity of Regulus caused as much grief at Rome, as joy at Carthage. The senate no sooner received an account of the posture of their affairs in Africa, so contrary to their expectation, but they ordered the consuls for the year, Fulvius and Emilius, who had hitherto continued at Rome inactive, to take proper measures for the securing of the coasts of Italy from an invasion, to hasten into Sicily, and from thence, if they thought it advisable, to pass over into Africa, and save the remains of Regulus's army and conquests. In the mean time the Carthaginians sat down before Clupea, but the garison made so brave and obstinate a defence, that the enemy, notwithstanding their utmost efforts, were obliged to raise the siege. From Clupea they marched to Utica, which they likewise besieged, but abandoned the enterprise upon the news they received, that the Romans were equipping a fleet of three hundred and fifty sail. And indeed this formidable armament was ready before the end of the summer; so that the consuls from Sicily, where they left some land-forces, set sail for Africa, in order to make a second descent. The Carthaginians, who had, with incredible expedition, refitted their old vessels, and built a good number of new ones, met the Roman fleet off cape Hermea, or cape Mercury, and gave them battle. But the loss they sustained was much greater, than the advantage they had gained over Regulus. An hundred and four of their ships were sunk; thirty taken, and fifteen thousand of their soldiers or rowers killed in the action. After this the Romans pursued their course to Clupea, where they had no sooner landed, than d

they were attacked by the Carthaginian army, under the command of the two Hanno's, father and son. But as the brave Lacedæmonian was no longer with them, notwithstanding the new discipline he had taken great care to teach them, they were routed at the very first onset, in which they lost nine thousand men, and among them many of their chief lords. After these two glorious victories, the one by sea, and the other by land, the Romans found themselves obliged, for want of provisions, to drop their African expedition, and to evacuate both Clupea and Utica. In their way home they were desirous of signalizing the end of their consulate by some important conquests on the coast of Sicily, where some cities still adhered to the Carthaginians. They thought that the sudden appearance of a victorious fleet with a formidable army would awe them into subjection. Instead therefore of returning home, they steered their course to the northern coast of Sicily, contrary to the opinion of all the pilots in the fleet, who advised them, as the season was far advanced, to sail strait for Italy. Their obstinacy proved the destruction of the fleet; for a more violent storm arising than had been known in the memory of man, the fleet was almost intirely destroyed; for of three hundred and seventy vessels, which composed it, fourscore only escaped shipwreck, the rest being either swallowed by the sea, or dashed against the shore. This was by far the greatest loss Rome had ever sustained; for besides the great number of ships that were cast away with their crews, a numerous army was destroyed with all the riches of Africa, which had been by Regulus amassed and deposited in Clupea, and were now transporting from thence to Rome. The whole coast from Pachinum to Camerina was covered with dead bodies, and strewn with the wrecks of the ships; insomuch that history can scarce afford an example of the like dreadful disaster. The Romans on this occasion experienced the constant friendship of good king Hiero, who supplied such as escaped the common calamity, with cloaths, provisions, and ships to convey them to Messana. This misfortune however was not imputed to the consuls, who were continued each in the command of an army the next year with the title of proconsul. The new consuls were, Cn. Cornelius Asina, and A. Atilius Calatinus. The former f

- a had been treacherously taken prisoner by Hanno the Carthaginian, as we have related above, and kept in captivity till the first descent of the Romans in Africa, when he was delivered from slavery, during which he had been obliged to drive a plough¹.

- THE Carthaginians upon advice of the misfortune which had befallen the Romans ^{They fit out a new fl. et.} at sea, renewed the war in Sicily with fresh fury, hoping the whole island, which was now left defenceless, would soon fall into their hands. But the Romans having in the space of three months launched a hundred and twenty new galleys, which with the old ones that were refitted, made a fleet of two hundred and fifty sail, both the consuls and proconsuls were ordered to pass over into Sicily, the former to command at sea, and the latter on land. As they besieged only maritime cities, they acted jointly, the land-forces investing them on one side, and the fleet on the other. Their first attempt was on the city of Cephalædium on the north coast not far from the mouth of the Cephalædrium Himera, which was betrayed to them by some of the inhabitants. From thence they sailed to Panormus, the capital of the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily, and having seized the port, summoned the town to surrender. But the inhabitants and garison being determined to stand a siege, the consuls landed all their troops, and began to batter the walls with their engines, by which a tower standing near the sea was quickly ruined. At this breach the Romans entered, and made themselves masters of the quarter called the New City, those who defended it, retiring into the Old City, whither they carried with them terror and famine; so that the inhabitants soon sent a deputation to the consuls, offering to surrender upon condition that their lives, liberties and effects were spared. But the consuls, not ignorant of the extremity to which they were reduced, would not even grant them their lives and liberties, unless they paid so much a head by way of ransom. The unhappy people were obliged to submit, and forty thousand of them paid two minæ each, that is, 6l. 9s. 2d. for their ransom. Those who could not advance that sum, were made slaves to the number of about thirty thousand, and sold to the best bidder. After this considerable conquest, the consuls set sail for Rome; but in their passage the transports, on which they had put the money and spoils brought from Panormus, were taken by the Carthaginian fleet. The two proconsuls entered Rome in triumph for the victory gained over the Carthaginians at sea during their consulate. ^{And Panormus taken by the Romans.}

- d THE consuls for the new year, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and C. Sempronius Blæsus, with a fleet of two hundred and sixty galleys set sail for Sicily, and appeared off Lilybæum; but finding this place too strong, and too well garisoned for them to attempt the siege of it, they steered from thence to the eastern coast of Africa, where they made several descents, surprised some cities, and plundered several towns and villages. But as they were returning with the spoils of that rich country, they narrowly escaped losing their whole fleet on the flats of the Lesser Syrtis, near the island of the Lotophagi; where by coasting too near the shore their vessels grounded, and stuck on the sand-banks, till the flood brought them off again; and then they made off so fast, that the Africans took their departure for a flight. They arrived safe at Panormus, and from thence after a few days set sail for Italy, having a fair wind till they came off cape Palinurus, where so violent a storm overtook them, that a hundred and sixty of their galleys, and a great number of transports, were lost. And now the republic, considering the two tempests, which had destroyed her two fleets, as a declaration of the will of the gods against her design of depriving the Carthaginians of the empire of the sea, made a decree, that for the future no more than fifty vessels should be equipped, and that these should be employed only in guarding the coast of Italy, and transporting troops into Sicily. The proconsul Cornelius commanded this campaign the land-forces in Sicily, and though historians give us no account of his exploits, there is no room to doubt but they were very considerable, since he was, on his return to Rome, decreed a triumph, as was also the consul Sempronius Blæsus, but not his colleague Servilius Cæpio; which is somewhat surprising, since he seems to have had a share in all the exploits of this campaign. Both the triumphal tables, and several medals, which have reached our times, confirm the triumphs of Cornelius and Sempronius^b. ^{The Roman fleet destroyed by another storm.}

C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus, being the ensuing year raised to the consulate, passed over into Sicily to command the land-forces there, and made themselves masters of Himera, a city standing at the mouth of a river bearing the same name. Aurelius, animated with this important conquest, which put his republic in possession of a fruitful territory, formed a design upon the island and city of Lipara; and being supplied with ships by that ever faithful friend to the republic, king Hiero, he transported some of his chosen troops into the island, and sat down before Lipara the metropolis. But being seized with some unaccountable scruple touching the auspices, he returned to Messana to consult the auguries anew. During his absence, Q. Cassius, and P. Aurelius Pecuniola his relation, both legionary tribunes, being intrusted with the command of the army, made an attempt upon the city, contrary to their general's express command. But the besieged made so vigorous a sally, that they repulsed the aggressors, and pursuing them with great warmth, burnt their palisades, and had like to have taken their camp. The consul, upon his return to the camp, deprived Cassius of his employment, and reduced Aurelius, after he had caused him to be beaten with rods, to the state of a private soldier, obliging him to go through the servile drudgeries of a common centinel. After this the consul applied himself wholly to the siege of the place, took it by assault, and put almost all the inhabitants to the sword. The consul having finished this conquest, returned to Sicily, and with an army of forty thousand foot, and a thousand horse, laid siege to Ereia, a strong-hold of great importance; but as soon as the Carthaginian army appeared, they abandoned the enterprise, the Romans being too much disheartened ever since the defeat of Regulus, and too much afraid of the elephants to hazard a battle in the open country. They would fain have drawn the enemy up upon the eminences, thereby to render their elephants useless. But neither party coming into the measures of the other, the campaign ended without any considerable action. As for the consul Servilius, he probably acted separately; but did not signalize himself by any great exploit.

new fleet.

THIS year a plebeian, by name Tib. Coruncanius, by some unknown revolution was raised to the dignity of pontifex maximus. As he was a man of eminent probity, he concurred with the consul Aurelius, who was naturally severe, and the censors, to punish those who neglected the worship of the gods, led irregular lives, or transgressed the laws of military discipline. Thirteen senators were ignominiously struck out of the list; and at the motion of Aurelius, four hundred knights, who had refused to obey his orders in the island of Lipara, were degraded. Their horses were taken from them, and they deprived of the right of suffrage in their centuries, without being exempted from the taxes. The pay likewise, which the republic owed them for their past services, was declared forfeited. Aurelius, who had taken Himera and Lipara, was honoured with a triumph, which he obtained on the ides of April. By a census taken this year, there appeared to be in Rome 297797 men fit to bear arms. The Carthaginians seeing themselves now masters of the sea, and their hopes of reconquering Sicily increasing in proportion as they found their rivals reduced to act upon the defensive, began to make new levies in Africa, to hire troops in Gaul and Spain, and to equip a new fleet. But their treasures being exhausted, they sent an embassy to Ptolemy king of Egypt, intreating him to lend them two thousand talents. That prince being resolved to stand neuter, refused to assist them against the Romans, telling them, that he could not, without breach of fidelity, assist one friend against another. However, the Carthaginian republic made an effort, and exerting herself, equipped a fleet of two hundred sail, and raised an army of thirty thousand men, horse and foot, and an hundred and forty elephants, appointing Asdrubal commander in chief both of the fleet and army.

The Romans
put a new fleet to sea.

WHILE Carthage was making these great preparations, Rome raised L. Cæcilius Metellus and C. Furius Pacilus to the consulate. They both went into Sicily, and there acted only upon the defensive, pursuant to their instructions from the senate. But though the conscript fathers approved of the obedience of their generals, yet they began to reflect, that so much caution and circumspection dishonoured the commanders, and greatly abated the courage of the soldiers. They resumed therefore their former vigor, and forgetting their shipwrecks, resolved to put a new fleet to sea, there being no other means to preserve Sicily. While the vessels were building, the comitia chose two consuls, who were both men of great valor and experience, viz. L. Manlius Vulso, and C. Attilius Regulus, cousin-german to the famous captive. The late consul Furius was recalled from Sicily; but his colleague Metellus continued there, with the title of proconsul, to oppose the formidable army under the command of Asdrubal. Metellus, who was an able commander, being allowed by the senate to act according to his

- a own judgment, soon recovered the former reputation of the Romans in Sicily. For Metellus gains by pretending fear, he drew Asdrubal into a disadvantageous spot of ground near Panormus, and then sallying out upon him, gave him a terrible overthrow, and obtained one of the most signal victories mentioned in the Roman history. Twenty thousand of the enemy were killed, and many elephants, of these latter a great number were also taken with their leaders, and sent afterwards to Rome, where they swelled the pomp of the conqueror's triumph. Asdrubal after this defeat fled to Lilybæum, which he reached with great difficulty; and the proconsul having no more enemies to contend with in the field, returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph on the seventh of the ides of September. The Romans had never seen a more magnificent entry. The elephants, to the number of a hundred and four, marched through the city in procession. The air rung with acclamations at the sight of those animals, and of the great number of prisoners in chains, among whom were thirteen officers of distinction. As the Romans had resolved never to make use of elephants in war, and did not care to be at the expence of feeding them, they ordered them to be hunted, and put to death in the circus by their asbleta or wrestlers; so that the people were at the same time diverted, and taught to despise the animals they had hitherto so much dreaded. As for the unhappy Asdrubal, he was condemned in his absence, and on his return home crucified, one single misfortune blotting out the remembrance of his many former important services^f.
- c AND now the two consuls with the new fleet of two hundred and forty galleys, and sixty smaller vessels, passing over into Sicily, resolved by a noble emulation, to surpass, if possible, their predecessor Metellus, and to drive the Carthaginians quite out of the island. With this view they laid siege to Lilybæum, a city deemed impregnable, and the only place of retreat for the Carthaginian armies. But Lilybæum proved a second Troy; the siege lasted ten years, the forces of the two republics being exhausted within and without the walls of one single city. The people of Carthage, upon the news of this enterprize, were so discouraged, that they began to think of a peace. The war had already lasted fourteen years; they had lost their best commanders; their elephants had been taken from them; their fleets had been destroyed as fast as they had put them to sea; their finances were as much exhausted as their armies were diminished; the only towns they had now left in Sicily were Lilybæum and Drepanum, the one invested, and the other exposed to the insults of the enemy's new fleet. These considerations induced them to think of putting an end to so destructive a war by a speedy peace. With this view they began to soften the rigors of Regulus's confinement, and endeavoured to engage him to go to Rome with their ambassadors, and use his interest there to bring about a peace upon moderate terms, or at least an exchange of prisoners. Regulus obeyed his masters, and imbarqued for Rome, after having bound himself by a solemn oath to return to his chains, if the negotiation did not succeed. The Carthaginian ship arrived safe in Italy; but when Regulus came to the gates of the city, he refused to enter them; My misfortunes, said he, have made me a slave to the Carthaginians; I am no longer a Roman citizen; the senate gives always audience to foreigners without the gates. His wife Marcia went out to meet him, and presented to him his two young children. But he only casting a kind of wild look on them, fixed his eyes on the ground, as if he thought himself unworthy of the embraces of his wife, and the caresses of his children. When the senators assembled in the suburbs, he was introduced to them with the Carthaginian ambassadors, and together with them made the two proposals with which he was charged: Conscript fathers, said he, being now a slave to the Carthaginians, I am come on the part of my masters to treat with you concerning a peace, and an exchange of prisoners. Having uttered these words, he began to withdraw, and follow the ambassadors, who were not allowed to be present at the deliberations and disputes of the conscript fathers. In vain the senate pressed him to stay, and give his opinion as an old senator and consul. He refused to continue in the assembly till his African masters ordered him, and then the illustrious slave took his place among the fathers; but continued silent with his eyes fixed on the ground, while the more ancient senators spoke. When it came to his turn to deliver his opinion, he addressed himself to the conscript fathers thus: Though I am a slave at Carthage, yet I am free at Rome, and will therefore declare my sentiments with freedom. Romans, it is not for your interest either to grant the Carthaginians a peace, or to make an exchange of prisoners with them. Carthage is extremely exhausted, and the only reason why she sues for peace, is, because she is not in a condition to continue the war. You have been vanquished but once, and that by my fault; a fault which Marcellus has repaired by a signal victory. But the Carthaginians have been so often overcome, that they have not the courage to look a Roman in the face. Your allies continue peaceable, and serve you with zeal. But your enemy's troops consist only of mercenaries, who have no other tie but that of interest, and will soon be disobliged by the republic they serve, Carthage being already quite destitute of money to pay them. No, Romans, a peace with Carthage does not by any means suit your interest, considering the condition to which the Carthaginians are reduced. I therefore advise you to pursue the war with greater vigor than ever. As for the exchange of prisoners, you have among the Carthaginian captives several officers of distinction, who are young, and may one day command the enemy's armies. But as for me, I am advanced in years, and my misfortunes have made me useless. Besides, what can you expect from soldiers, who have been vanquished, and made slaves? Such men, like timorous deer, that have escaped out of the hunter's toils, will ever be upon the alarm, and ready to fly. The senate, greatly affected with his disinterestedness, magnanimity, and contempt of life, would willingly have preserved him, and continued the war in Africa. Some were of opinion, that in Rome he was not obliged to keep an oath, which had been extorted from him in an enemy's country. The pontifex maximus himself being consulted in the case declared, that Regulus might continue at Rome without being guilty of perjury. But the noble captive, highly offended at this decision, as if his honour and courage were called in question, declared to the senate, who trembled to hear him speak, that he well knew what torments were reserved for him at Carthage; but that he had so much of the true spirit of a Roman, as to dread less the tortures of a cruel rack, than the shame of a dishonourable action, which would follow him to his grave. It is my duty, said he, to return to Carthage. Let the gods take care of the rest. This intrepidity made the senate still more desirous of saving such an hero. All means were made use of to make him stay, both by the people and senate. He would not even see his wife Marcia, nor suffer his young children to take their leave of him. Amidst the lamentations and tears of the whole city, he imbarqued with the Carthaginian ambassadors to return to the place of his slavery with as serene and chearful a countenance, as if he had been going to a country seat for his diversion. The Carthaginians were so enraged against him, that they invented new torments to satisfy their revenge. First, they cut off his eye-lids, keeping him for a while in a dark dungeon, and then bringing him out, and exposing him to the sun at noon-day. After this they shut him up in a kind of chest stuck with nails, having their points inwards, so that he could neither sit nor lean without great torment; and there they suffered him to die with hunger, anguish, and want of sleep (G) &c.

WHEN the news of these cruelties reached Rome, the senate, by way of retaliation, gave up the chief of the Carthaginian captives to the revenge of Marcia the wife of Regulus, who venting her rage upon those unhappy wretches, caused them to be shut up two and two in great chests thick stuck with nails, and there to suffer the same torments which her husband had endured at Carthage. Bostar died the fifth day; but Hamilcar, notwithstanding the stench and corruption of the dead body of his companion, lived ten days, having as much food allowed him as was sufficient to prolong his life in misery. At length the senate put a stop to this cruel usage, and commanded Bostar's ashes to be sent home, and the rest of the prisoners, who had survived their tortures, to be used with more humanity &c.

(G) It is somewhat strange, that Hoffman should look upon a fact, attested by a cloud of credible witnesses, as a fable. It is true, that Polybius, in other cases a most exact historian, does not mention the cruel death of Regulus. But is the silence of one single author, who is wholly taken up in describing battles and sieges, sufficient to weigh down the express testimonies of Cicero, Livy, Appian, Zonaras, Valerius Maximus, and especially of Tuditanus, who lived in the same age with Polybius? All these writers agree, that Regulus died in the midst of most exquisite torments; though it must be owned, that they relate the circumstances of his death very differently. Some say, that he was crucified; others, that he died of the miseries of a long imprisonment: but the most common opinion is that which we have inserted in the text. Regulus was not the only person the Carthaginians sacrificed to their revenge. Valerius Maximus tells us, that with unparalleled cruelty they crushed great numbers of the Roman prisoners to death with the weight of the galleys that were upon the stocks.

- a In the mean time the two consuls, Manlius and Attilius, carried on the siege of Lilybaeum with great vigor. Himilco, a general of great experience and personal valor, commanded in the place, which was strong both by nature and art, and defended by a very numerous garison, consisting of ten thousand mercenary Gauls and Greeks, besides a prodigious number of Carthaginian and African troops. The consuls divided the attacks between them, the one investing the city on the side of the sea, the other of the land. Their camps had a communication by a deep ditch, covered with a rampart and a wall, so that they could mutually assist each other. The first attack was made at the point of cape Lilybaeum, where it jets out most into the sea, and where there were seven towers, which had a communication with each other, and reached in a direct line to the town. These towers being taken one after another, the consuls prepared to batter the wall of the city; but were obliged first to fill up a ditch sixty cubits broad, and forty deep, in order to bring their machines up to the wall. This proved a laborious piece of work, the besieged drawing up the earth into the city by certain engines, as fast as the besiegers threw it into the ditch. But the Romans, by the superior number of their workmen, gained their point. Then Himilco, with incredible expedition, threw up a rampart, and built a new wall to cover the wall of the city. The Romans endeavoured to undermine it; but the enemy countermining them, attacked the Roman miners under-ground, and prevented them from carrying on their work. The besieged however were reduced to great straits, numbers of them being killed in the frequent sallies they made, and the rest harassed day and night in defending their works against two consular armies. The town must have soon fallen into the enemy's hands, had it not received a seasonable reinforcement. The Romans had shut up the port so closely, that Himilco could not find means to acquaint the senate of Carthage with the unhappy condition to which he was reduced. But nevertheless, it was concluded there, that after so long and streight a siege the place must stand in need both of men and provisions. A supply was therefore decreed them of provisions, and as many men as could be transported in a squadron of fifty galleys; which were accordingly dispatched under the command of Hannibal the son of Hamilcar. That brave commander arriving safe at the island of Aegusa, at a small distance from the coast of Sicily, sheltered himself there, waiting for a proper time to force his way through the enemy's fleet, which lay at the mouth of the harbour. As soon as a brisk south wind blew, he crowded all his sails, and ordering his rowers to ply their oars, passed through the midst of the Roman fleet, and arrived safe in the port with a reinforcement of ten thousand men, and a great quantity of provisions. The sudden appearance of the African squadron, and the fear of being forced into the port with the enemy by the violence of the wind, prevented the Romans from attacking Hannibal, so that he got into Lilybaeum without the loss of a single man. Himilco, encouraged by this new reinforcement, made the very next day a brisk sally at the head of twenty thousand men, in hopes of destroying the engines of the Romans. Never was action begun or carried on with more bravery; but at length the besieged were repulsed with great loss, without being able to set fire to the engines as they intended ¹.

- f The night after this obstinate fight, Hannibal, finding himself to be of no use in Lilybaeum, put all the Carthaginian cavalry on board his galleys, sailed boldly through the Roman fleet, and got safe to Drepanum, whence he made incursions into the territories of the allies of the Romans, and intercepted the provisions which were designed for the consular armies. This occasioned a great scarcity in the two camps, which obliged one of the consuls to retire with his two legions from the rest of the army. In the mean time his colleague endeavoured to shut up the harbour with a bar, made of strong beams, fastened together with iron braces. But this work was soon destroyed by the winds, and strong currents. However, the report being spread at Carthage that the harbour was quite shut up, no vessel would venture out for some time to bring them from Lilybaeum an account of the siege. At length a Rhodian, by name Hannibal, undertook to get into the place, and bring them intelligence how their affairs stood there, provided the harbour was not yet quite barred up. His undertaking was well received, but little dependence was had upon it, in regard the Roman fleet lay at anchor before the mouth of the harbour. Nevertheless the Rhodian with a vessel of his own put to sea, and getting safe to one of those islands, which lie opposite to Lilybaeum, the very next morning with a fair wind and a fresh gale he passed ^a through the enemy's fleet, and to their great surprize entered the port. The consul gave strict orders to have a more careful eye on the entrance of the haven, and ordered ten of his lightest vessels to be placed there, with their oars, like so many wings, displayed, and ready to fly after the prey they expected. But the Rhodian, depending upon his skill in sea affairs, and the lightness of his vessel, not only escaped safely, but in contempt of the Romans, who pursued him, would often lie upon his oars, till they got near him, and then row quite round their vessels. He thus passed and repassed several times, carrying to Carthage an account of the siege, and to Lilybaeum the orders of the senate, the Romans being enraged and confounded to see one single galley triumph as it were over their whole fleet. The successful temerity of the Rhodian ^b encouraged several Carthaginians to make the like attempt. But one of these adventurers, less skilful than Hannibal, in the knowledge of the currents between the rocks and the flats, grounded, and was taken by the Romans. The consul immediately put on board this light galley the best crew he had, and waited with impatience for a fresh insult from the Rhodian. It was not long before the Rhodian entered the port again in the night-time, according to his custom, and was preparing to sail out in broad day, not knowing that the Romans were now masters of a galley, which was as good a sailer as his own. He weighed anchor with great confidence, and sailed out of the port in sight of the enemy's fleet; but was greatly surprized to see the Romans pursue him close, and at length come up with him, notwithstanding the lightness of his vessel. ^c He had now no way left but to engage them, which he did with an undaunted bravery; but the Romans, who were all chosen men, soon put an end to the dispute. The Rhodian vessel was boarded, and taken with all her crew. The Romans, being now in possession of two light galleys, shut up the port so effectually, that no Carthaginian ever after attempted to enter it ^d.

He is taken by
the Romans.

THE besieged were not discouraged by being deprived of this advantage; they boldly resisted two general attacks of the besiegers, and obliged them to retire with great slaughter, after they had got possession of the first rampart. The advantage they gained in these attacks was followed by another, which had like to have reduced the Romans to despair. A sudden storm arising, and the wind blowing from the land ^d with such violence, as almost to overturn the machines of the Romans, the Carthaginians, by the advice of some mercenary Greeks in their service, took advantage of this accident, and sallying out, set fire to the galleries, platforms, towers, and balistæ, of the besiegers. As the storm blew full in the faces of the Romans, they were so blinded with the smoke, that they could only throw their darts at a venture, while the flame, which spread very fast, gave light to the enemy. So that the work of several months was consumed in a few hours. The boasted constancy of the Romans would not have been able to bear up under this terrible disaster, had not their generous friend Hiero raised their drooping spirits, by sending them convoys of provisions, and exhorting them not to abandon the enterprize ^e.

The works be-
destroyed.

AFTER this shock the consul, not finding himself in a condition to take Lilybaeum by force, turned the siege into a blockade. At Rome the news of this disaster made different impressions on the people and the senate. The people were more animated by it to continue the siege. Nay, ten thousand of them entering into an association to serve in the army before Lilybaeum, passed over to Messana, and from thence marched on foot to the Roman camp. But in the senate many were for concluding a peace, and the dispute arose to such a height, that from words they came to blows, and one senator was killed for appearing too zealous for a peace ^a. The next year, when P. Claudius Pulcher, and L. Junius Pullus, were consuls, proved still more unfortunate for Rome. The former, who had the command of the land-forces, and had inherited ^f all the pride and rashness of the Claudian family, no sooner arrived at the camp, but he began to defame his predecessors, and reproach the soldiery with indolence and cowardice. Though he had but little knowledge in the art of war, his fiery temper put him upon projects, which required great skill in military affairs; and he was too proud to take advice. He had scarce taken upon him the command of the army, when, without consulting the other officers, he formed a design of surprising Drepanum, where Adherbal, an able captain, commanded for the Carthaginians. With this view he put to sea in the dead of the night with a fleet of a hundred and twenty galleys

- a that lay before Lilybæum, having on board the flower of his land-forces. Adherbal was greatly surpris'd, when at break of day he discovered the enemy's fleet; but recollecting, that if he suffered the harbour to be blocked up, he must endure all the calamities incident to a siege, he resolv'd to venture an engagement; and accordingly, sail'd out of the port with a squadron of ninety galleys, and conceal'd himself behind some rocks, till the Roman fleet began to enter the mouth of the haven. He then appear'd all on a sudden, and falling upon the enemy's squadron before they could draw up in line of battle, put them into great confusion. All the Roman officers advis'd Claudius not to engage the enemy, but to return before Lilybæum, which he might easily have done. But the consul, obstinate to venture an engagement, tack'd about, and made a signal to the headmost galleys to do the same. It was with the utmost difficulty, that he drew them up in line of battle along the coast. His situation was highly disadvantageous; for in case his vessels should be oblig'd to give way in the least, they could not avoid running aground on the flats, or splitting against the rocks. Notwithstanding this disadvantage Claudius persist'd in his former design of engaging the enemy, not only contrary to the opinion of his officers, but in defiance of the auspices, which it was then thought highly impious to despise. For when the sacred chickens were consult'd in his presence, and refus'd to feed, he threw them coop and all into the sea: If they won't eat, let them drink, said he, not reflecting that such a contempt of religion would discourage his troops. And indeed the Romans seem'd to have forgot themselves in the action which ensu'd. They made but a faint resistance, and suffer'd themselves, like mere cowards, to be board'd by the enemy, and driven either upon the shore, or against the rocks. As for Claudius, who had been so forward to hazard a battle, he no sooner saw the victory incline to Adherbal's side, than he made off as fast as he could with thirty galleys, leaving the rest to struggle with the waves, the rocks, and the enemy. The Romans lost ninety galleys in this ill conducted action. Eight thousand of their men were either killed or drowned, and twenty thousand taken, and sent prisoners to Carthage. The Carthaginians gain'd this signal victory without losing a single man, or one galley ^a.
- d THE news of this fatal action no sooner reach'd Rome than Claudius was recalled, and order'd to name a dictator. The proud consul, to insult the senate, and in derision of the laws, nominat'd to that supreme dignity one of his own clients, nam'd Claudius Glycias, a man of the meanest of the people, who had no other office in the city but that of viator, or, as we may call him, tipstaff to Claudius during his consulate. This unseasonable jest highly provok'd all orders of men against Claudius. The mock-dictator was forc'd to abdicate, but the senate allow'd him to wear the robe border'd with purple, call'd prætecta, in the theatre and circus the rest of his life, for having resign'd his dictatorship with a good grace. M. Attilius Calatinus succeed'd him, who appoint'd the famous Cacilius Metellus for his general of the horse. As for Claudius, he was, after his deposition, tri'd before the people for his misdemeanors. Some writers say, he was condemn'd; others tell us, that the people was prevented from condemn'g him, and driven from the forum by a sudden storm, which they look'd upon as a tacit absolution given him by the gods, and therefore did not call him to judgment again ^b. But this has the air of a fable, invent'd to wipe off the stain from the Claudian family, which was in great power at Rome. Polybius says, he was tri'd, and load'd with a very rigorous sentence ^c.
- e As for the other consul, Junius Pullus, he sail'd with a fleet of a hundred and twenty galleys, and eight hundred other vessels, to Syracuse, in order to take in provisions there for the camp before Lilybæum. From Syracuse he sent the quæstors before him with a squadron to supply the present wants of the army, while he follow'd with the rest of the fleet. Adherbal, who carefully watch'd all the motions of the Roman fleet, no sooner heard that the consul was at sea, than he detach'd Carthalo from Drepanum with a hundred galleys, ordering him to cruise off of Heraclea, and there wait for the Roman fleet and convoys. He had no sooner put to sea, than news was brought him, that a Roman squadron, which was that of the quæstors, appear'd at some distance. Hereupon, as he had the Romans in great contempt since their last defeat, he prepar'd to engage them, promising himself a sure victory. But the quæstors, diffident of their own strength, shelter'd themselves among certain rocks near Phintia, a city subject to the Romans, where Carthalo attack'd them, but was not attended with the success he expected, the Romans defending their vessels with ^a balistæ and other engines, which they had brought in great haste from the town, and planted on the shore; so that Carthalo, after having taken only a few transports, retired to a harbour in a neighbouring river, where he came to an anchor, and kept a vigilant eye on the motions of the Roman fleet. While he was thus waiting for the quæstors, he was informed by the vessels he had sent out to make discoveries, that the consul Junius had with a numerous fleet doubled cape Pachynum, and was steering his course for Lilybæum. Upon this important piece of news he immediately weighed anchor, resolved to give the consul battle before he could join the quæstors' squadron. He crowded all the sail he could, and came in sight of the consul's fleet off of Camerina. But Junius, not caring to hazard a battle, chose to act the same part his quæ- ^b stors had done, though he did not know it. For he turned to the coast, and took sanctuary among the rocks that were next at hand, thinking it more adviseable to run some hazard, than expose by the loss of the fleet, which might be the consequence of a battle, the land-forces to the mercy of the enemy. Carthalo forebore attacking them in so dangerous a post, but retiring to a place between the two fleets, kept that station, carefully observing their motions. While matters stood thus, the Carthaginian pilots, who were well skilled in the weather, and acquainted with those seas and coasts, foreseeing by certain signs that a storm would soon arise, advised Carthalo to weigh anchor, double cape Pachynum, and shelter himself under the opposite shore. Carthalo followed their advice, and with great difficulty doubled the cape, and secured ^c his fleet, while the Roman ships were either dashed against the rocks, or driven upon the coast. Never was there a more complete shipwreck. We are told, that of the consul's fleet, and the quæstors' squadron, which consisted of a hundred and twenty galleys, and eight hundred transports, laden with all sorts of provisions and military stores, not one vessel, nay, not a plank, was saved, which could be used again ^d. Thus Rome was deprived once more of all her naval force, and once more renounced the empire of the sea. But neither did this dejection last long, their ambition getting the better of all difficulties.

stroyed.

As the Romans, notwithstanding these losses, were still stronger by land, the blockade of Lilybæum was continued. The consul Junius, to repair his misfortune, made an ^d attempt upon Eryx, a place of great strength, and situated on the declivity of a mountain bearing the same name, and the highest in Sicily, except mount Ætna. He succeeded in his attempt, and surprised the place in the night by the help of some soldiers, who betrayed it to him. To secure this conquest, he built a fort at the foot of the mountain, and placed a garison in it of eight hundred men. But Carthalo soon after made a descent, took the fort by assault, and put the garison to the sword ^e. Some writers say, that Junius was taken prisoner in defending the place ^f; others, that he laid violent hands on himself for fear of being condemned at Rome for his ill conduct, or out of melancholy for so fatal a campaign ^g.

Eryx surpris'd

Junius.

ONE of the consuls being dead, and the other deposed, the dictator's presence ^e became necessary in Sicily. As from the foundation of Rome no dictator had appeared out of Italy, great things were expected from him. But Attilius performed no remarkable exploits. He gained some small advantages before Lilybæum, and then returned to preside at the elections for the ensuing year; when two were promoted to the consulate, who had enjoyed that dignity once before, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus. The Romans had now no fleet, and therefore both the consuls were ordered to pursue the siege of Lilybæum, and to prevent the Carthaginians from carrying succours or provisions into that place, or into Drepanum. Carthalo attempted both, but finding the Romans every-where upon their guard, he endeavoured to draw one of the consuls out of Sicily, by making a descent upon Italy, and ravaging the provinces ^f belonging to the republic. But upon the first advice, that he had landed in Lucania, the prætor of Rome putting himself at the head of an army, which was immediately raised in the city, forced him to reimbarque and return to Sicily. And now his mercenary troops began to murmur for want of pay, no money having been sent them for some time from Carthage, which was almost quite exhausted with so long and expensive a war. To put a stop to the mutiny, he punished the most seditious with great rigor: some were transported to desert islands, and there left to perish; others were sent to Carthage, and there executed. This provoked even those who were the most

a peaceably inclined; inasmuch that the rebellion becoming general, Carthalo was reasonably recalled, and a commander sent in his room, who became afterwards famous for his implacable hatred to the Romans, which he did not suffer to die with him, but transmitted to his posterity. This great man was Hamilcar, surnamed Barcas, Hamilcar Barcas sent into Sicily. the father of the famous Hannibal, the greatest officer Carthage ever produced. Hamilcar, having appeased the sedition which his predecessor had raised by his unseasonable rigor, sailed to Italy, and more successful than Carthalo, laid waste the territories of the Locrians and Brutians, and returned to Sicily with an immense booty. Having landed his troops, he incamped on a steep rock between Panormus and Eryx, both belonging to the Romans; and from thence making incursions into the lands of the allies of Rome, so harassed the consuls, that they could make but little progress in the siege of Lilybaeum. Hamilcar's campaign was looked upon at Carthage as a masterly piece of conduct. He had subsisted in spite of the Romans, and at the expence of their allies, between two of their cities, and at a great distance from any place allied to Carthage, and at the same time disconcerted all the measures of the consuls.

b THE new consuls, L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Fabius Buteo, were both ordered to Sicily; the former, who had been consul once before, and was so famous for his magnificent triumph, was appointed to carry on the siege of Lilybaeum, and his colleague to besiege Drepanum. But Hamilcar by innumerable sallies from his eminence kept both the consuls in play, and by his masterly conduct prevented them from gaining any considerable advantage during the campaign. According to the best historian of those times, the brave Hamilcar seemed to be every-where; his foresight extended to all particulars, and his valour was sufficient for any attempt.

c WHILE affairs were in this situation in Sicily, the Romans pillaged the coasts of Africa with a fleet built and equipped at the expence of private persons; for the republic had laid aside all thoughts of building new galleys, after the losses she had sustained by sea. However, she passed a decree, empowering all her subjects to build, equip, and arm ships at their own charges, to pillage the coast of Africa, and apply all the plunder to their own use. Nay, the republic lent the galleys she had left to private persons gratis, with this proviso only, that they should return them in as good a condition as they had received them. This fleet of privateers committed great devastations on the coast of Africa, entered the port of Hippo, set fire to the ships and houses, and put to sea again loaded with a rich booty. On their return to Sicily they met off Panormus a Carthaginian fleet carrying provisions to Hamilcar, and gained a considerable advantage over it. However, the pride of the Romans being now in a good measure abated by their many late misfortunes, they consented at last to an exchange of prisoners; and they were accordingly exchanged man for man. As the Carthaginians had more captives to redeem than the Romans, the latter received money for the overplus, which recruited their exhausted treasury. The number of the Roman citizens appeared by a census taken this year to be no more than 251220, which was less by 86575 than the number at the last census. A very considerable diminution, which can only be ascribed to the war, and the many shipwrecks which the republic had suffered.

f THE following year, M. Ottacilius Grassus, and M. Fabius Licinus, were created consuls; but they made little or no progress in the siege of Lilybaeum, which was the province allotted to them, being daily harassed by parties sent out by Hamilcar. As they did not return before the time of their consulate expired, Tib. Coruncanius was appointed dictator to preside at the election of new magistrates, when M. Fabius Buteo, and C. Attilius Bulbus, were chosen consuls. At this time a woman of the first rank was severely punished only for dropping some words, which betrayed a want of affection for the public. Claudia, the sister of the late Claudius Pulcher, a woman thoroughly tinctured with all the vices of her family, returning in a chariot from a public show, happened to be pressed in the throng. Upon this she cried out in a transport of rage; I wish my brother Claudius were alive again, that he might rid Rome, as formerly, of this scoundrel mob, with which the city is crowded. For these words she was cited by the two ædiles to appear before the tribes; and notwithstanding all the whole body of the nobility could say or do in her favour, she was forced to appear before the tribunal of the Roman people, which had never before happened to any woman, and was condemned to pay a fine of twenty five thousand asses of brass, that is, 80*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*

Claudia punished for treasonable words against the people.

Hamilcar supplies Lilybæum with provisions.

THE two new consuls had no sooner entered upon their office, than they set out for Sicily. The Romans hoped to reduce Lilybæum at length by famine, and therefore persisted in carrying on the siege. But in spite of all the care and vigilance of the two consuls, the brave Hamilcar found means to supply the place with fresh provisions. He sailed with his small fleet from the port of Epiroeste, near which place he lay incamped, and in the night ordered a good number of transports, loaded with provisions, to advance behind the islands Ægates, which covered the port of Lilybæum. In the morning he himself appeared out at sea with the small remains of his galleys, bidding, as it were, the enemy defiance. The Roman galleys, which guarded the port, made what haste they could to attack him. But when they had got a great way from the port, the Carthaginian ships, which lay concealed behind the islands, entered it, unloaded their provisions, landed some fresh troops, and got out to sea again before the Romans returned from their vain pursuit †. This same year the Roman privateers gained a considerable victory over a Carthaginian fleet within sight of the island of Ægimur near Africa; but were afterwards dashed in pieces by a storm, which drove them against the rocks on the coast of Africa ‡.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these misfortunes, the Romans with an unaccountable steadiness continued the siege of Lilybæum, and dispatched their two new consuls, A. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Sempronius Blaesus, into Sicily, with orders to use their utmost efforts against the place. As it was well stored with provisions, Hamilcar gave himself no farther trouble about relieving it, or sending in new stores. His mind was wholly bent upon a more noble design, which was to recover the city of Eryx, taken formerly by the consul Junius. This was a difficult and dangerous enterprise. The city of Eryx stood about the middle of the mountain of that name, and was fortified by art as well as by nature. The Romans were in possession of the temple of Venus Erycina on the summit of the mountain, and had a fort at the bottom of it defended by a good garison. But nothing could discourage the Carthaginian general. He set out from his camp in the dead of the night, and winding round the mountain in a profound silence, arrived undiscovered at the gates of the city, which he easily forced open in that surprise, and made himself master of the place. All those who were found under arms, he put to the sword, and sent the rest prisoners to Drepanum. The war now took another turn: the Romans made it their whole business to dispossess Hamilcar of this advantageous post, and the Carthaginian did all that lay in his power to maintain himself in it. The Romans, who were masters of a fort at the foot of the mountain, besieged him; and he at the same time besieged the Romans, who were posted at the top of it in the temple of Venus. In this post between two garisons of the enemy, Hamilcar maintained himself, and amused the Romans two whole years. And this diversion was of great service to his country; for in the mean time the siege of Lilybæum advanced but slowly, and that of Drepanum was raised. Of so great a weight in the scale was the valour and address of one single man. The new consuls, C. Fundanius, and C. Sulpicius Gallus, endeavoured in vain to drive Hamilcar from his post. The besieged and the besiegers suffered, each in their turn, all the miseries of war and famine. Never was fury more uninterrupted, or battles more frequent. No day passed without some rencounter. Both parties seemed, as Polybius expresses it, quite insensible of pains and fatigues, fought as if they had been invulnerable, and bore the inconveniencies of hunger and watching, as if their bodies had been proof against all pain and hardships. After the consuls had by a thousand stratagems attempted in vain to make themselves masters of the disputed city of Eryx, the Gauls, who made up the best part of Hamilcar's garison, being at length tired out with continual fighting, and not receiving their pay, plotted together to put the place into the hands of the Romans. But Hamilcar, too vigilant to be surprised, discovered and defeated their design. However, they delivered up to the consuls an advanced post, which they guarded, and entered into their service. This is the first time we read of foreign forces in the pay of the republic, whose armies had hitherto consisted either of Roman citizens, who were paid by the public, or of Italian allies, who were maintained by their respective states.

- ^a But now the senate being thoroughly convinced, that the republic could never establish her dominion in Sicily, so long as the Carthaginians were masters of the sea, turned their thoughts anew to the building of a fleet, resolving to try fortune a third time, how averse soever she had hitherto been. They proposed to man their vessels with hired troops from foreign countries, that in case of new misfortunes, Rome might not suffer so great a loss of her own citizens as she had done formerly. The great difficulty was, how to find money for such an undertaking, the public treasury being quite exhausted. On this occasion the senators gave to the rest of the citizens an example of zeal for the service of their country. The most wealthy among them built, each a quinqueremis, at his own expence. Others taxed themselves at so much a head, and a galley was fitted out at the joint expences of three or four. In short, a fleet of two hundred quinqueremes was put to sea by private persons, without any other burden on the republic, than that of reimbursing the private persons, when she should be in a condition to do it. This new armament far excelled any of the former ones, all the galleys, that composed it, having been built upon the model of that light galley, which was taken from Hannibal the Rhodian ¹.
- ^b The consuls chosen for the new year, were C. Lutatius Catulus, and A. Posthumius; but the latter being at the same time high-priest of Mars, Cacilius Metellus, at this time pontifex maximus, would not suffer him to exercise any military function; so that he had the bare name of consul. But the republic, not thinking it adviseable to trust the command of her armies to one general, and being well apprised of the inconveniences which would arise from the too long absence of the prætor, to whom it naturally fell to supply the place of the consul, created a second prætor, that one might be at the head of the army, and the other reside at Rome, and administer justice there. This new institution continued even when both consuls took the field. One of these prætors was to hear causes between citizen and citizen, and the other between citizens and foreigners, whence the former was called prætor urbanus, and the latter prætor peregrinus. The two prætors chose their provinces by lot, and were themselves chosen, as the consuls, in the comitia by centuries ². Valerius Falto was the first prætor peregrinus. He embarked on board the new fleet to make war together with the consul Lutatius in Sicily. They began the campaign with the siege of Drepanum, and soon made a breach in the wall with their engines, which battered the place day and night. But as the consul was mounting the breach at the head of his men, he received a dangerous wound in the thigh. As he was greatly beloved by the soldiers, they all hastened to his relief, and giving over the attack, carried him back to the camp. After this he did not push on the siege with great vigour; but being persuaded that the Carthaginian fleet would soon appear, and that a victory at sea would contribute much more, than the taking of a single town, towards the intire conquest of Sicily, he turned all his thoughts to the disciplining of his men, and preparing them for a naval engagement. He was not yet cured of his wound, when news was brought him, that a Carthaginian fleet of four hundred ships, under the command of Hanno, had been seen at sea. This terrible armament was the last effort of the African republic. Hanno had on board new levies, arms, money, provisions, and all sorts of stores; and his design was to touch at the port of Eryx before the Romans could have account of his motions, and to sail from thence in quest of the enemy's fleet, after he had unloaded his vessels, and taken on board the flower of the troops there together with Hamilcar, whose name he thought was enough to fill the Romans with terror. But Lutatius, indisposed as he was, having caused himself to be carried on board the Prætorian galley, immediately ordered the fleet to join the squadron before Lilybaeum, and steer their course directly from thence to the islands called Ægates, the place of rendezvous for the enemy's fleet. He had scarce left Lilybaeum, when he descried the Carthaginian fleet off Hiera, shaping their course to Eryx. Hereupon he ordered the commanders of his vessels to prepare for a battle. The wind was then favourable for the Romans; but it changed all on a sudden, and at the same time the sea began to run very high. However, the consul, after having been some time in suspense, and undetermined what to do, resolved in the end not to defer the engagement one moment. After all, said he, we shall have a greater advantage in fighting with ships that are heavy laden, than disadvantage in the roughness of the sea. If Hanno carries his fleet to Eryx, takes Hamilcar on board, imbarques his brave mercenaries, and gets rid of these new recruits, the success will be more doubtful, and the victory longer disputed. Upon these considerations Lutatius drew up his fleet in line of battle, and made directly towards the enemy. As the Carthaginians were on this occasion inferior to the Romans in every thing, except the number of their ships, the dispute was soon decided. The Romans routed them at the first onset. Fifty of the Carthaginian vessels were sunk, and seventy taken, with all the mariners and soldiers they had on board. The rest, by an uncommon instance of good fortune, made their escape. For the wind, which had hitherto been favourable to the Carthaginians in their voyage to Sicily, changed all on a sudden, and favoured their escape. After the battle the consul steered his course to Lilybaeum, to dispose of the money, arms, provisions, and above all of the prisoners he had taken, who were at least ten thousand in number. Such was the battle of the Ægades, which determined the fate of Sicily.^b

peace between Rome and

Hamilcar was the first who felt the effects of this terrible defeat. The consul Lutatius had no sooner disposed of his booty and captives, than he marched against him, and in several skirmishes killed above two thousand of his men. Hereupon that gallant commander, having no longer any hopes of succours, was forced to capitulate. The Romans, elated with their late victory, insisted upon his passing under the yoke with his garison. But he rejected the proposal with the utmost indignation, protesting, that he would rather suffer all extremities, than submit to such an indignity, or abandon a place with disgrace, which he had so long defended with honour. While he was treating with the consul, he received full powers from his republic to do whatever he judged to be most for her interest. Being thus appointed mediator between Carthage and Rome, he considered that Carthage was too much exhausted to maintain her conquests in Sicily, and therefore thought it more advisable to yield the island by a treaty of peace, than to be driven shamefully out of it, and at the same time expose Africa to the ravages of a victorious fleet. For this purpose therefore he sent deputies to Lutatius, who received them with great joy, being desirous to put an end to the war before his consulship expired, that his successors might not have the glory of finishing a work, which had cost him so much blood and labour. Both parties being thus disposed to pursue the same end, after some slight difficulties, the consul drew up the following articles, while he lay before Eryx, as the terms of a peace between the two republics. There shall be peace and friendship between Rome and Carthage upon the following conditions, if the people of Rome approve thereof:
1. The Carthaginians shall evacuate all the places which they have in Sicily, and intirely quit the island. 2. They shall in twenty years pay the Romans, at equal payments every year, two thousand two hundred talents of silver, that is, 437250 l. sterling. 3. They shall restore the Roman captives and deserters without ransom, and redeem their own prisoners with money. 4. They shall not make war upon Hiero king of Syracuse, or his allies. These articles being agreed on, Hamilcar surrendered Eryx, upon condition that all his soldiers should march out with him upon his paying for each of them eighteen Roman denarii. Hostages were given on both sides, and this long war concluded with a truce.^c The only thing now remaining was to get these articles confirmed by the Roman people assembled in the comitia, they being the sole arbiters of peace and war. For this purpose both Lutatius and Hamilcar sent deputies to Rome. The republic, though overjoyed at the consul's success, was dissatisfied with the too easy terms he had granted the Carthaginians, and therefore appointed ten commissioners to treat personally with Hamilcar, and demand farther advantages. These, after having thoroughly informed themselves of the state of affairs, added to the former articles two more; viz. 1. That a thousand talents should be paid immediately, and the two thousand two hundred in the space of ten years at equal payments. 2. That the Carthaginians should quit all the little islands about Italy and Sicily, and never more come near them with ships of war, or raise mercenaries in those places. Necessity obliged Hamilcar to consent to these new terms; but he returned to Carthage with a hatred to the Romans, which he did not even suffer to die with him, but left an inheritance to his son, the famous Hannibal. He had no sooner given his consent to these articles, than he set out for Lilybaeum, and from thence sailed to Carthage, not caring to be a witness of the solemn oath, which was to be the last ratification of the peace.^d It may be justly said of Hamilcar, that his country had never yet produced a general equal to him in valor and prudence. He always conquered as long as his republic

- a could support him, and only sunk in the common misfortunes of his country. At last he returned into Africa to be the defender, or rather the deliverer, of Carthage, in the cruel war, which she was to maintain with her discontented mercenaries, as we shall relate in the history of Carthage.

- THE next year the consul Lutatius, and the prætor Valerius, who had acted as his colleague, were continued in Sicily, the first in quality of proconsul, and the second in that of proprætor, while the two new consuls, Q. Lutatius Cerco, and A. Manlius Atticus, marched an army into Hetruria to quell a sudden rebellion of the Falisci, who had affronted a tribune of the people, named Genucius, and not only refused to give the republic satisfaction, but openly revolted, and even ventured to take the field against some Roman troops that were sent against them. The two consuls were therefore ordered to enter Hetruria, and bring the Falisci back to their duty. The rebels did not confine themselves to the defence of their city, but taking the field, fought two pitched battles in the space of six days. The success of the first was pretty equal; but the second turned so much to their disadvantage, that they were obliged to lay down their arms, and deliver up their city to the conquerors, after they had lost fifteen thousand men. Their capital, situated on an inaccessible mountain, was razed, but they were allowed to build a new one in the plain; their arms, horses, part of their moveables, and half their lands, were confiscated. From Hetruria the consuls returned to Rome, and from thence passed over into Sicily to put the last hand to the peace, which was ratified by the solemn sacrifice of a sow, and the mutual oaths of the two nations. Thus ended the first Punic war, the longest and most memorable which had ever been waged till that time. It had lasted full four and twenty years, during which time the conquerors lost seven hundred ships, and the conquered only five hundred. But the Romans prevailed at length by their constancy, or, as Polybius expresses it, by a certain inflexibility of resolution peculiar to themselves.

- AND now the great affair at Rome was to determine the fate of Sicily, the manner in which it should be governed, and the emoluments which the republic should draw from so fine a conquest. The whole island, except the kingdom of Syracuse, was declared a Roman province, that is, a country to be governed by Roman laws, and Roman magistrates. A prætor was to be sent annually thither to be governor and judge in civil causes, and a quæstor to receive the revenues of the republic. These revenues were either fixed or casual. The fixed were called tributes, and consisted of a certain sum of money, which the province was every year to pay into the public treasury. The casual were the tenths of the product of the lands, and the duties upon merchandize exported and imported. Certain officers, called publicans, generally chosen out of the body of the Roman knights, were appointed to levy both these sorts of taxes; and the latter sort were farmed by the publicans at a certain annual rent, which they constantly paid the republic at all events. However, these fixed revenues did not hinder the Romans from often demanding of the provinces extraordinary supplies of men, ships, corn, &c. Thus Sicily, the first province Rome established out of Italy, was deprived of its own laws, and consequently of the best part of its liberty. By becoming Roman, it was indeed less free, but more happy. It had been long the scene of war between three nations, the Carthaginians, the Mamertines, and the Syracusians, contending for the dominion of it. The Romans, who came after them, increased at first the calamities of that unhappy people, but afterwards secured their tranquillity. There were now but two sovereigns in the whole island, Hiero and the Romans; and as there reigned a perfect union between them, the Sicilians enjoyed all the blessings of an uninterrupted peace.

- Sicily* being thus settled in perfect tranquillity, the two consuls, Lutatius Cerco, and Manlius Atticus, the proconsul Lutatius Catulus, and the proprætor Valerius, returned to Rome with their troops to receive there the honourable reward of their labours. The proconsul and proprætor triumphed for the naval victory at the Ægades, and the consuls for having vanquished the Falisci in Hetruria.

THE joy of the people of Rome for their late prosperity was much damped by two dreadful misfortunes, which followed close upon one another. The Tiber on a sudden overflowed with such violence, as to overturn a great many houses in the lower grounds; and the water continued stagnated so long in the forum, as greatly to damage the foundations of the houses there. After this a fire broke out in the upper city, and thence spread as far as the forum. Rome, says Livy, lost more wealth in one day,

than she had got by many victories. The temple of Vesta was not exempted from the common misfortune, and the most ancient monuments of religion had been destroyed, had not Cæcilius Metellus, the present pontifex maximus, ventured his life to save them. He made his way through the flames, went into the sanctuary, where the palladium was kept, and saved it from the fire, an action more celebrated in history than the glorious victory which he gained over the Carthaginians at the head of a consular army. One of his arms was much hurt in the attempt, and, which was much worse, he intirely lost his sight. This heroical action procured him a mark of distinction, which had never before been granted to any man; he was allowed to be drawn to the senate-house in a chariot^t. This year the tribes were probably augmented to thirty-five, by the addition of the tribes Velina and Quirina. It is certain at least, that from this time the tribes were reckoned to be thirty-five, which number was never afterwards increased. The consular year was closed with a census made by the censors Aurelius Cotta, and Fabius Buteo; and unless there be some mistake in the cyphers, Eusebius reckons us up but one hundred and sixty thousand citizens. If his numbers are right, a prodigious multitude of citizens must have perished by the inundation and fire.

THE new consuls, C. Claudius Cento, and M. Sempronius Tudianus, having no employment abroad, turned their thoughts to the securing of their frontiers against the Gauls and Ligurians, by planting colonies in their neighbourhood. In the first year after the Punic war Livius Andronicus, the reformer of the Roman stage, appeared at Rome. He introduced connected fables after the Greek manner, instead of the buffooneries and rambling discourses with which the people to that time had been entertained. He was the freedman of Marcus Livius Salinator, whose children he had educated. His poetry was grown obsolete in Cicero's time, and, in the judgment of that orator, would not bear a second reading. Andronicus flourished about an hundred and fifty years after the death of Euripides and Sophocles, and fifty-two after that of Menander. The following consulship of C. Mamilius Turinus, and Q. Valerius Falto, proved an interval of peace. The Romans indeed had some thoughts of taking arms anew against the Carthaginians, who having seized some of their merchants carrying arms and provisions to the revolted mercenaries, had made five hundred of them prisoners, and thrown some of them into the sea. But they were appeased by a respectful embassy from Carthage, and continued faithful to the treaty of peace, though the city of Utica, which had declared for the rebels, would have submitted to Rome, and the mercenaries, who had seized Sardinia, invited them to take possession of that island. About this time Ennius the famous poet was born at Rudes, an ancient city of Calabria near Tarentum. He was the inventor of hexameter verse among the Latins, though the Greek was his mother-tongue. The life of Scipio Africanus, which he wrote in Coriacks, was his master-piece. By this work he gained the affection of the Cornelian family, who shewed their gratitude to him even after his death, depositing his ashes in the same tomb with those of Scipio Africanus, and erecting a marble statue to him near the statue of that great commander. Besides the life of Scipio, he wrote the history of Rome in eighteen books, recording in verse the events, of which he himself had been witness. His poem was a history in verse, the Romans in his time being too grave to have any taste for poetical fictions^e. The poet Nævius, who was his contemporary, after having made some campaigns in the first Punic war, wrote the history of that war in verse, according to the taste of those times^b.

Carthage, during her war with the revolted mercenaries, affected to pay a great deference to Rome, and even restored all the Italian merchants, who had been taken in carrying arms and provisions to the rebels. The Romans were so well pleased with this instance of respect, that they sent back to Carthage without ransom all the Carthaginian prisoners, who were still detained at Rome, prohibited their merchants all intercourse and traffick with the rebels, and allowed them to supply the Carthaginians with arms, provisions, and whatever they wanted^c. But notwithstanding the sincere friendship, which seemed to subsist at this time between the two rival republics, Hamilcar had no sooner by his valor and conduct put an end to the rebellion at home, than he turned all his thoughts to the humbling of a republic, whose interests were so opposite to those of his own. With this view, as Carthage was not then in a condition to renew the war with Rome, he formed two schemes, both worthy of a great genius, which, if wisely pursued, might at length have crushed the imperious republic, or at least

- a bring her upon a level with Carthage. The first was to extend the Carthaginian dominions in Spain, that his republic might, by this means, be able to raise within her own dominions a sufficient number of forces to make head against those multitudes of soldiers, with which Italy furnished the Romans. The second was to form young Hannibal his son so that he should inherit his valor, his experience, and his hatred to the Romans, and steadily pursue his designs. He had no sooner appeased the intestine troubles, than he applied himself wholly to the pursuit of these two projects. But before he passed the streights, known then by the name of the Pillars of Hercules, in order to make war in Spain, he took an opportunity to inspire his son, though but nine years old, with his own sentiments. Before he imbarqued, he ordered a solemn sacrifice to be offered to Jupiter; and when all things were ready, and the victim just going to be slain, he took his son by the hand, and leading him to the altar, asked him whether he was willing to attend him in his Spanish expedition? The courageous boy not only consented to go, but conjured his father by the gods present to form him to victory, and teach him the art of conquering. That I will joyfully do, replied Hamilcar, and with all the care of a father who loves you, if you will swear upon the altars, to be an eternal enemy to the Romans. Hannibal readily complied with the motion; and the solemnity of the ceremony, and the sacredness of the oath, made such an impression upon his mind, as nothing afterwards could ever efface. He then first imbibed that hatred for Rome, which ended only with his life. Hamilcar by this proceeding plainly declared, that he passed into Spain with no other view than that of falling afterwards on the Romans. But we must leave him making conquests there, and return to the affairs of Rome.

Hannibal takes an oath to be an eternal enemy to the Romans.

- THE Italic Gauls, called Boii, who had been subdued by the Romans before the first Punic war, threw off the yoke, and joined the Falisci in Etruria. On the other hand the Ligures were in motion, and seemed to threaten the republic with an approaching war. The present consuls therefore, C. Mamilius Turinus, and Q. Valerius Falto, divided their forces. The latter, who marched against the Gauls, was defeated by them with the loss of three thousand five hundred men. Upon the news of this defeat, M. Genucius Cipus, one of the prætors, was immediately dispatched from Rome with a reinforcement for the consul. But Valerius, looking upon this as a personal affront, resolved to conquer the enemy before the succours arrived, or perish in the attempt. Accordingly, he fell upon the Gauls with such fury, that he killed fourteen thousand of them, and took two thousand prisoners (H). However, this victory did not procure him a triumph, because he had by his rashness exposed the Roman army to the danger of a second defeat. As for Sempronius, the other consul, he gained a battle, though not a decisive one, against the Ligurians; but had not time to pursue his victory, being by the republic ordered into Sardinia. This island had been formerly subdued by the Romans, as we have related above, but soon after returned, we know not how, under the dominion of its ancient masters. The revolted mercenaries had seized it, and offered to put the Romans in possession of it, in order to engage them to take their part. But Rome made it then a point of honour not to side with rebels. However, this scrupulous fit of honour was short-lived. As this island was of great importance, and had never been yielded to the Carthaginians by any treaty, the senate thought they might justly claim it by right of conquest. They therefore sent, on trifling pretences, Sempronius with a fleet to take possession of it. The consul on

The Boii defeated.

(H) It is pretended, that M. Genucius Cipus, then one of the prætors, who was charged to lead these reinforcements to the consul, was scarce got out of the city, when two horns grew out of his forehead. Being alarmed at this prodigy, he consulted a diviner of Etruria, in order to learn what misfortunes it foreboded to him. The Etrurian told him, that he should one day be invested with royal authority; which made Cipus dread his fate, as the Romans were bred up with an utter aversion to monarchy, and do all that lay in his power to prevent the accomplishment of the prediction. From that moment he resolved never to enter Rome, intreated the senate to assemble without the walls, and there pressed the conscript fathers to pass a decree of perpetual banishment against him. The senate admired his disinterested affection for his country, and granted him his request; but at the same time, to reward his virtue, allowed him as much ground as he could inclose in a circle in one day, with a plough drawn by two oxen, and guided by himself; and besides erected a statue of brass, representing Cipus's head with the two horns, and placed it over the gate of the city, at which he went out. From this monument the gate was called the brazen gate. This prodigy is related by Festus, Valerius Maximus, and Ovid; but they all look upon it as a fable, though the statue of Cipus was still to be seen in their time over the brazen gate (25).

his arrival acquainted the Carthaginian commander, that if his republic did not immediately withdraw her troops from Sardinia, and relinquish all pretensions to that island for ever, he would, in the name of the senate and people of Rome, declare war with Carthage. The Carthaginians, who had just put an end to the war with the mercenaries, were so terrified at this express declaration made by a consul at the head of an army, that they readily submitted, and gave up all claims to Sardinia for ever. But this was not enough for the consul; he obliged them to defray the charges of his armament, and the further sum of twelve hundred talents. An extortion, which contributed most of all to confirm Hamilcar in his hatred to the Romans, and to render Hannibal inexorable in the wars, which we shall soon see him carry on with great cruelty in *Italy*¹.

defeated.

THE new consuls, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, pursued the war with the Gauls and Ligurians, in which they were attended with good success, so long as the two consular armies incamped together. But the love of glory and booty having made the consular armies separate, Fulvius, who had entered the country of the Gauls bordering on the Po, was obliged to continue in his intrenchments, and there pass a melancholy and shameful campaign, under continual apprehensions of a surprise. Cornelius had better success against the Ligurians nearest to Hetruria; for in one action he killed twenty-four thousand of the enemy, and took five thousand prisoners. For this victory he was honoured on his return with a triumph².

dued.

THE new consuls, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus, were obliged to take the field to oppose the Gauls, whose chiefs depending on the vast multitudes of men they had assembled, and the expectation of a strong reinforcement of their countrymen from the other side the Alps, demanded the restitution of Ariminum from the Romans. The consuls, not having their troops complete, referred the affair to the senate, and in the mean while proposed a truce to the Gauls, who readily consented to the proposal, upon the news they received that a numerous army of Transalpine Gauls under the conduct of Atys and Galatius, two generals, or rather kings, were in full march to join them. This army was so numerous, that it gave no small jealousy to the Italian Gauls, who thereupon turned their arms against those who were come to assist them, killed their two leaders, and put the whole body to flight. The enemy having thus defeated themselves, Lentulus with one consular army brought both the Boii and Ligurians to reason, depriving the former of a part of their territory, and taking several strong-holds from the latter. In the mean time Varus was preparing to pass over into the island of Corfica, which by the secret intrigues of the Carthaginians, had been induced to shake off the Roman yoke. The consul, not finding a fleet ready to transport his whole army, was forced to send a squadron before him under the command of that Claudius Glycias, who had been formerly named dictator in derision. He had since that time been honoured with several military employments, and always distinguished himself among the troops. When he saw himself at the head of part of the consular army, swelled with ambition, he thought it would be much to his honour to gain this island to the republic without bloodshed; and therefore without the consent either of the consul or senate, he made a shameful peace with the Corficans. But the consul on his arrival disannulled the treaty, renewed the war, and subdued the island by force of arms. As for Claudius, he was delivered up to the Corficans, whom he drew, said they, into a bloody war by a fallacious peace. In which sentence the senate had likewise the further view of preventing the reproach, which might have been cast upon the consul for having made war upon a people, who depended on the faithful execution of a treaty. The Corficans had more honour than to treat him with severity. They sent him back to Rome, where he was put to death in prison; and then his body being carried to the top of the steps, called Scala Gemonia (1), was dragged by an iron hook from thence to the Tiber, into which it was thrown³.

(1) The Gemonia was a place appointed either for torturing criminals, or for receiving their dead bodies after their execution. Some derive the name of Gemonia from one Gemonius, who was the first executed there; others from the Latin word gemere, to groan, because the place rung with groans and complaints of those who were put to death. It was on the hill

Aventinus, and there were several steps which led up to it; whence it had the name of Scala Gemonia. The dead bodies of those who died by the hand of the executioner, were dragged thither with an iron hook, and after they had been some time exposed to public view, thrown into the Tiber (26).

(26) Vide Plin l. viii. c. 40.

- HOWEVER, this execution of Claudius did not appease the Corficans, who had been amused by a treaty of peace, that Rome might have the better opportunity of subduing them by a war. They communicated their discontents to the Sardinians, who being stirred up under-hand by the Carthaginians, attempted to shake off the Roman yoke. The republic had too much penetration not to see from whence the blow came, and was less concerned at the loss of the two islands, than at the renewal of a war with a powerful republic; but the senators were all of opinion, that, if it was really necessary to come to an open rupture with Carthage, war could not be declared too soon. Preparations were accordingly made at Rome, and all over Italy, for beginning it with vigour. Carthage, alarmed at this news, sent ambassadors after ambassadors to negotiate an accommodation; but the Romans answered them only with reproaches and bitter words. At length she dispatched ten of her principal men for the same end, among whom was one Hanno, a young lord of great spirit and vivacity, who, enraged at the haughty answers of the proud republic, cried out with an air of equal pride, If you are resolved to break the treaty, reinstate us in the condition we were in before it was concluded; restore us the cities we possessed in Sicily. These were the price we paid for the peace, which, it was agreed, should be perpetual; otherwise you have made us pay very dear for this short truce. Equity ought to prevail over avarice. Would not that trader be thought unjust, who, after he had gone from his bargain, should keep both the money and the merchandize? This discourse filled the senators with confusion, who being either really just, or affecting to appear so, dismissed the Carthaginian ambassadors with the strongest assurances of peace¹.
- THE new consuls, C. Attilius Bulbus and T. Manlius Torquatus, drew lots for their provinces. The former continued in Italy, while the latter, by a few slight engagements, recovered Sardinia, and made it tributary; but without reducing it to the form of a Roman province. And now peace reigning every-where, the temple of Janus was shut for the first time since the reign of Numa Pompilius. But this tranquillity lasted only a few months. The consuls for the following year, L. Posthumius Albinus and Sp. Carvilius, were obliged to raise new forces to act against the Sardinians, Corficans and Ligurians, who had engaged, by mutual treaties, to assist each other.
- d The consul Carvilius was employed against the Corficans, whom he soon reduced. The prætor Cornelius made war with the Sardinians; but the bad air and water of Sardinia caused a plague in his army, and he himself was carried off by the contagion; which accident would have ruined the affairs of the republic there, had not Carvilius transported his legions thither from Corfica. Upon his arrival, the rebels ventured to face him in the open field; but the consul had all the advantage over them, which disciplined troops always have over confused multitudes. The Sardinians were defeated; and, by one single victory, the whole island was brought under subjection. As for the consul Posthumius, whose province it was to make head against the Ligurians, historians tell us, that he had all the success he could have wished for^m.
- e IN this consulship, the censors, observing the number of citizens to be considerably lessened, and imputing it to mens marrying only with a view to interest, and afterwards deserting their wives, and carrying on unlawful intrigues with other women, obliged all the citizens to swear, that they would not marry with any other view but that of increasing the subjects of the republic. This oath raised many scruples, and caused many ruptures between husbands and wives. Among the rest one Carvilius Ruga, a man of distinction, thought himself bound by his oath to divorce his wife, whom he passionately loved, because she was barren. Accordingly he put her away, and married another. This is the first instance of a divorce since the foundation of Rome, tho' divorces were allowed by the laws of marriage settled by the first kings. Afterwards they became scandalously frequent, as a corruption of manners prevailed in the republic. And now marriage-contracts were introduced, to secure womens portions in case of divorces. This same year a vestal, named Tutia, was condemned to be buried alive for an intrigue with a slave; but she prevented the execution of the sentence, by laying violent hands on herselfⁿ. In the present consulship, the poet Navius introduced the first regular comedy after the Greek manner on the Latin stage.

up in arms anew. It fell to Fabius's lot to make war with the latter; and he drove them out of the plain country, and obliged them to take shelter among the Alps. This is that Fabius, whom we shall soon see restoring, at the head of the Roman army, the affairs of his distressed country by his wise delays. He had the surname of Maximus from his great-grandfather Fabius Rullus, of whom we have made frequent mention above. In his infancy he was called Ovicula, or the Little sheep, on account of his natural sweetness of temper and docility. He was even in his earliest years remarkable for that conduct and behaviour, free from all precipitation and rashness, which afterwards rendered him so serviceable to his country. As for his colleague Pomponius, he sailed for Sardinia, where he found, that the frequent revolts of that island were owing to the intrigues of the Carthaginians, whose ships were continually passing from Carthage to Sardinia, and the other islands, and inspiring the people, where-ever they came, with an hatred to the Roman name. In order therefore to sound their sentiments, the senate sent an embassy to Carthage, under pretence of demanding the sums which they had stipulated to pay the Roman republic. The deputies were ordered to add threatenings of renewing the war, in case the Carthaginian ships presumed to touch at any port belonging to the Roman state. But the Carthaginians, flushed with the success of Hamilcar in Spain, being no-ways moved by these menaces, the deputies, pursuant to their instructions, presented them a caduceus, the symbol of peace, and a little javelin, the emblem of war, saying, Take your choice. The Carthaginian dictator answered, That he was ready to take which soever they should think fit to leave him. However, this haughty answer did not absolutely destroy the treaties between Rome and Carthage, but raised such mutual distrusts, as we shall soon see break out into a flame. As for Pomponius, he gained some advantages over the Sardinians, for which a triumph was granted him.

instituted.

THE Romans at this time instituted a new tribunal of justice, at the motion of two tribunes of the people, both Ebutii. As the two prætors, who were often obliged to take the field, could not dispatch all civil affairs, which multiplied in proportion to the increase of the republic, it was enacted, that three able and judicious men should be chosen out of each tribe, and form a new tribunal, subordinate to the prætor. These new judges were called, for brevity's sake, centumviri, tho' they were a hundred and five in number, and were divided into four courts or chambers. The causes, which fell under their cognizance, were such as related to proscriptions, guardianships, last-wills, inheritances, &c. This tribunal subsisted ever after in Rome, and the judges, tho' in after-ages increased to the number of a hundred and eighty, still continued to be called centumviri.

IN the following consulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus and M. Publius Malleolus, Flaminius, tribune of the people, made a motion to the people, to pass a law for distributing a fruitful country, lately taken from the Gauls, among the poor citizens. The patricians, who had always opposed motions of this kind, united their strength and interest to hinder the passing of this law; but neither the threats of the consuls, nor the intreaties of the senate, nor the tears of old Flaminius, whom the patricians had gained over to their party, could prevail on the tribune to desist from pursuing his point. On the day appointed for proposing the law to the people, he mounted the rostra, and began to harangue the multitude with great warmth; but while he was yet speaking, his father appeared, ascended the rostra, and taking the hot-headed tribune by the arm, ordered him to follow him home. Flaminius, without pleading either his dignity, or the actual exercise of his office, obeyed his father, and left the affair he was so bent upon, when it was almost finished; and, what is most extraordinary, not a murmur was heard in the whole assembly, which immediately dispersed. Afterwards indeed the affair took another turn; for the tribune Carvilius revived it, and succeeded: but the distribution of lands among the Romans, which had long belonged to the Gauls, so provoked that nation, that they took up arms, and began a war, which endangered Rome itself, as we shall see anon.

Corfica and Sardinia made a Roman province.

IN the following year the new consuls, M. Pomponius Matro and C. Papirius Mæso, finished the conquest of Sardinia and Corfica, which two islands they reduced to the form of a Roman province, upon the same foot as Sicily. Pomponius continued in the new province, which consisted of both the islands, all the next year, and governed it in quality of prætor. Papirius, who had subdued Corfica, returned to Rome, where

- a he found that a dictator had been created to hold the comitia for electing new consuls. He demanded a triumph; but not having interest enough to obtain it, he took a method intirely new to do himself justice. He put himself at the head of his victorious army, and marched to the temple of Jupiter Latiaris, on the hill of Alba, with all the pomp that attended triumphant victors at Rome. He made no other alteration in the ceremony, but that of wearing a crown of myrtle instead of a crown of laurel, and this on account of his having defeated the Coriscans in a place where there was a grove of myrtles. The example of Papirius was afterwards followed by a great many generals, to whom the senate refused triumphs.
- THE next year, when M. Æmilius Barbula and M. Junius Pera were consuls, a new war sprung up in a kingdom out of Italy. Illyricum, properly so called, which bordered upon Macedon and Epirus, was at this time governed by a woman, named Teuta, the widow of king Agron, and guardian to her son Pinaus, who was under age. The success of her late husband against the Ætolians had flushed her to such a degree, that instead of settling the affairs of her ward in peace, she commanded her subjects to cruize along the coast, seize all the ships they met, take what places they could, and spare no nation. Her pirates had, pursuant to her orders, taken and plundered many ships belonging to the Roman merchants; and her troops were then besieging the island of Issa in the Adriatic, tho' the inhabitants had put themselves under the protection of the republic. Upon the complaints therefore of the Italian merchants, and to protect the people of Issa, the senate sent two ambassadors to the Illyrian queen, Lucius and Caius Coruncanius, to demand of her, that she would restrain her subjects from infesting the seas with piracies. She answered them haughtily, That she could only promise, that her subjects should not for the future attack the Romans in her name, and by public authority; but as for any thing more, it is not customary with us, said she, to lay restraints on our subjects, nor will we forbid them to reap those advantages from the sea, which it offers them. Your customs then, replied the youngest of the ambassadors, are very different from ours. At Rome we make public examples of those subjects who injure others, whether at home or abroad. Teuta, we can, by our arms, force you to reform the abuses of your bad government.
- d These unseasonable threatenings provoked Teuta, who was naturally a proud and imperious woman, to such a degree, that, without regard to the right of nations, she caused the ambassadors to be murdered on their return home. When so notorious an infraction of the law of nations was known at Rome, the people demanded vengeance; and the senate, having first honoured the manes of the ambassadors, by erecting, as was usual in such cases, statues three foot high to their memory, ordered a fleet to be equipped, and troops raised, with all possible expedition. But now Teuta, reflecting on the enormity of her proceedings, sent an embassy to Rome, assuring the senate, that she had no hand in the murder of the ambassadors, and offering to deliver up to the republic those who had committed that barbarous assassination. The Romans, being at that time threatened with a war from the Gauls, were ready to accept this satisfaction; but in the mean time the Illyrian fleet having gained some advantage over that of the Achæans, and taken the island of Corcyra near Epirus, this success made Teuta believe herself invincible, and forget the promise she had made to the Romans; nay, she sent her fleet to seize on the island of Issa, which the Romans had taken under their protection. Hereupon the consuls for the new year, P. Posthumius Albinus and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, embarked for Illyricum, Fulvius having the command of the fleet, which consisted of a hundred gallies, and Posthumius of the land forces, which amounted to twenty thousand foot, besides a small body of horse. Fulvius appeared with his fleet before Corcyra in the Adriatic, and was put in possession both of the island and city by Demetrius of Pharos, governor of the place for queen Teuta. Nor was this all; Demetrius found means to make the inhabitants of Apollonia drive out the Illyrian garison, and admit into their city the Roman troops. As Apollonia was one of the keys of Illyricum on the side of Macedon, the consuls, who had acted hitherto jointly, no sooner saw themselves in possession of it, than they separated, the fleet cruizing along the coast, and the army penetrating into the heart of the queen's dominions. The Andyæans, Partbini and Atintanes voluntarily submitted to Posthumius, being induced, by the persuasions of Demetrius, to shake off the Illyrian yoke. The consul, being now in possession of most of the inland towns, returned to the coast, where, with the assistance of the fleet, he took many strong holds, among which was Nutria, a place of great strength, and defended by a numerous rous garison; so that it made a vigorous defence, the Romans having lost before it a great many private men, several legionary tribunes, and one quæstor. However, this loss was repaired by the taking of forty Illyrian vessels, which were returning home laden with booty. At length the Roman fleet appeared before Issa, which, by Teuta's orders, was still closely besieged, notwithstanding the losses she had sustained. However, upon the approach of the Roman fleet, the Illyrians dispersed; but the Pharrians, who served among them, followed the example of their countryman Demetrius, and joined the Romans, to whom the Issani readily submitted.

The conditions of peace between the Romans and Illy-rians.

In the mean time Sp. Corvilius and Q. Fabius Maximus being raised to the consulate a second time, Posthumius was recalled from Illyricum, and refused a triumph for having been too prodigal of the Roman blood at the siege of Nutria. His colleague Fulvius was appointed to command the land forces in his room, in quality of proconsul. Hereupon Teuta, who had founded great hopes on the change of the consuls, retired to one of her strong holds, called Rhizon, and from thence early in the spring sent an embassy to Rome. The senate refused to treat with her; but granted the young king a peace upon the following conditions: 1. That he should pay an annual tribute to the republic. 2. That he should surrender part of his dominions to the Romans. 3. That he should never suffer above three of his ships of war at a time to sail beyond Lyssus, a town on the confines of Macedon and Illyricum. The places he yielded to the Romans in virtue of this treaty, were the islands of Corcyra, Issa and Pharos, the city of Dyrrachium, and the country of the Atintanes. Soon after Teuta, either out of shame, or compelled by a secret article of the treaty, abdicated the regency, and Demetrius succeeded her. The proconsul Fulvius, having thus put an end to the Illyrian war, dispatched ambassadors to the Ætolians and Acæans, acquainting them with the true motives of their coming into Illyricum, of the success of their arms, and the articles of the treaty, which were publicly read in the dyets of these two states. The ambassadors were received with great respect by the Greeks, who were overjoyed to see themselves delivered from the piracies of the Illyrians. At the same time the senate sent ambassadors to Athens and Corinth, to acquaint those republics with the advantages they had gained over the Illyrians, and the tranquillity they had procured for all the maritime cities, by reducing those pirates. The Athenians shewed their gratitude, by admitting the Romans to partake of the mysteries of Eleusis, of which we have spoke in the history of Greece; and the Corinthians ever after permitted the Romans to be present at the Isthmian games. Thus the Romans became first known to the people of Greece. The proconsul, on his return to Rome, was decreed a triumph, which he enjoyed on the tenth of the calends of the month Quintilis.

A new treaty with the Carthaginians.

BEFORE this foreign war was ended, the Gauls began to be in motion in Italy, and at the same time the republic was greatly alarmed at the incredible progress the Carthaginians made in Spain. The senate therefore thought it necessary, by some means or other, to put a stop to their increase of dominion. To this end they sent a deputation to Carthage, and at the same time to Asdrubal, who had succeeded Hamilcar in the command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. Carthage, unwilling to give her rival umbrage, agreed to the two following articles: 1. That she should not extend her conquests beyond the river Iberus; and, 2. that Saguntum, a city between the Iberus and that part of Spain which belonged to the Carthaginians, should remain free.

Two Gauls and two Greeks buried alive at Rome.

THE new consuls, P. Valerius Flaccus and M. Atilius Regulus, continued in a manner inactive all their year, tho' the Gauls were raising troops, and making extraordinary preparations for war. Rome seemed to be afraid to enter the lists with so warlike a nation. At this time a prophecy, pretended to be found in the Sibylline books, was spread about Rome, viz. that the Gauls and Greeks should one day make themselves masters of it. The new consuls therefore, M. Valerius Messala and L. Apustius Fullo, having consulted the pontifices, to appease the superstitious populace, caused an edict to be published by the decemviri, who had the care of the Sibylline books, commanding two Greeks, a man and a woman, and two Gauls, likewise a man and a woman, to be buried alive in the ox-market. By this they persuaded the credulous multitude, that the prophecy was fulfilled, and that the Gauls and Greeks had taken possession of Rome. The difficulties, which superstition had raised, being

- a surmounted by this cruel piece of policy, Rome made it her whole business to raise divisions among the Gauls, and found means to gain over to her party the Cænamani and Veneti, two considerable nations among them; but this loss the Gauls repaired with the new levies they made beyond the Alps, where, by their ambassadors, they engaged the Gæsatae to join them. The Gæsatae, according to Polybius, were a very warlike people, and ready to fight for any nation that would pay them; whence they had the name of Gæsatae, that is, birdlings. Others derive this name from a sort of weapon, which they used, and in their language called Gæsum. The consuls, Valerius and Apustius, spent the greater part of the year in raising troops for their successors; and indeed Rome had never before had so numerous an army on foot. All the
- b nations of Italy, subject to the republic, were exhausted, and none excused from sending their quotas. We are told by a credible historian*, that the number of forces Rome raised on this occasion, amounted in all to eight hundred thousand men. Of this incredible multitude two hundred forty-eight thousand foot, and twenty-six thousand six hundred horse, were Romans or Campanians. Nevertheless the Gauls, with only fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, began hostilities, forced themselves a passage through Hebruria, and took their rout towards Rome.
- In the mean time the republic raised L. Æmilius Papus and C. Atilius Regulus to the consulship. The latter was sent into Sardinia, to quiet some commotions there, while his colleague took upon him the conduct of the war with the Gauls, who were now joined by the Gæsatae from the other side the Alps, to the number of above two hundred thousand men, commanded by two kings, Concolitanus and Aneroestus. The consul Æmilius, not knowing what rout the Gæsatae would take, incamped near Ariminum, in order to prevent them from entering the Roman lands by the coasts of the Adriatic sea. At the same time a prætor, whose name is not mentioned in history, was sent into Hebruria with a body of fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse. In the mean time the Gæsatae, having left the coast of the Adriatic to avoid Æmilius's army, crossed Insubria, and joined the troops of their nation in Hebruria; whence this terrible army marched strait to Rome. They found means to bring the prætor to a battle, in which they killed six thousand of his men, and obliged the rest to fly
- d in confusion to a neighbouring hill, where they entrenched themselves; but were the next day invested by the Gauls, who attacked their entrenchments with a fury not to be expressed. The Romans, in this distress, defended themselves with great resolution, hoping that fortune, which had espoused their cause, would, by some means or other, rescue them out of the hands of so cruel an enemy; and accordingly an unexpected accident delivered them from death or slavery. The consul Æmilius being informed, that the Gauls were in full march to Rome, had left his camp at Ariminum, in order to cover the city. As he drew near Fasula, he received an account of the advantage the Gauls had gained over the prætor's army, and of the deplorable situation to which he was reduced. Upon this advice he did not deliberate a moment, but immediately ordered the legions to advance in good order to the enemy's camp, while he himself led the cavalry to the foot of the hill, which the Gaulish cavalry kept closely invested. The Gauls were so alarmed at the unexpected arrival of the consular army, that they decamped in great confusion, in order to return home through Insubria, and secure the booty and wealth which they had amassed. In their march they kept along the shore of the Hebrurian sea; and Æmilius, strengthening his army with the remains of the prætor's troops, followed them close, with a design rather to harass than engage them; but it luckily happened, that Atilius having put a speedy end to the troubles of Sardinia, had, on his return home, landed his army at Pisa, and was now marching along the shore towards Rome, not expecting to find an enemy in his way. He was overjoyed when he learned by
- f his scouts the situation of affairs; and, in order to intercept the Gauls, he drew up his troops near Telamon, a little port in Hebruria, making as wide a front as he could. With his cavalry he posted himself on an eminence, over which the enemy must necessarily pass. The Gauls imagining, that this body of Roman horse was a detachment from Æmilius's army, sent some squadrons of their horse to attack it. As for Æmilius, he knew not that his colleague was so near; he had only learned, that he had left Sardinia, and was arrived at Pisa; but as soon as he perceived at a distance the two parties engaged, he immediately concluded that Atilius was attacking the enemy in front, and detached some squadrons to his relief. Then the attack was renewed with more vigour than ever. The consul Attilius, who distinguished himself in a very eminent manner, was killed; and his head, stuck on the top of a lance, was carried through all the files of the enemy's army; but the death of this brave man proved no advantage to them. One of his lieutenants took his place, and the battle was continued with the same ardor and resolution. While the Gaulish cavalry was engaged with that of the Romans on the top of the hill, their infantry had time to draw up in the plain. As they were to oppose two consular armies, one of which was to attack them in front, and the other in the rear, they disposed their troops so, that one part of them faced the consul Æmilius, and the other the army which Attilius had commanded. In the first line, over-against Æmilius, were placed the Gasata, who were lately come into Italy, and behind them the Insubres. At the head of the other body were the Taurini, and behind them the several nations of the Gauls, who dwelt on both sides the Po. This second army, if we may so call it, faced the legions, which Attilius had brought from Sardinia, and turned their backs to the other. By this disposition the Gauls supported each other, and could neither fly nor retreat. Before the action, the Gasata, observing that the plain, on which they were going to engage, was covered with brambles and bushes, and fearing they might, by entangling their clothes, prevent them from using their arms with freedom, stripped themselves naked, and in that manner advanced against the Romans, who were greatly surprized at that sight. The attack began with great shouts, while the air at the same time rung with an infinite number of horns and trumpets, which were much used by the Gauls. The Romans, who engaged the Gasata, kept at a distance from them, and made a dreadful slaughter with the showers of darts they discharged upon them. Naked as they were, they kept their ground, till the greater part of those, who fought in the first file, were either killed or wounded. Then the rest began to retire, which occasioned some confusion, and encouraged the legionaries to advance and attack them sword in hand. The Gauls behaved with great resolution; and tho' their arms were far inferior to those of the Romans, yet they stood the shock, till the Roman cavalry, which had been engaged on the hill, came down full speed, and attacked them in flank. Then the defeat of the Gauls was general; forty thousand of them were killed on the spot, and above ten thousand taken prisoners, with Concolitanus one of their kings. Aneroestus, the other king, and the most experienced commander among the Gauls, escaped to a neighbouring village, where he laid violent hands on himself, as did most of the officers, who attended him.

AFTER this victory, Æmilius, now sole commander of the two armies, marched along the borders of Æturia, and entering the territories of the Boii, gave up that fruitful country to be plundered by his soldiers. When they were loaded with booty, he began his march to Rome. As he passed through Æturia, he restored to the owners all the booty the Gauls had taken from them. He entered Rome in triumph on the third of the nones of Marth; and as his victory was one of the most important the republic had ever gained, his triumphal procession was one of the most pompous and magnificent. The triumphant victors generally stripped the captives of their military ornaments; but the Gauls were suffered to appear in their belts, in derision of the vow they had made not to quit them till they were upon the capitol; and there they were taken from them, amidst the hisses of all the people.

HOWEVER, this terrible defeat did not make the Gauls submit. The republic therefore cast her eyes on two commanders of great experience, who had been both consuls before, in hopes they would finish this important war. These were T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus; but they performed nothing worth mentioning. Their marches being retarded with violent rains, they could not pass the Po, as they designed; besides, a plague broke out in their army, which not only kept them in a state of inaction, but prevented them from returning to Rome at the usual time; so that it was necessary to create a dictator, who was the famous Cæcilius Metellus, to hold the comitia in their absence for a new election of consuls. C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philo were chosen. These were the first Roman generals who passed the Po; but they were so terrified at the very sight of the Insubres, whose country they intended to invade, that they entered into a treaty with them, and repassing the Po, took refuge among their faithful allies the Canomani. Having rambled about

- a those unknown regions for some time, they resolved to make another attempt upon Insubria; but the Romans being at this time much frightened with prodigies, the augurs declared, that there must have been some defect in the election of the consuls. Whereupon the senate immediately dispatched a courier with a letter, commanding them to return to Rome, and abdicate. The consuls, who were then in sight of the enemy, thinking a retreat through so many nations, whose fidelity was dubious, might be attended with dangerous consequences, resolved not to open the letter till after the battle. The consul Flaminius seems to have taken the whole command upon himself on the day of the battle; for no historian makes mention of his colleague Furius in describing it. As the Romans were far inferior to the enemy in numbers, the consul
- b designed at first to reinforce his army with those Gauls, who were in amity with the Roman people, and sent orders to them to come and join him; but, upon their arrival, he began to consider, that it was a dangerous thing to trust those auxiliaries, who were a wavering people, and might, in the heat of the action, out of compassion for their countrymen, desert the Romans, and even turn their arms against them. Upon this consideration, he resolved not to trust them in an affair of so great importance, and therefore ordered them to pass the river Addua; which they no sooner did, than he caused the bridge to be broken down, and, by that means, as the river was not fordable, prevented them from siding with the enemy, since he could not resolve to trust them as friends. This was the only prudent step the consul took, either
- c before or in the time of the action; for he drew up his men, not after the Roman manner, but so close, that the whole army seemed to be one phalanx; and besides, he posted the last line so near the Addua, that, if they had been pressed ever so little, they would have been forced into the river; but the skill and management of the legionary tribunes made amends for the consul's imprudent conduct. These had observed, in their former battles with the Gauls, that they made but one brisk attack, after which their fire abated; and that their swords were only fit for cutting, and easily bent; so that, if they had not time to set them straight again with their foot on the ground, after a cut or two, they became quite useless. The tribunes therefore took two precautions, which determined the fate of the day in their favour. In the
- d first place, they distributed among the soldiers of the first line the javelins used by the Triarii, which were a kind of halberts, ordering them to present the points of their javelins to the enemy, and by that means keep them at such a distance, as to prevent them from making use of their swords. In the second place, the tribunes commanded their men to throw down the javelins, as soon as the first fire of the enemy was spent, and closing with them sword in hand, stab them in the throat and breast. To these orders the Romans owed the victory; for the Gauls having, in the beginning of the attack, blunted their swords against the long javelins of the Romans, the latter no sooner perceived that their ardor began to cool, than they shortened their swords, and closing with the enemy so as to leave them no room to lift up their arms, stabbed
- e them, as they had been ordered, without running any danger themselves, the swords of the Gauls having no point. Nine thousand of the enemy were killed upon the spot, and seventeen thousand taken prisoners. Thus, in spite of all the bad prognostics, and the orders of the superstitious senate, a complete victory was gained, tho' it was rather owing to the conduct of the subalterns, than to the skill or prudence of the general.

The Insubrians
defeated.

- f AFTER the action, the consuls opened the packet, when Furius, who perhaps had declined the command during the action, out of respect to the senate, was for immediately obeying the order; but Flaminius, thinking a successful act of disobedience more honourable than a blind and timorous submission, was for pursuing the advantages of the victory; which he did accordingly, enriching his soldiers with booty, while his colleague continued inactive, waiting to join him, when he should return from his incursions into Insubria. At length Flaminius rejoined his colleague, and they returned to Rome together, where they met with a very cold reception both from the senate and people; but the troops of Flaminius, whom he had enriched with the spoils of the enemy, prevailed upon the people to grant both the consuls a triumph, since the victory had been gained under the auspices of both. However, the senate obliged them to abdicate immediately after it; so that the republic fell into an inter-regnum, when the centuries chose M. Claudius Marcellus, one of the greatest men Rome ever produced, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, to the consulate. They had scarce entered upon their office, when the Insubres sent ambassadors to Rome, to beg a peace upon any terms; but the senate having, at the instigation of their new consuls, dismissed their deputies with a refusal, they resolved to make their lost effort; and accordingly took into their pay thirty thousand Gasatae, who passing the Alps, entered Italy, under the command of their king Viridomarus. Early in the spring the consuls passed the Po, and opened the campaign with the siege of Acerra, a place near that river. Hereupon the Gauls, who were now ninety thousand strong, in order to make a diversion, and oblige the Romans to raise the siege they had undertaken, passed the Po, and entering the Roman territories, invested Calcidium, a city placed by Plutarch in Cisalpine Gaul, but by Livy in Liguria Montana. Upon the news of this motion of the enemy, Marcellus, with two thirds of the cavalry, and about six hundred of the light-armed infantry, hastened to the relief of the place. The Gauls, receiving intelligence of his approach, raised the siege, and marched in order of battle to meet him. Marcellus drew up his small army with great skill, and advanced leisurely in order of battle against the enemy. When the two armies drew near each other, Viridomarus advanced before his troops, and challenged the Roman general to a single combat. Marcellus readily accepted the challenge; so that both parties, leaving the field free for the champions, retired to wait for the issue of the combat. Marcellus, rushing upon the enemy full speed, pierced his breast-plate with his lance, and gave him a deep wound. Then spurring his horse with great violence against that of his adversary, he made him recoil, rear, and throw his rider, whom he soon dispatched with repeated blows. The Gasatae being disheartened by the death of their leader, the Romans charged them with great fury, and put them to flight. Thus a handful of Romans defeated a numerous army of Gauls, and obliged them to shelter themselves in the woods and forests of their own country ^b.

DURING the absence of Marcellus, Acerra had been taken by his colleague, who from thence had marched to invest Mediolanum, the largest, richest and most populous city of Insubria; but he was himself more closely besieged by the Gauls, than Mediolanum was by him. But, upon the arrival of Marcellus, the scene changed; the Gasatae retired with precipitation, repassed the Alps, and left the inhabitants of Mediolanum to the mercy of the conquerors. The city immediately surrendered at discretion, as did also Comum, another city of great importance. Thus all Italy, from the Alps to the Ionian sea, became intirely Roman. Insubria and Liguria were now made one province, and called Cisalpine Gaul, which was governed by a prætor sent annually from Rome. In order to keep the conquered Gauls from revolting, two Roman colonies were settled at Cremona and Placentia, on the opposite banks of the Po ^c.

Insubria and Liguria made a Roman province.

Marcellus was decreed at Rome an extraordinary triumph, for having conquered, as the decree was worded, the Insubres and the Germans ^d. And this is the first time we find the Germans mentioned in the history of Rome. Polybius indeed places the Gasatae on the banks of the Rhone; but other writers tell us, that they inhabited the countries bordering on the Rhine. Marcellus, in his triumphal procession, carried on his shoulders the rich armour and spoils of Viridomarus, and dedicated the third and last opima spolia to Jupiter Feretrius, single combats between generals growing out of use after this time. Part of the rich spoils taken on this occasion was sent to good king Hiero, who was yet living, and a gold cup made out of them to the temple of Apollo at Delpbos. As for Cornelius, he did not receive the honours of a triumph, but was continued in the new province in quality of proconsul to regulate affairs there.

The third opima spolia.

Istria conquered.

THE new consuls, M. Minucius Rufus and P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, were ordered to make war upon the Istrians for having taken some Roman ships. All Istria was reduced in one year's time, tho' some writers tell us, that the reduction of it cost the conquerors a great deal of blood ^e.

Asdrubal succeeded by Hannibal.

DURING the present consulate, news was brought to Rome of the death of Asdrubal in Spain; which gave the Romans great concern, because he had been ever faithful to his treaties, and the republic thought she had much more to fear from the bold and enterprising genius of young Hannibal, who was appointed to succeed him, though at that time not above twenty-six years of age. And indeed the first expedition of this young warrior confirmed the Romans in their fears. In his first campaign he made war a upon the Olcades, a people bordering on the Iberus, and gave reason to believe, that he would soon pass that river, contrary to the treaty. Albæa, and several other cities in that neighbourhood, submitted to him; however, as Rome had yet no reason to declare herself his enemy, she turned her arms another way. Demetrius of Pharos, on whom the republic had heaped many favours, seeing the government of Illyricum lodged in his hands, and the Romans engaged in a troublesome war with the Gauls, had despised their orders; and acting not as regent, but as king of Illyricum, had obliged the Atintanos to renounce their alliance with Rome, and come into his measures; nay, he even ventured, contrary to the treaty, to send fifty ships of war beyond the Lyffes, to pillage the Cyclades. Complaints being brought to Rome from all parts, the new consuls, L. Velurius Philo and C. Lutatius, would have immediately set sail for Illyricum, if they had not been obliged to abdicate, upon some defect found in their election. They were succeeded by M. Æmilius Lepidus and M. Valerius Lavinius; but the year being too far advanced to begin the expedition, it was postponed to the next consulship. This year ended with a census, by which the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms appeared to be two hundred seventy thousand two hundred and thirteen. At the time of the census, all the libertini or freed-men, who lived dispersed among all the tribes, and occasioned great disturbances in the city, were confined to four tribes, viz. the Esquilina, the Palatina, the Suburrana, and the Collina ^f.

b AND now both consuls, M. Livius Salinator and L. Æmilius Paulus, imbarqued for Illyricum, and opened the campaign with the siege of Dimalum, a city of importance in that country, which Demetrius had fortified with so many works, that it was deemed impregnable. However, the Romans, by surprising efforts, took this formidable bulwark, by which the regent pretended to screen himself from the vengeance of Rome, in the space of seven days. Their next attempt was upon Pharos, an island in the Adriatic sea, and the birth-place of Demetrius. Here he had assembled the flower of his troops, looking upon this island and city as his last refuge. As the Roman fleet had two consular armies on board, one was landed in the night, with orders to conceal themselves in the forests, and behind the rocks, till the signal was given. Then the fleet appeared off Pharos in open day, as it were to land some forces. Hereupon Demetrius marched out of the town at the head of his troops, to prevent the descent; and then the legionaries, leaving their ambush, marched silently, and seized an eminence between the city and the port. Demetrius endeavoured to dislodge them; but, in the mean time, the Romans on board the squadron having made their descent, the Illyrians were invested on all sides, and soon dispersed. Demetrius made his escape to Macedon on board a vessel he had kept ready for that purpose. The city of Pharos was taken, plundered and razed; so that Rome was now the second time mistress of Illyricum, which however she did not reduce to the form of a province, having some compassion for the young king Pinaus, who had been brought into these troubles merely by the fault of his guardians ^g. The consuls, on their return to Rome, were accused before the tribes of having applied to their own use great part of the spoils taken from the enemy, and of distributing the rest partially among the soldiers. Æmilius indeed was acquitted; but his colleague Salinator was condemned by all the tribes, except the tribe Mæcia; an affront which he could not brook, and therefore appeared no more in public, but retired to a house he had in the country, and there led a solitary life, till the calamities of his country brought him upon the stage again. When he was afterwards censor, he deprived all the tribes, except the tribe Mæcia, of the right of suffrage, and all the privileges of Roman citizens. To such a height did he carry his resentment ^h. In this consulship, one Archagathus of Peloponnesus introduced the art of surgery into Rome. Till his time every one had their family receipts, as Pliny calls them ⁱ, conveyed down to him by tradition; but the Peloponnesian cured all sorts of wounds in a regular way; on which account he was honoured with the right of citizenship, and had a house built for him at the expence of the public; but as he used to make large incisions in order to cure wounds with more certainty, the Romans gave him the name of Butcher, which soon brought his profession into disrepute ^k.

mander had defeated them by his superior skill in war, and obliged them to submit to the yoke. Elated with this success, he advanced, at the head of his army, into the territory of Saguntum, and, contrary to the late treaty between Rome and Car- thage, laid siege to that city. Hereupon the Roman senate dispatched two embassa-dors, P. Valerius Flaccus and Q. Bebius Tanphilus, to Hannibal, with orders to proceed to Carthage, in case the Carthaginian general refused to comply with their request.
They were scarce landed, when Hannibal, who was carrying on the siege with great vigour, sent them word, that he had something else to do than to give audience to embassadors; however, he admitted them at last, and, in answer to their remonstrances, told them, that the Saguntines had drawn their misfortunes on themselves, by committing hostilities against the allies of Carthage; and at the same time desired the deputies, if they had any complaints to make of him, to carry them to the senate of Carthage. However, the artful Carthaginian immediately dispatched to Carthage some friends, in whom he could confide, to give the senate favourable prepossessions with relation to his enterprize upon Saguntum. He then returned to the attack of that city, which he had interrupted for some days, in order to refresh his troops.
The Saguntines defended themselves for the space of six months with surprising bravery; and when they could hold out no longer, they first burnt all their richest effects, and then shutting themselves up in their houses, set fire to them, and perished with their wives and children in the flames ¹.

Roman em-bassadors sent to Carthage.

IN the mean the Roman ambassadors arriving at Carthage, found the senate there divided into two factions; the Barcan, of which Hamilcar Barca, the father of Han- nibal, had been the head, and that of Hanno, which consisted of the oldest senators, and wisest men in the republic. The ambassadors, after having complained to the senate of Hannibal's haughtiness and unjust violences, demanded, that he should be delivered up to the Romans, to be punished according to his deserts; and at the same time declared, that Rome would look on the refusal of so just a demand, as a public approbation of the infraction of the treaty, and the destruction of Saguntum. This demand had the air of authority, which was very shocking, especially in times of prosperity. It seemed both cruel and shameful for the Carthaginians to deliver up to his implacable enemies a young conqueror, who was the glory and hopes of his nation. However, Hanno, in a warm speech, pressed the senate to give the Romans the satisfaction they required; but the Barcan faction opposed this motion, and, being more numerous, prevailed. A commissioner, expert in negotiations, was appointed to discuss the affair with the Roman ambassadors, and to answer their complaints; but, after several conferences, in which the African negotiator used all the chicanery and evasions possible to colour the proceedings of Hannibal, the ambassadors renewed their demand before the senate, and, to cut off endless disputes, the chief of the ambassadors, having made two folds in his robe, said, addressing himself to the senate, On one side is peace, on the other war; chuse which you please. The president of the assembly answered, We will chuse neither; give us which you please. Take war then, replied the ambassador. At which words the Barcan faction cried out with joy, War, war; a fatal declaration, which brought both nations to the brink of ruin.
If we consider only the last hostilities committed by Hannibal, his republic was certainly in the wrong; for they were a manifest infraction of the treaty with Asdrubal:
but, if we trace the matter higher, we shall find, that the Carthaginians were not to blame, the Romans having obliged them, by their haughty behaviour, their repeated extortions, and their unjust invasions of Corfica and Sardinia, to take up arms in their own defence.

C H A P. VI.

The history of Rome, from the beginning to the end of the second Punic war.

- a THE new consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longus, had scarce entered upon their office, when the ambassadors sent first to Hannibal, and then to Carthage, returned to Rome. The account they gave of their embassy, and the news of the destruction of Saguntum, left the senate no room to deliberate about war or peace. The former was now unavoidable, and even declared by their ambassadors, pursuant to the instructions they had received before they left Rome. The consuls were therefore ordered to draw lots for their respective provinces. Africa fell to Sempronius, and Spain to Cornelius Scipio. The former was directed to pass over into Sicily, assemble all the troops in that island, and sail from thence to Africa, and begin hostilities there. Cornelius, on the other hand, was commanded to go into Spain, and use all possible means to prevent Hannibal from entering Italy. Extraordinary levies were made all over Italy. Six legions were raised, amounting to twenty-four thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse; and among the several nations in Italy subject to the republic, four thousand horse more, and forty-four thousand foot. As for the fleet, Rome equipped two hundred and twenty quinqueremes, and twenty other light vessels. Two legions, consisting each of four thousand foot, and three hundred horse, with fourteen thousand foot, and one thousand horse of the allies, were put under the command of Cornelius Scipio, who was to transport them on board a fleet of sixty quinqueremes to Transalpine Gaul. Two legions, with fourteen thousand foot, and sixteen hundred horse of the allies were left in Italy, under the command of the prætor L. Manlius, to keep Cisalpine Gaul in awe. As for the consul Sempronius, who was designed for Africa, his army consisted of two legions, sixteen thousand foot of the allies, and eighteen hundred horse. These troops were put on board a fleet of a hundred and sixty galleys, and twenty light vessels. Before the arrival of Sempronius in Sicily, the Carthaginians had sent out a squadron of twenty sail to plunder the coasts of Italy; but these ships being dispersed by a storm, king Hiero, who happened to be then at Messana with his fleet, had detached part of it, and taken some of them. The prisoners informed him, that Carthage had equipped another squadron of thirty-five galleys, with a design to surprize Lilybæum. This intelligence the king immediately communicated to Æmilius prætor of Sicily, who, without loss of time, sailed with his small squadron to join the Syracusan fleet, in order to defend the threatened city. The Carthaginians finding, upon their arrival, both fleets riding at anchor before the mouth of the harbour, did not attempt to enter it, but keeping at some distance, drew up in line of battle. The Romans and Syracusans accepted the challenge; so that an engagement ensued, in which the Carthaginians were defeated, with the loss of seven ships. Seventeen hundred of their men were taken prisoners, and a great many killed in the action. The Romans did not lose one single galley, and had but a very small number of men killed. The king, on his return to Messana, finding Sempronius arrived there, went immediately on board the consul's ship, embraced him tenderly, and assured him, that he should continue the same affection for Rome in his old age, which he had always shewn her in his youth; nor was this all, he clothed the legionaries and the crews of the Roman ships at his own expence, supplied the whole army with corn, and then set sail with the consul for Lilybæum, where they parted with regret ^m.

Sempronius, from Lilybæum, steered his course to the island of Melita, situated between Sicily and Africa; and he no sooner appeared before it, than one Hamilcar, the Carthaginian governor, surrendered up to him the island, the city and the garison. But in the mean time the Carthaginians having made a descent on the coasts of Italy, Sempronius was preparing to drive them from thence, when news was brought him, that Hannibal had passed the Alps, and at the same time an order from the senate to return in all haste to Italy. Leaving therefore the prætor Æmilius in Sicily, with a sufficient number of troops and ships to defend the island, he went on board his a fleet, and entered the Adriatic sea, with a design to land at Ariminum.

Hannibal, being authorized by the senate of Carthage to act against the Romans as he thought fit, resolved not to wait for their coming to attack him in Spain, but to carry the war into the very heart of their dominions. With this view he had made it his whole business, during the winter, to settle affairs in Spain. He appointed his brother Asdrubal governor of that country in his absence; and in order to put him in a condition to oppose any descents there, he left him fifty quinqueremes, four quadriremes, and five triremes. As to the land-forces, he did not leave his brother to the mercy of the Spaniards, but transported thirteen thousand eight hundred and fifty foot, and one thousand two hundred horse of the Spanish troops into Africa, and b brought fifteen thousand Africans into Spain. By this exchange he wisely provided for the security of both countries. After these prudent regulations, he waited only for the answers of the Italic Gauls, to whom he had sent his emissaries, soliciting them to shake off the Roman yoke. He no sooner received assurances of their earnest desire to see him in Italy, than he applied himself wholly to the preparations for his march. He began by putting himself under the protection of Hercules, who was worshipped at Gades, whither he took a journey to offer sacrifices and vows to that god. Then he assembled his troops, harangued them, and, upon a muster, found, that they amounted to ninety thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. However, by the desertion of some of his troops, by his dismissing others, and by the several detach- c ments he made for the security of the new conquered provinces, his army, when he crossed the Pyrenees, consisted only of fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse. With these troops, having passed the Pyrenees without opposition, he arrived at Illi-beris, a city of Gallia Narbonensis on the coast of the Mediterranean, which he had appointed for the place of the general rendezvous.

for Italy.*

In the mean time the Boii, receiving intelligence that Hannibal was set out on his march to Italy, began to act as if he had already crossed the Alps. They bore an implacable hatred to the Romans, and therefore impatient to wait till the arrival of the Carthaginians, they openly revolted, and being joined by the Insubres, fell upon the two new colonies of Placentia and Cremona. The inhabitants, who were but just d come, fled for refuge to Mutina, an old Roman colony, whither the rebels pursued them, with a design to besiege the place; but as they were not skilled in taking cities, they had recourse to treachery, drew the three leaders of the colony, who were men of distinction, out of the place, under pretence of a conference, and then seized them, with a design to exchange them for the hostages they had formerly left in the hands of the Romans. This roused the prætor Manlius, who had been left by Cornelius Scipio with two legions, to keep Cisalpine Gaul in subjection. He immediately led one of them to the relief of Mutina; but as the country, through which he marched, was covered with forests, the Gauls, who were acquainted with all the roads, sur- e prized him, and cut most of his legionaries in pieces, the prætor himself escaping with great difficulty to an eminence, whence he retired to Tanetum, a city on the banks of the Nicia, where he was immediately invested by the enemy. However, upon the approach of the prætor Lucius Attilius, at the head of the other legion, and five thousand auxiliaries, they raised the sieges both of Tanetum and Mutina, and dispersed e.

The Boii revolt

In the mean time the consul Cornelius Scipio, having sailed from Pisa, and kept along the coast of Liguria, had landed his troops at that mouth of the Rhone, which is nearest Masilia. His design was to wait there for Hannibal, and give him battle before he attempted to cross the Alps. He had indeed received notice of Hannibal's having passed the Pyrenees; but could not imagine that he was near, considering the vast countries, and the many Gaulish nations, through which he was to pass. He therefore encamped on an island formed by the Rhone, which the ancients call Camaria, and the moderns La Camarque, and remained there a few days to refresh his troops after the fatigues of the sea. But Hannibal, more expeditious than Scipio imagined, having surmounted all difficulties, was actually encamped on the banks of the Rhone, and contriving means to pass that rapid stream. The Gauls on his side the river favoured him through fear; but those on the other side, jealous of so powerful an army, prepared to oppose his passage with all their might. Scipio knew nothing f

• LIV. ibid. POLYB. l. iii. c. 35.

- a of this ; otherwise, by joining the Gauls, who were determined to dispute his passage, he would, in all likelihood, have made the Rhone the boundary of Hannibal's expedition ; but, in this great crisis, Hannibal's fortune was equal to his valour. On the other hand, the Carthaginian suspecting that a consular army was not far off, and being therefore obliged without delay to pass the river, which was no-where fordable, in sight of the enemy, he had recourse to stratagem. He detached part of his army, under the command of Hanno the son of Bomilcar, with orders to march up along the river, cross it out of sight of the enemy's camp, and, by taking a tour, to get behind them, and lie in ambush. Hanno having executed his commission, and given the signal agreed on, Hannibal prepared to pass the river with that part of the army ^{Hannibal crosses the Rhone.} which remained with him. He ordered his cavalry to embark on the greater vessels, and his foot on canoes, made only of hollowed trees. He directed those who governed the greater vessels to keep their bow upon the stream, thereby to check the current of the river, and cover the others from danger. The horses were not embarked, but swam after the small boats, one man holding three or four by the bridle on each side the boat. While they were thus contending against the violence of the stream, and animating each other, the enemy waited for them on the opposite bank, and, with their cries and howlings, gave them to understand, that they were ready to receive them ; but in the mean time Hanno's detachment attacking them in the rear, they were seized with such a panic, that they immediately betook themselves to flight, and dispersed, every one making the best of his way to his own village ^p.

- c In the mean time news being brought to Scipio, that the enemy was already encamped on the banks of the Rhone, he did not at first believe it, it seeming to him incredible that they should be able to perform so long a march in so short a time. However, in order to get such intelligence as he might rely on, he commanded out three hundred chosen horse to reconnoitre. These fell in with a party of five hundred Numidian horse, sent out by Hannibal for the same purpose ; whereupon a sharp action ensued, in which the Numidians lost two hundred men, and the Romans a hundred and sixty. The Numidians were put to flight ; and this advantage, how inconsiderable soever, was looked upon by the Romans, who laid great stress upon presages, as a happy omen for the rest of the war. However, it did not discourage Hannibal, who, upon certain information that the consular army was not far off, was for some time in doubt, whether he should attack the Romans, or march strait for Italy ; but the deputies from the Cisalpine Gauls, the chief of whom was one Magalus or Mægilus, determined him, by their advice, to lead his army over the mountains intire, and not run the hazard of weakening it by a disaster. They made Hannibal rich presents, tendered him their service, and took upon them to be his guides over the Alps. The Carthaginian therefore, to avoid Scipio, marched up the river, and encamped at the conflux of the Rhodanus and the Araris, or the Rhone and the Saone. Here Hannibal found two brothers disputing for the dominion of the country, and their armies drawn up ready to engage. At the request of the elder brother Hannibal joined him against the younger, whom he drove out of the country. The conqueror immediately expressed his gratitude, by furnishing the Carthaginians with clothes, which they greatly wanted, most of them being half-naked and bare-foot, and supplying them with what was necessary to guard them against the snow and ice of the Alps. Nor was this all ; as the Carthaginians were afraid of being attacked by the Gauls dispersed about those unknown countries, the king guarded them in person, and conducted them safe to the foot of the mountains, which they reached after ten days march ^q.

- f AND here a historian is as much at a loss what rout to take as Hannibal himself was, the ancients having left us in great darkness as to the exact place where the Carthaginian general passed the mountains. Some of the moderns point out one place, and some another ; but as they may be all, for aught we know, equally mistaken, we shall follow Hannibal through the immense difficulties he met with in this his famous passage, without pretending to ascertain the precise place, where he attempted, and happily accomplished so bold an undertaking. As soon as the king we have mentioned above left the Carthaginian army, Hannibal ordered his troops to begin their march up the mountains ; and then the petty kings of the country, assembling their troops in great numbers, possessed themselves of the eminencies, over which the ^{Hannibal passes the Alps.}

Carthaginians must necessarily pass. And indeed, had they concealed themselves a longer, the Carthaginian army would have been in great danger ; but, by appearing openly, they lessened their advantage, and tho' they killed great numbers of the enemy, they lost an equal number of their own men. However, they continued harassing the Carthaginians, and were no sooner driven from one eminence, than they seized another, disputing every inch of ground with the enemy, and destroying great numbers of them by the advantage they had of the ground. Hereupon Hannibal made his army halt, and take up their quarters that night among the rocks. In the mean time being informed by the Gauls, who served him as guides, that the barbarians kept guard in those places only in the day-time, and in the night retired to a village not far off, he decamped in broad day, and moving slowly, drew near the post which the mountaineers possessed in the evening, as if he designed to pass the night there ; but as soon as it was dark, and the enemy were, according to their custom, retired, he put himself at the head of a detachment of chosen men, and gained one of the eminences. When day discovered to the enemy what had passed, they resolved to attack the Carthaginians from the other eminences, which commanded the narrow, stony and broken way through which they marched. Accordingly leaping from rock to rock with the agility of hinds, they fell upon them from all quarters at once. The Carthaginians lost in this unforeseen attack an incredible number of horses and beasts of burden ; for the way being narrow and broken, the beasts of burden were easily thrown down : but the horses that were wounded gave them most trouble ; for falling in so narrow and crowded a way, they threw down others by striving to recover their feet, and by that means occasioned a general confusion. Hannibal observing this, immediately left the post he had taken, and falling on the enemy from the higher ground, killed most of them on the spot, and dispersed the rest. Having escaped this danger, he marched himself at the head of a strong detachment against the town, which had harboured the enemy, and finding it deserted, took it without opposition. Here he found the prisoners, horses and beasts of burden, which had fallen into the enemy's hands, and besides, cattle and corn sufficient to support the army for three days. In this town Hannibal remained a day to rest and refresh his troops, and then pursued his march for three days together, without the least molestation or alarm ; but the fourth day he fell into a greater danger than that he had lately escaped. Other mountaineers, who inhabited the towns on the way he was to pass, met him with olive branches, and garlands of flowers, symbols of peace and friendship, and tendered him their service. Hannibal, thinking it equally dangerous to trust or distrust them, endeavoured, by several questions, to sound their design. They told him, that his having defeated those who opposed him, and taken their town, had prompted them to come and implore his protection ; and that as to themselves, they were resolved to do him no injury, nor suffer any to be done him by others. Hannibal at first only pretended to trust them for fear of disobliging them ; but after they had supplied his army with provisions, and conversed with all manner of freedom and confidence with his soldiers, he began to entertain a better opinion of their sincerity, and even put so much confidence in them, as to accept their tenders of serving him as guides. However, as he still retained a secret doubt of their sincerity, he placed his elephants and horse in the van, and his choicest foot in the rear. And this precaution preserved his army from being intirely destroyed ; for these faithless guides having led the army into a valley, surrounded with rocks and steep hills, all on a sudden faced about, and fell upon them in front, while their countrymen, who lay concealed among the rocks, attacked their rear ; but the elephants stopped the fury of the one, and the infantry stood their ground against the other. Nevertheless the Carthaginians suffered no small loss both of men and horses on this occasion ; for the enemy rolling down huge stones from the upper ground, killed a great number of them. The consternation was so great in Hannibal's army, that he himself was obliged to stop, and take up his quarters that night on the top of an eminence, exposed to the open air, with that part of the army which was with him, remote from the baggage and the rest of the troops, who had much ado to compass their passage through the valley before day-break. In the morning, the enemy being now retired, Hannibal joined his army and baggage, and continued his march. After this the Gauls appeared only in small bodies, falling sometimes on the van, and sometimes on the rear of the army, and seldom failing to carry off part of the baggage. At length, after many fatigues and losses, Hannibal arrived at the top of the mountains, a tains, nine days after he had begun to ascend them. There he encamped, and halted two days, to give his weary troops some repose, and to wait for the stragglers. During this stay, he saw with pleasure many horses arrive, which he thought lost, and some of his men, who had not been able to keep up with the army. As the snow was lately fallen in great plenty on the tops of those high mountains, and covered the ground, this sight terrified the Africans and Spaniards, who were much affected with the cold. In order therefore to encourage them, and inspire them with new resolution against the sufferings that yet threatened them, the Cartaginian general led them to the top of the highest rock on the side of Italy, and thence gave them a view of the large and fruitful plains of Insubria, acquainting them, that the Gauls, whose coun-

b trie they saw, were ready to join them. He also pointed out to them the place whereabout Rome stood, telling them, that, by climbing the Alps, they had scaled the walls of that rich metropolis. Having thus animated his harassed troops, after two days rest he decamped, and began to descend the mountains^r.

THE difficulties they met with in going down, were equal to those they had found in the ascent. They had indeed no enemy to contend with, saving some scattered parties, that came rather to steal than to fight; but the deep snows, mountains of ice, craggy rocks, and frightful precipices, proved more terrible than any enemy. However, the troops now inured to the greatest hardships, were proof against all difficulties, and went through them with cheerfulness. After they had for some days
c marched through narrow, steep and slippery ways, they came at length to a place, which neither men, elephants nor horses could pass. The way, which lay between two precipices, was exceeding narrow, and the declivity, which was very steep of itself, was become more dangerous by the falling away of the earth. Here the guides stopped, and the whole army being terrified, Hannibal proposed at first to march round about, and attempt another way; but all places round him being covered with snow to a great depth, he found himself reduced to the necessity, either of turning back, and climbing up the mountains again, or getting down a place, which was almost perpendicular, and where a thin surface of fresh snow covered a hard and thick ice. However, the infantry began to descend; but their feet slipping, and there
d being nothing to catch hold of, they rolled down into the precipices, which were on either side this narrow passage, and were either crushed to pieces, or buried in the snow. Hereupon Hannibal, having ordered the snow to be removed, which covered all the ground, and the ice to be broke, encamped at the entrance of this pass, in order to deliberate on the proper method of surmounting the present difficulty. After he had well considered the nature of the place, he concluded, that the only means of getting over it was to cut a way into the rock itself, through which his men, horses and elephants might pass, without danger of falling into the precipices. This was a laborious piece of work; but the Numidians setting cheerfully about it, and frequently relieving one another, with unspeakable pains made, in one day, a way in the rock
e for the foot, and in three days more for the horse, and likewise for the elephants, which had suffered much, and were almost dead with hunger, the ground being in that part of the Alps covered with snow; so that no forage could be found. Some historians tell us, that the Numidians used vinegar to soften the rocks^s; but the silence of the most judicious writers as to this particular, is sufficient to justify our not giving credit to so idle a story. All they tell us is, that the Africans made use of fire, pick-axes, and other instruments of iron, for the accomplishing of so laborious an undertaking. Thus Hannibal, having spent nine days in climbing up the Alps, and six in f descending them, gained at length Insubria, and, notwithstanding his many disasters by the way, entered that country with all the boldness of a conqueror. In the account we have given of this so much celebrated passage of Hannibal over the Alps, we have chiefly followed Polybius, who advances nothing but what he learned from those who lived at that time, and who took himself a journey to the Alps for his better information^t.

Hannibal, upon his entering Insubria, reviewed his army, when he found, that of the fifty thousand foot, with which he had set out from New Carthage five months and fifteen days before, he had now but twelve thousand Cartaginians, and eight thousand Spaniards; and that his twelve thousand horse were reduced to six thousand. Some writers tell us, that Hannibal entered Italy at the head of forty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse; others make his troops amount to two hundred thousand ^a foot, and twenty thousand horse ^u. But the above-mentioned number was specified by Hannibal himself, and engraved, as Polybius informs us, on a column, which he erected near the Lacinian Promontory in Calabria ^w. Hannibal's first care, after he had entered Italy, was to refresh his troops, who, after so long a march, and so many inexpressible hardships, looked like so many skeletons raised from the dead, or savages born in a desert. However, he did not suffer them to languish long in idleness; but joining the Insubres, who were at war with the Taurinians, laid siege to Taurinum, the only city in the country, and made himself master of it in three days time, putting all who made resistance to the sword. This struck such terror into the neighbouring barbarians, that they all submitted to the conqueror, and supplied his army with all sorts of provisions ^x.

BUT to return to Scipio, whom we left encamped on the island of Camaria: When that general understood, upon the return of the party he had sent out, that Hannibal was arrived at the banks of the Rhone, he immediately decamped, and marched up the river, with a design to give him battle; but finding that the Carthaginian had crossed the river three days before, and was pursuing his march over the Alps into Italy, he marched back to his fleet with all possible expedition; and having dispatched his brother Cneius Scipio with the best part of his troops to carry on the war in Spain against Asdrubal, he imbarqued the rest, with a design to return to Italy by sea, and meet Hannibal on his descending the Alps. He soon arrived at Pisa, and from thence ^c crossing Ettruria, joined that army, which the consul Manlius had so unfortunately led against the Boii. With this, and the few troops he had with him, he passed the Po, and encamped on the banks of the Ticinus, which discharges itself into that river. Hannibal was greatly surprized, when he understood, that Scipio, whom he had left on the banks of the Rhone, was already returned from Gaul to Italy, had crossed Ettruria, passed the Po, and was ready to receive him. On the other hand, Scipio was no less struck with admiration at Hannibal's expedition in crossing the Alps, through ways which he deemed impassable. This reciprocal respect, which the two generals had for each other, increased their emulation, and inspired them with an eager desire of entering the lists together. ^d In the mean time the news of Hannibal's arrival in Italy at the head of a powerful army, of his taking Taurinum, and advancing to meet the consul Scipio, filled Rome with terror. The senate expected every hour the tidings of a battle, and the uncertainty of the success kept all men in suspense: and indeed the two armies were too near each other to defer entering upon action. Scipio encouraged his troops in an harangue well suited to the occasion; but Hannibal employed a new kind of eloquence, which made deep impressions on the minds of his Carthaginians. He had treated the prisoners he had taken on the Alps with the utmost rigour; so that they earnestly wished to put an end to their miseries with death. They were loaded night and day with heavy chains, starved almost to death, and daily beaten with rods in a most barbarous manner. Hannibal, from the time he took ^e them, designed them for the diversion with which he now entertained his troops; for he caused them to be brought out at the head of the army, which he assembled for that purpose, and asked them whether they were willing to engage each other in single combats, and fight till one of them was killed in sight of his troops? He ordered horses and rich habits and furniture to be produced at the same time, as rewards for the conquerors, and comforted the vanquished before-hand with the hopes of death, which would put an end to their insupportable miseries. There was not one of them, who did not, with great joy, consent to the proposal. Hereupon Hannibal ordered a certain number of them to be chosen by lot, in order to enter the lists two and two. Those on whom the lot fell leaped for joy, while the others broke out ^f into loud lamentations. While they fought, the rest of the prisoners looked on the conquered as no less fortunate than the conquerors, having by their death put a period to the miseries they endured. The constancy of those who died was more admired by the Carthaginian soldiers, than the valour and skill of the survivors. While their imaginations were warm with these objects, Hannibal told them, that their fate was like that of the captives, whose glorious deaths they had admired, and whose rewards they had envied; that Italy was a vast prison to them, having the enemy's country before them, and behind them the Alps; that they could not escape the miseries to a which hunger, thirst, nakedness and heavy chains would reduce them, unless they purchased liberty, necessities and life itself by their bravery; that since they could entertain no hopes of returning to their native countries by flight, they ought to have the same sentiments, which they had just before admired in the captives, since they were under the same necessity of conquering or dying; that, if they conquered, not fine horses only and rich furniture would be their lot, but all the wealth of the richest country and city in the world, &c.

b THE discourse of the general was applauded by the whole army, every man declaring that he was determined to conquer or die. With this disposition the army drew near the Ticinus, which Scipio had already passed. The next day the two armies came in sight of each other, when Scipio advanced at the head of the cavalry, with some companies of dart-men, to observe the enemy's motions and disposition. Hannibal marched out against him at the head of his Spanish and Numidian cavalry. As the leaders on both sides, and the troops they commanded, were eager to engage, they soon came to blows; but scarce had the Roman dart-men, whom Scipio had placed in the front, made their first discharge, when they retired into the spaces between their troops, through fear of being trod down by the horse. Hannibal's horse made but one large front, the Numidians in the two wings, and the Spaniards in the center. The onset began between the cavalry of the Gauls in the Roman army, and the Spanish horse in the Carthaginian. The former, supported by the dart-men, who were drawn up in the intervals between the squadrons, sustained the shock of the Spanish horse with great resolution; but in the mean time the Numidians, taking a compass, attacked the Romans in flank, and, after an obstinate and long dispute, obliged them to give ground. Hereupon the Gauls, who had hitherto fought with great bravery, retired likewise in some confusion. Scipio, at the head of a small body of horse, endeavoured to animate his men more by his example than by words, till he fell from his horse by a wound he received. Then the Romans, believing their general killed, betook themselves to a disorderly flight; and Scipio would have been left upon the place, had not his son, attended by a few Roman knights, in spite of all opposition, rescued him, and carried him back to the camp. Some say, that a Ligurian slave saved the consul; but most writers give this honour to young Scipio. Be that as it will, the latter tradition prevailed, perhaps from the inclination of the Romans to magnify the rising merit of one of the greatest heroes their republic ever produced.

He defends the

the banks of the

c Scipio, considering that the enemy was stronger in horse, and consequently that it would be dangerous to give them battle in the champaign country, abandoned his camp, repassed the Po, and retired to Placentia. Hannibal, on the other hand, staid some time in the field of battle, in expectation that the legions would appear; but when he understood, that the consul was decamped, he pursued him close as far as the bridge, over which he had passed the Ticinus; but finding it broke down, he took six hundred men, whom the Roman general had left to defend a small fort, and, without loss of time, marched up the Ticinus, till he came to the banks of the Po, which he crossed on a bridge of boats. He then divided his army into two bodies, giving the command of one to his brother Mago, with orders to pursue the enemy, while he himself remained in the neighbourhood of the Po, to receive the deputies of several Gaulish nations, whom his first advantage had brought over to him. They engaged to supply him with as many men, arms and provisions, as he should want. Encouraged by these offers, he marched forward, joined his brother, and took the road to Placentia, where the consul was encamped. Scipio, believing himself safe there, thought of nothing but curing his own and his soldiers wounds. He was therefore greatly surprized to see Hannibal advance within reach of his entrenchments, draw up his army, and offer him battle. Scipio, instead of accepting the challenge, fortified himself in his camp; and Hannibal, not thinking himself strong enough to force the enemy's lines, encamped ten miles from him.

d IN the mean time an unexpected event doubled the apprehensions of the Romans, and increased the confidence of the enemy. About two thousand foot, and two hundred horse of those Gauls, who served in the consul's army, about the fourth watch, when all was quiet in the Roman camp, entered the tents that were next to them, murdered the Romans while they were asleep, and cutting off their heads, made their escape to Hannibal, who, by the kind reception he gave them, shewed how acceptable that black and treacherous action was to him. He invited them with great promises into his service; but gave them leave for the present to retire to their respective habitations, thereby to spread the fame of this action, and win over their countrymen to the service of the Carthaginians. At the same time ambassadors came to him from the Bon, bringing with them the three commissioners of the two Roman colonies, whom they had formerly taken by treachery. Hannibal received the deputies with great demonstrations of kindness; but left the three illustrious captives in their hands, advising them to make use of them, as they had formerly proposed, to redeem their hostages^a.

IN the mean time Scipio, not doubting but the Gauls, after their countrymen had acted so criminal a part, would all declare for the enemy, resolved to leave his camp at Placentia, where he was surrounded on all sides by Gaulish nations, and to seek some safer post, where his troops would not be so much intimidated by suspected neighbours. Accordingly he decamped about the fourth watch of the following night, and passing the Trebia, a small river which falls into the Po, posted himself on an eminence near that river, in the neighbourhood of many of the allies of the Roman people. Hannibal, upon intelligence of the consul's march, detached his Numidian horse in pursuit of him, while he himself followed with the main body of the army. The Numidians, finding the Roman camp empty, staid to set fire to it; and this delay gave the Romans time to pass the plains, where the cavalry might have made a great slaughter of them, and gain the eminences on the other side the river. Scipio intrenched himself in his new post, resolved not to leave it till his wound was cured, and his colleague Sempronius, whom he impatiently expected from Sicily, was arrived with another consular army. Hannibal, that he might not lose sight of the enemy, came and encamped within five miles of them, on the other side the Trebia. Hither great numbers of Gauls flocked to him from all parts, insomuch that provisions grew scarce in his camp; but he soon supplied this want, by bribing one Dafius, a Brundusian, governor of Clastidium, where the Romans had fixed their magazines of arms and provisions, to deliver up the place to him; by which means he transferred the scarcity from his own camp to that of the Romans^b.

WHEN news was brought to Rome of the battle of the horse, and the issue of that engagement, the senate was greatly surprized, as expecting quite different success. Some blamed Scipio, others imputed that misfortune to the perfidiousness of the Gauls, who, by their desertion, had given a plain proof of their treachery and hatred to the Romans; but after all, as the legions were intire, they took courage, not doubting but that fine body of foot would be able to stop the progress of the conqueror. Their confidence was heightened by the joyful tidings of the arrival of the consul Sempronius at Ariminum, after a voyage of forty days from Sicily to that place. He immediately set out on his march, and in a few days joined his colleague on the banks of the Trebia. After he had refreshed his troops, and informed himself of the circumstances of the engagement upon the Ticinus, the strength of the enemy, and the character of their leader, impatient to enter upon action, he detached all his cavalry, contrary to the opinion of his colleague, with orders to pass the Trebia, and attack a party of Numidian and Gaulish horse, which Hannibal had sent out to lay waste the lands of those Gauls, who yet adhered to the Romans. The trivial advantage he gained on this occasion made him resolve to hazard a general engagement. Scipio, whose wound, grown worse by his removing from one camp to another, confined him to his bed, did all that lay in his power to divert his colleague from so dangerous a design. Among other things he told him, that as soon as his strength would allow him to act, he had an enterprize to put in execution, which, he was confident, would much redound to the service of his country; but this, instead of diverting Sempronius from his first design, made him more eager to engage the enemy, before Scipio could appear in the field, and share with him the glory of the victory; nay, because that prudent commander would not by any means approve of his ill-timed eagerness for an engagement, he told him, That his mind was more affected than his body, and that his wound gave him an aversion to battles. Thus Sempronius, blinded with ambition, and pleased with the hopes of a complete victory, without Scipio's sharing in the honour of it, resolved to come to a pitched battle with the Carthaginians. In the mean time Hannibal, having learned the consul's design by some spies, whom he sent into

- a the Roman camp, detached the following night his brother Mago, with two thousand chosen men, half horse and half foot, ordering them to conceal themselves under the banks of a winding rivulet, which watered a neighbouring plain, and wait there, till they should receive orders to quit their ambuscade. Early next morning the Carthaginian commanded a strong detachment of Numidian horse to march out, insult the enemy in their camp, and then retiring slowly before the Roman cavalry, who, he did not doubt, would keep close at their heels, to pass the Trebia, and enter the plain. The Numidians, pursuant to their orders, advanced to the consul's intrenchments, as if they intended to brave the Romans; which Sempronius not being able to bear, he first sent out his cavalry against them, then his dart-men, and lastly marched b out himself at the head of all his legionaries. The Romans had not yet taken any nourishment, and besides the day was very cold and snowy, and the nearer they drew to the river, the more sharp the wind blew; however, such was the eagerness of the consul to come up with the enemy, who had just passed the river on horseback, that he commanded the Roman infantry to leap into the water, which they did without hesitation, tho' it reached to their waists. When they came out of the river, they found themselves so chilled and benumbed with cold, that they could not handle their arms; and besides, as the day was far advanced before they all got over, they began to be pinched with hunger, for they had not yet taken any food; while, on the other hand, the Carthaginians had refreshed themselves with a plentiful repast, and anointed c their bodies to arm themselves against the cold ^b.

- THE Romans no sooner appeared in the plain, than Hannibal drew up his army in battalia. He placed eight thousand Spaniards, most of them of the Balearic islands, armed with slings, in the advanced guard. These were followed by twenty thousand foot, Gauls, Spaniards and Africans, all drawn up in one line, to make the larger front. His cavalry, to the number of ten thousand, most of them Gauls, were posted in the two wings; and, at the two extremities of the main body, were ranged the elephants, to cover the flanks of the army. Sempronius's troops consisted of sixteen thousand legionaries, twenty thousand auxiliary forces, a handful of Canomani, the only Gauls who continued faithful to the Romans, and four thousand Roman horse. The consul
d drew up his men in the usual order, keeping the triarii for a body of reserve, and posting his cavalry in the wings. The two armies being thus drawn up, Hannibal, to keep his men warm, ordered them to march briskly against the enemy, who were waiting for them, and starving with cold in the plain. However, at their approach, the Romans gave a great shout, the trumpets sounded, and the attack began. The light-armed infantry on both sides made their discharges, the Balears throwing stones with their slings, and the Romans their little javelins; but this way of fighting did not last long, the Romans retiring within the spaces in their lines, and the Balears to the wings of their army. Hereupon the main bodies of the two armies advanced, the cavalry moving with the lines they flanked; but the Roman horse, being just returned from pursuing the Numidians, being already much fatigued, were soon put to flight
e by the Gaulish cavalry. Hereupon the flanks of the consular army being exposed and left naked, the Numidians fell upon them with great fury, and put them in confusion. Then Hannibal ordered his elephants to advance, which increased the disorder of the Roman army; but nevertheless the legionaries in the second and third lines still kept their ground, and fought with incredible bravery, till the Numidians, under the conduct of Mago, rising out of their ambuscade, attacked with great shouts their rear. Then the brave legionaries, finding themselves surrounded on all sides, fought like men in despair, and being headed by Sempronius, who was a man of great personal courage, cut their way through the battalions of the Gauls and Africans, who opposed f them, strewed the ground with their dead bodies, and, in spite of all opposition, retired in good order, to the number of ten thousand, to Placentia, their return to the camp being obstructed by the Trebia, and the victorious cavalry of the enemy, who, scouring the plain, cut all in pieces they met with. The allies in the two wings endeavoured to regain their camp; but some of them were drowned in the river, others killed by the enemy, while they were attempting to pass it, and most of them trod down by the horse and elephants; so that the rout was general, and the slaughter great. A small body only of foot, and a party of horse, besides the ten thousand legionaries, made their escape, the enemy not being able, on account of the excessive cold, to pursue them beyond the river. Scipio, who continued indisposed in his tent, ^a no sooner received the sad tidings of this defeat, than he decamped, and joined his colleague at Placentia ^c.

Sempronius, to prevent a consternation at Rome, sent dispatches thither, acquainting the senate, that he had engaged the Carthaginian army; but that the severity of the season, and the coldness of the weather, had snatched the victory out of his hands. This the Romans were at first willing to believe: but when they understood, that Hannibal was master of the consul's camp; that all the nations of the Gauls declared for him; that the Roman forces were all fled to the neighbouring colonies for refuge; and that the army had no provisions, but what were conveyed to them by water up the Po, the city was filled with terror, every one taking it for granted, that the conqueror would soon appear at their gates. But, notwithstanding this consternation, intrigue had a greater share in the election of new consuls, than a due regard for the wants of the state. As both the consuls were absent, the senate had already passed a decree for the nominating a dictator to preside in the comitia, when, to their great surprize, Sempronius arrived. Rashness had been always his character; and on this occasion it succeeded: for tho' the roads between Placentia and Rome were much infested by Gauls and Africans dispersed all over the country, yet Sempronius, without either disguise or guard, ventured to cross those countries, and got safe to Rome, where he presided in the comitia, when the famous C. Flaminius was chosen, a man without either morals or religion, and who had six years before signalized his consulship, by disobeying the orders of the republic, commanding him to abdicate, and by an open contempt of the gods and auspices; but he had joined the tribunes of the people in promoting a law, which confined commerce to the plebeians (K), and therefore was by them raised to the consulate the second time. The colleague appointed him was P. Servilius Geminus, a man of great integrity, but of moderate abilities in war. It fell by lot to Flaminius to oppose Hannibal, and to the other to command an army in Cisalpine Gaul. In the same comitia P. Cornelius Scipio, whose wound was not yet cured, was appointed to go into Spain in quality of proconsul, whither he had sent his brother Cn. Scipio to carry on the war against Asdrubal. The elections being over, and the consulship of Sempronius not yet expired, he returned to Placentia, ^d where he had taken up his quarters. As for Hannibal, he did not continue idle, notwithstanding the inconveniencies of the season, but made two attempts on two different places belonging to the Romans. The first was on a village on the banks of the Po, which the Romans had fortified, and made their magazine of corn; but Sempronius, who was very good at these sudden expeditions, hearing from Placentia the shouts of the garison, hastened with all his cavalry to their relief, and obliged Hannibal, who was wounded on this occasion, to retire with great loss. But the indefatigable Carthaginian, before his wound was well cured, made a new attempt upon Viſtumvia, a small city of Insubria, which the Romans had built and fortified during their war with the Gauls. This place Hannibal took, and gave it up to be plundered by his Africans, ^e who committed such cruelties, as had never before been practised in Italy ^d.

In the mean time the senate at Rome provided every thing necessary for the next campaign. Forces were dispatched into Sicily and Sardinia, under the command of their proper prætors; and Tarentum, as well as the other cities on the coast, secured with strong garisons, to prevent a descent. Sixty quinqueremes were equipped to cruize on the Mediterranean and Adriatic, and great convoys sent into Cisalpine Gaul and Œtruria, which were, in all likelihood, to be the seats of the war. But now Hannibal, finding the Gauls uneasy at his residing so long among them, began to grow jealous of that nation; and his apprehensions were such, that, fearing they might make some attempt upon his life, he invented the use of false hair of several colours, ^f which he changed several times a day, as well as his dress, to disguise himself; but as this subjection did not suit his temper, he resolved to cross the Apennines, and enter

(K) Flaminius, entering into all the intrigues of the tribunes of the people against the nobility, had been the promoter of a law contrary to the interest of the nobility, which from him was called the Flamian law. It was then customary for the nobility to fit out ships, and trade for their private advan-

rage; but Flaminius confined the liberty of commerce to the plebeians, by getting a law passed, forbidding the senators to possess more than one vessel each, and that only fit to bring provisions from their country-houses.

- a Hetruria, at a time when those mountains were almost impassable. He was not apprised of the dreadful storms, which the wind raises on those high rocks, especially towards the end of winter; and therefore unwarily exposed his troops to great danger, in attempting to cross them at that season. So terrible a hurricane surprized him on his march, and the wind blew the snow mixed with rain so violently in the faces of his men, that, not being able to advance a step, they were forced to halt, and let the storm blow over. When the rain ceased, the wind became more violent; inso-much that, after they had in vain attempted to pitch their tents, they were obliged to return to the plain, after two days fatigue and distress. Hannibal lost on this occasion a great many men, who were starved to death with cold, and seven out of the small number of elephants that still remained; however, his natural activity did not allow him to take any rest. Early the next morning he marched out of his intrenchments, with twelve thousand foot, and five thousand horse, and offered the consul Sempronius battle. The Roman general, always ready to engage, accepted the challenge, and, after a most obstinate dispute, which lasted till three hours after noon, repulsed the enemy quite to their camp. The rash consul, intoxicated with this success, thought now of nothing less than forcing Hannibal's camp; but, after he had fatigued his men to no purpose in this rash enterprize, he was forced to sound a retreat. As the Romans were retiring, Hannibal, having first sent out detachments to attack them in flank, fell upon their rear himself with all his infantry. The Romans faced about, and the battle was renewed with such fury, as threatened a dreadful slaughter on both sides, if night coming on had not put an end to it.

He attempts in vain to cross the Appennines.

As Hannibal had only postponed his design of entering Hetruria, he now began to inquire of those who were acquainted with the country, which was the best road to take; and being informed that there were two, the one longer, but more easy, the other shorter, but leading through marshy grounds scarce passable, he chose the latter, being on all occasions prompted by his natural inclination to imbarque in such enterprizes, as were apt to raise admiration, and strike terror into the enemy. Being therefore assured, that tho' great part of the country through which he was to pass, lay under water, the bottom was found, he ordered his army to begin their march.

- d He placed the Spaniards and Africans with their provisions in the van, next to them the Gauls, and the horse in the rear. Mago, with a body of Numidians, kept hovering about the flanks of the army, to prevent the soldiers from straggling, and the Gauls, who were impatient of labour, from deserting. The Spaniards and Africans, who were inured to all sorts of hardships, went into the water without hesitation, and tho' they were half-way up the leg in mud, kept their ranks; but the Gauls, who followed them, marched with great difficulty, the ground being potched and broken by the multitudes of men and beasts of burden who went before them. The whole army suffered unspeakable hardships on this march, being obliged to pass four days, and as many nights, in the water and mire, without finding a dry place on which they could take any rest. The horse of the Gauls were most part of them lost by the way, falling and sticking in the mire; which however proved some sort of relief to the soldiers, who made use of them as they lay with their burdens above water to get a moment's sleep, the want of which was their greatest torment. Great numbers of the Gauls sunk under the fatigue, and died. Nor was Hannibal himself without his share of the inconveniencies of the march; for tho' he rode the only elephant he had left, yet as he was before much affected with a defluxion in his eyes, the evil grew to such a height by the unwholesome qualities of the damp air, that he lost one intirely.

- f Hannibal, having thus, to the great surprize of all, passed the marshes, incamped in Hetruria, where he was informed, that Sempronius, immediately after his departure, had left Placentia, marched his army to Lucca, and there surrendered the command of it to the new consul Flaminius. We have observed above, that Flaminius obtained the consulship by the favour of the people, contrary to the inclinations of the senate. Being therefore apprehensive, lest, when he came to be inaugurated, the augurs, influenced by his enemies, should find some pretence to render his election invalid, he left Rome, without performing the usual ceremonies of religion; and putting himself at the head of the army, incamped with four legions under the walls of Arretium in Hetruria. The senators, highly provoked at this unprecedented step, sent deputies to him, ordering him to return to Rome, and perform there the usual ceremonies of religion; but Flaminius, without paying any regard to their orders, continued in his camp, and dismissed their deputies with scorn. As for his colleague Servilius, whose province was Cisalpine Gaul, he was detained at Rome, to assist at various expiations, the people being much terrified by accounts of prodigies. On the other hand, P. Cornelius Scipio, being now cured of his wound, sailed for Spain, to join his brother Cneius, who had gained great advantages over Asdrubal. He had defeated the Carthaginian army in a pitched battle, taken Hanno their commander, with Indibilis, a Spanish prince, reduced the whole country bordering on the Iberus, and gained over many princes to his republic. Tho' the news of these successes raised a little the courage of the conscript fathers, yet they were very anxious about the conduct of Flaminius, who was a man of a fiery temper, bold and enterprising, and had a crafty and experienced enemy to deal with. And indeed Hannibal, having learnt the true character of the consul, did not doubt but he should soon bring him to a battle. With this view he advanced towards Aretium, where the consul was incamped, and taking the way to Rome, left the Roman camp behind him. Flaminius, looking on this conduct of the enemy as a personal affront, resolved to follow him, and venture an engagement. All the officers of the army, in a council of war, endeavoured to divert him from so dangerous a resolution; but he, reproaching them with cowardice, rushed out of the council in a rage, and gave the signal both for marching and fighting. He mounted his horse in such a hurry, that he fell from him; which was thought an ill omen. At the same time he was told, that the ensigns stuck so fast in the ground, that the soldiers could not pull them out. This prodigy was no doubt feigned, on purpose to keep him in the camp; but the consul, without paying any regard to such omens, ordered the standard-bearers to make use of spades and pick-axes, if they could not pull them up with their hands. He then marched out at the head of his troops, whose minds he so filled with hopes of victory, that the rabble, who followed the army for plunder, carrying with them chains and shackles to secure the prisoners, were as numerous as the soldiers. As for Hannibal, who was before the consular army, by the terrible ravages he committed in the plains of Cortona, he provoked the consul still more to follow him, and at length drew him insensibly into an ambuscade. Adjoining to Cortona are some pretty high mountains, near a great lake called Thrasimenus, now the lake of Perugia. Between these mountains and the lake is a large valley, into which there is but one narrow passage. Through this defile Hannibal marched, and incamped his Spanish and African infantry in the valley. His light-armed foot he drew up in one long line, and posted them at the foot of the hills, on the left-side of the valley; and with his horse he lined the right-side of it. Flaminius, without sending scouts before to discover the situation of the enemy, entered the dangerous pass. As it was late when he came into the valley, he had only time to pitch his camp before it was dark. As he saw nothing but Hannibal's camp before him, he was under no apprehension; but as soon as the Romans began to march again at break of day, they found themselves attacked on a sudden in front, in rear, and in flank, and yet, by reason of a thick fog from the lake, could not perceive the enemy by whom they were thus galled. Flaminius heard from his post the cries of his soldiers in different places, and the groans of dying men in the very center of his army; but as he could not, for the thickness of the fog, perceive whence the mischief came, he ran sometimes one way, and sometimes another, in great perplexity, exhorting his soldiers, who, in their distress, were imploring the assistance of the gods, not to depend on idle prayers, but on their arms. The confusion of the Romans was inexpressible. Every one endeavoured to shift for himself; but were stopped either by crowds of their fellow soldiers, who were flying as well as themselves, or by the enemy, who surrounded them on all sides. Some considering that it was in vain to fly, since they were shut in by a lake, by mountains, and by narrow passes well guarded, resolved to sell their lives dear. Accordingly they rallied, as it were by chance; and the officers mixing with the soldiers, without observing the usual order in battle, they fell on the enemy with such eagerness and fury, that they were not sensible of an earthquake, which overturned many cities in Italy. The slaughter continued three hours without intermission. At length one Ducarius, an Insubrian in the Carthaginian army, knowing Flaminius, whom he had formerly seen laying waste his country with fire and sword, cried out, There is the consul, who did so much mischief to our fields and cities. I will make him a victim to appease the

a the manes of my countrymen. At these words, he spurred on his horse, broke through the Romans who guarded their general, and run his lance through his body. Flaminius fell down dead, and the Gaul was preparing to strip him; but the triarii covered him with their bodies and bucklers. And now the Romans were intimidated to such a degree, that some leaped into the lake, and were drowned; others attempted to climb over the mountains; and a body of six thousand of them opened themselves a way through the narrow pass, sword in hand, and escaped to an eminence, whence they retired to a town in Ettruria, and there intrenched themselves. Hannibal detached, Adherbal after them with all his cavalry, and a great part of his infantry. The fugitives, being invested in the village, and destitute of all manner of provisions, were rendered to Maberbal, who promised them their lives and liberties; but Hannibal, pretending that Maberbal had not been empowered by him to make such a promise, loaded the Romans with chains; but dismissed their allies, assuring them, that he was come into Italy to deliver them from the tyrannical yoke of Rome, and restore them that liberty, which their fathers had enjoyed. By this artful proceeding, he hoped to draw over to his side the friends and allies of Rome.

Flaminius killed, and the Romans defeated.

b AFTER this complete victory, the conqueror ordered the dead to be numbered, and found, that he had lost but fifteen hundred men; whereas the Romans had lost as many thousands dead upon the spot. The number of prisoners taken by Hannibal amounted, according to Plutarch, to ten thousand; according to Polybius to fifteen thousand; but Livy and Valerius Maximus tell us, that six thousand only were made captives on this occasion. About ten thousand Romans, most of them wounded, made their escape, and took their rout to Rome, whither few of them arrived, the rest dying of their wounds before they reached the capital. When news was brought to Rome of this great overthrow, the prætor Pomponius, knowing it could not be long concealed, mounted the rostra about sun-set, and to an exceeding numerous assembly, even the women crowding to it, contrary to custom, pronounced the following words, We are overcome; which struck all with such terror, that some who were present, and had been in the battle, thought the defeat was greater at Rome, than it had been in the field. The dejection of the citizens was unexpressible. They hastened in crouds to the gates of the city, to wait for those who had escaped the general slaughter, and to learn from them the particulars of the action. Two mothers were so transported with joy, one at the gate of the city, when she saw her son unexpectedly appear, the other at home, where she found her son, whom she had given up for lost, that they both expired on the spot. In this general consternation the senators alone preserved their steadiness. The prætor assembled them, and kept them sitting three days together from sun-rising to sun-set; but, before they came to any resolution, news was brought of a second defeat. The consul Servilius, having heard at Ariminum, that his colleague had resolved to give battle, had detached four thousand horse to his assistance, under the command of the proprætor Centenius; but Hannibal hearing of this reinforcement immediately after the action, sent out Adherbal with all his cavalry, and a body of infantry, who meeting with the Roman horse, killed two thousand of them, and obliged the rest to take sanctuary on a neighbouring hill, where they were invested, and the next day forced to surrender.

Rome in the utmost consternation.

A detachment of 4000 Roman horse cut in pieces or taken.

c AND now the senate, judging that the republic wanted an absolute governor, without waiting for a nomination from the surviving consul, of their own authority named a dictator; but, out of regard to the ancient custom, they gave him only the title of Pro-dictator. The person chosen was Fabius Maximus, surnamed Verrucosus, a man as cool and cautious in his conduct, as Sempronius and Flaminius had been warm and impetuous. The people did not suffer him, as was customary for dictators, to name his general of the horse, but appointed one themselves, and pitched upon Minucius Rufus, a great favourite of the people, and a zealous partizan of the plebeian party. The new dictator began the functions of his office, by commanding the decemviri to consult the Sibylline books, in order to learn from those mysterious oracles the causes of the present calamities. The decemviri reported, that the misfortunes of the republic were owing to the non-performance of a vow made formerly by Aulus Cornelius to Mars, which was, to sacrifice to that god all the pigs, lambs, kids and calves that should be brought forth in one spring; that is, from the first of March to the first of May. This is what the ancients called ver sacrum. This vow being renewed, and several others made, the dictator took the field at the head of the army Servilius a had commanded, to which he added two new legions, appointing the city of Tibur for the place of general rendezvous. From thence he sent orders to all the country people to burn their houses, and retire with all their effects into places of safety. After this he set out on his march to meet Hannibal, not with a design to engage him, but only to watch his motions, straiten his quarters, and cut off his provisions, which, he knew, was the most effectual means of destroying him in a country so far from his own. Accordingly he followed him through Umbria and Picenum into the territory of Adria, and then through the countries of the Marrucini and Frentani into Apulia. When the enemy marched, he followed them; when they incamped, he did the same; but for the most part on eminences, and at some distance from their camp, watching all their motions, cutting off their stragglers, and keeping them in a continual alarm. This cautious way of proceeding, which gained him the surname of Cunctator, greatly distressed the enemy, but at the same time raised murmurs in the army. Minucius, who was a favourite of the people, and ambitious of the chief command, made no scruple to accuse the dictator of cowardice under the appearance of prudence; but neither the invectives of Minucius, nor the devastations which Hannibal committed in the countries of the allies of Rome, could make Fabius alter his measures. He still continued following the Carthaginian army, without hazarding a battle, and was never above one, or, at the most, two leagues from it. Hannibal, who was well apprised, that the measures Fabius had taken must at length utterly ruin the Carthaginian army, did all that lay in his power to bring him to a battle. He ravaged Sammum, plundered the territory of Beneventum, a Roman colony, and laid siege to Telesia, a city at the foot of the Apennines. But finding that neither the ravaging of the country, nor even the taking of some cities, could make Fabius quit his eminences, he resolved to make use of a stronger bait, which was to enter Campania, the finest country in Italy, and lay it waste under the dictator's eyes, hoping by that means to bring him to an action. Accordingly he ordered his guides, who were three Campanian horsemen in his army, to lead him to the territory of Casinum; but as he spoke Latin very indifferently, he pronounced the word Casinum in such a manner, that the guides understood Casilinum, and led his troops into narrow passes, which divide Sammum from Campania, at a small distance from Casilinum. He had no sooner entered the straits, than Fabius, who watched all his motions, attacked from the eminences his rear, put it into disorder, and killed about eight hundred of his men. Hannibal, thinking himself betrayed by his guides, ordered them all to be crucified; or, as Livy has it, vented his rage on one of them only, causing him to be first beaten with rods, and then crucified, for an example of terror to others¹.

Fabius is val-lied as a coward by his own

THE ravages he committed in Campania, raised such complaints in the Roman army against the dictator, that, for fear of irritating his men, he pretended to be as impatient of coming to a battle as Minucius, and accordingly marched after Hannibal with more expedition than usual; but at the same time avoided an engagement, under various pretences, with more care than the enemy sought it. He beheld, from the top of mount Massicus, the Carthaginians laying waste the fruitful plains of Falerum, without stirring from his post. Hereupon both officers and soldiers began to mutiny, and hearken with pleasure to the invectives of Minucius. We have indeed, said the general of the horse, a noble leader; for fear of endangering our lives, he bids us in the clouds. When these and such like reflections were told Fabius, he only replied, That he should be more cowardly than they supposed him, if, through fear of idle raileries, he neglected to follow the dictates of his reason, and continued the same conduct, notwithstanding he understood that his precaution and delays were blamed even at Rome. Hannibal, finding he could not by any means bring the dictator to a battle, resolved to quit Campania, which he found abounding more with fruit and wine than with corn, and to return into Sammum, through the pass called Eribanus. Fabius concluded from his march, that this was his design, got there before him, and incamped on mount Callicula, which commanded the pass, after having placed several bodies in all the avenues leading to it. Hannibal was for some time at a loss what to do; but at last contrived the following stratagem, which Fabius could not foresee, nor guard against. Being incamped at the foot of mount Callicula, he ordered Asdrubal to pick out of the cattle taken in the country two thousand of the strongest and nimblest oxen, to tie

- a faggots to their horns, and to have them and the herdsmen ready without the camp. After supper, when all was quiet, the cattle were brought in good order to the hill, where Fabius had placed some Roman parties in ambush to stop up the pass. Upon a signal given, the faggots on the horns of the oxen were set on fire, and the herdsmen, supported by some battalions armed with small javelins, drove them on quietly. The Romans, seeing the light of the fires, imagined, that the Carthaginians were marching by torch-light. However, Fabius kept close in his camp, depending on the troops he had placed in ambuscade; but when the oxen, feeling the fire on their heads, began to run up and down the hills, the Romans in ambush, thinking themselves surrounded on all sides, abandoned their posts, and climbing the ways where
- b they saw least light, returned to their camp. Then Hannibal, seeing the pass open, entered it, and getting safe through with his army and baggage, gained the plain before day-light, and incamped near Allisa, on the confines of Samnium and Campania. Fabius, tho' rallied by his soldiers for having been thus over-reached by the Carthaginian, still pursued the same measures, marched directly after Hannibal, and incamped on the eminences near Allisa. From thence he followed him all over Samnium into Apulia, intercepting many of his stragglers and convoys; but when he came to Larinum in the country of the Frentani, he received a letter from the senate, recalling him to Rome, on pretence of a solemn sacrifice, which required his presence; and then the virtue of this great man was put to a severe trial. Not only the blind multitude, but even the conscript fathers, had imbibed false prejudices against him. As Hannibal had artfully spared his lands in the general devastation, they began to suspect him of holding a secret correspondence with the enemy. Of this groundless suspicion they gave a signal proof, by refusing to send him a sum of money for the redemption of two hundred and forty-seven captives, whom Hannibal had released, pursuant to an agreement between him and the dictator concerning the exchange of prisoners; but this ingratitude of the senate served only to heighten the lustre of his virtue; for as he was a religious observer of his word, he ordered his son to sell his lands, and with the money paid the sum stipulated ^k.
- THE dictator, upon his leaving the army, commanded his general of the horse
- d not to hazard a battle during his absence; but Minucius, without paying any regard to his orders, immediately sent out strong parties to attack the Carthaginian foragers, and in two bloody skirmishes cut many of them in pieces, and took from them all their booty. The news of this success reaching Rome before the dictator, he found, on his arrival, both the senate and people strangely prepossessed against him, and in favour of his general of the horse. One Metilius, a tribune of the people, made an harangue to the multitude in the presence of Fabius, full of the blackest accusations against him; but the dictator, thinking it beneath him to make an apology, addressed himself to the assembly with the following words: Fabius cannot be suspected by his country. And then with an air of grandeur and intrepidity suitable to his rank, Romans, said he,
- e let us make haste to finish the religious ceremonies, which detain me from returning to the army. I have a refractory man to chastize, and a breach of military discipline to punish. I forbid Minucius to give battle; but he has disobeyed my orders, and I must make an example of him. The friends of Minucius, struck dumb with this declaration, began to consult how they could screen him from the severity of a magistrate invested with an uncontrollable power. Metilius advised the people to give the general of the horse an equal authority with the dictator. Terentius Varro was the only tribune, whom Metilius could prevail upon to second his motion. He was the son of a butcher, and had followed his father's profession in his youth; but growing rich, he had forsaken that mean calling, and, by the favour of the people, obtained first the prætorship, and afterwards the tribuneship. Now he aspired to the consulship, and therefore,
- f seeing the people greatly inclined to favour Minucius, he did not scruple to promote his fortune at the expence of his honour. He seconded Metilius, and both together got the law passed, establishing, by an unheard-of innovation, an equality between the dictator and his general of the horse. The senate, out of some unaccountable prejudice against Fabius, were mean-spirited enough to confirm this strange law. Fabius, having assisted at the sacrifice to which he had been called, and presided at the election of a new consul, Attilius Regulus, in the room of Flaminius, had left Rome before the decree was confirmed by the senate, but was overtaken on the road

by a messenger, injoining him, in the name of the Roman people and senate, to give a his general of the horse an equal share of the command. When he arrived at the camp, Minucius, in the first conference he had with him, proposed, that each should take his turn in the command of the whole army for a day, or a week; but Fabius chose to divide the army, and to command his share separately, hoping by that means to save at least a part of the Roman forces. The army being divided, the two generals did not remove far from each other, but incamped at a due distance; Fabius on the hill, and Minucius a little below him, almost in the plain. Hannibal posted himself over-against the latter, and, by his artful management, soon brought him to an engagement, in which, by the masterly skill of the Carthaginian in laying ambushes, he was surrounded on all sides, and would have been cut off with all his troops, had not Fabius, sacrificing his private resentment to the welfare of his country, hastened to his relief. That brave Roman, moved with compassion at the sight of the terrible slaughter that was made of his countrymen, rushed down like a torrent from his hills, fell upon the enemy where Minucius was most pressed, cut all in pieces who opposed him, and put the rest into the utmost confusion. Then Minucius's troops rallying, the two armies united, and advanced in good order to renew the fight; but Hannibal, not caring to venture a second action, sounded the retreat, and retired to his camp. He was heard to say, as he marched back, I have always foreseen, that the cloud which appeared so constantly on the mountains, would, some time or other, break out into a storm, and discharge itself upon our heads. After the action, Minucius and Fabius returned to their respective camps. The latter did not drop a word which favoured of ostentation, or of contempt for his colleague; and Minucius did justice both to himself and to Fabius. Having assembled his troops, he told them, He had learned by experience that he was not born to command; but that obedience ought to be his province; and that he was therefore resolved to return to the station, which he had presumptuously left. Come then, dear fellow-soldiers, said he, let us go, and offer our services to the dictator, and put ourselves again wholly under his conduct. Let him command alone, since he alone is fit to be the soul of so great a body. I will call him father; and you ought to give his soldiers, who delivered you, the title of patrons. It will be a greater glory for us to have conquered ourselves, than to have conquered Hannibal. Having thus spoke, he immediately marched his legions to the dictator's camp, presented himself before him, made his acknowledgments, and resigned the authority with which he had been intrusted. He declared, that he should think himself happy, if the dictator would only continue him in his office of general of the horse, and begged, that none of his officers might be degraded, since his rashness alone had brought dishonour upon them. Fabius tenderly embraced him, granted him what he asked; and the day which began with so much terror, ended with an universal joy in the camp. The six months of the dictatorship being soon after expired, Fabius returned to Rome, after having resigned the command of the army to the consuls Servilius and Attilius, who, observing the same conduct with Fabius, watched from the eminences the enemy's motions, without giving Hannibal, for the remainder of their year, an opportunity of attacking them.

Minucius resigns his new authority.

The state of affairs in Spain.

DURING these transactions in Italy, Cneius Scipio made a surprising progress in Spain. All the nations between the Iberus and the Pyrenees submitted to him, and put him in possession of a hundred cities. The Celtiberians entered into an alliance with him, and engaging Asdrubal, defeated him in two pitched battles, killed five thousand of his men, and took four thousand prisoners. This was the state of the Roman affairs in Spain, when P. Scipio, the brother of Cneius, arrived there with the character of proconsul, carrying with him eight thousand Roman troops. With this additional strength the two brothers passed the Iberus, and penetrating into the heart of the Carthaginian provinces, marched towards Saguntum, which Hannibal had rebuilt before he left Spain, and secured with a strong garison, under the command of Bostar, a Carthaginian, having placed in it all the young noblemen, whom he had obliged their parents to put into his hands, as pledges of their fidelity. As these hostages prevented the Spanish lords from revolting to the Romans, the two Scipios marched to Saguntum, in order to set them free. Their design was executed by one Abelox, a Spanish officer in the garison, who, having an inclination to go over to the Romans, persuaded Bostar, that it would be much for the Carthaginian interest, to oblige the Spanish

- a noblemen by a voluntary release of their children, urging, that, if the Romans should take the place, and restore them to their parents, innumerable nations would immediately declare for them. He offered to conduct the hostages himself to their respective countries; but the inconsiderate Carthaginian had no sooner given his consent to this motion, than Abelox, stealing away in the night to the Roman camp, acquainted the proconsul with what he had done; and it was agreed between them, that the following night a detachment of Romans should lie in ambush, and surprise both the youths and their leader. The project was happily executed; and Scipio, by sending back the hostages to their parents, secured such an interest in the country, that he was stronger there than the Carthaginians ^m.
- b AND now the time for a new election drawing near, one of the consuls named a dictator to preside in the comitia, it not being safe for either of them to leave the army. The person named was L. Veturius Philo; but the augurs finding some defect in his nomination, he was forced to abdicate, and give place to an inter-regnum; when Terentius Varro, of whom we have spoken above, was chosen to the consulate, in spite of the utmost efforts of the whole body of the nobility. The colleague given him was Æmilius Paulus, as bitter an enemy to the plebeians, as Varro was to the patricians. Servilius and Attilius were continued, in quality of proconsuls, at the head of the armies; but with orders to act under the direction of the new consuls. That Terentius, who was a great favourite of the people, might have the glory of
- c conquering Hannibal, eight new legions were raised, consisting each of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse; and the allies were ordered to furnish the republic with double their contingents both of horse and foot. The winter being spent in these preparations, the consuls took the field early in the spring, and arriving at the camp, found affairs in a good condition there, Servilius and Attilius having avoided a general action, and in some skirmishes gained considerable advantages. Hannibal, soon after the arrival of the new consuls, whose army consisted in all of eighty-seven thousand men, being reduced to great straits for want of provisions, resolved to leave Samnium, and penetrate into the heart of Apulia. Accordingly he decamped in the night, and, by leaving fires burning, and tents standing in his camp, made the
- d Romans believe for some time, that his retreat was only feigned. When the truth was discovered, Æmilius was against pursuing him; but Terentius, contrary to the opinion of all the officers in the army, except the proconsul Servilius, was obstinately bent on following the enemy, whom he overtook at Cannæ, till this time an obscure city in Apulia (L). It stood on the banks of the Aufidus, in a vast plain, five miles from Canusium, and six from the Adriatic sea. Here Hannibal halted, not only because he found a magazine of corn in the place, but because he thought the open country about it very proper for a battle, there being room enough for his cavalry, the main strength and hopes of his army, to extend themselves. The consuls being divided in opinion about fighting, courier after courier was sent to Rome, and even
- e Æmilius went thither himself to receive the orders of the senate, who judged it necessary to fight the enemy; but advised Terentius not to do it yet. In the mean time Hannibal took his post on the banks of the river, and disposed all things as if he were just coming to a battle. His troops had the sun behind them at noon; so that the Romans must be exposed not only to the inconvenience of too great a light, but to that of great clouds of dust, which the south-west wind, that blows almost every day in Apulia, would carry in their faces. As for the consuls, they were no sooner within reach of Cannæ, than a dispute arose between them. Æmilius was for incamping on the eminences, where the enemy's cavalry, which was far superior to theirs, could not act; and accordingly, when it was his turn to command, he pitched his camp
- f among the hills; but Terentius the next day advanced into the plain, and brought the

(L) Cannæ, according to Livy, Appian and Florus, was only a poor village, which afterwards became famous, on account of the battle fought near it; but Polybius, who lived near the time of the second Punic war, styles Cannæ a city; but adds, that it had been razed a year before the defeat of the Roman army. The account of Silius agrees with that of Polybius.

says that poet. It was afterwards rebuilt; for Pliny ranks it among the cities of Apulia (27). The ruins of Cannæ are still to be seen in the territory of Bari, formerly called Apulia Penceria.

army into such a situation, that Æmilius the following day could not retire, without a exposing the army to great danger. He therefore fortified two camps, the greater on the west side of the river, and the lesser on the east, and opened a communication between them by a bridge. And now there was no longer the least harmony between the consuls; they had quite different maxims, and pursued opposite measures, each succeeding day destroying the projects of the preceding. Hannibal, perceiving that the Romans could not long avoid a general action, having harangued his troops, drew them up in battalia, and bid the enemy defiance. It was Æmilius's day to command; and he, knowing that Hannibal would be soon obliged to decamp for want of provisions, despised his bravadoes, and kept close in his intrenchments; but the next morning, by break of day, Terentius, whose turn it was to command, marched b his troops into the great plain, where the little camp was pitched, and drew them up after the usual manner, the hastati in the first line, the principes in the second, and the triarii in the third. The cavalry were posted on the wings. In the right the Roman knights flanked the legionaries; in the left the cavalry of the allies covered their own infantry. The two consuls commanded the two wings, Æmilius the right, and Terentius the left; and the two proconsuls, Servilius and Attilius, the main body. On the other hand, Hannibal, whose army consisted of forty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, placed his Gaulish and Spanish cavalry in his left wing, to face the Roman knights, and the Numidian horse in his right, over-against the cavalry of the allies of Rome. As to his infantry, he divided the African battalions into two bodies, one of which he posted c near the Gaulish and Spanish horse, the other near the Numidian. Between these two bodies were placed, on one side the Gaulish, on the other the Spanish infantry, drawn up in such a manner, as to form a kind of obtuse angle, projecting a considerable way beyond the two wings. Behind this first line he drew up a second, which had no projection. Asdrubal commanded the left wing, Maberbal the right, and Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, the main body. The onset was begun with the light-armed infantry, the Romans discharging their javelins, and the Baleares their stones, with equal success; nevertheless the consul Æmilius was wounded. Then the Roman cavalry in the right wing advanced against the Gaulish and Spanish in Hannibal's d left wing. As they were shut in by the river on one side, and their infantry on the other, they did not fight, as usual, by charging and wheeling off, and then returning to the charge, but continued fighting each man against his adversary, till one of them was killed or retired. After they had made inconceivable efforts on both sides to overbear each other, they all on a sudden dismounted, and fought on foot man to man with incredible fury. But this attack was more bloody than long; the Gauls and Spaniards prevailed, put the Romans to the rout, and pursuing them along the river, strewed the ground with their dead bodies, Asdrubal giving no quarter. This action was scarce over, when the infantry advanced on both sides. The Romans fell first upon the Spaniards and Gauls, who, as we have observed above, formed a kind of triangle, projecting beyond the two wings. These gave ground, and, pur- e suant to Hannibal's directions, sunk into the void space in their rear; by which means they insensibly brought the Romans, who followed them with more ardor than caution, into the centre of the African infantry, and then rallying, attacked them in front, while the Africans charged them on both their flanks. The Romans being, by this artful retreat, drawn into the snare, and surrounded, no longer kept their ranks, but formed several platoons, in order to face every way. Æmilius, who was in the right wing, seeing the danger of the main body, at the head of the legionaries, who were his only hopes, after the defeat of the cavalry, acted the part both of a soldier and general, penetrating into the very heart of the enemy's battalions, and cutting in pieces all who opposed him. All the Roman cavalry that was left, attended f the brave consul on foot, and, encouraged by his example, fought like men in despair. But in the mean time Asdrubal, at the head of a detachment of Gaulish and Spanish infantry brought from the centre, attacked Æmilius's legionaries, who were greatly fatigued, with such fury, that they were forced to give ground, and fly. Æmilius, covered with wounds and blood, was too weak to reach the camp; and therefore, being deserted by his men, sat down on a stone, and in that condition was found by one Lentulus, a tribune, who was flying as well as the rest. Lentulus, knowing the consul, immediately dismounted, and offered him his horse; but Æmilius replied with a faint voice, I have lived long enough, dear Lentulus; fly, and let me die. Take care to give the senate timely notice of our misfortunes, that they may guard g and

- a and fortify Rome, and tell Fabius, that I have followed the advice he gave me at our parting to the very last. Then Lentulus passed on, and the enemy's cavalry, who pursued the Romans, coming up, killed the consul without knowing him (M). Thus fell one of the bravest consuls, and best citizens, Rome ever had.<sup>The consul

- In the main body the Romans, though invested on all sides, continued to sell their lives dear, fighting in platoons, and making a great slaughter of the enemy. But being at length overpowered, and disheartened by the loss of the two proconsuls, Servilius and Attilius, who headed them, they dispersed and fled, some to the right, and some to the left, as the ground or the enemy gave them an opportunity. But the Numidian horse, more fit for a pursuit, than a pitched battle, cut most of them in pieces. The whole plain was covered with heaps of dead bodies; insomuch that Hannibal himself, thinking the butchery too terrible, ordered his men to put a stop to it. As for Terentius Varro, the author of all these misfortunes, after the Numidians had put the wing he commanded into confusion, he without attempting to rally his men, fled to Venusia with only seventy horse. In this bloody action at least forty-five thousand Romans were left dead upon the spot (N); among whom were one consul, two proconsuls, two military quæstors, twenty-nine legionary tribunes, and fourscore senators or magistrates who had a right of voting in the senate, and had served as volunteers. Among the rest, the famous Minucius was killed, who had been general of the horse the last year under Fabius. About seventeen thousand of the right wing had fled to the two camps, ten thousand to the great camp, and seven thousand to the little one. The former having lost their officers, and expecting to be invested the next day, invited the latter to join them, that they might march away together in the night, and take refuge in Canusium, a strong city not far off. But it was with the utmost difficulty that Sempronius Tuditanus, a legionary tribune, could prevail upon any of those in the little camp to hearken to his proposal, they being all afraid lest the enemy should intercept them in passing from one camp to the other. However, the bravest of them drew themselves up at length into a cuneus, that is, in the form of a wedge, marched out in good order, and arrived safe at the great camp; where they joined their fellow-soldiers, marched away before day-break, and got to Canusium.<sup>And the Ro-
great slaughter.</sup>

- In the Carthaginian camp the night was spent in feasting and rejoicings. Hannibal had never gained a more complete or more seasonable victory. As soon as the day returned, he beheld with infinite satisfaction the whole plain covered with Romans, who had been slain in the action, while in surveying the field of battle, he found that his loss amounted to no more than four thousand Gauls, fifteen hundred Africans and Spaniards, and about two hundred horse. Hannibal took, what in the action and what in the pursuit, ten thousand prisoners. Such a number of knights are said to have been found dead on the field, that three bushels of their rings were sent to Carthage. Immediately after the victory, Maberbal pressed Hannibal to march strait to Rome, and besiege that capital; which he refusing to do, Maberbal took the liberty to tell him, that he knew how to conquer, but knew not how to use and improve his victories. Many of the ancients have thought as Maberbal did, and have reproached the Carthaginian general with the same fault; but whether justly or not, may be well

(M) The account Plutarch gives us of the consul Æmilius Paulus's death, is somewhat different from this. This great man, says he, after he had discharged all the duties of a good citizen, and able commander, was thrown by his horse, which probably had been wounded. Hereupon the knights round him dismounted to defend him; which the rest of the cavalry observing, believed that they had dismounted by the general's order, and did the same. In the mean time Æmilius, having received many wounds, and lost a great quantity of blood, rested some time on a stone; and then threw himself into the middle of the enemy's squadrons, who dispatched him with innumerable wounds.

(N) There is a great disagreement among authors as to the number of Romans killed and taken in the battle of Canna. According to Livy, the republic lost on that occasion fifty thousand men, the auxiliaries included. According to Polybius, of six thousand Roman horse only seventy escaped to Venusia with Terentius Varro, and three hundred of the auxiliary horse. As to the infantry, that writer tells us, that seventy thousand of the Roman foot died on the field of battle, fighting like brave men, and that thirteen thousand were taken prisoners. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, of six thousand horse only three hundred and seventy escaped the general slaughter, and of eighty thousand foot, three thousand only. If we give credit to a tradition, which continued in Plutarch's time, fifty thousand Romans were killed on the spot, and four thousand made prisoners, exclusive of the ten thousand who were, according to him, taken in the two camps the day after the battle. Livy says, that eight thousand of the best Carthaginian troops were killed in the action.

questioned. The advantages he had gained were chiefly owing to his cavalry, who could be of no use in a siege. The Roman infantry were noways inferior to his, and would be invincible, when sheltered by walls and ramparts. The inhabitants of so populous a city were all bred up to arms from their infancy, obliged to serve as soon as they attained to the age of manhood, and would use their utmost efforts in defence of their wives, their children, and their domestic gods. They had as many generals as senators, most of them men of great prudence and conduct; whereas the advantages hitherto gained over them were owing to the rashness of some presumptuous and unexperienced generals, who had been placed at the head of their armies by the favour of the people, contrary to the interest of the public. Besides, no one nation or city of Italy had yet declared for him; and he might judge it necessary, and not without reason, to gain over or conquer some of them before he attempted the siege of Rome. Hannibal having, probably on these considerations, determined not to follow the advice of Maberbal, continued some days on the field of battle, allowing his soldiers to strip the dead, and gather up the booty, which the Romans had left on the plain. On this occasion the Carthaginians, among other moving objects, found, to their great surprise, a Numidian yet alive, lying under the dead body of a Roman, who had thrown himself headlong on his enemy, and beat him down; but being no longer able to make use of his weapons, because he had lost his hands, had tore off the nose and ears of the Numidian with his teeth, and in that fit of rage expired. The Carthaginians, having spent a whole day in stripping the dead bodies of the unhappy Romans, the victorious general invested the two camps in the evening, which he easily made himself master of, there being none in them but wounded men or cowards, who had not had courage enough to retire with their companions to Canusium. They all surrendered upon terms, and were allowed to march out with their cloaths, but without arms. The Romans were to pay three hundred denarii a head for their ransom, that is, 9 l. 7 s. 9 d. their allies two hundred, and each slave one hundred. Till this was done, Hannibal divided them into several companies, and kept them prisoners under different guards. They amounted in all to four thousand men, the rest having retired, as we have related above, to Canusium.

Among those Romans, who had fled to Canusium, were four legionary tribunes; and of these the soldiers chose two to be their chief commanders, viz. Appius Claudius Pulcher, and young Scipio, the son of the proconsul in Spain, who was at this time but eighteen years of age. While Scipio was deliberating with his colleague what measures to take, notice was given him, that the young nobility among the troops were assembled in a house, and contriving how to leave Italy, and retire to some of those kings who were friends to Rome, which they gave up for lost. Hereupon the young tribune, filled with zeal, took with him a band of soldiers, surprised the cowards, and with his sword drawn came up to Cæcilius Metellus, the author of this pernicious design, whom he addressed thus; I call the great Jupiter to witness, that I will never depart my country; nor will I suffer any man to do it. This I solemnly swear; and do you, Cæcilius, either take the same oath, or die. The fear of present death made them all take the same oath; and then Scipio secured them with a strong guard. Thus this young Roman, whom we shall afterwards see honoured with the glorious surname of Africanus, signalized his zeal for the public welfare on his first entering upon public life. The consul Terentius, since his coming to Venusia, whither he had fled with only seventy men, had been joined by five thousand of the fugitives. With these he went to Canusium, as soon as he heard that there were six thousand more in that place, and joined his troops to them; so that the whole had now the appearance of a consular army.

In the mean time it was reported at Rome, that both consuls were killed, and that of eighty-seven thousand men there was scarce one left alive. Never was the city filled with more terror, nor a more universal consternation seen there. All the Roman constancy was necessary to prevent the fatal consequences of so shocking an affliction. For want of consuls, the two prætors assembled the senators, who could hardly give their opinions, being every moment interrupted by the cries of the people, and the shrieks of the women, who lamented the loss of their husbands, children, or fathers. As the conduct of Fabius was now fully justified by the defeat of Terentius, his counsel was listened to and followed. He advised them to send to the Apian and Latin

- a ways horsemen well mounted, to learn from the fugitives the state of affairs; what was become of the consuls? to what place the remains of the army had retired? where Hannibal was incamped? what he was doing? and what he designed to do? That the women should by a decree be forbid to appear in public, and disturb the city with their outcries and lamentations; that when any courier arrived, he should be brought privately, and without noise, to the prætors; and that no person should be suffered to go out of the city, lest it should be deserted. This advice was applauded; the crowds that filled the streets, were dispersed; and each senator undertook to keep every thing quiet in his own neighbourhood. Such was the situation of affairs, when at length a courier arrived from Terentius with letters, importing, that the Roman army had been defeated; that Æmilius was slain; that he himself was retired to Canusium, where he was assembling the remains of the troops; that about ten thousand men of different corps had joined him, but most of them without officers; that Hannibal was still incamped at Cannæ, and busy there in fixing the ransoms of the prisoners he had taken. At the same time a vessel arrived from Sicily with letters from the prætor Oscilius, acquainting the senate, that a Carthaginian squadron was ravaging the coast of Syracuse, and waiting for an opportunity to make a descent. The conscript fathers, in the midst of these perplexities, behaved with incredible constancy; and assembling daily, made the necessary preparations for the defence both of Italy and Sicily. Marcellus, an hero already honoured with an extraordinary triumph for having defeated the Gauls, and killed their king in a single combat, had been appointed prætor of Sicily, and was now equipping a fleet at Ostia. But the senate ordered him from thence into Apulia to take upon him the command of the army at Canusium in the room of Varro, who was recalled. Marcellus, pursuant to his orders, set out immediately for Rome, and from thence for Canusium, where he found a body of about fourteen thousand men. Upon his arrival Varro left Canusium, and returned to Rome. It is almost incredible, that the author of so many both public and private calamities should be received with respect either by the senate or people. Nevertheless, all the ancients tell us, that he met with as kind a reception from all orders of men in the state, as if he had gained a signal victory. All the senators in a body, attended with crowds of people, went out to meet him, and thank him for not having despaired of the republic.^p Valerius Maximus tells us, that the senate and people offered him the dictatorship, which he refused, and by his modest refusal wiped off, in some measure, the shame of his former behaviour.^q Thus the Romans, by treating their unfortunate commanders with humanity, lessened the disgrace of their being vanquished or discharged, while the Carthaginians condemned their generals to cruel deaths upon their being overcome, often without their fault, by the enemy.
- As the present situation of affairs required an absolute magistrate, the senators, of their own authority, appointed M. Junius Pera, who had bore the offices of prætor, censor, and consul, to be dictator; and he chose Tib. Sempronius Gracchus for his general of the horse. Junius made it his whole business to put the army in a condition to make head against the victorious enemy. All the young Romans above seventeen years of age, of what rank soever, were obliged to enlist themselves; as were also those who had already served their legal time. By this means four legions, and ten thousand horse, were soon raised in the city. The allies of Rome, the colonies, and the municipia, furnished their contingents as usual. To these were added out of the great number of slaves in Rome eight thousand of the youngest and strongest. The republic purchased them of their masters, but did not oblige them to serve without their own consent, which they gave, when asked, by answering, Volo, I am willing; whence they were called Volones, to distinguish them from the other corps by a name less odious than that of slaves. As the Romans, after the loss of so many battles, had no swords, darts, or bucklers left in their magazines, the Volones were supplied with the arms which had been formerly taken from the enemy, and hung up in the public portico's and temples. The finances of Rome were no less exhausted; but this defect was supplied by the liberality of her citizens. The senators shewing the example, were followed first by the knights, and afterwards by all the tribes, who, stripping themselves of all the gold they had, brought it to the public treasury. The senators only reserved their rings, and the bullæ about their childrens necks. As for the silver coin, it was now for the first time alloyed with copper, and the value of it raised. Thus the finances were again put into a good condition, and a competent army raised.^a

In the mean time Hannibal, wanting money, gave the Roman prisoners leave to redeem themselves. The ransom of each horseman he fixed at five hundred denarii, that is, 16*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* that of each foot soldier at three hundred, and of each slave at one hundred. As for the allies of Rome, notwithstanding his want of money, he dismissed them, agreeable to his former practice, without ransom. The Roman captives agreed to send ten of their body to negotiate their redemption at Rome; and Hannibal required no other security for their return, but their oath. Carthalo was sent at the head of them to make proposals of peace to the republic, which Hannibal imagined she would be glad to purchase at any rate. But upon the first report of Carthalo's arrival to treat of a peace, the dictator sent a licitor to him, commanding him forthwith to quit the Roman territory. As for the ten deputies, the senate, considering them as foreigners since their captivity, did not suffer them to enter the city, but met without the walls to hear what they had to offer in behalf of themselves, and their fellow-captives. After a warm debate, which lasted many hours, it was absolutely concluded against the redemption of those unhappy men, who, it was pretended, had acted the part of cowards in not retiring with their fellow-soldiers to Canusium (O). The prisoners being thus left to the mercy of the Carthaginian, he sent the most considerable among them to Carthage, and of the rest made gladiators, obliging them to fight with one another, even relations with relations, for the entertainment of his troops.^b

At length Hannibal left Cannæ, and took his rout towards Compsa, a city of the Hirpini, near the head of the Aufidus, which surrendered to him, and was the first that fell off from the Romans. From thence he turned towards Capua, the inhabitants of which city, thinking the time now come to shake off the Roman yoke, and recover their ancient liberty, sent deputies to treat with Hannibal, who promised them an intire liberty and independence, and besides agreed to put into their hands four hundred Roman knights, to be exchanged with the same number of Capuan youths in the service of Rome. Upon these conditions the Capuans surrendered their city to Hannibal. As to the Roman garison, the people contrived to shut them up in the public baths, and suffocate them there. When Hannibal made his entry, all the town crowded to meet him, except Decius Magius, a friend of the Romans, and a small number of the nobility, among whom was one Perola, the son of Pacuvius, who had been the chief author of the revolt. Perola was afterwards obliged by his father to go and pay his homage to Hannibal; but as he had imbibed the sentiments of Magius, he afterwards formed a design to stab the Carthaginian general at a magnificent entertainment, which his father was to give him. But Pacuvius, to whom he imparted his intention, in hopes of gaining his consent, dissuaded him from it; and Hannibal escaped this danger. The next day the senate of Capua being assembled, Hannibal complained to them of the disaffection of Magius, who was thereupon delivered up to him loaded with irons, and by his orders put on board a ship bound for Carthage. But the vessel being driven by a storm into the port of Cyrene, a city belonging to the king of Egypt, the illustrious prisoner ran and embraced the statue of Ptolemy Philopator; and the Carthaginians not daring to drag him from that sanctuary, he appealed to the king, and was conducted to Alexandria, where Ptolemy received him with great humanity, and gave him leave to return either to Capua, or to Rome; but he chose to continue at Alexandria under the protection of his deliverer.^c

AND now Hannibal dispatched his brother Mago to give an account at Carthage of his success. As soon as he arrived there, he acquainted the senate, that Hannibal in

(O) More pressing reasons than the pretended cowardice of the captives, prevailed on the senate to conclude against their redemption. They were afraid of enriching Hannibal with the ransom-money, and at the same time willing to let him know, that Rome was not so destitute of men, but she could spare several thousands. Besides, by this signal punishment Rome taught her soldiers this great lesson, that in such conjunctures they must either conquer, die, or live in perpetual slavery, which to a Roman was worse than death itself. One of the ten deputies mixed with the crowd, and disappeared. But Rome would not suffer the perjured wretch to reap the fruit of his iniquity. She ordered him to be taken out of his house, and sent back to Hannibal's camp. The republic was fond of purchasing the reputation of being just, when it cost little, and the state did not suffer by it.

- a six pitched battles had killed two hundred thousand Romans, and taken fifty thousand prisoners; and that the Apulians, Brutians, Lucanians, and Campanians, had submitted to the Carthaginian dominion. So much good fortune seemed incredible, and Mago was not believed, till he gave a glaring proof of it, by spreading abroad in the senate-house, some say, one bushel, others, three bushels of rings, taken from the Roman knights and senators (P). Having thus preposessed the senate in favour of his brother, he proceeded to solicit succours for him, that he might be enabled to carry on so successful a war. The request was approved of, and the Barcan faction triumphed. Himilco, the head of it, turning to Hanno, as it were, to insult him, Well, said he, has the war turned to the disadvantage of our country? Must we deliver up Hannibal to the Romans? Hanno, though thus provoked, answered with moderation: The war, said he, is successfully begun, I grant it; but I shall not be easy, till an end is put to it by a happy peace. Send me troops and provisions, says Hannibal. Is this the language of a conqueror, who is master of so many nations in Italy? The Roman republic, we are told, is reduced to the last extremity. Do the vanquished shew any signs of despair? Tell me, Mago, Do they make any advances towards a peace? Do they seem to desire it? Mago answered, that the Romans indeed, notwithstanding their losses, strove to put a good face upon their affairs, however desperate. I conclude then, resumed Hanno briskly, that we are scarce any farther advanced, than we were the day Hannibal entered Italy. We have indeed done enough to obtain an advantageous peace with Rome; and that ought to be our utmost view. One single defeat may undo all our mighty projects. I therefore vote against sending any succours to the army in Italy. If Hannibal has really gained these great victories, he needs no supplies; if he sends us false accounts, he deserves none. But notwithstanding Hanno's speech, an immediate supply of four thousand Numidians, forty elephants, and a thousand talents of silver, were by a plurality of voices decreed for the army in Italy. Nor was this all; a commissioner was sent with Mago into Spain with powers to raise levies there, which were to be equally divided between the Carthaginian armies in Spain and Italy. Asdrubal, who had just obtained a signal victory over the revolted Spaniards, and subdued the country of the Carpetani, was ordered to leave Spain, and march with his army to the assistance of his brother in Italy. In his room Himilco was sent into Spain with a competent army, and a sufficient number of galleys to keep the seas. But in the mean time the two Scipio's, hearing that Asdrubal was advancing towards the Iberus in his way to the Pyrenees, and knowing of what dangerous consequence it would be for Rome, that Hannibal should receive so strong a reinforcement, resolved to oppose his passing that river. With this view they passed the Iberus, and having brought Asdrubal to a general engagement, gained a complete victory, which prevented the Carthaginian for some years from going into Italy. Thus the two Scipio's by their victories and prudent conduct in Spain made Rome amends for the losses she sustained in Italy.
- The dictator Junius, and the senate, encouraged by the news they received from Spain, carried on their preparations for the next campaign with great expedition, while Hannibal was losing his time at Capua, being captivated with the bewitching pleasures of that place. The dictator released from prison all criminals, and persons confined for debt, who were willing to enlist themselves. Of these he formed a body of six thousand foot, armed with the broad swords and bucklers which had been formerly taken from the Gauls. Then the Roman army, to the number of about twenty-

(P) Authors are divided about this prodigious quantity of gold rings. Pliny seems to insinuate, that Hanno carried with him to Carthage three bushels of rings. To make the thing the more credible, he tells us, that in the time of the second Punic war, all the citizens of Rome, without exception, assumed the right of wearing a gold ring (18). Florus says, that Hannibal sent to Carthage two bushels of gold rings, and that by them the senate judged of the number of Roman knights, who had lost their lives in the several battles Hannibal had gained (29). The most probable opinion, according to Livy, is, that one bushel of rings was sent to Carthage. The same author adds, that Hanno, to shew how great the loss of the Romans was, acquainted the senate of Carthage, that at Rome only knights, and the most considerable amongst the citizens, had the privilege of wearing gold rings. If all, without distinction, had enjoyed this privilege, as Pliny insinuates, Hannibal might well have sent three bushels of rings to Carthage after the many victories he had already gained. But the opinion most agreeable to the testimony of the ancients is, that only knights and patricians at this time were allowed to wear rings. Florus tells us, that Hannibal, to shew how many Romans had fallen in the battle, made a bridge with their dead bodies for his troops over the river Vergellus. What Florus says is confirmed by Valerius Maximus; but Polybius, Plutarch, and Livy, make no mention either of the river Vergellus, or of this new kind of bridge.

five thousand men, partly citizens, partly slaves, and partly criminals, marched out ^a of Rome under the command of the dictator. The remains of Varro's army, about fifteen thousand men, were kept by Marcellus at Casilinum in a readiness to march, whenever there should be occasion. At length Hannibal began to move from Capua in order to subdue the rest of Campania. He made a fruitless attempt upon Neapolis, and then turned towards Nola. But the inhabitants of that city were kept steady by the presence of Marcellus, who, leaving Casilinum, passed the Vulturnus, crossed the mountains of Suessula with incredible expedition, and unexpectedly appeared before Nola. Then the Carthaginian, after having made another unsuccessful attempt upon Neapolis, fell upon Nuceria, which, for want of provisions, was obliged to capitulate. From Nuceria he returned to Nola, with a design to besiege it, Marcellus having ^b shut himself up in the place with all his troops. The inhabitants were greatly inclined to favour Hannibal, and their affection for the Carthaginian was kept up by a young man of known valor, and great interest among the people, by name Bantius. He had served in the Roman armies with credit, and signalized himself at the battle of Cannæ, fighting near the consul Æmilius, till being covered with wounds, he dropt down on the field of battle, where he was found the next day and brought to Hannibal. As none of his wounds proved mortal, Hannibal, understanding that he was a native of Nola, took great care of him, and when he was cured of his wounds, sent him home without ransom. This friendly behaviour had its due effect on the mind of the generous Bantius. He returned to Nola wholly in the Carthaginian interest, and ^c gained over many of the chief citizens to his party. Marcellus could have easily destroyed him, but he chose rather to gain him. One day, when he came to wait on Marcellus, the Roman, pretending not to know him, asked him his name. My name, replied the young warrior with a great deal of modesty, is Bantius. What, are you the famous Bantius, answered the general, so much celebrated at Rome? I have often heard of you. It was not your fault that a Roman consul fell into the enemy's hands. How much blood did you lose in endeavouring to save his life! What pleasure is it to me, to see and embrace a brave man, who does honour to his country, and may be a means of saving Rome! Then Marcellus to tender embraces added presents, and in short rekindled in his heart his former love for Rome. The recovery of this single man brought many ^d Nolans over to Marcellus, who was informed by them of all the secrets of the Carthaginian party. This was the situation of affairs at Nola, when Hannibal appeared before it, not doubting but he should soon become master of a place, in which he had all the populace and most of the nobility on his side. But Marcellus having by sound of trumpet forbid any of the citizens to approach the ramparts, or even come out of their houses on pain of death, drew up his men within the walls, and sallying out at three several gates, fell unexpectedly upon Hannibal, killed five thousand of his men, and obliged the rest to retire in great confusion. In this action, which revived the courage of the Romans, by shewing them that Hannibal was not invincible, the number of the killed on the side of the Romans amounted only to five hundred ^e. Some ancient writers, quoted by Livy ^w, tell us, that the number of the dead on the side of the Carthaginians amounted to no more than two thousand three hundred; but add, that the Romans lost only one man in the action. This check was a sensible mortification to Hannibal, who thereupon left Nola, and marched to Acerra, a small city in that neighbourhood. But the Acerrani upon his approach with one consent abandoned their houses, and retired with their most valuable effects to those cities in Campania, which continued faithful to the Romans. The Carthaginian having made himself master of the empty city of Acerra, in order to recover his reputation, undertook the siege of Casilinum, a strong city on the banks of the Vulturnus, thinking it garrisoned by Campanians. But it had happened, that a body of Prænestines having found ^f the inhabitants, as they passed through their city, wavering in their fidelity to Rome, had cut their throats in the night, and possessed themselves of the walls. These had been afterwards reinforced by about four hundred Perusians from Hetruria, and a small number of Latins and Romans. As they were all men of bravery and resolution, they made such a vigorous defence, that Hannibal was obliged, after several fruitless attempts, to turn the siege into a blockade ^x. Having therefore left part of his troops in the camp, as winter now approached, he quartered the rest in the villages and open places of Campania, while he himself took up his residence in the voluptuous city

- a of Capua, where he got a thorough relish for pleasure, which brought him down to a level with the rest of mankind. The less he had been used to an effeminate life, the more he now indulged himself in it, spending most part of his time in feasting and revelling with the Capuan women. He was more frequently seen, says Valerius Maximus^{*}, among the young debauchees in a public place called Seplasia, than in his camp before Casilinum. Seplasia was a public place in Capua, whither all the debauchees resorted; and therefore so infamous, that it was deemed a crime in a Roman barely to appear there. Thus Capua proved more fatal to Hannibal, than Cannæ to the Romans. All the ancients reproach him more for the life he led at Capua, than for his having neglected to besiege Rome after the battle of Cannæ. The example of the general infected the soldiery; inasmuch that when he led them again in the spring to the siege of Casilinum, he found them quite altered, and as impatient of military toils as raw levies. They were followed by troops of dissolute women, and thinking it hard to live in tents, they deserted in crouds, and returned to Capua, and the other places in Campania, where they had spent the winter so much to their satisfaction. Hannibal, instead of attempting to storm the besieged town, endeavoured to reduce it by famine; and indeed the garison was brought to the utmost extremity for want of provisions. Two Roman armies were within reach of the place; but neither in a condition to relieve it. The dictator Junius was soon recalled to Rome to consult new auspices, and had forbid, before his departure, Sempronius his general of the horse, to undertake any thing during his absence. The brave Marcellus was willing to relieve the besieged at all events; but the inhabitants of Nola would not suffer him to leave them, imagining, that the blockade of Casilinum was only a feint, and that Hannibal's real aim was at their city. In the mean time the garison of Casilinum, being almost starved to death, were scarce able to carry their arms. Many of them, to avoid perishing with hunger, or falling into Hannibal's hands, put an end to their unhappy lives. Sempronius, greatly affected with the distress of these brave men, endeavoured to relieve them, by throwing first barrels of meal, and afterwards nuts, into the Vulturnus, which ran through the town. But this artifice being discovered, and all methods of supplying the city intirely stopped, Hannibal summoned the garison to surrender. But those brave men, preferring death to slavery, would not hearken to his summons, their hunger in the mean time not suffering them to spare any animals whatsoever, not even rats. Nay, at length they pulled off the skins of their bucklers, soiteden them in the water, and lived upon them with great frugality. Lastly, to give the enemy a proof of their constancy and resolution, they ploughed up the ground near their houses, and sowed it with pulse. When Hannibal heard this, he cried out, What then, do the besieged design to keep me here till their seed is come to maturity? From that time he shewed himself inclined to consent to a capitulation, which was soon agreed to by both parties on this condition, that the freemen should be allowed to march out of the town upon their paying seven ounces of gold a head. Thus Hannibal made himself master of Casilinum after a long blockade, during which the Prænestines and Perusians gave proofs of a constancy scarce to be matched by the Romans themselves. The inhabitants of Petilia, a city in the country of the Brutians, which Hannibal besieged next, gave him as much trouble as the garison of Casilinum; but was taken at last, the Romans not being in a condition to send them succours.

In the mean time, as the best part of the Roman nobility had lost their lives in the war, the conscript fathers began to think of filling up the vacant places in the senate; and because there were then no censors, they ordered Terentius Varro to nominate some person, who had been formerly censor, to be a second dictator, whose office should be wholly confined to this province. Terentius named M. Fabius Buteo, the oldest of the former censors; but did not allow him a general of the horse. Fabius discharged his office with great prudence; for he first chose to the senatorial dignity all those, who since the last censors had obtained curule magistracies; then those without exception, who had been tribunes of the people, plebeian ædiles, or quæstors; and lastly, such as had distinguished themselves in the army, or obtained any military rewards from their generals. Thus an hundred and seventy-seven new senators were created without jealousy, complaints, or contention; and the dictator had no sooner read the list to the people, than he abdicated his dignity, highly applauded by all ranks of men.

THE senate being thus filled up, the next business was to chuse consuls for the ensuing year. Sempronius Gracchus, general of the horse to the dictator Junius, and Posthumius Albinus, who commanded a body of troops in Cisalpine Gaul, were raised to the consulate. After the election of the consuls, the prætors, and other great officers of the state, were appointed; but in all these promotions Marcellus, notwithstanding the glory he had lately acquired, was intirely forgot, through the jealousy, as some writers conjecture, of the dictator Junius, who presided at the election of the new magistrates. The elections being over, the dictator returned to his camp; but the consul Sempronius continued in Rome to consult with the senate about the operations of the approaching campaign. But in the mean time news was brought to Rome, that Posthumius Albinus, who was just raised to the consulate a third time, had been cut off with all his army by the Boii in a vast forest, called by the Gauls the forest of Litana, which he had been obliged to cross. Hereupon the consul Sempronius, having assembled the senate, endeavoured to raise their dejected spirits, advising them among other things to withdraw all their forces out of Gaul, and other countries, and turn them against Hannibal, the only source of all their evils. If we can once drive Hannibal out of Italy, said he, the rebellious nations will be soon reduced again. This advice was followed, and all the troops of the republic ordered into the provinces near Hannibal. The army, which the dictator Junius had commanded, was given to the consul Sempronius. Marcellus's army, which consisted of those who had escaped the general slaughter at Cannæ, was commanded to go into Sicily, and continue there as long as the war should last in Italy. In exchange for them, the two legions, which had hitherto served in Sicily, were ordered to Italy to serve there under the consul, whom the centuries were soon to appoint in the room of Posthumius, who had been killed by the Boii. Terentius Varro, notwithstanding his late misconduct, was intrusted with the command of an army in Apulia with the character of proconsul. When the time came for the electing of a new consul, the tribes unanimously chose Marcellus, notwithstanding the intrigues of Sempronius, who, fearing he might be eclipsed by the extraordinary merit of that great man, had kept him out of the way. However, a storm, attended with dreadful claps of thunder, happening to rise during the assembly, it is incredible with what greediness the augurs took hold of this accident, to declare that the election of Marcellus was not agreeable to the gods. Marcellus was a plebeian, as was also his colleague Sempronius; and the patricians, unwilling to see two plebeian consuls at the same time, influenced the augurs to pronounce the election of Marcellus disagreeable to the gods. But the people would not have acquiesced to the declaration of the augurs, had not Marcellus shewed himself on this occasion as zealous a republican, as he was a great commander: for he refused to accept the fasces, though offered him by the whole body of the people, saying, that he had rather lead a private life, than enjoy the greatest honours in the republic, contrary to the will of the gods, and the inclination of any of his fellow-citizens. Then the famous Fabius Maximus was chosen in his stead, and raised a third time to the consulate.

WHILE the republic was busy in making these elections and preparations for pursuing the war, Hannibal made himself master of Consentia on the Crathis, of Croton, Locri, and several other cities in Great Greece. The Romans therefore took the field. Fabius put himself at the head of those troops, which the late dictator had commanded. Sempronius took upon him the command of the new levies made at Rome, consisting mostly of slaves, to whom were added twenty-five thousand auxiliaries. The prætor Lævinus was ordered to cover Apulia with two legions. Marcellus was appointed to command the troops with which he had defended Nola; but such among them as had escaped from the battle at Cannæ were sent over to Sicily, their room being supplied by two legions from that island. Lastly, Terentius Varro led an army into Picenum to defend that country, and raise recruits there.

AS Campania was now the seat of the war, the Campanians, who had espoused the cause of Hannibal, raised an army of about fourteen thousand men of their own nation, and put one Marius Alfius at the head of it. His first attempt was upon the city of Cumæ, which adhered to the Romans. The Cuman senators, and those of the other cities of Campania, used annually to meet at a place called Hamæ, not far from Cumæ, to perform a solemn sacrifice, and deliberate upon the general affairs of the province. Alfius formed a scheme of surprising on this occasion the senators of Cumæ; but they,

- a suspecting his design, gave notice of it to the consul Sempronius, who, as he lay within six miles of them, fell on the Campanian army in the night, killed two thousand of them, among whom was their leader Alfus, and put the rest to flight. However, as Hannibal was not far off, Sempronius, unwilling to expose his unexperienced troops to the danger of a battle, immediately retired, and shut himself up in Cumæ, which Hannibal invested; but was obliged to raise the siege after he had lost thirteen hundred men in that unsuccessful attempt. At the same time another Sempronius, surnamed Longus, who commanded a body of troops in Lucania, gained a considerable victory over Hanno, and Lævinus retook three cities in the country of the Hirpini, which had revolted to Hannibal. During these transactions ambassadors from Philip king of Macedon to Hannibal being intercepted and sent to Rome, the senate found, that a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive was actually concluded between the Macedonian and Carthaginian. In order therefore to keep the former out of Italy, Lævinus was ordered to imbarque at Tarentum, sail for Macedon, and find king Philip employment at home. And now Fabius, who had hitherto continued quiet in his camp at Cale, being well apprised that his rival's remissness was not feigned, as he had imagined, but real, boldly passed the Vulturnus, and crossing a large plain near mount Tifata, on which Hannibal was incamped, joined his colleague Sempronius at Cumæ. On the other hand Marcellus, who was incamped at Nola, made daily incursions into the countries of the Hirpini and Samnites, who had revolted to Hannibal, committing every-where dreadful
- c devastations. The Samnites, surprised to find Hannibal so unactive, and so little zealous in their defence, sent deputies to him, and by their repeated complaints prevailed upon him at last to come to their assistance. Upon his approach Marcellus retired behind the walls of Nola, which Hannibal immediately invested with his whole army. After he had for some days battered the walls with incredible fury, Marcellus, thinking it less dangerous to engage the enemy in the open field, than in the narrow streets of Nola, the walls being already half ruined, resolved to put the whole to the issue of a general action. Accordingly, he marched out with his men in good order, and after having obliged the Carthaginians, who were carrying on the siege, to retire to their camp, which was about a mile from the city, he drew up his small army in the plain
- d between the Carthaginian camp and the city. Hannibal could not persuade himself, that Marcellus, whose forces were so much inferior in number to his own, really designed to hazard a battle; however, after having encouraged his men with a short harangue, in which he treated the Romans with the utmost contempt, he advanced boldly, not doubting but the enemy would retire, at the sight of his army in battalia, behind the walls of the city. He was therefore greatly surprised, when he saw the Romans not only stand their ground, but at the very first onset put his advanced guard into disorder. Marcellus had armed his infantry with long pikes, used only at sea, and chiefly in boarding of ships, and taught them how to manage this new kind of weapon, in order to keep the enemy at a distance; so that the Carthaginians, who
- e carried only short javelins, finding it impossible to hurt the Romans, while they themselves were run through with their long pikes, began to retire, and, in spite of all Hannibal could do, to save themselves by flight to their camp. Marcellus pursued them close, and before they got to the camp killed five thousand of them, and took six hundred prisoners, nineteen standards, and two elephants, which with some others had been lately sent from Carthage. Marcellus lost about a thousand men, who were trod down by the Numidian horse, headed by Hannibal in person. The Romans, encouraged by this advantage, asked leave of their general to attack Hannibal's camp; but the wise Marcellus, without hearkening to their request, sounded a retreat, and returned to Nola, which he entered amidst the acclamations of the citizens. After this defeat,
- f Hannibal had the further mortification to be abandoned by twelve hundred and seventy-two of his best horse, partly Spaniards, and partly Numidians, who had crossed the Alps with him. Some discontent was, without all doubt, the occasion of their desertion; but they gave out, that the esteem they had conceived for the Romans, induced them to it. Be that as it will, they continued ever after faithful to the republic, and did her important services; for which they were, in their old age, rewarded with lands in their own countries, when the Romans had conquered Africa and Spain. Hannibal was so touched with the reproach, which this desertion of his old companions in victory threw upon him, that he left Campania, and retiring into Apulia, incamped near Arpi. He was no sooner gone, than Fabius, drawing near to Capua, laid waste
- g the whole country about it, and then incamped at Suessula within reach of Naples and and Nola, in order to succour them in case they were attacked. In the mean time ^a winter approaching, Fabius, either out of jealousy, or to lessen the expences of the republic, ordered Marcellus to disband his army, and to leave in Nola only a sufficient garison to defend it. Marcellus obeyed, but did not go to Rome with his disbanded troops, chusing rather to stay at Nola, than to be importuned at Rome by his friends, who were for his soliciting the consulate in the next election. As he had contributed more to the glory of the republic, and the discredit of Hannibal, than all the generals of Rome, and even Fabius himself, he was resolved to owe his promotion wholly to his merit and services; and therefore disdaining to offer himself as a candidate in the comitia, or to court the favour of the people, he spent the winter in tranquillity at Nola ^c.

^b DURING these transactions in Italy, the prætor Manlius Torquatus defeated the Sardinians, who had revolted, though assisted by an army sent from Carthage, under the command of Asdrubal, surnamed The Bald, killed twelve thousand of the enemy upon the spot, took Asdrubal himself with Hanno and Mago his chief officers prisoners, and reduced the whole island. The two Scipio's were equally successful in their wars in Spain, where with an army only of sixteen thousand men they gained a complete victory over Asdrubal, whose forces amounted to the number of sixty thousand. But the accounts which the senate received from Sicily, were not so satisfactory. Good king Hiero, who had continued so faithful to the republic for fifty years together, had lately ended his days there, and had been succeeded by his grandson Hieronymus, who, having insulted the Roman ambassadors, made a treaty of alliance with the Carthaginians, and was intirely governed by their councils. This gave no small uneasiness to the senate, who thereupon ordered new levies to be raised, and sent into Sicily. But in the mean time the consular year being near expired, Fabius returned to Rome to preside at the election of the new consuls. On the day appointed the tribes assembled, and the majority of the first tribe that voted nominated to the consulship T. Otacilius, and M. Æmilius Regillus, both men of merit, but yet not of such abilities as the present necessities required. Fabius therefore, interrupting the election for a short time, exhorted the tribes to chuse such consuls as they would name, if they were to appoint two generals to give Hannibal battle. As to those they had already ^d named, he told them, that he could not be so partial to them, as to think them capable of making head against the crafty and experienced African. He then ordered the first tribe to return to the voting-place, and give their suffrages anew. Otacilius, who was nearly related to Fabius, made at first some opposition to this; but the lictors, surrounding him with their axes, soon forced him to be silent. Then the tribes unanimously chose Fabius himself, and Claudius Marcellus; though absent. Rome had never seen two greater men together at the head of affairs. Fabius had indeed by an irregular proceeding contributed to his own continuance in the consular dignity, contrary to law and custom; but yet no one accused him of ambition or tyranny, or imagined him actuated by any other motive than that of zeal for his country. The first ^e thing the new consuls did was to raise six legions to be added to the twelve already on foot. As the Sicilian expedition seemed to require most dispatch, Otacilius was ordered to imbarque with all expedition for that island; and in order to equip a fleet for that service, each head of a family, who by the last censor's register was found worth from fifty thousand to a hundred thousand asses, was obliged to maintain a rower or sailor at his own expence for six months; and the more wealthy, three, five, seven, in proportion to their riches. The senators obliged themselves to maintain eight men, each for one year; so that a fleet was soon manned and equipped without being any ways chargeable to the republic ^d.

^f AND now the land-forces began to be in motion, when the Capuans, terrified at the extraordinary number of the forces of the republic commanded by so many able generals, recalled Hannibal, who, quitting Apulia, and returning to his camp on mount Tifata, ordered Hanno at the head of seventeen thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to seize Beneventum. But Sempronius, by the direction of Fabius, having got to that city before the Carthaginian, made himself master of it, and then marched to meet Hanno, in order to give him battle. Sempronius's army consisted mostly of Volones, and the general, in order to engage them to exert themselves, promised every man his liberty, who should bring off the head of an enemy, the senate having im-

- a powered him to set at liberty such of his slaves as he pleased. No soldiers ever shewed a greater eagerness to engage an enemy, than the volones did after Sempronius had made them this promise. They ranged themselves round the prætorium by break of day, soliciting the general to lead them against the enemy, that they might deliver themselves from slavery either by death or victory. Sempronius did not suffer their ardor to cool, but immediately led them into a neighbouring plain, through which Hanno was to pass, as Sempronius had been informed, on his march to Beneventum, not knowing that the Romans were already masters of that city. Accordingly, the Roman army was scarce drawn up, when Hanno appeared at the head of seventeen thousand foot, mostly Brutians and Lucanians, and twelve hundred Numidian horse. The Carthaginian advanced in good order into the plain, not doubting but he should soon put to the rout a handful of slaves accustomed to tremble, as he told his soldiers, at the voice of their masters. In the mean time the trumpets sounded, and the attack began with incredible fury on both sides. The volones fought with great bravery; but the promise Sempronius made them had like to have occasioned an intire defeat of his army. He had promised liberty to such only as carried off the head of an enemy; Sempronius as soon therefore as any of them had dispatched his antagonist, he made it his whole business to cut off his head, and lost a great deal of time in that butchery. Besides the ardor of those who had performed the condition on which they were to obtain their liberty, immediately abated; so that Sempronius was forced to publish a new declaration through all the ranks of his army, That none should obtain their liberty, unless the Carthaginians were routed. Upon this the brave slaves renewed the fight with fresh vigor, and gained so complete a victory, that scarce two thousand of the enemy escaped. Sixteen thousand of them were killed either on the field of battle, or in the camp, which the volones forced after they had driven them out of the plain. However, four thousand of Sempronius's slaves did not behave so well as the rest, being afraid to pursue the enemy to their camp. These, ashamed of their cowardice, retired after the battle to a high mountain for fear of becoming the jest of their companions. But Sempronius sent a tribune to invite them back; and then, to perform his promise, declared them all free without exception. However, to make some distinction between the brave and the cowards, he obliged the latter to take their meals standing, all the time they were in the service.*

- In the mean time Hannibal, leaving his camp on mount Tifata, took his rout to Nola, being invited thither by the populace, who were still in his interest, in opposition to the senate. But Marcellus, receiving timely notice of his march, followed him, and coming up with him near that city, killed two thousand of his men, with the loss only of four hundred. The Romans would in all likelihood have given him a total overthrow, had Claudius Nero, whom the consul had detached with a body of horse to take a large compass, and fall upon the Carthaginians in the rear during the action, come up in time. Marcellus offered Hannibal battle the next day, but he declined it, and decamped in the night, laying aside all thoughts of taking Nola, which had so often proved fatal to his glory. From Nola he led his army to Tarentum, where some Tarentine prisoners, whom he had formerly sent home without ransom, had engaged many young men in his interest. But the proprætor Levinus, who guarded that coast, took such effectual means to prevent the designs of the factious, that the Carthaginian being again disappointed, abandoned the enterprize, and took the road to Salapia, a city in Apulia, with a design to spend the winter there. As the season was not yet far advanced, Fabius undertook the siege of Casilinum, which was garrisoned by two thousand Campanians, and seven hundred Carthaginians, under the command of a Capuan of distinction, named Statius Metius. The consul had no sooner invested the place, than Magius, prætor of Capua, which was but two miles from Casilinum, formed a strong body of troops, and armed even the slaves, with a design to attack the Romans in their trenches. Fabius receiving intelligence of these preparations, wrote to his colleague Marcellus, either to come in person, or to send the prætor Sempronius with two legions, to cover the siege. Hereupon Marcellus, leaving only two thousand men in Nola, for Hannibal was then in winter-quarters in Apulia, marched with the rest of his army to join Fabius. And now the two greatest generals Rome had, acted together for the first time, the one carrying on the siege, and the other covering it with an army, ready to engage Hannibal or the Capuans, in case they should attempt to relieve the place. The garison made so vigorous a defence, a that Fabius, discouraged by the daily slaughter of his men, would have raised the siege, had not Marcellus pressed him to pursue it; which he did with such vigor, that the Campanians, having lost all hopes of being relieved either by Hannibal or their prætor Magius, sent deputies to Fabius, asking leave to march out of the place, and return to Capua. The consul consented to what they asked, knowing it would not be long ere the city surrendered, when defended only by a small number of Carthaginians. But Marcellus, watching the time, when the Campanians were to march out of the city, seized the gate before fifty of them were out, and entering the place, put all to the sword, without distinction, who opposed him. Those who threw down their arms, whether Capuans or Carthaginians, were made prisoners of war, and b sent to Rome, Marcellus pretending that he was not obliged to stand to the agreement made by his colleague. Fabius being now master of Casilinum, laid waste great part of Campania, killed or took prisoners near twenty-five thousand men, made incursions into Samnium, where he surprised three hundred and seventy Roman deserters, and sent them to Rome, where they were first beaten with rods, and then thrown down the Tarpeian rock. Fabius had also the satisfaction to hear that his son had gained great glory in Apulia, where he took the city of Accua, almost in sight of the Carthaginian army. As for Marcellus, he returned to Nola, where he was seized with a distemper, which for some time suspended his martial ardor f.

In the mean time Philip king of Macedon, who, as we have observed above, had c concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with Hannibal, began to move, and draw towards Italy. He first laid siege to Apollonia, a city at the head of the Adriatic sea; but not succeeding in that design, he turned his arms against Oricum; the inhabitants of which city immediately sent notice of their danger to the prætor Lævinus, who, in two days after the news, arrived at Oricum; and finding the city already taken, easily recovered it, and then formed a design of surprising in the night the king of Macedon in his camp; and executed it with such success, that Philip himself had fallen into the prætor's hands, had not a party of Macedonians, more resolute than the rest, carried him off half naked to his ships. Lævinus killed about three thousand Macedonians, and took near twice that number of prisoners. The Macedonian fleet, which d lay in the port of Oricum, not being able to get out to sea, by reason the Roman fleet barred up the mouth of the harbour, Philip was obliged to set fire to his ships, and return by land to his own territories with the miserable remains of his shattered army e. But Hannibal soon made himself amends for this disappointment on the side of Macedon, by the troubles he found means to raise in Sicily; where, after several plots, counterplots, and assassinations, Hippocrates and Epicyles, the two agents, whom Hannibal had sent to make a treaty with king Hieronymus, were by the Syracusians chosen into the college of prætors; so that Syracuse being now wholly devoted to the Carthaginian interest, it was thought necessary to send Marcellus with his army from Nola to the assistance of Claudius and Lentulus, the two Roman prætors in Sicily. But as to the particulars of this glorious expedition, we refer our readers to our history of Sicily, where we have given a distinct account of all the transactions in that island both civil and military from the death of king Hiero to the intire reduction of the city and kingdom of Syracuse by the brave Marcellus h.

In Spain the two Scipio's gained great advantages over the Carthaginians, who in two battles lost above twenty thousand men. The fruit of these successes was the retaking of Saguntum, the city which had given rise to the war: The old inhabitants, of whom few were now alive, were reintituted in their possessions, and the Turdetani, who had formerly joined Hannibal against that faithful city, being obliged to surrender at discretion, were made slaves, and sold by auction i.

THE consulship of Fabius Maximus and Marcellus being now expired, the conscript fathers, to keep these two great men at the head of the armies without infringing the laws, continued Marcellus in Sicily with the title of proconsul, and made him governor of all those territories, which had formerly belonged to king Hiero. As for Fabius, that he might still have the conduct of those forces, which were to act against Hannibal, the centuries raised his son Q. Fabius to the consulate, knowing that the father, who offered to serve under him, would have the chief direction of the campaign. With young Fabius was joined Sempronius Gracchus, who with an army of volones had

The other generals were continued in their respective commands; the two Scipio's remained in Spain; Terentius Varro in Picenum; Mucius Scaevola in Sardinia; Otacilius commanded the fleet in Sicily, and Valerius Laevinus a squadron at Brundisium, to watch the motions of the king of Macedon; the prætor Fulvius had the command of two legions near Suessula, and Sempronius Tuditanus was sent with a body of troops into Cisalpine Gaul. After the consuls had continued at Rome as long as was necessary to calm the fears of the people in relation to some odd events, which superstition made formidable, young Fabius went to take upon him the command of the army, which was incamped near Suessula; and Sempronius at the same time set out for Lucania, where it had fallen to his lot to act. Fabius,
- b pursuant to his father's directions, opened the campaign with the siege of Arpi, in Arpi taken by the Romans, which was a garison of five thousand Carthaginians. As the city was weak on one side, but deemed impregnable on the other, the troops in the town, believing it would be undoubtedly attacked on the weaker side, all repaired thither; which gave the Fabii an opportunity of surprizing the place in the night. After this the Fabii made it their whole business to follow Hannibal, who did not so much as attempt any considerable enterprise, during this campaign, but contented himself with standing on the defensive. The prætor Fulvius near Suessula watched the motions of the Capuans, and was much surprized to see an hundred and twelve brave men of their nobility arrive at his camp, and declaring an abhorrence of the revolt of their countrymen, demand
- c to be received again into the friendship of the Romans. This change in the minds of the nobility plainly shewed how much Hannibal had lost his credit. The prætor Sempronius Tuditanus besieged and took by storm the city of Aternum in the country of And Aternum. the Marrucini; and with the booty he found there, and the ransom of seven thousand prisoners, much enriched the treasury of the republic. The consul Sempronius gained considerable advantages in Lucania, and obliged part of Brutium to return to its former obedience. In Spain the two Scipio's not only made great progress, but extended their views even to Africa, where they engaged Syphax king of Masæsyliæ, the western part of Numidia, to take arms against Carthage. But on the other hand, the Carthaginians, alarmed at the motions of Syphax, prevailed on Gala king of Masæsyliæ, the
- d eastern part of Numidia, to join them. Gala himself was no warrior, but had a son in the flower of his age, whose inclinations were wholly for war. The young prince's name was Masinissa; he was then only seventeen years old; but his genius and conduct were such as made the Masæsylians conclude, that he would both enrich and enlarge his father's dominions. Gala put him at the head of his troops, and the young warrior, joining the Carthaginians, fell so vigorously and so seasonably on the Masæsylians, that they were intirely routed, and lost thirty thousand men in the action. Syphax defeated by Masinissa. The vanquished king retired into Mauritania, made new levies, and prepared to pass the streights, and join the Scipio's in Spain. But the great Masinissa gave him a second overthrow, which put him out of a condition of trying the fortune of arms again for
- e a long time^{*}.

AND NOW the time for the new elections drawing near, as both consuls were engaged abroad, Sempronius, the elder of them, nominated C. Claudius Centho dictator to hold the comitia, in which Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, were chosen consuls for the new year. At the same time P. Cornelius Scipio, and his brother Lucius, the sons of the proconsul in Spain, were elected curule ædiles, though the elder was but twenty years of age, and the laws required that every candidate for that office should be thirty. The personal merit of young Cornelius Scipio, and that of his father and uncle, made the people dispense with their old customs[†]. While the new consuls were busy at Rome in raising two legions to be added to the twenty-one already on foot, and in prosecuting some publicans guilty of notorious frauds, Hannibal having made himself master of Tarentum by the treachery of the inhabitants, laid siege to the citadel, whither Livius, the commander of the Roman garison in the city, had retired. Hereupon the consuls, leaving Rome, joined their forces; and in order to divert the Carthaginian from pursuing the siege he had undertaken, entered Campania, laid waste the country round Capua, and threatened that city with a siege. The Capuans immediately dispatched deputies to Hannibal, intreating him to hasten to their assistance, and acquainting him, that by the devastation of their fields, they began already to feel the miseries of a siege. The Carthaginian, unwilling ling to raise the siege of the citadel, which began to be streightened for want of provisions, ordered Hanno with an army from Brutium to the relief of his favourite city. Hanno, pursuant to his orders, left Brutium; and having collected an immense quantity of corn, pitched his camp near Beneventum, ordering the Capuans to send their waggons to fetch it from thence. In the mean time the consuls, being informed by the people of Beneventum of all that passed, Fulvius marched thither with all expedition, and entering the town in the night unknown to Hanno, appeared the next morning by break of day before the enemy's camp. Two thousand waggons were arrived from Capua, and the peasants, mixing with the soldiers, caused great confusion. However, as the camp was situated upon an ascent, and therefore very difficult to be taken by assault, the consul was for quitting the enterprize, or at least suspending it till the arrival of his colleague. But the legionaries signalized their bravery on this occasion beyond the expectation of their general. One Vibius, a centurion of the Latin troops, and after his example Pedanius, a centurion of the third Roman legion, threw each a standard over the enemy's ramparts, crying out, Let us be the curse of all men, if we do not recover these ensigns out of the enemy's hands. Hereupon the soldiers, encouraging each other, crossed the ditch, and climbing up the rampart, in spite of all opposition, forced the Carthaginian camp, and made a dreadful slaughter of their troops. Above six thousand of them were killed, and about seven thousand made prisoners. The booty was exceeding great; corn, forage, waggons, horses, Hanno's baggage, the utensils of the Carthaginians, and whatever they had brought from the neighbouring countries, fell a prey to the Roman soldiers. As for Hanno, he made his escape, attended only by a small body of horse, and through by-roads returned into Brutium.

Hanno defeated, and his camp taken by the Romans.

THE taking of the Carthaginian camp, and the absence of Hanno, threw the Capuans into the utmost consternation. Being more apprehensive of a siege than ever, they sent a new deputation to Hannibal, pressing him to come to their assistance. But he was so intent upon reducing the citadel of Tarentum, that he could not be prevailed upon to move from thence. Hereupon the consuls drew near to Capua, with a design to besiege it in form. As they did not doubt but Hannibal would hasten to the relief of his faithful Capuans, they ordered Sempronius Gracchus to leave Lucania, and encamp with his army of volones in the neighbourhood of Capua. Sempronius had already named his successor to command in that province, and was preparing for his march, when one Fulvius, a Lucanian, who had been hitherto very zealous for the interest of Rome, changed his inclination on a sudden, and in order to recommend himself to the Carthaginians by some signal service, resolved to betray the proconsul to them. The traitor, abusing the confidence Sempronius placed in him, told him, that before he left Lucania, he would fain procure him the glory of uniting all the hearts of his countrymen in the interests of Rome, and pretended, that the heads of the Carthaginian faction desired a private conference. The brave Roman, not suspecting any deceit, went to the place appointed, attended only with his lictors, and a small body of horse. But he no sooner arrived, than he was surrounded by a great body of horse and foot under the command of Mago, who had concealed himself behind a neighbouring hill. The proconsul, finding it impossible to make his escape, cried out to his small troop, We are betrayed, and must die. Let us therefore signalize the last of our days with a behaviour worthy of Romans. Let us turn our arms chiefly against the traitor Fulvius, and send him to the infernal regions before us. Having thus spoke, he dismounted, and wrapping his left arm in his paludamentum, or military cloak, for want of a buckler, flew sword in hand to the place, where he saw Fulvius, in hopes of killing the traitor before he fell himself. But he perished in the attempt, the Carthaginians being obliged by the great slaughter he made in the heart of their battalions to dispatch him, though they had been ordered by Mago to take him alive. Thus perished one of the best generals of the republic at a time when she abounded with great men. The body of this great man was carried to Hannibal's camp, who could not help shewing marks of esteem for so great a commander. He erected a funeral pile for him at the gate of his camp, and ordered his cavalry to make their evolutions round it in honour of the deceased. Upon his death the volones, thinking themselves discharged from their military oath, disbanded, so that the consul's project of besieging Capua was a little disconcerted.

The proconsul Sempronius betrayed and killed.

^b Idem ibid. c. 16.

- a To this misfortune was added another on the side of Spain, which threw the republic into the utmost consternation. News was brought to Rome, that both the Scipio's were killed. The circumstances of their death are thus related : The Carthaginians had three armies in Spain commanded by three officers of reputation, viz. Asdrubal Hannibal's brother, Mago, and another Asdrubal, the son of Gisco. The two latter had united their forces, and encamped together ; the former commanded an army apart, but without removing far from his colleagues. The two Roman generals likewise separated, and divided their troops. Publius, who was proconsul, and the eldest, took two-thirds of the Roman soldiers, and leaving his brother the rest with thirty thousand Celtiberian auxiliaries, marched towards the post, which Mago and his colleague possessed, about five days journey from the Roman camp. During his absence, the Celtiberians, being bribed by Asdrubal with large sums, deserted their general, and marching away, left him in a melancholy situation. His brother Publius was already a great way off, and he was no ways in a condition, having but a handful of Romans with him, either to keep thirty thousand Celtiberians in awe, or without them to defend his camp against the numerous forces of Asdrubal. His only refuge therefore was to retire, and keep at a distance from the enemy, which he did accordingly, passing the Iberus, and keeping that river between him and Asdrubal's army. In the mean time his brother Publius, arriving after five days march at the post, which Mago and Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, possessed, was informed, that Masiniissa, after having conquered Syphax in Africa, had passed the streights, and joined the Carthaginians with his victorious army. This gave no small uneasiness to the proconsul, who expected to engage only the Carthaginians under the command of Mago, and the son of Gisco. Notice was brought him at the same time, that a Spanish prince, named Indibilis, was in full march from the country of the Lacetani, where he reigned, to join the Carthaginians with seven thousand five hundred men. Upon this intelligence, he decamped in the night with a design to obstruct the march of Indibilis, and fight him before he reached the enemy's camp. Accordingly, the next morning he met him, and had already surrounded him on all sides, when all on a sudden Masiniissa, who had narrowly watched his motions, appeared at the head of a numerous body of Numidian horse, and unexpectedly attacked the Roman army in flank. The fight was then renewed with great fury on both sides. Indibilis returned with his Lacetani to the charge ; and at the same time Mago, and the son of Gisco, arriving, contrary to the proconsul's expectation, attacked his army in the rear. The brave Scipio, thus surrounded by three armies, flew from manipulus to manipulus, fighting as a common soldier in one place, and giving orders as a general in another. Thus by his activity, and undaunted courage, he kept up the spirits of his legionaries, who withstood with an unparalleled bravery the numerous forces of the enemy, till their gallant commander was run through with a lance, and left dead on the spot. Hereupon the Numidian horse, who saw him fall, gave a great shout, crying out, The Roman general is dead. The death of so brave a commander damped the courage of the Romans, who thought of nothing now but retiring in good order. They cut their way, sword in hand, through the enemy's infantry ; but Masiniissa, falling upon them with his Numidian cavalry, put them in disorder, and made such a dreadful havock of them, that not one of the Romans would have escaped, had not night, which very seasonably overtook them, obliged the Numidian to give over the pursuit.

The two Scipio's defeated, and killed in Spain.

- In the mean time Cneius, knowing nothing either of the death of his brother, or the defeat of his legions, kept advancing on the banks of the Iberus towards the provinces of Spain, which were well affected to the Romans ; when all on a sudden he saw a very numerous army advancing towards him, and was soon after informed, that his brother was killed, his army intirely defeated, and his troops either dispersed, or cut in pieces. At this news he sunk into a deep melancholy, and not being able to gain any better retreat, he posted himself on the top of an eminence, where the nature of the ground, which was very rocky, would not suffer him to make any fortifications but with the baggage of the army. In this post the small body he commanded was attacked by all the Carthaginian forces in Spain, under the conduct of the two Asdrubals, of Mago, Masiniissa, and their ally Indibilis, who after the defeat of Publius had united their forces, in order to fall upon Cneius, and put an end to the war in Spain at one blow. The Romans, though surrounded on all sides by numerous armies, forced their way through the enemies battalions without so much as offering to surrender ; and gaining the neighbouring mountains, escaped through by-ways to the camp of the deceased proconsul, which they found guarded by a small number of troops under the command of T. Fonteius, one of Publius's lieutenants. As for the brave Cneius, he lost his life with a considerable number of legionaries in the action. Some writers tell us, that he retired, with some brave men, to a neighbouring tower, in which, the enemy having set fire to it, he was either stifled with the smoke, or burnt. Thus all the hopes of the Romans in Spain seemed extinguished by the death of the two Scipio's, who had been the chief support of the republic, and had done her greater services in those countries, than Hannibal had done her hurt in Italy. The conscript fathers now looked upon the affairs of Rome as quite ruined in Spain. But a young Roman knight, named C. Marcius, who had been brought up under Cneius, and had a wonderful genius for war, soon repaired the misfortunes which had made the wisest men in the senate despond. Marcius, not discouraged by the loss of two battles, put himself in motion, and being unanimously chosen general by the troops, he gathered together the fugitives, and repulsed Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, who came to attack him in his camp. The brave Marcius, encouraged with this success, formed a design, which would have been deemed a rash attempt, had not his present circumstances authorized it. The very next night he marched boldly to the enemy's camp, surprised it, and having shut up all the passages out of it, set fire to the tents, which were covered with thatch. In the general confusion, which the flames, and the shouts of the Romans occasioned, some of the Carthaginians hastened to the gates of the camp, where they were cut in pieces by the legionaries, who guarded them. Others leaped down from the top of the ramparts, but in endeavouring to make their escape, were intercepted by the squadrons, which Marcius had placed in all the avenues leading to the camp. As they were unarmed, and most of them naked, for Marcius surprised the camp in the dead of the night, the massacre was general. We are told, that the number of the dead on the side of the Carthaginians amounted to thirty-seven thousand, and that of the prisoners to eighteen hundred and thirty. Thus the mighty projects of the Carthaginian generals were intirely defeated, and Rome, notwithstanding the great losses she had sustained, maintained herself in possession of the provinces she had given up for lost.

Capua shut up on all sides by the Romans.

THE first care of the brave Marcius after so signal a victory was to dispatch couriers with letters to the senate, informing them of his success, and demanding succours and provisions to enable him to maintain the war. In these letters he unluckily styled himself proprator, a title which he had acquired only by a military election in the camp; and this slight offence against the authority of the haughty republic was resented to such a degree, that notwithstanding the important services of Marcius, the senate resolved to recal him, and send another general in his room. Nay, some were for treating him as a criminal, and citing him as such to appear forthwith before the tribes. But the greater number chose to act a more moderate part, and suppressing the title of proprator in their answer, sent Marcius word, that they would take care to supply the Roman soldiers in Spain with cloaths and provisions. They thought it a dangerous precedent for the legions to assume the liberty of chusing their own commanders; and therefore they thought it necessary to convene the tribes, as soon as they conveniently could, in order to appoint another commander in the room of Marcius. But in the mean time the consular year being ready to expire, Appius Claudius was recalled from Capua to preside in the comitia, when P. Sulpicius Galba, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, were raised to the consular dignity. Apulia was assigned to them for their province, while the late consuls were, in quality of proconsuls, to continue the siege of Capua, which they shut up on all sides, proposing to reduce it rather by famine, than by force. But notwithstanding the vigilance of the two proconsuls, a Numidian horseman, having crossed the Roman camp in the night, without being discovered, carried the news to Hannibal of the extremity to which the city was reduced. This engaged him at length to leave the blockade of the citadel of Tarentum, and march to the relief of the distressed city with his horse, his light-armed infantry, and thirty-three elephants. He found means to give the besieged notice when he intended to attack the Romans, ordering them to make a vigorous sally at the same time. The proconsuls, upon the first notice of the approach of the enemy, divided their troops, Appius taking upon him to make head against the garison, and Fulvius to defend the

- a intrenchments against Hannibal, who at the time agreed on before-hand with the Capuans began the attack with incredible fury, while the garison, under the command of Hanno and Bostar, two Cartbaginian generals, fell upon the Romans at the same time. Appius Hannibal attempts in vain to relieve Capua. found no difficulty in repulsing the garison; and would have entered the city with them, had he not been wounded at the very gate, and by his wound disabled from pursuing his design. As for Fulvius, he found it more difficult to withstand the troops of Hannibal, who exerted themselves with such courage, resolution, and intrepidity, as can hardly be expressed. A body of Spaniards and Numidians had even the boldness to pass the ditch, and in spite of all opposition, climbing the ramparts, penetrated into the Roman camp. But as they were not seconded by the other troops, they were
- b all to a man cut in pieces, which so disheartened the Cartbaginian general, especially after the garison was repulsed, that he sounded a retreat, which was made in good order. Some writers tell us, that eight thousand of Hannibal's army, and three thousand of the Capuan garison, were killed upon the spot, and that fifteen colours were taken from the former, and eighteen from the latter. Be that as it will; for there is a great disagreement among authors as to the number of the dead; it is certain, that Hannibal was much perplexed what step to take next, it being impossible for him to subsist long in a country, which was ruined, and laid waste. At length he formed a design worthy of himself, and the fittest to support his glory and credit. He resolved to march directly to Rome, and surprise that capital, while the inhabitants expected nothing
- c less than to see Hannibal at their gates. One advantage at least he concluded would attend this enterprize, which was a diversion of the Roman forces before Capua; by which means provisions might be conveyed more easily into that city. That the Capuans might not be so disheartened by his absence as to hastily surrender, he found means to acquaint them with his design. The news of Hannibal's approach caused great apprehensions at Rome. Some of the senators were for calling all the armies in Italy into the neighbourhood of Rome. But the great Fabius opposed this opinion, telling the conscript fathers, that Hannibal's design was not to take Rome, but to deliver Capua. However, a middle way was taken, and messengers were sent to the proconsuls, informing them of the state of affairs, and leaving it to their judgment,
- d either to continue both before Capua, or for one of them, with such forces as could be spared, to come to the relief of the capital. Upon this it was agreed by the two colleagues, that Appius should continue before Capua, and that Fulvius with fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, should march to Rome. He set out accordingly, but took a different rout from Hannibal, the latter going by the Latin way, and the former by the Appian. The Roman troops were plentifully supplied with provisions on their march by the allies and subjects of Rome; so that they met with no obstruction, except in passing the Vulturnus, Hannibal having seized and burnt all the boats, which obliged the proconsul to spend some time in cutting timber, and making rafts to convey over his troops. As for Hannibal, he took a great compass
- e before he came in sight of Rome. From Capua he went to Cale, and from thence to Sidicinum; from Sidicinum he directed his march to Suessa, then to Allise. From this latter place he returned to the Latin way, and passing through Casinum, Aquinum, and Interamna, incamped in the plains of Fregellæ. Hereupon the Fregellani, having first sent one of their citizens with orders to travel night and day, in order to acquaint the senate with the approach of Hannibal, broke down their bridge on the Liris, which stopped the enemy's march for some time. However, after he had laid waste the lands of the Fregellani, and built a new bridge over the Liris, he arrived at length by the Prænestine way within eight hundred paces of Rome. The alarm, which the approach of so formidable an enemy gave in all the quarters of the city, is not to be expressed.
- f Fulvius was not yet arrived with his reinforcement, which occasioned great uneasiness, and doubled their fears, the more timorous, especially the women, whose shrieks were heard in all the streets, believing he had been cut off with his whole army by Hannibal. But while the city was in the utmost alarm, the proconsul appeared with his troops, and entered Rome by the gate Capena, having first received from the senate an authority equal to that of the consuls for the better discharge of his employment. He marched through the city, and incamped with his army between the gates Esquilina and Collina. The ædiles were charged to supply the camp with provisions, and all sorts of ammunition; and the two consuls, who had not yet left Rome, with the senate, went thither to hold a council of war, in which due measures were taken for
- g the defence of the city. The situation of Fulvius's camp was approved, and all the officers officers were assigned their posts. The ramparts were lined with soldiers ; troops were a stationed at proper distances within the walls ; and the senate thought it necessary to keep their assembly continually sitting in the forum, to be ready against all emergencies. These dispositions so much intimidated Hannibal, that despairing to compass his design of making himself master of Rome, he retired about three miles farther from it, and incamped beyond the Anio. Nevertheless, as he had the curiosity to satisfy himself of the condition of the enemy, he advanced at the head of two thousand horse towards the gate Collina, and appeared over-against the temple of Hercules. The proconsul Flaminius, provoked at this insult, sent out a detachment of cavalry to attack him ; and at the same time, ordered the twelve hundred Numidians, who had formerly deserted from Hannibal, to support the Roman cavalry. As they had been b posted by Fulvius on mount Aventine, they were obliged to march through the city ; which they did in good order. But as the people did not know that the proconsul had any Numidians in his army, they imagined the city surprised, and such was the fright and consternation upon this false apprehension, that most of the inhabitants would have abandoned the city, had not Hannibal been at the gates. In this panic, many of the citizens took arms, and falling upon the Numidians, killed some of them before they were undeceived. At length the Numidians, with the utmost difficulty, made their way through the terrified crouds, joined the Roman squadrons, and with them obliged Hannibal to retire in some confusion to his camp. But as the Carthaginian general had no mind to give over the enterprise without being obliged to it by the loss c of a battle, in which he entertained great hopes of succeeding, he repassed the Anio, drew up his troops within reach of the enemy, and bid them defiance. Fulvius readily accepted the challenge, thinking he might venture a battle, almost without any danger, in fight, and at the foot of the ramparts of the city. Never were combatants more nearly concerned in interest, than both parties now were, to exert all their courage and resolution. To take or preserve Rome was the great end which the two armies proposed to gain by the victory. When all things were ready for the onset, a sudden and violent storm prevented the armies from engaging. The same thing happened the next day, when the storm returned with such violence, that both Romans and Carthaginians were obliged to return to their tents. To complete this prodigy, for d it is looked upon as such by some declamatory historians among the Latins, as soon as the armies had left the plain, the clouds disappeared, and the sun returned. Polybius, who lived in, or soon after, those times, and has given us a minute account of what passed on this occasion, makes no mention either of preparations for an engagement, or of prodigies that prevented it. It is therefore probable, that Hannibal continued quiet in his camp, watching some favourable opportunity of putting his project in execution. As Rome was no longer alarmed, the senate provided for all affairs abroad with as much tranquillity, as if the enemy had been at a great distance.

A good number of troops was sent to reinforce the army in Spain ; and this Hannibal looked upon as an insult. But he was more concerned, when he was told by a e deserter, that a piece of land in the place, where he was then incamped, had been sold at Rome as dear as if he had not been master of it. This exasperated him to such a degree, that he put up to sale the bankers shops round the forum, and after this bravado drew nearer to the city, and incamped at a small distance from the gate Capena (Q). But he soon retired again, and incamping on the banks of the Turia, about six miles from Rome, ravaged the neighbouring country, and then marched into the territory of Capena ; where he rifled a temple consecrated to the goddess Feronia, carrying thence a considerable booty in gold and silver. He then pursued his march, passed the Liris, and drawing near Capua, fell unexpectedly on Appius's camp in the night. A great number of Romans were killed on the spot, and Appius forced to leave f

(Q) Festus tells us, that Hannibal, when near the city of Rome, saw spectres in the air, which filled him with a sudden terror, and obliged him to turn back immediately ; and hence, according to that author, came the name Rediculus, which was given by the Romans to a new divinity of their own making. For after Hannibal's retreat, the Romans erected a temple in the way to the gate Capena, where he had incamped, consecrating it to the god Rediculus. Others derive this name from the word ridiculus, which signifies any thing that deserves to be laughed at. The ill success of Hannibal's enterprise, say they, made the Romans very jocos upon him ; and to perpetuate his shame, they erected a temple to the god Risus or Laughter, whom they styled rediculus or ridiculus. Varro, in his satire called Herrules tuam fidem, gives this god the name of Turanus, as if he had defended Rome against Hannibal. He makes this god speak thus :

*Noſtu Hannibalis cum fugavi exercitum Turanus hoc, Turanus Roma munuspor.
Hoc propter omnes, qui laborant, invocant.*

- a his camp, and fly to some eminences, where he intrenched himself, expecting every moment to be joined by his colleague Fulvius, who he apprehended could not be far off. But Hannibal, expecting to have all the Roman forces immediately upon him, abandoned all thoughts of relieving Capua, marched through Lucania and Brutium, and then entered the territory of Rhegium with such expedition, that he had like to have surprised the city. In the mean time Fulvius having rejoined his colleague before Capua, that city was soon reduced to the utmost extremity. The proconsuls offered to spare the lives of all those who should repair to the Roman camp; but not one Capuan accepted the offer. The commanders of the Carthaginian garison wrote letters to Hannibal, full of reproaches, and pressing him not to desert them in so shameful a manner. But
- b one of the Numidians, to whose care these letters were committed, being betrayed by his mistress, who had followed him into the Roman camp, both he and his companions were seized, and driven back into the city, after having been whipt, and had their thumbs cut off. At the sight of the maimed Numidians, the people in the utmost consternation obliged the senate to assemble, in order to deliberate about the proper means of delivering them from the calamities which threatened them. Fear brought the senators together; and the majority were for surrendering upon the best terms they could obtain. But Vibius Virius, the chief author of the revolt, opposed this motion, and in a long speech shewed them, that there was no room to hope for any favour from the Romans after so great provocations. He concluded his harangue, in which every
- c thing favoured of rage and despair, with these words; Death is our only remedy. I have prepared a great entertainment at my house; where after we have eat and drank plentifully, a cup of poison will end our days and misfortunes together. Let those who despise life, follow me. A glorious death will procure us respect from the enemy, and the perfidious Hannibal will lament the loss of allies, who did not deserve to be thus deserted and betrayed. Twenty-seven of the assembled followed Virius, and closed the entertainment, to which they were invited, with a cup of poison. The rest of the Capuans submitted to the Romans, who were no sooner in possession of the city, than they seized the Carthaginian garison, and all the Capuan senators. The Carthaginians were made prisoners of war; but the senators were tried by the proconsuls, and fifty-three of them, who
- d had been the most active against Rome, were sent to two neighbouring cities, twenty-five to Cale, and twenty-eight to Teanum, to be kept there under close confinement, till their fate was determined. For Appius being inclined to clemency, and Fulvius to severity, the dispute grew warm between them; and Appius, to put an end to it, referred the matter to the conscript fathers, and in the mean time sent the prisoners to the above-mentioned cities. But his colleague, without waiting for the decree of the senate, marched out of the camp at midnight, and hastening with two thousand horse first to Cale, and then to Teanum, caused the fifty-three senators to be first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. He received, just before the execution of those at Teanum, letters from Rome with orders to suspend it; but he put the packet into his bosom, and
- e did not open the letters till all was over. And yet the republic never blamed him for this instance of severity; being, without all doubt, pleased to see herself revenged, without incurring the odious charge of inhumanity among her allies. As to the city of Capua, the republic kept to herself the property of those fruitful plains, and of the houses in the city; and transplanted thither freedmen to manure the lands. These were governed by a præfect sent thither annually to preserve order in the place, and to hear causes. As to the ancient inhabitants, they were deprived of their estates and effects, and dispersed without hopes of ever returning to their native city, some of them being sold for slaves, and others confined to several prisons, where they perished with hunger.
- f THE taking of Capua, in a manner before Hannibal's face, sunk his reputation in all the provinces of Italy. However, Philip king of Macedon, was preparing to come into Italy, pursuant to his engagements with the Carthaginian general. But the prætor Lævinus, having drawn some of the Greek states into a confederacy with Rome, found him so much work at home, that he gave over all thoughts of carrying his arms into Italy, as we have related at length in our history of Macedon.
- IN Spain, Claudius Nero, who had been sent to succeed the Scipio's, suffered himself to be shamefully outwitted by Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal. He had shut up the Carthaginians on a neck of land, where they were reduced to such straits, that Capua submits to the Romans.

Asdrubal promised to leave Spain with all his troops, provided the Romans would only grant them their lives. Claudius accepted the proposal; but the artful Carthaginian, starting every day new difficulties about evacuating the cities he possessed, found means to convey in the mean while most part of his troops over the mountains in the night-time without the knowledge of the enemy, who after the signing of the treaty, did not keep so watchful an eye over them. At length all the infantry gained the plains, Asdrubal being left in the camp with the cavalry only, and the elephants; and even these he found means to save by the help of a thick fog, which covered both armies. When the weather cleared up, Claudius found the Carthaginian camp deserted, and himself egregiously deluded. He pursued the enemy, but to no purpose; for Asdrubal, having joined his infantry, retired in good order, and escaped with the loss of a small number of his men, who were killed in some skirmishes between his rear-guard, and the van-guard of the Romans^r. The senate and people of Rome were much mortified, when they received this news; the centuries were immediately assembled to chuse a proconsul, capable of retrieving the glory of the Roman name in Spain. But no candidates appearing, by reason that employment was generally disliked, young Scipio, the son of the deceased proconsul, courageously offered himself for that hazardous enterprize. He was then but twenty-four years of age; and nevertheless, not only all the centuries, but every voter in each century, declared him proconsul of Spain^s. He imbarqued soon after at Ostia with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, on board a fleet of thirty quinqueremes, and set out for his province. c of Spain.

AND now the time for electing new magistrates drawing near, Fulvius Centumalus was recalled from Campania to preside in the comitia. The persons raised to the consular dignity were Marcellus, the fourth time, who had lately taken the city of Syracuse, and Lævinus, the second time, who lay sick at Anticyra in Greece, after having signalized himself against Philip of Macedon, as we have related in the reign of that prince. As soon as Lævinus arrived, both consuls applied themselves wholly to the preparations for the approaching campaign. Sicily fell to Lævinus, and Marcellus was ordered to march against Hannibal, who, since the reduction of Capua, was marched into Brutium. Marcellus began the campaign with the siege of Salapia in Apulia, which was betrayed to him by two leading men in the place. The Carthaginian garison, which consisted of five hundred brave Numidian horse, seeing themselves betrayed, resolved to sell their lives dear; and accordingly, quitting their horses, fought on foot, and made a great slaughter of the enemy, till they were all cut in pieces, except fifty, who surrendered themselves prisoners. From Apulia Marcellus marched into Samnium, where he recovered many cities, and took above three thousand Carthaginian prisoners. But in the mean time the Romans received two very considerable checks; the one at Tarentum, where a squadron of ships, which they had sent to supply the citadel with provisions, was intirely defeated by the Tarentine fleet; the other in Apulia, where the proconsul Fulvius Centumalus was surpris'd by Hannibal, and cut off with eleven legionary tribunes, and a great number of private men, some say thirteen thousand, others only seven thousand. However that be, this victory retrieved the affairs and credit of Hannibal, and greatly discouraged the Roman senate and people, whose only hopes were now in Marcellus. This brave consul was no sooner informed of the defeat and death of Fulvius, than he marched in quest of Hannibal, not doubting, as he wrote to the senate, but he should soon damp the joy that swelled the mind of the proud conqueror. He came up with him near Numistro in Brutium, and drawing up his men, offered him battle. The Carthaginian accepted the challenge; whereupon a bloody engagement ensued, which lasted the whole day without any considerable advantage on either side. The next morning Marcellus marched out his army at sun-rising, and drew it up in the same place, where the battle had been fought the day before. But Hannibal, not caring to hazard a second engagement, kept his troops close in their intrenchments, and decamped the night following. Marcellus pursued him from place to place; so that these two great generals spent the rest of the campaign, the one watching for an opportunity to come to a general action, the other endeavouring to avoid it^t.

WHILE the Carthaginians were thus kept in awe by Marcellus in Italy, the arms of the republic in Spain prospered beyond expectation under the conduct of young Scipio; who by the gracefulness of his person, and his wonderful complaisance, gained, on

- a his first arrival, the hearts both of the Spaniards and Romans. The first time he reviewed his troops, he asked for the brave Marcus, tenderly embraced him at the head of the army, heaped marks of distinction upon him, took him near his person, and was not ashamed even to consult him, and on several occasions follow his advice. When the season allowed him to take the field, he bent all his thoughts on the executing a design, which he had formed before he left Rome. This design he now communicated to C. Lælius, the commander of his fleet, and his intimate and inseparable friend; but carefully concealed it from all others. His scheme was to surprise New Carthage, the capital of the Carthaginian empire in Spain, where all the enemy's treasures, machines of war, and naval stores, were lodged. It was agreed, that Lælius should shut up the port with his fleet, while Scipio invested the city by land. With this view the whole army passed the Iberus, and marching always in the night, arrived the seventh day early in the morning before New Carthage. Then he imparted his design both to the officers and soldiers, represented to them of what importance the reduction of that city would be with regard to the entire conquest of Spain, and told them, that Neptune had appeared to him, advised him to that enterprise, and promised him success. He added, that they would soon see a miracle wrought by the god in their favour. He knew the hour when the tide would ebb, and leave the city accessible to his land-forces on the side of the port; and he made use of this natural event, which was a mystery to the soldiers, to persuade them, that he had a supernatural knowledge. Having thus encouraged his troops, as soon as the tide ebbed, Scipio, at the head of five hundred resolute men, entered the basin, having learnt from some fishermen that it was fordable when the tide was out, and marching up to the waist through the water, scaled the walls, which on that side were very low, while the Carthaginians were wholly intent on repulsing the Romans, who attacked the city on the land-side. The confusion of the besieged was so great, when they saw the Romans within the walls, that they abandoned the ramparts, and gave the rest of the army an opportunity of breaking down one of the gates, and entering the city. Mago, who commanded in the town, retired with his garison, consisting of a thousand regular troops, and two thousand of the inhabitants, to the citadel; but was soon obliged to surrender at discretion.
- d The prisoners in all amounted to six thousand men, besides women, children, and slaves. The Africans were reduced to slavery; but the Spaniards were suffered to enjoy their estates, and live according to their own laws, only in subjection to Rome. Eighteen galleys belonging to the enemy were taken in the port, and an hundred and thirteen merchant-ships loaded with naval stores. In the granaries were found forty thousand bushels of wheat, and two hundred and sixty thousand bushels of barley; and in the armories an immense quantity of warlike machines of all sorts with seventy-four standards. As the city was taken by assault, Scipio gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers, ordering them to bring all the booty into the market-place; where, upon taking an inventory of the whole, he found among other valuable effects two hundred and sixty cups of gold, most of them weighing a pound, eighteen thousand three hundred pounds weight of silver money, and a prodigious quantity of plate. All the brass-money was distributed among the soldiers, and the rest of the rich spoils put into the hands of Caius Flaminius the quaestor. The hostages likewise, whom the Carthaginians had demanded of the cities and provinces of Spain, were all found in the city, and sent home by Scipio loaded with presents. As for Mago, and the other Carthaginian officers, they were put into the hands of Lælius, who treated them with great humanity *.

- AFTER this glorious day, the proconsul leaving Lælius to command in the city, returned with his army to the camp, and spent the night there. The next morning, his officers, knowing that he was a great admirer of the fair sex, brought to him a young virgin of extraordinary beauty. Where-ever she appeared, she charmed the eyes of all, and Scipio was struck at the first sight of her. But though he was in the prime of his age, unmarried, and under no restraint, he did not suffer himself to be blinded by his rising passion. He examined the beautiful captive concerning her country, birth, and engagements; and finding that she was betrothed to a Celtiberian prince, named Allucius, he ordered both him and the captive's parents to be sent for, and put her untouched into their hands, telling them, that the only return he expected from them was their friendship for his republic. The young Spaniard was

At length all the infantry gained drubal being left in the camp with the cavalry only, and the elephants these he found means to save by the help of a thick fog, which covered him. When the weather cleared up, Claudius found the Cartaginian himself egregiously deluded. He pursued the enemy, but to no purpose. drubal, having joined his infantry, retired in good order, and left a small number of his men, who were killed in some skirmish in the rear guard, and the van-guard of the Romans. The senate and people were much mortified, when they received this news; the centumvirs assembled to chuse a proconsul, capable of retrieving the loss in Spain. But no candidates appearing, by reason that emilius was disliked, young Scipio, the son of the deceased proconsul, was chosen for that hazardous enterprize. He was then but twenty-three years of age; theless, not only all the centuries, but every voter in the assembly chose him proconsul of Spain. He imbarqued soon after at Ostia with six thousand horse, on board a fleet of thirty quinqueremes.

AND now the time for electing new magistrates was come. Marcellus was recalled from Campania to preside in the comitia. The consular dignity were Marcellus, the fourth time, who had been consul before, and Levinus, the second time, who lay sick. Marcellus signalized himself against Philip of Macedon, as a brave prince. As soon as Levinus arrived, both commenced preparations for the approaching campaign.

Marcellus ordered to march against Hannibal, who, finding the city of Brutium which was betrayed to him by two leading citizens, a garison, which consisted of five hundred men, was betrayed, resolved to sell their lives dearly. He fought on foot, and made a great slaughter of the Carthaginians, except fifty, who surrendered. He then marched into Samnium, where he recovered a great number of Cartaginian prisoners. But in the winter he suffered considerable checks; the one at Tarentum, the other at Canusium.

He lost say thirteen thousand, others only recovered. He retrieved the affairs and credit of the Roman people, whose only hopes were now. He was sooner informed of the defeat at Canusium, not doubting, as he was, that Hannibal would swell the mind of the proud Marcellus. He drew up his army at Brutium, and drawing up his army to the challenge; whereupon a battle was fought without any considerable loss. Marcellus marched out his army at Brutium at four o'clock, he had been fought the day before. He kept his troops close, and did not engage. Marcellus pursued him till the rest of the campaign. He was defeated in the action, the other endeavored to recover.

so transported with joy, that he could not so much as return Scipio thanks. As for ^a the parents of the captive, they had brought a considerable sum for the ransom of their daughter, which they offered to the generous proconsul as a present, since he had freely given her to her lover without ransom. They pressed and intreated him to accept of it, and at length,, throwing the money at his feet, retired. But Scipio immediately bestowed it on Allucius, as an addition on his part to his wife's fortune. This behaviour, truly heroic, did the Roman republic more service than even the taking of New Carthage. Allucius declared in Celtiberia, that the gods had sent into Spain a young conqueror almost equal to themselves. Upon his report Celtiberia came over to the Roman party; Allucius joined the Roman troops at the head of fourteen hundred chosen horse, and all Spain began to revolt from the Carthaginians. And now Scipio dispatched Lælius, ^b and with him Mago, and the senators of New Carthage, in a quinqueremis to Rome, to give the senate an account of his success. Never was news received with more applause. The republic little expected to recover her affairs in Spain, and feared she had hazarded too much in the hands of a young general. The senate therefore was overjoyed to find, that the very first enterprise of their young commander had eclipsed the glory both of his father and uncle. At the same time the republic received from Sicily the agreeable news of the total reduction of that island by the consul Lævinus, the particulars whereof we have related at length in our history of the city and kingdom of Syracuse.

Lævinus having settled affairs in Sicily, was recalled by the senate to hold the comitia. ^c But he was scarce arrived, when he was ordered to return to his province upon certain intelligence, that the Carthaginians were fitting out a new fleet with a design to attempt the recovery of Sicily. He was commanded by the senate to name a dictator, before he left Rome, to preside in the comitia for the new elections. But as he insisted upon deferring the nomination till he was in Sicily, and it was not thought proper to interrupt Marcellus in his pursuit of Hannibal, the tribunes of the people took upon them to name a dictator in their assembly, viz. Fulvius Flaccus, the proconsul of Campania. Thus the consuls lost the prerogative, which they had enjoyed time out of mind, of appointing dictators. The dictator, having assembled the tribes, was himself named ^d consul with Fabius Maximus. Two of the tribunes opposed the election of Fulvius as contrary to law; but the senate, well pleased with the choice that had been made of two such able commanders, declared, that the dictatorship did not by any means disqualify Fulvius from being chosen consul. In the mean time Lælius arriving from Spain with Mago, the senators of New Carthage, and the rich booty which had been taken there, the senate, as a mark of distinction to Scipio, continued him in his commission of proconsul of Spain not for one year only, but till an order should be made for recalling him.

The consuls lose the prerogative of appointing dictators.

Tarentum besieged by the Romans.

Marcellus is routed by Hannibal.

AND now the season of the year being fit for action, the two consuls left Rome. Fabius undertook the siege of Tarentum, while Fulvius on one side, and Marcellus on the other, watched the motions of Hannibal, intercepted his convoys, and prevented ^e his men from going in parties to plunder at any distance from their camp. The Carthaginian, being thus harassed, and reduced to great straits for want of provisions, resolved at length to engage Marcellus, while the consul Fulvius was at a great distance. Accordingly, having drawn up his men, and exhorted them to complete the work of Cannæ, he fell upon the Romans with incredible fury. After the engagement had lasted two hours with equal success, the right wing of the Romans began to give way. Hereupon Marcellus ordered the eighteenth legion, which was posted in the second line, to advance into the first, and take the place of the body that began to retire; but as the legion advanced too slowly, and the troops, which they were to succeed, retreated with too much precipitation, the enemy laid hold of this opportunity to penetrate a great way into the Roman manipuli, and to put the whole right wing into disorder. Marcellus strove in vain to make them keep their ranks, and lead them back to the charge. They fled in the utmost confusion, and their example was followed by the rest of the army; so that Marcellus, now unsuccessful for the first time, was obliged to return to his camp, leaving two thousand seven hundred auxiliaries and Romans dead on the field of battle. Among these were two of his lieutenants, four centurions, and many persons of distinction. Marcellus the same night assembled his troops, and, in a very angry speech, reproached them with the bad success of that melancholy action, which, he said, was intirely owing to their cowardice. The soldiers readily owned their fault, and asking pardon for their sudden ^f flight,

- a flight, protested that they were ready to expose themselves to any danger he should think fit, with a firm resolution either to die or conquer. Make ready then, replied the proconsul, to perform your promises to-morrow, and to deserve the forgiveness you desire. The next morning the legionaries were under arms, and ready to march by break of day. The manipuli, which had behaved so shamefully the day before, were placed, Plutarch says, at their own request, in the first line, that they might have an opportunity of wiping off the shame of the day before. Marcellus, after his men had taken some nourishment, without letting their ardor cool, marched out of his camp, and drew up his army as usual. Hannibal, surpris'd at this unexpected step of the Roman general, cried out, What a strange man is this Marcellus! whether conqueror, or conquered, he is always ready to fight. Let us march out, and teach him not to insult, but to fear and respect his conquerors. Having thus spoke, he gave orders for the battle; the trumpets sounded, and the attack began. The victory was for some hours disputed with equal success; but at length the Romans prevailed, and obliged the enemy to shelter themselves in their camp. In this action Hannibal lost eight thousand of his best troops. However, Marcellus bought his victory dear; for three thousand of his legionaries were killed upon the spot, and almost all the rest wounded; so that he could not pursue Hannibal, who decamped the night after his defeat, retired into Brutium, and there intrenched himself, while Marcellus led his troops to Venusia to give them some respite and time to be cured ^w.
- b But the next day gains a complete victory over him.
- c IN the mean time the consul Fulvius recovered, without bloodshed, the provinces of Lucania and Hirpinia, and great part of Brutium. As for Fabius, who had undertaken the reduction of Tarentum, he was put in possession of that wealthy and important city by the commander of the Brutian troops in garison there, who let the Romans into the place in the night-time. The Romans, seeing themselves masters of the place, spared neither Carthaginians, Tarentines, nor Brutians; nay, some writers tell us, that those among the latter, who had been privy to the treachery of their leader, were by Fabius's orders massacred the first, lest, if he spared them, this fine conquest should be imputed more to treachery, than to his prudence and bravery. But this conduct is no-ways suitable to the character of that great man ^x. The riches found in this maritime city were immense. The quæstors are said to have received, for the public treasury, eighty-seven thousand pounds weight of gold, and three thousand talents of silver. As to the pictures and statues, Fabius, who had no taste for arts, and therefore neglected them, being asked by the quæstors, What he would have done with those master-pieces of painting and sculpture? returned the following answer, which all the ancients mention; Let us leave to the Tarentines their angry gods. He alluded to the attitudes, in which the gods of Tarentum were represented; for, after the Lacedæmonian manner, they were generally armed with swords, and in fighting postures. As for the inhabitants, thirty thousand citizens, who escaped the general massacre, were reduced to slavery, and sold to the best bidder. In short, the Tarentines were reduced to so low a state, that they became a reproach among their neighbours, and were employed by Roman magistrates in the provinces only as lictors and executioners ^y. As for Hannibal, upon the first news of the siege of Tarentum he had left Brutium, and hastened to its relief. But when he was within five miles of the city, an account was brought him, that the Roman consul had taken it by artifice. Upon which he cried out in great surpris; What! have the Romans then their Hannibal too! However, to save his honour, he did not immediately retire; but incamped on the place where he heard the news, and continued there some days. As Fabius did not offer to attack him, he marched at length to Metapontus, a city in his interest, and there contrived a stratagem, which had like to have proved fatal to Fabius. He sent two of the inhabitants to the consul with letters from the chief men of the city, offering to deliver up the place and the Carthaginian garison into his hands. Fabius, not suspecting the cheat, fixed the day for his march, and would have fallen into an ambush prepared for him, had not the augurs and aruspices, who doubtless were more suspicious, and had better intelligence than the general, detained him in the camp, by declaring that the presages were all unfortunate. Hannibal, impatient of Fabius's delays, sent new emissaries; but these being arrested, and threatened with severe punishments, confessed the secret ^z.

Further progress of Scipio in Spain.

Asdrubal intirely defeated.

Hannibal gains an advantage over the Romans.

IN Spain Scipio, having fortified New Carthage, and left a strong garison in it, ^a marched to Tarracon, where he spent the winter in exercising his troops, and teaching them the exactest discipline. Early in the spring he took the field, and as the Carthaginian forces were still divided into three bodies under three generals, he marched to attack Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, who was the nearest to him, and whose army consisted almost wholly of Spaniards, except the Numidians Masinissa had brought with him from Africa. The Carthaginian at his approach was much perplexed, not knowing what course to take. But at length he resolved to hazard a battle, intending, if it proved unsuccessful, to make the best of his way to the Pyrenees, and crossing Gaul, enter Italy. He posted himself on an eminence, in the midst of a plain watered by a river, which, winding round the eminence, made it a peninsula. ^b This was a very advantageous post; but Scipio, after two days consideration, resolved to attack him before he was joined by the other Asdrubal and Mago. He succeeded in the attempt; the enemy was intirely routed; and Asdrubal, accompanied by Masinissa, fled towards the Pyrenees with as many troops and elephants as he could get together. The fame of this memorable action brought many of the petty princes of Spain to the Roman camp, and induced all the nations beyond the Iberus to renounce the Carthaginian party with great sincerity. While Scipio continued in the camp of Asdrubal, the quaestor brought to him a youth, named Masiva, who had been found among the captives, and by his comeliness, and an air of grandeur in his deportment, seemed to be of noble extraction. The proconsul, finding, upon examining him, that he ^c was a nephew of Masinissa, ordered him to be treated according to his rank; and when he had finished some other affairs, he sent for the young prince, and asked him, whether he desired to return to his uncle? Masiva answered with tears in his eyes, that this was the utmost of his wishes. Upon this the proconsul, having ordered him to be richly dressed, presented him with a horse finely accoutred, and in this manner sent him back under a guard. These were the methods by which Scipio gained the affections even of his enemies. The flight of Asdrubal towards the Pyrenees gave the proconsul no small uneasiness; however, he would not pursue him, but chose rather to lead his victorious army into the heart of the country, and fix the several nations in an alliance with his republic. As to the Carthaginian generals, they joined their armies, ^d and having consulted together about the best measures to be taken, it was resolved, that the son of Gisco should resign his troops to Mago, and repair to the Balearic islands to make new levies there, that Mago should post himself in Lusitania, and that Asdrubal should march for Italy, and there join his brother with as many Spanish troops as he could get together ^e.

IN Italy the time for the new elections drawing near, Fulvius was recalled to preside in the comitia, when Marcellus was chosen the fifth time, and with him T. Quinctius Crispinus the second time. The new consuls no sooner entered upon their office, than they took the field, and uniting their forces, formed a design of making themselves masters of Locri, a strong city in the interest of Hannibal. With this view ^e they ordered a body of troops thither, which was incamped before Tarentum. But Hannibal being informed by the Thurians of the march of this detachment, surprised them near the river Latis, killed two thousand of them, and took twelve hundred prisoners. Hereupon the two consuls advanced against Hannibal, and drawing up their forces, offered him battle, which he declined, waiting for an opportunity to deceive the enemy by some stratagem; wherein he succeeded at length even beyond his expectation. Between his camp and that of the Romans was a little hill very convenient for incampments, being well supplied with water. As it was nearest to Hannibal, the Romans were surprised that he had not taken possession of it at first; and murmured against their generals for not being so quick as they would have them, to ^f seize such an advantageous post. At length Marcellus, to comply with their importunity, proposed to his colleague to go with a guard of two hundred and twenty horse, and take a view of the eminence which seemed so inviting to the soldiery. Quinctius approving of the motion, the two consuls set out on an expedition, which would have better become a private centinel, or an inferior officer, than the heads of the republic. Marcellus was so little apprehensive of danger, that he left orders with his army to decamp on the first signal, and advance to take possession of this new post. Hannibal had hid a detachment of Numidians in the cavities of the hill, and under the bushes

- a which covered it. These, coming out of their ambush, surprised and surrounded the two consuls and their guards; so that they could neither retreat, nor gain the top of the eminence. Being overwhelmed with showers of darts, they fell with fury on those who cut off their retreat; and perhaps the two consuls would have made their way through the enemy, had they not been deserted by the cowardly Hetrurians, of whom their guard chiefly consisted. The Hetrurians having fled or laid down their arms at the first appearance of danger, the consuls were left with only five or six Roman officers, and about forty soldiers. These brave men fought with great courage and resolution, and had already opened a passage, when Marcellus, being mortally wounded by a dart, fell from his horse and died. His colleague, though dangerously
- b wounded in two places, and Marcellus the son of the deceased consul, then a legionary tribune, behaved themselves so valiantly, that with the assistance of their small guard, they returned, in spite of all opposition, to the camp. Thus died the renowned Marcellus, surnamed The sword of the republic, a man famous for many victories, the terror of Hannibal, and the conqueror of Syracuse. Though antiquity has taxed his prudence as a general, on account of this last rash attempt; yet it is certain, that on all other occasions he displayed the accomplished hero. Hannibal, upon the news of his death, flew to the place, where the body of his rival lay; and at the sight of it shewed no marks of joy, but seemed rather to pity the misfortune of so great a man in losing his life in a manner unworthy of so renowned a commander. His first care was to take
- c off the ring which the dead consul had on his finger, and with which he sealed his dispatches, not doubting but he should have some opportunity or other of making use of it to his advantage. Then, having for some time admired the stature and noble mien of the deceased, he ordered the body to be wrapt up in a rich stuff, laid on a funeral pile, and burnt. He gathered up the ashes, inclosed them in a silver urn, on which he placed a crown of gold, and another of laurel, and in this pompous manner sent the remains of the father to the son, who shewed them all those marks of distinction which the illustrious father deserved. Livy, without mentioning any of these circumstances, only tells us, that the body of the deceased consul was buried by the Carthaginian general. The surviving consul, being dangerously wounded,
- d decamped the following night, and posted himself among inaccessible mountains, and from his asylum dispatched messengers to all the neighbouring cities in the interest of Rome, acquainting them that Marcellus was killed, lest Hannibal, who was master of his ring, should attempt to deceive them by letters sent to them in his name. This precaution preserved Salapia in Apulia. Nay, the inhabitants turned the artifice of the Carthaginian upon himself: for a Roman deserter having brought them a letter as from the deceased consul, acquainting them that he would be there the next day, and ordering them to make the necessary preparations for his reception, the Salapians admitted six hundred of Hannibal's men, most of them Roman deserters, into the town, and then all on a sudden pulling up the draw-bridges, cut in pieces those who
- e had entered, and with a shower of darts from the ramparts, drove back the rest. Hannibal, being thus disappointed in his attempt upon Salapia, marched with all his forces to the relief of Locri, which the Romans had closely invested by sea and land. Upon his approach the Romans were so terrified, that Cincius, the admiral of the fleet, immediately sounded a retreat, and having imbarqued all the land-forces on board his gallics, sailed away, and returned to Rome. In the mean time, the consul Quintius, having left his post among the mountains, came and incamped near Capua, whence he sent letters to the senate, acquainting them with the death of his colleague, and desiring them to depute to him three men of prudence and integrity, with whom he might confer about the proper measures to be taken by the republic, since his wounds proving mortal, he was drawing near his end. Accordingly, three senators were commissioned to receive his last advice; and at their request he appointed a dictator to hold the comitia for the next elections. The person he chose was T. Manlius Torquatus, who named C. Servilius for his general of the horse. Soon after the consul died. However, the Romans were a little comforted for the loss of both their consuls with news from Sicily, that Levinus, who commanded a fleet of an hundred sail, had made a descent on Africa, brought from thence an immense booty, and afterwards defeated a Carthaginian fleet off Clypea.

To retrieve the affairs of the republic, it was necessary, that two men of unexceptionable prudence and bravery should be raised to the consulate. The senate therefore cast their eyes on Claudius Nero, and M. Livius Salinator. The former was a man of uncommon bravery, but bold and enterprising, the latter more sedate and calm, and therefore fit to temper the vivacity of his colleague. Livius had discharged the office of consul twelve years before with great prudence; but being unjustly censured by the people for a pretended unequal division of the spoils of Illyricum, he had, out of pique, retired to a country house, and there, letting his hair and beard grow, lived like a man in disgrace, till the censors obliged him to shave himself, and take his place in the senate; and even then he still shewed his resentment, giving his opinion by a yes or a no. As he was a man of unquestionable abilities, both the senate and the dictator thought him a proper person to be joined with Nero. But it was with the utmost difficulty, that they prevailed upon him to accept the dignity offered him. It fell to his lot to march against Asdrubal, who was making the best of his way over the Alps into Italy to join his brother, and to Nero's lot to act against Hannibal in Brtium. Levies were raised with great rigor, and the volones, formerly disciplined by Sempronius, were obliged to serve again. Besides the forces raised in Italy, Scipio sent from Spain to Livius two thousand legionaries, eight thousand Spaniards and Gauls, and about two thousand horse, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards. Early in the spring the two consuls took the field. Nero at the head of forty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, incamped within five hundred paces of Hannibal's army; and having privately sent a considerable detachment to fall upon the enemy in the rear from the eminences behind them, gained by this stratagem a victory, killed eight thousand of the enemy, and took seven thousand prisoners, with the loss only of five hundred men. After this defeat Hannibal decamped in the night from the neighbourhood of Grumentum in Lucania, where the battle was fought. But the Romans pursued him with so much expedition, that they came up with him near Venusia, and in another battle killed two thousand of his men; which obliged him to make the best of his way to Metapontus, in order to join Hanno, whom he had sent to make new levies in Brutium.*

Hannibal defeated by the consul Nero.

WHILE the consul was thus pursuing and harassing Hannibal, a courier fell into the hands of the Romans with letters from Asdrubal to his brother, importing, that he had passed the Alps, and that he was repairing to Umbria, in hopes that Hannibal would join him there. Upon this intelligence, the consul Nero, having appointed one of his lieutenants to command the army, set out in the night with six thousand of his choicest troops, causing a report to be spread, that he was going to attack a Carthaginian garison in a neighbouring city of Lucania. But his true design, which he disclosed to nobody, was to join his colleague, and give Asdrubal battle, before his brother could come to his assistance. With this view he took the road to Picenum, and advanced with incredible expedition towards Cisalpine Gaul, his soldiers, to whom he imparted his design, when he was got to a considerable distance from his camp, marching night and day at a great rate. At length he drew near his colleague's camp, and entered it in the night to conceal his arrival from the enemy. A council of war was held, in which it was resolved to give the enemy battle without delay. But Asdrubal, perceiving that the Romans were reinforced, decamped in the night, and after a long and tedious march came to the Metaurus, a river in Umbria, but postponed the passing of it till day-break. In the mean time the Romans overtaking him, obliged him to give battle in a disadvantageous situation, and when his men were quite spent with hunger and want of rest. The consuls gained a complete victory, killed about fifty-six thousand of the enemy on the spot, and took a great many prisoners. As for Asdrubal himself, as soon as he saw the total defeat of his army, he threw himself into the midst of a Roman battalion, and died fighting. The Romans are said by some writers to have lost eight thousand men in this action; but others reduce them only to two thousand. The consul Nero after this glorious victory did not continue so much as one whole night in his colleague's camp; but having cut off Asdrubal's head, and taken it with him, he returned with such expedition, that in six days time he reached his camp at Canusium. On his return he sent some of the natives of Carthage, whom he had taken prisoners in the late battle, to Hannibal's camp in chains, that they might publish the victory there. At the same time he ordered Asdrubal's head to be thrown feated and slain.

- a into the enemy's trenches, or, as some say, to be fixed on a pole near them. This sight, with the report of the captives, filled Hannibal with horror and sadness. He is said in the height of his grief to have cried out, O Carthage; unhappy Carthage! I am sinking under the pressure of thy fate; and then he immediately decamped, and retired into Brutium ^f.

THE republic for a whole year had received no account of any new exploits in Spain. But now, to add to her joy, Lucius Scipio, the brother of the proconsul, arrived at Rome, and brought news, that Silanus, the proprætor under Scipio, had with a detachment of ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, routed the united forces of Mago and Hanno; that he himself with another detachment had besieged and taken Aurinx, a city of importance on the confines of Lower Bætica; and lastly, that Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, to whom Mago had fled after his defeat, was confined to a corner of Spain near the streights of Gades. Lucius Scipio, who brought this news, came to Rome, attended by Hanno and many other Carthaginians of distinction taken in the war. Thus was the prosperity of the Romans complete in this happy year ^g.

- THE next year the new consuls, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and L. Velurius Philo, carried on the war jointly in Brutium against Hannibal, who, though his troops were in a manner starving, and in want of the common necessaries of life, with which Brutium could not supply them, gained notwithstanding some advantage over the consuls in the plains of Gosentia, where he continued incamped the rest of the summer, the consuls not daring to attack him. But while Hannibal was upon the defensive in Italy, Scipio gave the Carthaginians no respite in Spain. He marched at the head of forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, against the united forces of Mago and Asdrubal, consisting of seventy thousand foot, and four thousand five hundred horse, engaged them in a large plain near Bœcula, on the confines of Bætica, and gained a complete victory over them. The Carthaginians indeed behaved with extraordinary valor, and made such a resolute resistance, as almost disheartened the Romans; insomuch that Scipio was forced to dismount, seize a buckler, and throw himself sword in hand into the midst of the African battalions, before he could engage his men to make the necessary efforts to decide the day in their favour. Asdrubal fled to his camp, but abandoned it in the night, and retired towards the sea. Scipio pursued him close, and coming up with him, made a second furious havock of his men; insomuch that of his vast army only six thousand were left about him, the Carthaginians being for the most part killed, and the Spaniards returned after the first battle to their respective countries. With these small remains of so numerous an army, the three chiefs, Asdrubal, Mago, and Masiniſſa, gained the summit of a steep hill, and there intrenched themselves as well as they could. As the sea was near, first Asdrubal, and afterwards Mago, escaped in the night by a shameful flight, and finding ships ready to sail, imbarqued for Gades, leaving their men to shift for themselves. Masiniſſa continued on the hill, where he was invested by Silanus, whom Scipio left there with a detachment, while he himself returned to Tarracon. A few days after the departure of the proconsul, Silanus had a private interview with Masiniſſa; and though we know not the conditions of the engagement, into which the Numidian king entered with Rome, it is certain he bound himself by such ties as proved indissoluble. The effects of his good understanding with Silanus immediately appeared, the troops he commanded on the rock being allowed to disperse, and he to return into his own dominions, where he took proper measures to support the party he had newly embraced ^h.

- Spain* being now almost totally reduced, Scipio sent Lælius into Africa to negotiate an alliance with Syphax, king of Masæſſia, who had espoused the Carthaginian party. As Lælius was only a subaltern in Scipio's army, the king, for his greater security, insisted upon having a personal conference with the proconsul himself. Hereupon Scipio, whose great soul was above the fear of danger, having left the brave Marcus at Tarracon with part of the army, and sent Silanus with the rest to New Carthage, imbarqued with Lælius for Africa, and arrived at the capital of king Syphax. As the fugitive Asdrubal happened to arrive there at the same time, the Numidian king would fain have had Scipio enter into a conference with the Carthaginian, in order to an amicable accommodation. But the proconsul excused himself, as not having received any commission to treat of peace. However, he accepted the invitation to dine at the king's table with Asdrubal; on which occasion he appeared as much superior to his rival in the charms of conversation, as he had been in war. Syphax was so taken with his eloquence, address, and noble behaviour, that he entered into a secret treaty with him, amusing the Carthaginian, who had a fleet there, till the proconsul was safely arrived at New Carthage. Upon his return he marched in person to besiege Illiturgis, and sent Marcus to reduce Castulo; both which cities had revolted from the Romans. The former being taken by assault, all the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age, were put to the sword, and the city razed. The latter capitulated, and was more favourably treated. Marcus in the next place appeared before Astapa, the inhabitants of which city, obstinately devoted to the Carthaginians, sallied out in good order to attack the Romans, and all died fighting, except fifty, who had been left in the city to guard their effects, their wives, and children, whom they had brought into the market-place, designing to destroy them all with fire and sword in case the Romans should prevail. This trust they discharged upon the first news of the defeat of their countrymen, setting fire to a great pile, on the top of which they had placed the women, children, and their most valuable moveables. This done, they threw themselves into the flames, leaving the Romans masters of an empty city. While Marcus was thus executing vengeance on the rebellious cities, Scipio was returned to New Carthage, where he fell dangerously sick; and a report being spread that he was dead, not only Indibilis and Mandonius, two petty kings mentioned above, immediately revolted from the Romans; but eight thousand legionaries, who were incamped on the banks of the Sucro, mutinied, drove away their leaders, and chose two common soldiers, Atrius and Albius, to conduct them. These fellows, seeing themselves at the head of eight thousand Roman legionaries, had the insolence to usurp the consular dignity, and to order lictors to march before them. The pretence for the mutiny was their not having received pay for six months. But in the mean time the proconsul, having recovered his health, and by a stratagem secured the ring-leaders of the revolt, caused their heads to be struck off; which so terrified the rest, that they all returned to their duty, and took a new military oath. As to the Spanish princes, who had revolted, Scipio was informed, that they had raised an army of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, and that they were living upon free quarter in the territories of the friends of Rome. Hereupon he marched against them, and coming up with them in the country of the Sedetani, gained there a complete victory, seventeen thousand Spaniards being killed upon the spot. After this defeat, the two kings had no resource, but in the clemency of the conqueror, who contented himself with obliging them to supply him with money enough to pay his troops. After this the proconsul marched with part of his troops towards Gades, the only city of Spain in the Carthaginian interest. His chief design in this journey was to have an opportunity of conferring with Masiniissa, who had shut himself up in that city with Mago, and was impatient to have a conference with the Roman general. Accordingly, the Numidian prince, under pretence of going out to forage, met Scipio, and entered into an alliance with Rome, advising the proconsul to pass over into Africa, and lay siege to Carthage itself, which, he said, would be easily reduced. The treaty being concluded, the proconsul returned to Tarracon, and Masiniissa to Gades, after having pillaged some part of the continent to conceal the true design of his journey. Soon after Mago received orders to leave Gades, and hasten with all his forces to the assistance of Hannibal in Italy. Upon his departure, the Gaditani immediately submitted to the Romans, who were now become masters of all Spain. As Mago was coasting along Spain in his way to Italy, he formed a rash design of surprising New Carthage; but lost in the attempt eight thousand men; which misfortune obliged him to stop at the Balearic islands, where he forced ten thousand of the inhabitants into the service of his republic, and did not sail from those islands for Italy till the spring. At Rome the senate no sooner received an account of the intire reduction of Spain, but they determined to recall Scipio; and accordingly, without giving him time to enjoy any rest after his fatigues, or even waiting for the new comitia, they dispatched two persons to succeed him, Cornelius Lentulus, and Manlius Acidinus; the former was to govern the Hither Spain, from the Pyrennees to the Sucro, and the latter the Further Spain, from the Sucro to the Ocean. To these Scipio surrendered the fasces without murmuring, and attended by his faithful Lolius, and his brother Lucius, immediately set sail with a squadron of ten ships, and returned to Italy.

- a As Scipio arrived at Rome about the time of the new elections, it is not to be expressed with what zeal the centuries gave their suffrages in his favour, though he had not yet attained to the years customarily required for the consular dignity, being only between twenty-eight and twenty-nine years of age. The colleague appointed him was P. Licinius Crassus, surnamed Dives, and at this time pontifex maximus. When the fathers came to settle the provinces of the new consuls, Scipio desired to be sent into Africa. But old Fabius, now president of the senate, in a long and studied speech, laboured to set forth the dangers of such an enterprise. It was very visible, that jealousy of a rising merit, which already began to eclipse his own, was what chiefly animated Fabius at this time; and Scipio in his answer did not fail to expose this infirmity of the old president. After long and warm debates, the affair of the provinces of the two consuls was put to the vote, when it was decreed, that Scipio should command in Sicily, and that, if he thought it for the advantage of the republic, he might, with the fleet there, consisting only of thirty ships of war, pass over into Africa. As for Licinius, he was directed to carry on the war against Hannibal in Brutium. Scipio, whose thoughts were wholly bent on Africa, notwithstanding his colleague, at the persuasion of Fabius, did all he could to obstruct his measures, obtained leave to take with him into Sicily as many volunteers as he could get together, and a power to ask of the allies all things necessary for building and equipping a new fleet. Many of the provinces and cities voluntarily taxed themselves to furnish him with corn, iron, timber, cloth for sails, &c. so that in forty days time after the cutting of the timber, he was in a condition to set sail with a fleet of thirty new galleys, and about seven thousand volunteers ^b.

And sent into Sicily.

- In the mean time news was brought to Rome, that Mago, the brother of Hannibal, had landed in Liguria with twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, and that his army was, soon after his landing, greatly swelled by the Gauls and Ligurians, who flocked to him from all parts. At the same time the consul Licinius sent the senate an account, that a plague raged in his camp, and obliged him to continue inactive. But as Hannibal's troops were affected with the same distemper, and had also a famine to struggle with, eighty ships, loaded with provisions for him and his brother Mago, having been lately taken by a Roman squadron, the fears of the people were intirely quieted ^d.

Mago the brother of Hannibal lands with an army in Italy.

- DURING this inaction in Italy, Scipio, having disciplined the volunteers he had brought with him into Sicily, sent Lælius with the choicest of them on board a fleet of thirty galleys to make a descent in Africa, and pillage the country. Lælius landed near Hippo, laid the territory about it waste, and threw the people of Carthage into the utmost consternation. Masiniſſa was no sooner informed of the arrival of Lælius, than he went to confer with him; and expressed his surprise, that Scipio so long delayed his departure from Sicily, since there could never be a more favourable opportunity of attacking Carthage, which was destitute both of men and provisions. The Numidian promised to join Scipio, the moment he arrived, with all his forces; but advised Lælius to imbarque his troops, and return without delay, since the Carthaginian fleet was getting ready to intercept him. Lælius followed his advice, and weighing anchor the next day, arrived safe in Sicily with an immense booty. In the mean time Mago in Liguria received from Carthage a reinforcement of six thousand men, with vast sums for raising troops in Cisalpine Gaul. But notwithstanding all he could do, Livius and Lucretius, who commanded two Roman armies in the neighbourhood of Ariminum, took their measures so well, that he was forced to continue in Liguria, though he had been ordered by his republic to join his brother in Brutium ^e.

Lælius makes a descent in Africa.

- In the mean time Scipio, having surprised the city of Locri, which stood on the sea-coast near Sicily, and left Pleminius governor of the place, returned to the said island, and there went on with the preparations for his African expedition, hoping that at least the next year the republic would suffer him to carry the war into the neighbourhood of Carthage. In Spain, Mandonius and Indibilis, despising the new proconsuls, revolted from the Romans; but were intirely defeated in a pitched battle, thirteen thousand of the Spaniards being killed on the spot, among whom was Indibilis himself, and eight thousand taken prisoners. After this defeat, the Spaniards seized Mandonius with the other heads of the revolt, and sent them under a strong guard to the camp of the proconsuls Lentulus and Acidinus, who had insisted on this as a condition of their

obtaining mercy. In Italy the plague made a dreadful havock in the camp of the consul Licinius, as well as in that of the enemy; so that nothing was attempted on either side during this campaign. Licinius not being in a condition to return to Rome, named Cæcilius, the proconsul in Brutium, to hold the comitia for the new elections. M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, were chosen consuls. The latter was then in Greece, and before he left that country, he entered into a treaty of peace with Philip king of Macedon, which was confirmed by the senate. Licinius in quality of proconsul was ordered to continue the war against Hannibal, Livius to watch Mago in Cisalpine Gaul, and Scipio to remain in Sicily. The latter was allowed to pass over into Africa, and to chuse such of the Roman troops in Sicily as he thought fit for that enterprize. We have observed above, that Scipio had gained over to the Roman interest the two Numidian kings, Syphax and Masinissa. On the other hand, Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, undertook to draw off one of them at least by means of his daughter Sophonisba, who is represented by historians as a woman of extraordinary beauty, sublime genius, engaging manner, and of a courage above her sex. Her father, to gain Masinissa, had promised her in marriage to him; but that prince being afterwards unfortunately dispossessed of the throne of his ancestors, Asdrubal broke his word, and gave her to Syphax, who, forgetting his engagements with Scipio, entered into an alliance with Carthage. However, to keep some measures with Rome, he wrote to Scipio, acquainting him with his marriage, the new alliance he had made with the Carthaginians, and the necessity he was under of taking part with them, in case they were attacked. The proconsul received this letter with some surprise; but concealing the contents of it from his army, he assembled his troops, and told them, that both Masinissa and Syphax complained of his dilatoriness, and pressed him not to delay his departure, since they were ready to join him with all their forces. He then ordered his fleet to the port of Lilybæum, and commanded his troops to repair thither by land. It is not certain what number of men Scipio imbarqued; but never was imbarcation made with more order and solemnity. The concourse of people, who came from all parts to see him set sail, and wish him a prosperous voyage, was prodigious. Just before he weighed anchor, he appeared on the poop of his galley, and after a herald had proclaimed silence, addressed a solemn prayer to the gods; which ended, he ordered a victim to be slain, threw the entrails into the sea, and then the trumpets sounding, he weighed anchor, sailed out of the harbour with a favourable wind, and arriving safe on the coast of Africa, landed at the Fair Promontory, where we shall leave him a while to return to the affairs of Italy.

Hannibal gains some advantage over the consul Sempronius.

But is afterwards defeated by him.

Several cities in Brutium taken by the Romans.

Scipio arrives in Africa.

THE consul Sempronius no sooner arrived in his province, but he marched towards Croton, where Hannibal was incamped. The Carthaginian met him unexpectedly on his march, and having forced him to fight before he could draw up his men, killed twelve hundred Romans, and obliged the rest to retire in disorder. The consul, incamped at some distance from the enemy, resolved to hazard a second battle, when joined by the proconsul Licinius, who was not far off. Accordingly, he was no sooner reinforced by the proconsular army, but he marched out of his intrenchments, and bid the enemy defiance. Hannibal was too proud of his late victory not to accept the challenge. The victory was long doubtful; but in the end the Romans prevailed, killed four thousand of the enemy on the spot, and took about three hundred prisoners, and eleven standards. After this defeat Hannibal retired to Croton, and appeared no more in the field the whole campaign. But the consul Sempronius, taking advantage of the enemy's inaction, made himself master of Petilia, Clampetia, Cosentia, and Pandusia; and then returned to Rome to erect a temple to Fortune, which he had vowed before the last battle, in case it proved successful. On the other hand the consul Cethegus, who acted against Mago, kept Hetruria and Cisalpine Gaul in awe; so that the Carthaginian, who was not in a condition to force the Roman intrenchments, gave over all thoughts of joining his brother this campaign.

DURING these transactions in Italy, Scipio, as we have observed above, arrived safe on the coast of Africa. The alarm and terror which this unexpected descent caused at Carthage, is not to be expressed. The republic had no general to make head against Scipio, except Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, who was not a match for him; nor was she provided with any regular and disciplined troops. Scipio, having ordered his fleet to Utica, incamped with his land-forces on certain eminences at a small distance

- a from the coast, and from thence sent out a detachment of five hundred men to forage. These were attacked by a flying party under the command of Hanno, a young warrior, who had been ordered to observe the enemy's motions. The Romans had all the advantage, and the young Carthaginian was killed in the engagement. Scipio, Hanno defeated, and Locha taken. looking upon this first success as a good augury, immediately drew near to Locha, a city which seemed to promise his soldiers a rich booty. But he had no sooner planted his scaling-ladders for the assault, than the inhabitants sent a herald to demand their lives with liberty to retire. Upon this Scipio sounded a retreat; but the greedy soldiers carried on the assault, scaled the walls, and entering the city, put all, even women and children, to the sword. But so barbarous an action, and so signal a disobedience, did not escape unpunished. The centurions, who had encouraged the soldiers to carry on the attack, were ordered to draw lots, which of them should die. Three of them were executed, and the guilty soldiers were deprived of the booty they had taken.
- b AFTER this expedition, Masiniſſa came privately in the night to confer with Scipio. He had been deprived of his kingdom by Syphax, and restored to it by the mediation of the Carthaginians, who readily embraced that opportunity of obliging a prince, whose bravery and enterprising genius gave them no small umbrage. However, Syphax detained Masiniſſa's mother, whom he had taken prisoner, as a hostage to secure her son's fidelity. Masiniſſa was sensible, that the Carthaginians were not sincere at the bottom; and therefore he still retained his former affection for Rome, tho', to comply with the times, he had joined Asdrubal with a strong reinforcement of horse. In the private interview he had with Scipio, it was agreed, that the Numidian should continue to deceive the credulous Carthaginians, till a favourable opportunity offered of breaking openly with them, and till he could free himself from the constraint he was under by the captivity of his mother. In the mean time Asdrubal, at the head of twenty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse, with an hundred and forty elephants, drew near to Utica, which Scipio was preparing to invest. Masiniſſa, who was one of the council of war on all occasions, persuaded Asdrubal to detach his son Hanno with a thousand horse, to watch the motions of the enemy, and attempt to enter Utica with that reinforcement, promising to favour the enterprize with all his Numidian cavalry. He then gave notice to Scipio of the design, who surprised the detachment, and took Hanno prisoner. And now Masiniſſa, not doubting but Asdrubal would willingly exchange his mother for Hanno, joined the Romans with all his forces (R). As for Syphax, when he saw that his rival had declared for the Romans, Masiniſſa joins the Romans. he endeavoured first to draw him off from the party he had embraced; but not succeeding therein, he attempted to bribe one of his servants to poison him. This treachery was discovered; and then Syphax, who had hitherto taken upon himself the office of mediator between Rome and Carthage, and incamped apart with his army, And Syphax the Carthaginians. which consisted of fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, kept no longer any measures with the Romans. He led his troops before Tholus, a place where the Romans

° APPIAN. in Punic.

(R) We have followed Appian in this matter; but Livy relates it in a quite different manner. According to him, Scipio had no sooner landed his troops in Africa, than he advanced towards Utica, and encamped within a mile of that city. The Carthaginians, in order to stop the progress of the Roman army, had recourse to Syphax, who was intirely governed by Asdrubal his father-in-law, and his new wife Sophonisba. Asdrubal, who was then at the court of king Syphax, was ordered to leave it, and hasten to the defence of his country. Till he arrived, Hanno was appointed to watch the motions of the enemy, and secure the country against their incursions. The Carthaginian, pursuant to his commission, found means to draw together a body of four thousand horse; and with this small army he took the road to Solera, and cantoned his troops in that neighbourhood, about fifteen miles from the Roman camp. Hereupon Scipio ordered Masiniſſa, who, according to Livy, had already declared openly for the Romans, to march with a troop of Numidian horse towards Solera, while he himself, at the head of a choice body of Roman horse, followed him at some distance through by-ways among the hills, in order to conceal his approach from the enemy. Masiniſſa, as had been concerted, advanced with his troop to the very gates of Solera, as it were to insult Hanno, who had retired with his troops into that city. Hanno did not fail to sally out against him; and then the Numidian king, retiring in good order, drew the enemy by degrees into the plain, when Scipio, who lay in ambush among the rocks, starting up, cut off their retreat, and surrounded them on all sides. Two thousand of the enemy were either killed or taken, and among the former was, according to Livy, Hanno himself, with several Carthaginians of distinction. This is the account Livy gives us of this action; but that of Appian seems to us to agree better with the precedent and subsequent events. Besides, Calpurnius and Valerius, two ancient annalists, quoted by Livy himself, tell us, that Hanno was not killed, but taken prisoner; as does also Zonaras, whose authority is an additional weight to incline the balance in favour of Appian.

had a magazine of corn, surpris'd it, and put the garison to the sword. In the mean time Scipio was so harass'd by the enemy, who surrounded him, that he was oblig'd to raise the siege of Utica, after he had continued it forty days, and retire, as the winter approached, to a more commodious post. The place which he chose was a promontory, under which his fleet was anchored. There he fortified his camp, and waited for the return of the spring to renew the war with vigour.

In the mean time cloaths, corn, and provisions of all sorts, were sent from Rome to Scipio's army, in spite of the peevish jealousy of old Fabius, who was ever inveighing against the proconsul, and even moved in the senate to have him recalled. When the comitia had elected the new consuls, Cn. Servilius Cæpio and C. Servilius Geminus, and came to appoint the proconsuls, Scipio was honoured with a particular mark of distinction; for while the others were nominated only for one year, he was continued proconsul in Africa till the war was ended. The whole winter was spent in fruitless negotiations between Scipio and Syphax, who had assumed anew the quality of mediator. Early in the spring the proconsul sent a detachment to take possession of the old post, where he had incamped when he besieged Utica. Both the Romans and Africans imagined, that his intention was to renew that enterprize. But his design was to attack the two camps of the enemy in the night; for Syphax was incamped with his army apart from the Carthaginians. This scheme he imparted to his troops the night before the attack; and the motion being approved of by all, tho' there were more men in each camp than the whole of the Roman army, Scipio divided his troops, and gave the command of one part to Masinissa, and of another to Lælius, ordering them to invest the camp of Syphax on different sides, and to set fire to their barracks, which were of wood, mats, hurdles, and such combustible materials. As for himself, he told Masinissa and Lælius, that he would watch the motions of Asdrubal's army, but suspend the attack of his intrenchments, till he received advice, that they had penetrated to the centre of the Numidian camp. The whole scheme was happily executed. The camp of Syphax first, and then that of Asdrubal, was surpris'd and burnt. Many of the Carthaginians and Numidians were burnt alive in their beds, some were suffocated with the smoke, others ran to the gates, and were either stifled in the croud, or massacred by the enemy. Men, beasts of burden, and elephants, all perished, either in the flames, or by the sword. Those who leaped down from the top of the ramparts to avoid perishing in the flames, were cut in pieces by parties of Roman troops, who had seized all the avenues to the two camps. The plain was all covered with dead bodies, and the two camps filled with heaps of ashes and bones. Forty thousand of the enemy were destroyed either by fire or sword, and five thousand made prisoners. Among the latter were many persons of distinction; particularly eleven Carthaginian senators. The Romans saved out of the flames a hundred and sixty standards, two thousand seven hundred Numidian horses, and six elephants. Scipio did not lose a hundred men in this decisive action. The two African commanders, Asdrubal and Syphax, found means to make their escape, with two thousand foot, and five hundred horse. The consternation of the people at Carthage was inexpressibly great, when they saw Asdrubal arrive there with the poor remains of his shattered army. The Suffetes, or supreme magistrates, immediately assembled the senators, who were divided in opinion, some being for recalling Hannibal without delay, others for proposing a truce with the enemy; but the Barcan faction, which was for pursuing the war, and continuing Hannibal in Italy, prevailed. Hanno, the son of Hamilcar, was appointed to command the troops in the room of Asdrubal, who was sentenced to die for his ill conduct; but the troops being for him, he avoided the execution of the sentence, and having assembled about eight thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he endeavour'd to serve his country without any commission from the republic. As for Syphax, he had retired, after his defeat, to Abba, or Obba, where he was soon joined by Asdrubal, and other troops; so that the two African commanders found themselves in a very short time in a condition to appear anew in the field, having drawn together from several parts near thirty thousand men. With this army they incamped in a place called the Great Plain, about five days march from Utica, which Scipio had besieged anew. However, the proconsul was no sooner inform'd of their motions, than he turned the siege into a blockade, and hasten'd to attack them. After some slight skirmishes, the two armies came to a general engagement, in which the

- a Romans prevailed, and gained a complete victory. After this success, the proconsul Scipio gains a complete victory over Asdrubal and Syphax. dispatched Lælius and Masiniſſa after Syphax, who, with the best part of his troops, hastened back into his own country. Scipio resolved to make himself in the mean time master of the towns in the neighbourhood of Carthage. With this view he marched to Tunis, from whence Carthage could be seen, and took it without the loss of a single Tunis taken by Scipio. man, the garison having deserted it in a fright at his approach. The Cartaginians, in order to divert Scipio from laying siege to their capital, having equipped with incredible expedition a fleet of a hundred galleys, sent it, under the command of Hamilcar, the father of Hanno, to burn the Roman fleet, which lay under the promontory formerly mentioned. Scipio, perceiving from Tunis the course which the Cartaginians steered, made what haste he could to preserve his fleet; and reaching the port by land, before the enemy arrived there by sea, drew up his galleys as near to the shore as he could, and repulsed the enemy, who nevertheless took six of his galleys. With this small prize Hamilcar returned to Carthage; and the proconsul thought it adviseable to continue where he was, till he could receive from Italy a reinforcement of ships, his whole fleet consisting now but of fourteen galleys ¹.

- In the mean time Lælius and Masiniſſa, who, with the third part of the legions, were gone in pursuit of Syphax, penetrated, after fifteen days march, into the heart of Numidia. Syphax, at the head of a very numerous army, advanced to meet them; but was vigorously repulsed in a general action which ensued, forced to fly, and pursued to the banks of a river, where Masiniſſa himself took him prisoner, with his son Vermine. After this, the victorious Numidian, with the approbation of Lælius, who Syphax defeated, and taken prisoner. was to follow him by slow marches, hastened to appear before Cyrtba, the capital of Syphax's dominions. As he had taken the captive king with him, the city, being destitute of all hopes of relief, readily surrendered. Masiniſſa entered it in triumph, and hastened to the palace, with full intention to punish Sopbonisba, for entering into engagements with his rival, after she had been betrothed to him. But he was soon disarmed; for he no sooner entered the palace, than the beautiful queen, set off with all the charms of dress, fell at his feet, and embracing his knees, conjured him in the most moving manner not to deliver her up to the Romans, but rather to free her by death from the chains of an insulting enemy. These words made a deep impression on Masiniſſa; he looked tenderly on her, and feeling his former flame revive, he reached out his hand to her; which was a token that her request was granted. But as the fair captive properly belonged to Scipio, and Masiniſſa, who was but a subaltern in the Roman army, had no right to make such a promise, he was greatly perplexed to know how he should perform it. At length he resolved to follow the dictates of his love, and marry her, thinking that neither Scipio nor Lælius could lay any claim to her, after he had, by a lawful marriage, made her his own. The public rejoicings on this occasion were not over when Lælius arrived. He was so shocked at so precipitate a marriage, that he resolved at first to snatch the queen from the nuptial bed, and send her away with the other captives to Scipio; but, upon second thoughts, Masiniſſa marries Sopbonisba. he determined to refer the matter to the judgment of the proconsul, and in the mean time let the prince enjoy his amours. As for Syphax, he was sent under a strong guard to Scipio's camp, where he was treated with great politeness and respect, the proconsul remembering the hospitable entertainment this prince had formerly given him at his court. As Scipio took frequently pleasure in conversing with his royal captive, he learned of him, that, if he had been left to his own judgment, he would have continued faithful to Rome; but that his wife Sopbonisba, having by her irresistible charms made herself mistress of his heart, had induced him to prefer Carthage to Rome. Hereupon Scipio, fearing she might gain such an ascendant over her new husband, resolved to take her from him. It was not long before Masiniſſa, having reduced all Numidia, arrived at the proconsul's camp with his new queen. Scipio received him with all possible marks of distinction; but took no notice of Sopbonisba, tho' she entered his tent together with Masiniſſa. From the proconsul's tent she was conducted to Masiniſſa's quarters, and there respected as his wife; but Scipio, by no means liking to see a Cartaginian woman with the title of queen in the midst of a Roman army, had a private conference with Masiniſſa a few days after his arrival. He complimented him in the first place on his heroic behaviour, and then, expostulating with him on his late conduct, exhorted him to conquer the love of pleasure, and not suffer himself to be enslaved by a woman, after having subdued a vast kingdom. At the same time he put him in mind, that the spoils and captives taken from the enemy belonged not to him, but to the Romans. He concluded his speech thus: I am very sensible, that your heart trembles at the thought of the sacrifice I require of you; but return, Masiniſſa, return to your reason. Hitherto your weakness deserves pity; but it may become unpardonable. Your perseverance in it may be attended with a long repentance. The Numidian prince blushed and wept. His heart was rent with opposite passions; but at length his virtue and his interest gained the ascendant over his love. He promised the general to shake off his chains; and so far got the mastery over his passion, as to carry in person to his beloved Sopboniſſa the decree, which Scipio had pronounced against her, declaring, that she belonged to the Roman people. When he entered his tent, Receive now, said he, the last testimony of my affection and fidelity. It is absolutely out of my power to deliver you from the slavery with which you are threatened, any other way than by death. Remember only whose daughter and whose queen you are, and then surely you cannot be afraid to descend to the shades. Masiniſſa will soon follow you thither. Tears flowed down the prince's cheeks while he uttered these words; and, as soon as he had spoke them, he rushed out of the tent, where all things were prepared to give the unhappy princeſs the most speedy and easy death. A slave, whose business it was to prepare poison, entered the tent as soon as Masiniſſa went out, and presented to the queen the fatal cup, which she took with an air of great composure, upbraiding her weeping nurse for dishonouring her death with her tears. Then turning to the slave, Let my husband, said she, know that I die contented, since I die by his orders. Assure him, that I was forced, contrary to my inclinations, to enter into engagements with another. My heart has been enslaved to none but him; and as for my body, I readily abandon it to the fury of the Romans. Having thus spoke, she drank the poison, and almost instantly expired. Scipio, to console the Numidian prince, caressed and diverted him; and, when he had assembled his troops, styled him king for the first time in a juridical way, and presented him with a crown of gold, a curule chair, an embroidered robe, and a tunic adorned with palm-branches. These honours counterbalanced in the prince's heart the remembrance of his dear Sopboniſſa, and he now conceived hopes of becoming sole master of all Numidia.

The Carthaginians make a fraudulent proposal of peace.

AND now that the winter kept both armies from entering upon action, Scipio dispatched Lælius with Syphax and the rest of the captives to Rome, and returned himself to his old post near Tunis. The Carthaginians, alarmed at his neighbourhood, endeavoured to gain time by a fraudulent treaty of peace, till Hannibal and Mago should arrive from Italy. The better to impose upon the proconsul, they sent deputies to Rome, and with them a small number of Roman captives and deserters; but at the same time they prepared to renew the war with vigour, strengthened their alliances on all sides, and once more prevailed upon Philip of Macedon to engage in their interest. While Scipio, deceived by the fraudulent proposals of the Carthaginians, was suspending hostilities in Africa, Lælius, arriving at Rome, gave the conscript fathers a pompous, but true account of his friend's exploits. This occasioned an universal joy in the city. The prætor published a decree for a general supplication, and the people crowded to the temples to return thanks for the proconsul's success. As for Syphax, the senate ordered him to be conducted to Alba, in the country of the Marſi, and there kept to grace the triumph of the Roman general at his return. At the same time the senate confirmed the title which Scipio had given to Masiniſſa, and sent him new presents in the name of the republic.

Mago embarks for Africa, but dies of a wound at sea. Hannibal recalled.

IN Italy Hannibal was now wholly confined to a corner of Brutium, and had not attempted any thing this campaign. As for his brother Mago, he did not venture to give battle to the consul Servilius Geminus, who commanded an army in Heſtruria; but falling down upon Inſubria, engaged two Roman armies there, under the conduct of the proconsul Corn. Cethegus, and the prætor Quintilius Varus. The victory was long disputed; but at length Mago himself being wounded, the Carthaginians were routed, and obliged to take shelter among the mountains of Liguria. There he received strict orders to repair forthwith to Carthage; but he had scarce doubled the island of Sardinia, when he died of his wound. Hannibal received the same orders, and complied with them, but not without great reluctance. He resolved to take a a body of Brutian troops with him ; but these, refusing to abandon their native country, took refuge in the temple of Juno Lucina, where the barbarous Carthaginian caused them all to be cruelly massacred. When he was out at sea, he often looked back on the country he had hoped to conquer, and is said to have uttered bitter execrations against gods and men. The joy at Rome, on the news of his departure, was inexpressibly great ; but old Fabius endeavoured to allay it, by exclaiming, that the Roman state was never in a more deplorable condition ; but the people confided in the abilities of Scipio, and public thanks were appointed to be offered to the gods for Hannibal's departure ^r.

Scipio had granted the Carthaginians in Africa a truce, till their ambassadors returned from Rome ; but in the mean time an accident discovered the insincerity of their intentions. Scipio had sent for a reinforcement of ships both from Sicily and Sardinia. The squadron from Sicily was dispersed by a tempest, and many of the ships being driven near the port of Carthage, the Carthaginians seized and plundered them. Hereupon the proconsul sent M. Babius with two other deputies to Carthage, to complain of the injustice, and require satisfaction ; but the senate, depending on the return of Hannibal, agreed to send them back without an answer ; nay, the quinqueremis, which carried the envoys, was attacked by the Carthaginian admiral, and, after some resistance, forced to run aground near the shore, where most of the Romans were killed ; but the ambassadors themselves had the good luck to escape ^u. This perfidiousness was too plain a proof, that the war would be renewed with fresh vigour, as soon as Hannibal arrived ; and it was not long before that general, so much wished-for, came within sight of Africa, which he had left at nine years of age, and had not seen for thirty-three years past. He landed at Little Leptis, a city between Susa and Adrumetum. About the same time Laelius and Fulvius returned from Rome, the latter to continue in his post of lieutenant in Scipio's army, and the former in quality of quæstor as well as lieutenant. As for the troops, which Mago commanded in Cisalpine Gaul, the fleet, which carried them, was dispersed by a storm, and most of the ships were taken by the Romans. The Carthaginians break the truce.
Hannibal lands in Africa.

AND NOW the eyes of all nations in Europe and Africa were fixed on the two heroes of the age, Scipio and Hannibal, who were to enter the lists. The latter, being informed that hostilities were begun anew, gained over as many of the princes of Numidia as he could, and among the rest the second son of Syphax, who joined him with a considerable body of Numidian horse. On the other hand, Scipio pursued the war with all the fury, which the perfidiousness of the Carthaginians deserved. He took several towns by assault, put the garisons to the sword, and made the inhabitants pass under the yoke. However, he dismissed the Carthaginian ambassadors, who had been arrested by Babius, on their return from Rome, after having treated them with great humanity and politeness, tho' most of the officers were for retaliating upon them the injuries which their ambassadors had suffered.

c IN the mean time Tib. Claudius Nero and M. Servilius Pulex being chosen consuls for the next year, they drew lots for their provinces, and it fell to the latter to conduct the army in Hetruria, and to the former to command the fleet in Africa ; but by a decree both of the senate and people, he was to leave the direction of all affairs at land wholly to the proconsul.

As Scipio continued ravaging the territories of Carthage, and taking her cities, Hannibal was ordered to advance towards the enemy, and stop their progress. Accordingly he left Adrumetum, marched a hundred and seventy-five miles, and incamped near Zama, a town in Africa Propria, about seventy-five miles from Carthage. From his new camp he sent out spies to observe the situation and strength of the enemy. These spies, being discovered and apprehended, were, by Scipio's orders, led into all the quarters of the camp, and, after they had been shewn every thing which they came to learn, dismissed with money to defray the expences of their journey. Hannibal was so struck with admiration at the magnanimity and confidence of the Roman general, that he immediately resolved to ask an interview with him, in order to a peace. With this view he addressed himself to Masinissa, begging him to intercede with the proconsul, and persuade him to come to an interview. Masinissa discharged his commission with zeal ; but the people, having got the ascendant at Carthage, would hearken to no measures that tended to a reconciliation ; nay, orders were dispatched to the general to continue the war, and come to a decisive battle without delay. But, notwithstanding these orders, which had been extorted from the senate by the people, Hannibal, having obtained the proconsul's consent to an interview, drew near, and incamped with his army about five miles from the Romans. There was between the two camps a large plain, intirely open, and where no ambush could be laid. Thither the two generals repaired, escorted by a like number of guards, and then separating from their attendants, each with his interpreter, they held a private conference. Perhaps two greater men never met, nor was ever any deliberation of more importance. These two heroes had never seen one another; but fame had given each a high esteem of the other. Hannibal is said to have been struck with admiration at the first sight of Scipio. His hair flowed down his back to a great length; he had an equal mixture of majesty and sweetness in his countenance; he was in his full strength and bloom, and deemed one of the most comely men of his age. There was nothing affected or too negligent about him. His habit was plain, but neat, and such as became a foldier, who despised the studied elegancies of dress. Their surprize at meeting kept them for some moments in a profound silence, which Hannibal first broke with a long descant on the vicissitudes of fortune; and then, having artfully flattered the Roman, he proposed the cession of Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and of all the islands between Italy and Africa, as the terms of a peace. Scipio answered with all the haughtiness of a conqueror, that he offered nothing but what the Romans already possessed; that if he had made such a proposal before he left Italy, it might perhaps have been thought a tolerable one; but now that his republic would insist upon conditions of a different nature, which he proposed, adding, If you like these conditions, the Roman senate and people will condescend to enter into a treaty with your republic; if not, let us fly to arms, and decide the controversy by the sword. At these words the two generals parted, and each returned to his camp to prepare for a general action. Early the next morning Scipio marched out his troops into the plain, and sent a detachment to seize an eminence between the two camps. These meeting with a detachment sent by Hannibal for the same purpose, repulsed them, and made themselves masters of that post. This brought on a general action, contrary, as some say, to the inclination of Hannibal. Never was a more memorable battle fought, whether we consider the generals, the armies, the two states that contended, or the importance of the victory. Both generals displayed an uncommon skill in drawing up their men, and chusing their ground, and no less courage and resolution in charging the enemy. They both represented to their men, that this battle must decide, whether Rome or Carthage should give law to the world. Never was victory more obstinately disputed. The Carthaginians, especially in the second line, performed wonders, repulsing three times the Roman legionaries with great slaughter. As for Hannibal's first line, which consisted of mercenaries, it was put to the rout at the first onset, which occasioned at length the defeat of the second line; for the Romans, pushing on the routed mercenaries with their bucklers, forced them back on the Carthaginians, and by that means put the second line into confusion, and at length obliged them to give ground, and betake themselves to flight; but the greatest difficulty was to break into the enemy's phalanx, where Hannibal commanded in person. The phalanx was the choice of Hannibal's army, the Carthaginian general having formed it of those veterans, who had often made the Romans tremble in the plains of Italy. However, Scipio advanced boldly at the head of his hastati to attack this formidable body; but the ground he was to cross to come at the phalanx, being covered with dead bodies, bucklers and darts, and the earth soaked with blood, and so slippery, that his men could scarce keep their feet, Scipio commanded the principes and triarii to join the hastati; and having drawn up all his men in one great front, marched over heaps of dead bodies against Hannibal, who, at the head of his phalanx, kept his men close, and waited for the enemy. The Romans fell upon this last body with a fury not to be expressed; but the Carthaginians, encouraged by the presence and example of their leader, kept their ground, in spite of the utmost efforts of the whole Roman infantry. Scipio, resolving either to complete the victory, or die in the attempt, exerted, at the head of the legionaries, all his skill and personal bravery; but could not by any means break into that impenetrable body. The attack was often renewed, but to no purpose. The ground was covered with heaps of dead bodies; but not one of the Carthaginians offered to fly, or even quit his rank. The proconsul, finding all his efforts unsuccessful, was at a loss what to do; but while he was under the

a greatest concern to see his brave legionaries fall in great numbers, without being able to gain the least advantage over the enemy, Lælius and Masiniſſa, returning from the pursuit of the Carthaginian and Numidian cavalry, appeared very seasonably on the field of battle, and attacked the phalanx in the rear. And now Hannibal could hold out no longer; his phalanx was put in disorder, and so terrible a slaughter was made of those brave men, that few of them escaped. Hannibal, after having signalized himself by a thousand acts of valour, was at length obliged to save himself by flight. Masiniſſa, tho' wounded, pursued him close, being extremely desirous to crown his other exploits with the taking of the general himself; but the Carthaginian, being favoured by the darkness of the night, got safe into Tbon, a small city in that neighbourhood, attended only by twenty horsemen. From thence he fled, with one man only, in whom he could confide, and taking the road to Adrumetum, reached that city in two days and two nights. In this action above twenty thousand men were slain on the side of the Carthaginians, and as many prisoners taken, among whom were many Macedonians, and Sosipater their commander. The Romans did not lose above two thousand men; a memorable victory, which raised Scipio above Hannibal, and paved the way for the Romans to the conquest of the world^w.

Hannibal was soon called from Adrumetum to Carthage, where he declared in the senate, that they had no resource but in a peace. These words, in the mouth of the warlike Hannibal, were decisive; and Carthage now thought of nothing but using all means to soften the Roman general, whose humane temper was well known. Thirty of the chief nobility were dispatched away in haste to Tunis, where Scipio then was. These deputies spared neither submissions, protestations nor promises. Scipio received them at first with the haughty air of a conqueror, and seemed not to give ear to their proposals; but, at the bottom, he was as fond of concluding a peace as they; for he had certain intelligence from his friends in Rome, that the consul Nero was equipping a fleet with all expedition, in order to come into Africa, and rob him of the glory of finishing the war there. The next day therefore he sent for the deputies, whom he had rejected the day before, and imparted to them the conditions, on which he was willing to grant them a peace. These were as follow: 1. The Carthaginians shall

d live according to their own laws, and enjoy all the cities and provinces which they had in Africa before the war; but the Romans shall hold Spain, with all the islands in the Mediterranean. 2. The Carthaginians shall deliver up to the Romans all their deserters, fugitive slaves, prisoners of war, and all the Italians whom Hannibal forced to follow him. 3. They shall deliver up into Scipio's hands all their ships of war, except ten triremes, with all their tamed elephants, and tame no more. 4. The republic of Carthage shall enter into no war, either in Africa or elsewhere, without the consent of the Roman people. 5. They shall restore to Masiniſſa all they have usurped from him and his ancestors, and even enter into an alliance with him. 6. They shall supply the Roman legions with corn, and pay their auxiliaries, till the return of the ambassadors they shall send to Rome. 7. They shall pay the Romans, in the space of fifty years, ten thousand talents, at equal payments. 8. They shall deliver up to Scipio a hundred such hostages as he shall chuse, the youngest of which shall not be under fourteen, and the oldest above thirty years of age. 9. Neither the peace nor the truce shall take place, till the Carthaginians have restored to the Romans the ships and effects taken from them during the late truce. 10. The Roman armies shall leave Africa within fifty days after the conclusion of the treaty. These were hard conditions, but readily complied with, Hannibal himself declaring zealously for a peace. Pursuant to his advice, deputies were sent to Scipio's camp, to make satisfaction for the ships and effects taken from the Romans during the last truce; and the whole sum amounted to twenty-five thousand pounds weight of silver^x. Then the suspension of arms took place, and ambassadors were dispatched to Rome to obtain of the senate and people a ratification of the treaty. When the deputies were introduced into the senate, Asdrubal, surnamed The Ram, who was at the head of them, and had always opposed the Barcan faction, made a modest speech, in which he laid all the blame of the late war on the family of Hamilcar, and endeavoured to move the Romans to compassion, by representing the deplorable condition to which the city and republic of Carthage were reduced. The conscript fathers were divided in opinion ; some were for concluding a peace on the terms proposed by Scipio, who, said they, is certainly the best judge, in the present case, of what is most for the interest of Rome. But as Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Aelius Patus had been lately chosen consuls, and the command of the fleet had fallen to the former, all his friends and relations were for continuing the war, that he might have the glory of completing the great work begun by Scipio. Among the rest, C. Lentulus maintained, that nothing could be more to the interest of Rome, than utterly to destroy Carthage, and put it out of the power of the perfidious Africans to hurt Rome for the future. In the close of his speech, turning to the chief of the embassy, What gods, said he, will you call to witness the sincerity of your oaths? To which Asdrubal immediately replied, The same who have so severely punished us for the breach of them. This answer was applauded by the assembly ; and the senate plainly seeing, that Lentulus had no other view in declaiming with so much zeal against a peace, but to give the consul, his relation, an opportunity of finishing the war, to the prejudice of Scipio, passed a decree, granting the Carthaginians their request. The consul Lentulus appealed from it to the people ; who being assembled, gave their consent to a peace with Carthage, declaring, that they would suffer none but Scipio to conclude it, or bring back the troops to Rome. The Carthaginian ambassadors were therefore dismissed with a favourable answer, and ten deputies, attended by the secales of the republic, sent with them, to assist Scipio in settling the articles of the treaty. Upon their arrival at the proconsul's camp, the Carthaginians began to execute the articles they had agreed to. In the first place, they delivered up all deserters and prisoners of war, and then their elephants, of which Scipio sent some to Rome, and gave the rest to Masiniſſa ; but nothing was more mortifying to the Carthaginians, than the delivering up all their ships, galleys and frigates, except ten triremes, to the number of five hundred sail. These Scipio burnt at sea, within sight of Carthage. The last thing that remained, was to discharge the first payment of the tribute, which the Romans had required for fifty years ; and this article was also executed, a tax being laid on all the citizens of Carthage for the raising of this sum. And now Scipio prepared for his departure ; but before he left Africa, with the consent of the ten commissioners, he settled Masiniſſa in the peaceable possession of his hereditary dominions, and of all the places he had taken from Syphax. This done, he sailed to Lilybzum, and thence to Italy. The news of his landing was no sooner spread in the neighbouring places, but the people flocked from all parts to see the deliverer of Rome, and the conqueror of the formidable Hannibal. From the port where he landed to Rome, the roads were crowded with infinite numbers of people, not only the citizens, but even the peasants, running to behold and applaud the man, to whom they owed their liberty and preservation. As he drew near Rome, the whole city went out to meet him ; and such of the citizens and senators as had at first opposed his expedition, were the most earnest to congratulate him on the success of it. He wanted only to have received the congratulations of the great Fabius ; but he was dead. However, the conqueror had the satisfaction to find, that the predictions of this old general had proved false, and served only to augment his glory. Both senate and people concurred in decreeing him a triumph, which was the most magnificent one that had ever been seen in Rome. Polybius tells us, that king Syphax was carried in triumph, and that he died a few days after in prison ; but he is therein contradicted by all the ancients, who say, that the captive king died before the triumph at Tibur, whither he had been removed from Alba, the place of his confinement. Among the captives was, according to some writers, the famous poet Terence, at that time very young ; at least it is certain, that he was a native of Africa, and was afterwards enfranchised by Terentius Lucanus, whose name he took. The senator Terentius Culleo, who had been taken by the Carthaginians, and delivered by Scipio from a cruel captivity, to shew his gratitude, wore, in the triumphal procellion, the pileus, as a symbol of his having obtained his freedom. The booty Scipio brought from Africa was immense ; among other things he delivered to the quæstors one hundred and twenty thousand pounds weight of silver. The republic, to shew her gratitude to a man, who had done her more important services than all her other commanders together, would have raised him above the level of other citizens, by bestowing on him, as some authors write, the perpetual dictatorship, and erecting statues to him in the comitium near the rostra, before the senate-house, and even on the capitol ; but Scipio wisely declined these extraordinary honours, content-

The history of Rome, from the end of the second Punic war, to the destruction of Carthage.

- b ROME, by the peace she concluded with Carthage, was delivered from those continual alarms she had long been under from so powerful a rival. However, she was not yet in such a state of peace and security as to shut the temple of Janus. While the treaty with the Carthaginians was executing, the Boii entering the territories of the allies of Rome, laid them waste; which obliged the consul Ælius Patus to take the field. He detached Oppius with two legions, and about two thousand auxiliaries, to go before him, and ravage the enemy's country; but that general was surprised by the Boii, surrounded on all sides, and cut off with seven thousand of his men. The consul advanced to revenge his defeat; but the Gauls appearing no more in the field, he pillaged their country, and then falling down on Liguria, he obliged the Ingauni, who inhabited a small canton of Liguria Maritima, to enter into an alliance with Rome ^{The Boii gain a considerable advantage over the Romans.}.
- c These were the only exploits of the consul Ælius during this campaign. Upon his return to Rome, a decree was passed, empowering him to name a general to go with a fleet into Macedon; for the senate had just received advice, by ambassadors from the Rhodians, and from Attalus king of Pergamus, that Philip of Macedon was soliciting the states of Asia to join him against Rome. The person, whom the consul named for this expedition, was Lævinus, who no sooner appeared on the coasts of Macedon, than he was joined by Aurelius, who had long resided in Greece, to defend it with a small squadron, and a few Roman troops. These two, having consulted together about the state of Macedon and Greece, agreed to write to the senate, that they thought it necessary to declare war without delay against king Philip, who was preparing to make a descent upon Italy. These letters arrived soon after the election of the new consuls, P. Sulpicius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta, who having assembled the people, prevailed upon them to vote for a war with the king of Macedon, notwithstanding the opposition of Bæbius, a tribune of the people, who endeavoured to persuade the centuries, that the nobility, from party-views, hindered them from enjoying any repose. The consul Sulpicius, to whose lot Macedon fell, passed over into that kingdom with two legions; and being assisted by Attalus, the Rhodians and the Ætolians, gained great advantages over Philip, as we have related at length in our history of Greece and Macedon. ^{The Romans resolve upon a war with the king of Macedon.}
- e WHILE the consul Sulpicius was employed in Macedon, the Gauls, headed by Hamilcar, whom Hanno had left in Italy, made a sudden irruption into the lands of the allies of Rome, and having seized Placentia, put all the citizens to the sword. From thence they advanced to Cremona; but the inhabitants of that city, shutting their gates against them, gave notice of their danger to Furius Purpureo the Roman prætor, who commanded five thousand men of the allies in the neighbourhood of Ariminum. Furius, before he marched to their relief, wrote to the senate, desiring succours, the Gauls being above forty thousand strong. Hereupon the fathers decreed, that either the consul Aurelius, who was still in Rome, should put himself ^a at the head of his legions, which were incamped in Uetruria, and hasten to the relief of Cremona; or, in case he declined it, that those legions should march to Ariminum without him, and be commanded in that expedition by Furius, who should send his five thousand men into Uetruria. As Aurelius chose rather to continue at Rome, Furius, at the head of his legions, marched against the enemy, defeated them in a pitched battle near Cremona, and killed above thirty thousand of them on the spot. The victorious prætor returned to Rome, where, after a warm debate in the senate, he was decreed a triumph. This is the first instance we find in the Roman history of a triumph granted to a general, who had fought under the auspices of another; and on this account it was, that the oldest senators opposed it, tho' to no effect, the majority ^b being for honouring the brave prætor with that mark of distinction.

In the following consulate of Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus, the Ætolians took part with the Romans against the king of Macedon; but Villius, to whose lot Macedon fell, staid at Rome, till the season was too far advanced to undertake any thing of moment this campaign. The other consul, Lentulus, who remained in Italy, instead of marching against the Gauls, who were not yet quelled, staid at Rome, tho' there was no business of sufficient moment to detain him there. The consular year being expired, the republic bestowed the fasces on Quintius Flaminius and Sext. Ælius Catus, tho' neither of them had been in the prætorship, and the former, who was but thirty years of age, had never been so much as ædile. The war of Macedon fell to ^c the lot of Flaminius, and that of Italy to Ælius. Cato was at the same time appointed prætor of Sardinia, where he made himself remarkable for his frugality, austeriety of life, and strict justice in punishing offenders. His only amusement was to hear the instructions of the poet Ennius, under whom he learned the Greek sciences, and perfected his fine genius. He banished usurers from his province, and reduced the interest upon loans almost to nothing ^b.

As for Flaminius, he immediately set out for his province, where he forced the intrenchments of king Philip, opened himself a way into the heart of Macedon, took several towns in Thessaly, and, by his insinuating manner, gained over the Æthians to the interest of Rome, as we have related at length in our history of the Achæans. ^d His colleague Ælius, who had performed nothing worth mentioning in Cybalpine Gaul, when the time of the elections drew near, was called home to assemble the centuries. The persons raised to the consulate this year were C. Cornelius Cetbegus and Q. Minucius Rufus. They were both sent into Cisalpine Gaul against Hamilcar, who still headed the revolt there. Flaminius was continued, in quality of proconsul, general of all the Roman forces in Greece, till the senate and people should think fit to recal him. They also granted him a supply of five thousand foot, three hundred horse, and three thousand seamen and rowers, and appointed his brother Quintius to command the fleet under him. With this reinforcement Flaminius, having first gained over the city of Thebes and all Bæotia to the Roman interest, marched into Thessaly ^e in pursuit of Philip, and came up with him in the plains of Cyncephalæ. Here the two armies came to a general engagement, in which the Macedonians were intirely defeated, eight thousand of them being killed upon the spot, and five thousand taken prisoners. At the same time Androstenes, one of Philip's generals, whom that prince had left in Corinth with six thousand men, was defeated by Nicostratus prætor of the Achæans. Hereupon the Macedonian, having no other resource but in a peace, submitted to such terms as Flaminius was pleased to impose upon him ^c. Thus ended the first Macedonian war, of which we have given a very particular account in our history of Greece.

Philip submits to the terms of peace proposed by Flaminius.

The Cisalpine Gauls defeated.

In Italy the war, which was carried on with the Gauls by the two consuls, gave the people more concern than that of Macedon. But their fears were soon quieted; ^f for Cetbegus, who marched against the Insubres and Cenomani, gained a complete victory over them on the banks of the Mincius. Thirty thousand of those Gauls were killed upon the spot, and five thousand seven hundred made prisoners, with their general Hamilcar. Minucius, the other consul, having no opportunity of coming to a pitched battle with the Ligures and Boii, over-ran their country, and laid it waste. For these successes the senate and people ordered public thanksgivings in all the temples of Rome for four days ^d. The republic thought fit at this time to increase the number of prætors to six, by creating two new ones for the government of Spain,

But the Spaniards, highly displeased to see their country reduced to the state of Roman The Spaniards revolt. provinces, took arms, and falling upon Sempronius, prætor of Hiber Spain, cut him off with most of his troops. In Further Spain several towns revolted; and there was almost a general disposition to shake off the Roman yoke.

The new consuls, L. Furius Purpureo and M. Claudius Marcellus, were ordered to continue the war with the Cisalpine Gauls, who were not yet totally subdued; but Flaminius, by a new decree, was appointed to act as general in Greece, till such time as the treaty with Macedon should be concluded. Ten commissioners were sent from Rome to assist him in this undertaking. These, by the advice of Flaminius, decreed, that b that all the Greek cities, both in Europe and Asia, should be restored to perfect liberty. This decree was soon after proclaimed by a herald in a vast assembly of Greeks, met together from all parts to celebrate the Isthmian games. Their amazement and joy on this occasion was inexpressible. Many speeches were made in praise of the Roman greatness and generosity. The Ætolians, who had been refused some towns which they claimed, were the only people dissatisfied with the peace. They complained of it, and at length had recourse to Antiochus king of Syria, who, at their instigation, passed over into Europe, under pretence of recovering Thrace, which his great-grandfather, Seleucus Nicator, had conquered from Lysimachus.

In Italy the two consuls carried on the war with great success against the Gauls, and c intirely destroyed two considerable armies of those rebels, plundered their country, and returned to Rome loaded with booty. After this, the republic was wholly employed in publishing some new edicts. The pontifices and augurs were now required, for the first time, to pay a tax towards the expences of the war; but they were at the same time eased of one burdensome part of their function, a new sort of sacerdotal college being erected, under the name of Epulones, whose office was confined wholly to the care of religious feasts. At first these epulones were three only, and all chosen out of plebeian families. The three first were C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius, then d tribune of the people, who had got the law passed, and Porcius Lacas, who, two years before, while he was tribune of the people, had, in spite of all opposition, carried a law, forbidding, under very severe penalties, any magistrate to cause a Roman citizen to be whipt with rods. This law, which secured the shoulders of the people, to use the expression of one of the ancients^c, was called the Porcian law, not from the famous Porcius, known afterwards by the name of Cato the censor, as some have falsely e imagined, but from Porcius Lacas, first tribune of the people, and afterwards one of the epulones^f. However, this privilege did not extend to the armies, where the generals had an absolute power of life and death.

The consul Marcellus, when the time for the new elections drew near, assembled the centuries, who raised to the consular dignity L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato. The conduct of the war in Spain fell by lot to the latter; but, while he was
e making the necessary preparations for his departure, the Roman ladies took a step, which obliged him to stay longer at Rome than he expected. About eighteen years before, when Hannibal was ravaging Italy, and the treasury was exhausted, a tribune of the people, named Oppius, had got a law passed, forbidding even the richest of the Roman ladies to use above half an ounce of gold in their apparel, to wear habits of various colours, or to make use of chariots, either at Rome or in the neighbouring villages, unless they were to assist at a public sacrifice a mile off. The women of distinction, thinking it intolerable to be under this restraint; now that the republic abounded with riches, made a great stir to get the law repealed. Valerius and Fundanius, two of the tribunes, presented their request to the comitia; and never was an f assembly more divided. The capitol, where it was held, was full of people crying out for and against the law. Even the women, neglecting the orders of their husbands, the rules of decency, and the public authority, ran thither, beset the passages which led from the capitol to the voting place, solicited the men as they passed for their suffrages, and urged the justice of their pretensions. As the affair was more than one day under deliberation, the women flocked to Rome from all the neighbouring colonies and towns, and offered petitions to the consuls and prætors: "But Cato was inexorable; he made a long harangue to the assembly in behalf of the law, full of satyrical reflections on the women, for their appearing in public to solicit votes.

But the tribune Valerius made a very eloquent speech in behalf of the women, in which he excused their appearing in public to solicit their own cause, and urged the reasonableness of repealing the Oppian law. His harangue made such an impression on the minds of the people, that they all voted for the abrogation of the law, Cato being the only man who dissented.

Cato defeats

AND now the consul set out for Spain with two legions, five thousand auxiliaries, and five hundred horse. He imbarqued at Luna in Hebruria, and landed at Rhoda, now Roses, in Catalonia. From thence he marched by land to Emporia, where he was joined by the prætor Helvius, who had just gained a considerable victory over the Spaniards. As Cato's troops consisted for the most part of raw soldiers, he took great pains to discipline them, considering that they had to deal with the Spaniards, who, in their wars with the Romans and Carthaginians, had learned the military art, and were naturally brave and courageous. The general himself was a pattern to his men of vigilance, sobriety and assiduity in labour. His dress was always plain, he readily exposed himself to the inclemencies of the season, and his provisions were the same which the common soldiers had. When a camp was to be pitched, he was always the first to take up the spade, and the last to lay it down. By this management, the consul soon put his troops on the foot he desired, and then marched in quest of the enemy, but first sent away his fleet, that his soldiers might place all their hopes in their bravery. With this same view, when he came near the enemy, he took a compass, and posted his army behind them in the plain; so that the Spaniards were between him and his camp. In the general action which ensued, the Spaniards were, by Cato's admirable conduct, intirely defeated, and driven out of the field. After this victory, deputies flocked to his camp from all the neighbouring cities, intreating him to pardon them; but he did not accept their submissions, till they had given him hostages. As the dread of his name procured him great respect in all the provinces beyond the Iberus, he wrote the same day private letters to the commanders of several fortified towns, ordering them to demolish without delay their fortifications, assuring them, that he would pardon none, but such as readily complied with his orders. Every one of the commanders, believing the order to be sent only to himself, immediately beat down their walls and towers; so that all the places in whole provinces beyond the Iberus, were left defenceless, and seized by the Romans without opposition. After this, the consul marched into Further Spain, to assist Manlius the prætor, who commanded in those parts; but not being able to bring the enemy to a battle, he returned to his old camp upon the banks of the Iberus. In his way he took several towns, and a prodigious booty, bestowing on each of his soldiers, besides the spoils, a pound weight of silver. When some of the officers seemed surprised at this liberality, he told them, It is better that many of the Romans should return home with silver, than a few only with gold. Of all the booty he appropriated nothing to his own use, but continued to live in as frugal a manner as the meanest soldier. The campaign being ended, he sailed back to Rome with his troops, and was honoured the next year with a triumph; after which he led a private life, employing his leisure in study. He wrote a book of the origin of the cities of Italy, and another of agriculture, in which he took great pleasure. He often pleaded before the senate and people, and was always ready to serve his country even as a private soldier.

Flaminius.

BUT to return to Flaminius: Tho' a peace was concluded with Philip, yet the senate, being well apprised, that, sooner or later, they must break with Antiochus, judged it necessary, that Flaminius should continue in Greece; and as there was reason to suspect, that Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, would join the king of Syria, orders were sent to the proconsul to attack and crush that tyrant. Pursuant to these orders, Flaminius marched with all his forces to besiege Lacedæmon; and at the same time his brother Quintilius appeared on the coast with forty ships of war. Upon their appearance, several cities on the coast of Laconia submitted to the Roman admiral, and among the rest Gythium, a strong town, and, as it were, the port of Lacedæmon. Hereupon Nabis sent deputies to desire a conference with the proconsul; which being granted, a peace was soon after concluded upon such terms as Flaminius thought fit to impose. And now the proconsul, having intirely rescued Greece from slavery, and put it out of the power either of Philip or Nabis to disturb the peace he had established in all parts, returned to Rome, where he was honoured with a triumph, which lasted three days.

- THE following year, when Scipio Africanus and Tiberius Sempronius Longus were consuls, nothing happened worth mentioning, except a victory which the latter gained over the Cisalpine Gauls. The enemy lost eleven thousand men, and the Romans five thousand. Scipio hoped to be sent against Antiochus; but as that prince had not yet openly declared against Rome, that illustrious Roman had no opportunity to signalize himself in his second consulate. In the beginning of the next year, when Cornelius Merula and Minucius Thermus were consuls, three ambassadors came to Rome from Antiochus, to propose an alliance with the republic; but the Romans requiring him to renounce all his pretensions to Thrace, Æolis and Ionis, to which he had an undoubted right, the ambassadors returned to Antioch, much dissatisfied with the reception they had met with at Rome^m. This year P. Cornelius Scipio, surnamed Nasica, gained a considerable victory over the Lusitanians, who inhabited the country we now call the kingdom of Portugal. After this, he left Spain, and resigned his army to Fulvius his successor, who defeated in a pitched battle the united forces of the Vaccæi, Vettones and Celtiberians, and took Hilermus, one of their kings, prisoner. In Hither Spain, Flaminius came late into his province; but nevertheless made himself master of Ilucia, a strong town, and cleared the country of some banditti, who infested it. In Cisalpine Gaul, the consul Merula defeated the Boii near Mutina, killed fourteen thousand of them on the spot, made near two thousand prisoners, among whom were three of their generals, and took two hundred and twelve colours, with sixty three Gallic carts loaded with baggage. However, this victory was much disputed, and cost the conquerors dear; for they lost five thousand men, legionaries and auxiliaries, among whom were twenty-three centurions, two tribunes of the second legion, which was most exposed, and many officers of the allies. Notwithstanding this victory, Merula was refused a triumph, being charged by Marcellus, one of his lieutenants, with some misconduct during the action. Q. Minucius Thermus, the other consul, marched against the Ligures, who, to the number of fifty thousand men, were incamped near Pisa; but as the consular army consisted for the most part of raw and undisciplined troops, Thermus acted only upon the defensive.

Spain and Ci-

- WHEN the time for electing new consuls drew near, two patricians, of high birth and great merit, offered their service to the republic, viz. Scipio Nasica and L. Quinctius. Two other illustrious citizens contended for the plebeian consulship, Lælius and Domitius Ænobarbus. Nasica and Lælius were supported by Africanus, who was cousin-german to the former, and united to the latter by the ties of an intimate and strict friendship. Quinctius was recommended by his brother Flaminius, who had lately been so successful in Greece and Macedon. When the day appointed for the elections came, it appeared, that Flaminius had more interest than the great Scipio, who had the double mortification of not succeeding either for his cousin or his friend; so that Quinctius was preferred to Nasica, and Ænobarbus to Lælius, tho' the plebeian consul was not recommended by any extraordinary merit of his own or his friends.
- e Time had somewhat lessened the esteem and veneration of the people for the conqueror of Hannibal; besides, he had disoblinded the commons, by the invidious distinction he had procured the senators the year before, of sitting in the orchestra at the scenic shews apart from other spectators. The new consuls were scarce entered upon their office, when news was brought to Rome of the defeat of the Ligurians by Thermus, now proconsul. He had been drawn by the enemy into a kind of Caudian Forks, but rescued out of danger by a stratagem of the Numidian horse in his army. These advancing towards the posts the Ligurians had seized, galloped up and down the plain, without offering to attack them; so that they were rather an entertaining sight, than matter of terror. Nothing could be more contemptible in appearance
- f than the Numidian squadron; the men had no arms but one dart each; their horses were small and lean, and as they had no bridles, they thrust out their necks, and hung down their heads when they galloped. The Numidians added to the ridiculousness of their appearance out of design, affecting to fall off their horses, to raise the laugh and shouts of the enemy. This scene was so agreeable to the Ligurians, that many of them, not apprehending any danger from so contemptible an enemy, quitted their arms and ranks, and sitting down on the grass, entertained themselves with so diverting a sight. On the other hand, the Numidians, advancing nearer and nearer, as if they could not govern their horses, all on a sudden clapping their spurs to them, flew through the Ligurian battalions with incredible swiftness, and entering the plain, set fire to a the enemy's magazines. This caused such a diversion, that one pass was left unguarded, which gave the Romans an opportunity of seizing it, and getting out of the snare. After this, Rome sent the proconsul a reinforcement of four thousand foot, and two hundred horse; and then he forced them to come to a battle, and gained a complete victory over them. Nine thousand of the enemy were killed on the spot, their army was dispersed, and their camp besieged, which they valiantly defended till night; but quitted it by favour of the darkness, and left it to be plundered by the Romans ^a.

WHILE these things were transacting in Italy, the Ætolians raised new disturbances in Greece. They resolved, in a general diet of the nation, to renounce their alliance with Rome, and form a new confederacy against her. With this view they sent deputies to Philip, Nabis and Antiochus. Nabis immediately took arms, and besieged Gythium. Upon this beginning of a general commotion in Greece, the senate sent three ambassadors to the king of Syria; and on this occasion it was, that Scipio Africanus, who accompanied them without a commission, had the famous conference with Hannibal, who, being persecuted at home by the Romans and the Barcan faction, had taken refuge in the court of Antiochus, as we have related in the history of Syria. As Rome would not abate any thing of her first pretensions, the conference between the king and the Roman ambassadors was warm, but not long. From this time Antiochus resolved to declare war against Rome, and began to make the necessary preparations for passing over into Greece, contrary to the advice of Hannibal, who pressed him to invade Italy. Pursuant to the resolution he had taken of making Greece the seat of the war, he transported himself thither with only ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six elephants, these being all the forces he had ready. Hereupon war was immediately declared at Rome against Antiochus. The new consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica and M. Acilius Glabrio, drew lots for their provinces; and Greece falling to the latter, he immediately set out for his province with twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and fifteen elephants. On his arrival in Greece, he was joined by the allies of the republic there, and with their assistance he soon subdued all Theffaly. In the mean time Antiochus seized the famous freights of Thermopylae; but the consul, by the advice and assistance of Cato, who served in no higher a station than that of a legionary tribune, forced the Syrian's strong intrenchments, and obliged him to abandon Greece, and retire to Ephesus. Much about the same time, Livius, the Roman admiral, gained a complete victory over the Syrians at sea. The joy of the Roman people for these successes in the Levant, was greatly heightened by the account they received from Cisalpine Gaul of the intire reduction of the Boii by Scipio Nasica. This whole nation being subjected, their lands were shared among Roman colonies sent thither for that purpose. The same year the proconsul Thermus finished the war with the Ligurians, by the reduction of their whole country; so that Italy now enjoyed a profound tranquillity. Endeavours were used by one of the tribunes to have Nasica and Thermus triumph jointly; but the senate granted that honour to the former only. His procession was set off with all sorts of spoils, with chariots made after the Gallic fashion, standards, vases of brass, fourteen hundred and seventy collars of gold, twelve hundred and twenty horses taken from the enemy, two thousand three hundred and forty pounds weight of gold, and lastly, a great number of captives, among whom were many of the chief nobility of the country. The conqueror bestowed on each of his soldiers a hundred and twenty-five asses of brass, that is, about eight shillings; to every centurion twice as much, and to every horseman three times that sum. At the same time the senate granted an ovation to the propraetor Fulvius Nobilior, for having subdued the Vellones and Oretani in Spain. His procession was adorned with spoils of great value, viz. a hundred and thirty thousand pieces of silver money, ten thousand pounds weight of silver in bars, and a hundred and twenty-five pounds weight of gold in ingots ^b.

THE consuls chosen for the new year were L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Laelius, the former brother, the other friend to the great Scipio. As Laelius had the reputation of being the abler commander, he artfully proposed to his colleague, that, instead of drawing lots, they should leave the matter to the decision of the senate. Scipio Africanus advised his brother to accept the proposal; and when the affair was laid before the senate, he offered to serve under his brother in quality of his lieutenant.

There

- a There needed no other argument ; the conscript fathers immediately assigned Asia to the two Scipios, as their common province. Thus the great Africanus shewed more regard to the honour of his family, than partial affection to his friend. It would have cast a blemish on his brother, if he had not been judged fit to command the army against Antiochus ; besides, Lælius had been a little wanting in point of friendship, by exposing his friend's brother to an affront. The two brothers immediately imbarqued at Brundisium with thirteen thousand men, and landed at Apollonia. From thence they marched through Epirus and Thessaly, and at length arrived before Amphissa, a city of the Ætolians, which Acilius was besieging. Hither came deputies from the Athenians to intercede for the Ætolians ; and the consul was prevailed upon to grant
- b them a truce, that they might send ambassadors to Rome to treat of a peace with the senate. By this truce the siege of Amphissa was raised ; and then Acilius resigned the command of his two legions to the consul, and returned home. The Scipios pursued their march through Macedon and Thrace, and crossed the Hellefont without opposition. Scipio Africanus fell sick near Elæa ; but his brother Lucius, being ambitious of gaining a victory in his absence, pursued Antiochus, and coming up with him near Magnesia, gave him a total overthrow. The Syrian lost on this occasion fifty thousand men, including prisoners of war, and the Romans not above three hundred foot, and twenty-five horse. Tho' the success of this action was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Eumenes king of Pergamus, and his brother Attalus, yet Lucius Scipio gained by it the surname of Asiaticus, as his brother had done, by his victories in Africa, that of Africanus. Antiochus, after his defeat, readily submitted to such conditions of peace as the consul thought fit to impose upon him, as we have related at length in the history of Syria, to which we refer our readers. The Ætolians, hearing of the defeat of Antiochus, sued for peace in good earnest ; which was granted them at the intercession of the Athenians, but upon very severe conditions ; which the reader will find in our history of Ætolia. Acilius, who had overcome Antiochus at the pass of Thermopylæ, was honoured on his return with a triumph, in which were carried many valuable spoils of Greece and Asia, a great many silver vases carved after the Greek fashion, all the plate of the king of Syria, and his moveables, which were of an
- d inestimable value, two hundred and thirty standards, three thousand pounds weight of silver in bars, a hundred and thirteen thousand Attic tetradrachmæ, amounting to fourteen thousand five hundred and ninety-five pounds sixteen shillings and eight pence, and two hundred and forty-eight thousand cistophori, pieces of silver coin current in Asia, and amounting in the whole to four thousand two hundred and seventy-one pounds two shillings and two pence. Acilius also brought home with him forty-five crowns of gold, which were presents made him by cities in alliance with Rome. Thirty-six Ætolian chiefs, taken prisoners in war, walked before the triumphant victor's chariot.

Antiochus totally defeated in the battle of Magnesia. Year of the flood 2814. Before Christ 185. Of Rome 563.

- The consular year being expired, the fasces were transferred from Scipio and Lælius to M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The former was sent into Ætolia, to settle affairs there, and the latter into Asia, where he took upon him the command of the army, which had defeated Antiochus at Magnesia. As no nation had lent Antiochus more powerful succours than the Gallo-Greeks or Galatians, the consul resolved to march against them, and attempt the reduction of their country. They were originally Gauls, who, to the number of twenty thousand, had, in the time of Brennus, crossed the Alps, and passing through Thrace, entered Asia, and settled in an inland country beyond Caria and Phrygia. The consul being assisted in his long march by Seleucus the king of Syria's son, and by Attalus the brother of Eumenes, arrived at length on the confines of Galatia. Upon his approach, the Galatians retired with
- f all their effects and provisions to the tops of high mountains, with a design to tire out the patience of the Romans, by leaving them to languish away their time in desolate plains. The consul marched first against those Galatians, who were called Tolistobii, and were posted on mount Olympus, forced their intrenchments, slew great numbers of them, and took forty thousand prisoners, including women and children. After the defeat of the Tolistobii, the consul led his army against the Tectosagi and Troemi posted on mount Magaba, attacked their intrenchments with the same success as he had done the other, and forced the whole nation to sue for peace. He would not treat with them on the spot ; but ordered their deputies to follow him to Ephesus, whither he retired with his army, the weather beginning to be very cold in Galatia. The Galatians obeyed the commands given them, and concluded a peace with the consul on his own terms ^a.

The Ligurians
subdued.

THE war with the Gauls in Asia was scarce finished, when a new one broke out with the Gauls and Ligurians in Italy. M. Valerius Messala, one of the new chosen consuls, was ordered to Pisa, to watch the motions of the latter, and C. Livius Salinator, the other consul, to march against the former. Fulvius and Manlius were continued in their respective provinces, in quality of proconsuls. Fulvius had, during his consulship, established all the cities on the continent of Greece in their ancient freedom; but had added the island of Cephalenia to the demesns of the republic. Hither he transported his troops, and now, being proconsul, made it the place of his residence, giving from thence law to all Greece. All disputes between the Greek cities and states were brought to his tribunal; so that in reality they had only an appearance of liberty. The consuls of this year performed nothing worthy of notice against the Gauls and Ligurians; and therefore the new consuls, M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius, were both ordered against the Ligurians, whom they reduced in one campaign, and made all quiet between Hetruria and the Alps. During their consulate, the proconsul Manlius arrived at Rome. After the reduction of Galatia, he had crossed the Hellepont in his way home. As he was passing through Thrace, a body of ten thousand Thracians attacked him in a narrow pass between woods, where the Romans could not form themselves in order of battle. However, he escaped the danger, with the loss only of some spoils, and continuing his march through Thessaly and Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he was to imbarque; but the season being now far advanced, he passed the winter there, and arrived in Italy early in the spring. He halted in the neighbourhood of Rome, and demanded, as usual, a triumph of the senate, assembled in the temple of Bellona; but his request met with great opposition. It was objected, that he had undertaken his expedition against the Galatians, without the orders of the republic, and carried it on more like a robber, than a Roman consul. It was also urged, that he had been wanting in conduct, since he had suffered the Thracians to rob him of part of the spoils. But Manlius shewing that the Gauls had assisted Antiochus, and excusing, as well as he could, his disaster in Thrace, after a long debate, a triumph was decreed him by a majority of votes ^c.

AND now Rome being disengaged from all foreign wars, the most zealous republicans took pleasure in prosecuting the chief men in the state. They thought it perhaps a refined policy to humble those in times of peace, whom they had exalted in times of war. Cato, who had always been a secret enemy to Scipio Africanus, no sooner saw the republic in a condition to do without him, but he resolved to destroy him: With this view he engaged two tribunes of the people, both Petilius's, to cite him before the tribes, to answer to a charge of misdemeanour. One of the tribunes made it matter of accusation against him, that he had spent a whole winter in effeminacy and pleasures at Syracuse, before he went into Africa. The other charged him with the pillage of Locri, and many violences, which had been committed in that city by Pleminius, whom he had appointed governor of the place; but the grand accusation was, that he had received from Antiochus great sums to procure him an advantageous peace. The number of the accusers was so great, that the whole day was spent in their speeches; so that the trial was postponed to twenty-seven days after. In the mean time the tribunes moved in the senate, that Scipio should be obliged to give an account of the spoils he had brought from Asia, and produce the book, in which he had set down the sums he had received from Antiochus; and the senate complied with the motion. When the time came for determining the affair, it happened to be the same day of the year, on which he had obtained the famous victory over Hannibal at Zama. Scipio brought his books of accounts with him, and having only shewed it to the people, he tore it in pieces before them, saying, On this day Hannibal was conquered, and Carthage subdued: why then do we trifle it away in bearing idle declamations? The gods expect us at the capitol: follow me, Romans; let us go thither, and jointly offer up our vows and thanksgivings. He had scarce uttered these words, when the tribes began to move, and the whole assembly followed him; even the apparitores and other officers, whose business it was to attend the tribunes, deserted them. This was a glorious triumph for the accused. However, he was cited to appear a third time; ^d

- and then he gave way to the storm, and retired to his country house near Liternum, in the neighbourhood of Naples. The tribunes proceeded in order to condemn him as by default, tho' Lucius Scipio appeared, and alledged, that his brother was sick. This fury against so venerable a man raised the compassion even of his enemies. A tribune of the people, named Tib. Gracchus, tho' an avowed enemy to the Cornelian family, declared, to the great surprize of all, that, he thought, Scipio Asiaticus ought to be believed concerning the sickness of his brother; and then went on thus: If Scipio were at Rome, I would oppose his appearing to take his trial. What! shall the conqueror of Carthage appear at the foot of our tribunal, to be reviled there by an insolent populace? Did he conquer Hannibal and Antiochus, to fall a sacrifice to the two
- b Petilius's? Shall we pretend to triumph over a man, who has been honoured with so many triumphs of the noblest kind? Let him at least find a safe retreat for his old age in the port to which he is retired for refuge. This unexpected declaration from an old enemy of the Scipios, had such an effect on the rest of the tribunes, that they dismissed the tribes, telling them, that they would consider more maturely of the matter. Whether Scipio's sickness was feigned or real, we cannot determine; but it is certain that he died soon after, in the forty-eighth year of his age. He is said to have been so dissatisfied with the cowardice of the senate, the iniquity of the people, and the ingratitude of both, that, at his death, he desired his wife Emilia, the daughter of Emilius Paulus, who died so gloriously at the battle of Cannæ, not to carry his bones to
- c Rome. She erected a mausoleum for him at Liternum, and there placed his statue, with that of the poet Ennius, who was probably his faithful friend, and companion of his retreat. Such was the end of the greatest commander, and the most accomplished citizen the republic had ever produced.

- BUT even the death of the great Scipio did not extinguish the hatred of the implacable Cato to the Cornelian family. He thought the vast authority of the Scipios might prove dangerous to the republic, and therefore was resolved to humble them. In republican states precaution is often carried to ingratitude and injustice. To have done great services is sometimes enough of itself to make a man suspected. The eyes of Africanus were scarce closed, when Cato turned his fury, or, as some call it, the bitterness of his zeal, against Asiaticus. He drew up a petition to the people, which
- d was presented by the two Petilius's, That the tribes would solicit the senate to order an inquiry concerning what money had been received from Antiochus, and from the cities in his dominions. This petition was accepted, and a decree passed pursuant to it, with an additional clause, That an inquiry should be likewise made after the money received from the allies of Antiochus. Furius Purpureo, one of the ten commissioners, who had been sent into Asia to settle the conditions of peace with Antiochus, got this clause added, in order to include Manlius in the process, who was supposed to have drawn great sums from the Galatians. The person whom the faction pitched upon was Terentius Culco, at that time prætor, but a secret enemy to the Cornelian family, tho' he had been formerly delivered out of slavery in Africa by Scipio Africanus, as we have related above.
- e Before this unjust and partial judge Scipio Asiaticus was cited to appear, and with him Aulus and Lucius Hostilius, two of his lieutenants, and C. Furius his quæstor. The prætor, having heard the charge, and received the depositions, declared Scipio, Aulus, Hostilius and Furius convicted; the first of having received from Antiochus, to procure him a favourable peace, six thousand pounds weight of gold, and four hundred and eighty pounds weight of silver; the second of having received twenty pounds weight of gold in ingots, and four hundred and three pounds weight of silver in bars; and the third of having received a hundred and thirty pounds weight of gold, and two hundred of silver. The prætor condemned them to pay large fines. The two
- f latter immediately gave security; but Scipio, still insisting on his having accounted with the republic for all the money he had brought from Asia, and refusing to give bail, the officers were ordered to carry him to prison; but then Scipio Nasica appealed from the prætor's sentence to the people. While he was pleading his cousin's cause, the prætor Culco ordered the house of the accused to be searched, and his goods to be confiscated. But he did not find effects enough to pay the fine laid upon him; and it was much to his justification, that, among all his moveables, not one thing was to be found, which could be judged to have been brought from Asia. Nasica being informed of this, took thence an occasion to justify his relation. At the same time

Gracchus, dissenting from the other tribunes, spoke with great eloquence in his favour. ^a The multitude applauded what Gracchus said; truth seized their minds all at once, and changed their affections. However, the prætor would not repeal his decree; so that Scipio's effects remained confiscated, by which means he was reduced at once to a state of beggary. His relations and clients endeavoured to persuade him to accept of their presents; and, had he done so, he would have been richer than he was when his effects were confiscated: but it was in vain; he had courage enough not to fear poverty, and therefore would accept of nothing more than bare necessities. Rome afterwards acknowledged his innocence and merit, sent him ambassador to terminate some differences between Eumenes and Seleucus, and, upon his return, took pleasure to enrich him; insomuch that he was in a condition to celebrate games for his victory ^b over Antiochus for ten days together at his own expence. All the shame of his disgrace fell on the ungrateful Culeo, and the tribunes. As for Cato, he only kindled the fire, and disappeared when it burnt with most fury; and the people being disposed to think he meant well, he lost no reputation; nay, he was soon after promoted to the greatest honours. The Scipios, to express their gratitude to Gracchus, bestowed on him Cornelia, the younger daughter of the great Africanus, the elder being already married to Scipio Nasica ^c.

the athletæ introduced at Rome.

BEFORE the consular year expired, the proconsul, L. Fulvius Nobilior, being returned from Greece, obtained a triumph, but not without great opposition, for having reduced Ætolia. His triumphal procession was set off with a great number of crowns ^e of gold, a vast quantity of gold in ingots, and silver in bars, immense sums of Attic and Macedonian money, multitudes of marble and brass statues, &c. Fulvius made rich presents to his officers, gave twenty-five denarii, that is, sixteen shillings and one penny, to every common soldier, fifty to every centurion, and seventy-five to every horseman. As for his games, they were celebrated with the greatest magnificence and judgment. On this occasion the combats of the athletæ were seen for the first time in the arena at Rome, and the people were likewise entertained with the hunting of lions and panthers. The consulship of Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Marcius Philippus was spent in making preparations for carrying on the war against the Spaniards and Ligurians, who began to move anew. In the beginning of the following consulship ^d of Appius Claudius Pulcher and M. Sempronius Tuditanus, three commissioners were sent into Greece, to terminate some disputes between the king of Macedon and the Greek republics. The commissioners chose the vale of Tempe for the place where the contending parties should meet; and Philip had the mortification to be cited before the tribunal of three Roman citizens. The seats in the court of judgment were so disposed, that the commissioners sat uppermost, the accusers next, and the king the lowest, as a criminal; for the Greeks pretended, that he had seized and detained many cities belonging to them. Philip answered the charge brought against him with an air of threatening; whereupon the commissioners, thinking it necessary to humble him, pronounced the following decree: Our will and pleasure is, that the Macedonian garisons evacuate forthwith all the places in dispute, and that the kingdom of Macedon be reduced to its ancient limits. Philip made no reply, but readily submitted to the sentence pronounced against him. Thus the citizens of Rome began to determine the fate of monarchs, and treat them as their vassals ^e. In Spain the two new prætors, Quintilius and Calpurnius, fought two battles with the Lusitanians. In the first they were defeated, and lost five thousand men; but in the second they gained a complete victory, killed and took thirty thousand of the enemy, and quieted the country for some time. In Italy both consuls marched against the revolted Ligurians. Sempronius carried the war into the country of the Apuans, in the east of Liguria, and Claudius into the territory of the Ingauni, more to the west. The former ravaged the enemy's fields, pillaged their villages, burnt down the woods, and opened a way into the heart of the country. The latter fought several successful battles with the Ingauni, took six of their cities, made a great many prisoners, and put to death forty-three of the ringleaders of the revolt. The campaign being ended, both consuls returned to Rome to hold the comitia for the great elections, in which P. Claudius Pulcher and L. Porcius Licinius were chosen chief magistrates for the new year. When the censors came to be elected, Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus were, by a great majority, preferred to Scipio Asiaticus, and other men, who had done the republic eminent services. The ^f

- a cenfors immediately drew up a new list of the senators, and degraded seven of that illustrious body, among whom was Quintius, the brother of Flaminius, for having killed with his own hand, when he commanded in Cisalpine Gaul, a Boian nobleman, who fled to him for protection. This treacherous murder he had committed only to gratify the curiosity of a young Carthaginian, for whom he had conceived an execrable passion, the infamous pathic expressing a desire to see a man die a violent death. Manlius, or, as others call him, Mamilius, was degraded, and his name struck out of the list of the senators, only for having saluted his wife in the presence of his daughters. Scipio Asiaticus, since his disgrace, had been made a Roman knight; but the rigid cenfor, out of an inveterate hatred to the Cornelian family, took away, upon what pretence is not known, the horse which the public kept for him; so that the conqueror of Antiochus was now reduced to the condition of the most private persons. After this, his severity fell on multitudes of people; he laid a heavy tax on fine moveables, jewels, and all superfluities both of men and women; and, by such popular acts, made himself so acceptable to the people, that they erected a statue to him in the temple of Health. After the expiration of his cenforship, he spent the rest of his days in a private life. He found exercise enough for his philosophy in his own family, his wife, who was of a high birth, being very expensive, and ill-tempered. He took upon himself the education of his only son, whom he would not suffer to be taught the learning of the Greeks, saying, That the only study of a Roman should be how to conquer, and how to govern conquered nations. He was a great soldier, an able statesman, an eloquent orator, a learned historian, and well skilled in rural affairs: but these accomplishments were counterbalanced by great defects; he was extravagantly severe, jealous of the merit of others, and ambitious to a high degree. As a private person, he lived frugally; but it was only to lay up money. He used to say to his son, That no man deserved any esteem till he had doubled his fortune. In public he was ever extolling continence; but in private was familiar with a beautiful slave. To revenge himself on his son and daughter-in-law for treating her contemptuously, he married a second time in his old age; and when his son asked him by what act of disrespect he had incurred his displeasure, he replied, I have no manner of complaint to make against you; your conduct is so prudent, that I am resolved to have other children like you. As his merit and virtues were known, and his vices concealed, he acquired the esteem of the multitude; so that, tho' four-and-forty times accused before the people, he was always acquitted *.

- THE following consulship of Q. Fabius Labeo and M. Claudius Marcellus was remarkable for the death of two famous men, Philopæmen, of whom we have spoke in the history of the Achæans, and Hannibal, who, persecuted by the Romans, had taken refuge in the court of Prusias king of Bithynia; but that prince being obliged by the Romans, contrary to the laws of hospitality, to withdraw his protection from him, the illustrious Carthaginian, to avoid falling into the hands of his implacable enemies, either drank a poisonous draught, or took a subtle poison, which he is said to have always carried about with him in his ring †. Thus died, to the eternal reproach of the Roman name, in the seventieth, or, as others will have it, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, a hero, who, to his last breath, was the terror of Rome. He is said to have upbraided the Romans, before he took the poisonous potion, with degenerating from the virtue of their ancestors, who had honourably prevented the murder of their mortal enemy Pyrrhus; whereas they forced a king to violate the most sacred laws of hospitality, to get rid of an old man in a treacherous and cowardly manner.

The death of Philopæmen and of Hannibal.

- THE following year, when L. Æmilius Paulus and Cn. Bæbius Tampilus were consuls, proved barren of great events. But the consulate of P. Cornelius Cethegus and M. Bæbius Tampilus, was remarkable for considerable victories gained by the Roman armies in Spain and Liguria, and for the suppressing of a revolt in Sardinia. The same year a stop was put to immoderate expences in feasts and entertainments. At the motion of one Orcius, a tribune of the people, it was enacted, that no man should spend more than one hundred asses of brass, that is, six shillings and five pence, at an entertainment; and the number of guests was likewise limited. In the succeeding consulship of A. Posthumius Albinus and C. Calpurnius Piso, the proconsul, Paulus Æmilius, defeated the Ligurians, and reduced the whole country of the Ingauni. Q. Fulvius Flaccus, the prætor of Hither Spain, was attended with equal success against the Celti- berians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, killed twenty-five thousand of them ^a on the spot, made four thousand eight hundred prisoners of war, and took above five hundred horses, and ninety-eight standards. The Romans lost two hundred legionaries, seven hundred of the Latin troops, and two thousand four hundred of the Spanish auxiliaries ^v. This same year Gentius, one of the kings of Illyricum, who had countenanced some piracies in the Adriatic, made his submissions to the senate, and was pardoned. Before the consular year was expired, the famous plebiscitum was published, called the Villian law, from Villius Tappulus, tribune of the people, who got it passed in the comitia. It enacted, that no man should be quæstor before he was one-and-thirty years of age, curule ædile before thirty-seven, prætor before forty, consul before forty-three; and this law continued in force till the fall of the republic ².

WHEN the time came for the elections, two brothers, the first instance of this kind, were promoted to the consular dignity, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had lately triumphed for his victories in Spain, and L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus. The latter was called Manlius, because he had been adopted into the Manlian family. Both consuls marched against the Ligurians. Manlius performed no memorable exploits; but Fulvius, who was a great soldier, defeated the Ligurians in a pitched battle, killed three thousand two hundred of them, and forced the rest to leave their mountains, and settle in the flat country. In Spain the prætors Sempronius and Albinus made themselves masters of Munda and Certima, two important places belonging to the Celtiberians, over whom ^c they gained several considerable victories. Sempronius is said to have killed near forty thousand of the Vaccæi and Lusitani; and Albinus to have destroyed about the same number of Celtiberians. The former, on his return, brought into the public treasury forty thousand pounds weight of silver, and the latter twenty thousand. They were both honoured with a triumph ². In Italy M. Junius Brutus and A. Manlius Vulso being chosen consuls, the latter, without any orders from the senate or people, marched against the Illyrians and Istrians, commanded by Gentius their king. The consul was shamefully surpris'd in his camp, and driven out of it; but he soon after recovered it again, and killed eight thousand of the enemy, while they were drunk with the wine they had found in it. The king, drunk as he was, was put on horseback, and ^d conveyed away by his guards. Notwithstanding this victory, the war was not finished before the succeeding consulship of C. Claudius Pulcher and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. Claudius, by taking three towns, Nesattium, Mutula and Favaria, brought the whole Istrian nation under subjection to Rome. The consul Sempronius maintained in Sardinia and Corfica the glory he had acquired in Celtiberia. He either took or killed twenty thousand of the rebels, and was on that account honoured on his return with a triumph, which was set off with a prodigious number of Sardinian captives, who were all sold by auction; and hence came the proverb, Sardinians to sell, tho' others carry the origin of it higher, as we have observed elsewhere.

THE consul Claudius, having subdued Istria, led his forces into Liguria, where he ^e gained a complete victory over the rebels, having killed or taken fifteen thousand of them. He then returned to Rome to preside at the comitia, when Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispalis and Q. Petilius Spurinus were chosen consuls; but the former dying soon after of an apoplectic fit, C. Valerius Lavinius was elected in his stead. Petilius, jealous of the glory which Claudius gained in Liguria, where he acted as proconsul, hastened thither, and took upon him the command of the army; but having attempted to force the Ligurian intrenchments, he was run through with a javelin, and killed, while he was leading on his men, after a repulse, to renew the attack. However, the Romans, tho' deprived of their general, gained a considerable victory, and killed above five thousand of the enemy, after they had made themselves masters of their ^f camp ^h. The two following years were barren of military exploits. In the first, P. Mucius Scævola and M. Æmilius Lepidus were consuls; and in the second Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Mucius Scævola. During the consulship of the latter, the streets of Rome were paved, which had never been done since the building of the city. L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popillius Lænas being chosen consuls for the new year, the latter marched against the Stelliates, a people in Liguria, bordering on the river Tanarus, and in a sharp conflict, which lasted three hours, killed ten thousand of them, and took seven thousand prisoners, and eighty two standards. The Romans lost

- a three thousand men, and the number of their wounded was exceeding great. After this defeat, the Stelliates, finding the forces of their nation reduced to ten thousand men, submitted to the consul, without settling any terms. Hereupon Popilius took away their arms, dismantled their cities, reduced them all to slavery, and sold them and their goods to the best bidder; but this severe proceeding was repented by the senate, and a decree passed, commanding Popilius to restore the money he had received for the sale of the Stelliates, to let them at liberty, return to them their effects, and even to purchase new arms for them. The senate concluded their decree with words, which posterity ought never to forget, Victory is glorious, when it is confined to the subduing of an untractable enemy; but it becomes shameful, when it is made use of to oppress the unfortunate ^c.

The equity of the Roman senate.

- b THE following year the Romans chose for the first time two plebeians to the consulate, P. Acilius Ligus and C. Popilius Lænas. From this time to the dictatorship of Julius Cæsar, nothing was more common than to see two plebeians consuls together. During the present consulate, Eumenes king of Pergamus came to Rome, out of pure zeal to acquaint the senate, that Perfes, who had succeeded his father Philip in the kingdom of Macedon, was soliciting alliances in Greece and Asia, and making great preparations for war. Tho' the senate kept the intelligence they had received from Eumenes an inviolable secret, yet Perfes, not doubting but he had acquainted the conscript fathers with his designs, resolved to be revenged on him; and accordingly employed ruffians to murder him as he was going to Delphos, to pay his homage to the god worshipped there. The king, tho' dangerously wounded, was afterwards cured; but the senate was so exasperated at this wicked attempt upon the life of their friend and ally, that they commanded Solon and Hippias, two deputies sent by Perfes to clear him of the crimes laid to his charge, to leave Rome immediately. They were scarce gone, when war was formally declared with the king of Macedon, for having usurped from the allies of Rome several cities, and refused to restore them to their lawful owners. The prætor Sicinius was ordered to sail from Brundisium with ten thousand men for Apollonia, and begin hostilities. In the mean time the consular year being near expired, P. Licinius Crassus and C. Cassius Longinus were raised to the supreme magistracy. Macedon falling by lot to the former, two legions were appointed him of six thousand foot and three hundred horse each, to which were added sixteen thousand auxiliary foot, and six hundred horse. Leave was likewise given him to chuse as many as he pleased of the veterans, who were not yet fifty years old. When the necessary preparations were made for imbarquing, new ambassadors came from Perfes, representing, that it was needless to send an army into Macedon, since the king their master was ready to give the republic all the satisfaction she could require; but the senate ordered them back with the following answer, That a consul would be soon sent into Macedon, and that Perfes might treat with him, if he was sincerely disposed to give the Romans satisfaction ^d.

Two plebeians chosen consuls.

The Romans declare war with Perfes king of Macedon.

- c SOON after, the consul Licinius imbarqued with his troops at Brundisium, landed at Apollonia, and marched to the Roman camp at Nymphæum; which post the prætor Sicinius had seized some months before. Hereupon Perfes assembled his army at Citium, consisting of forty thousand Macedonians, and some thousands of Gauls, Thracians, Cretans, Bæotians and Ætolians. With these forces, which formed the most considerable army that had been seen in Macedon since the time of Alexander the Great, Perfes marched against the consul Licinius, who, having left Nymphæum, was advanced into Thessaly, and had incamped on the banks of the Peneus. As the king was much superior to the consul in cavalry, he drew near his camp, and insulted him so far, that he was obliged to send out his light-armed troops to oppose those of the enemy; and then a smart action ensued, in which the Macedonians had all the advantage. The Romans, full of shame and confusion, left their camp in the dead of the night, crossed the river Peneus, and intrenched themselves on the other side of it. The next morning the king passed the river after them; but they removed to a stronger and more inaccessible place, where they received a reinforcement of a thousand foot, a thousand horse, and twenty-two elephants, under the command of Misagenes, the natural son of Masiniissa. The king, not being able to force the Roman intrenchments, and hearing that troops were marching from all parts to join the consul, sent, by the advice of his wisest counsellors, a new embassy to him, offering to maintain inviolably

the treaty which had been made with his father, and to reſtore to the allies of Rome all the places which Philip had yielded to them; but Licinius returned the following answer to the deputies, There is no peace for Perſes, till he ſurrenders up himſelf and his dominions to the Romans at diſcretion. Hereupon Perſes, laying aſide all thoughts of peace, prepared to renew hoſtilities. He attempted to bring the enemy to a general engagement; but the conſul declining it, he ſet out in perſon with two thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, to fall upon ſome parties of the Romans, who were buſy in reaping. Licinius, having timely notice of his deſign, haſtened with the greater part of his army to the aſſiſtance of his foragers, met the king, and cut in pieces the beſt part of his life-guard, who were thought invincible. This defeat ſo diſheartened the king, that he retired into Macedon to ſpend the winter there. As for the conſul Licinius, after ſome inconfiderable expeditions in Theſſaly, he took up his winter-quarters in Beotia. His colleague Caffius, tho' confined by his lot to Italy, had attempted to make his way into Macedon through Illyricum; but was recalled by the ſenate, and ſeverely reprimanded for engaging in ſuch an enterprize without orders.

The conſul Hoſtilius attempts in vain to enter Macedon.

THE following year A. Hoſtilius Mancinus and A. Atilius Scranus being choſen conſuls, Macedon fell by lot to the former, who immediately ſet out for his province, and arriving in Theſſaly, took upon him the command of the army; but was attended with no ſucceſs in two attempts which he made to enter Macedon. He firſt tried to force the paſs of Elymea; but his troops were put to flight by Perſes. After this, he endeavoured to make his way into Macedon through Theſſaly; but the king oppoſed him there likewiſe, and offered him battle; which the conſul, either out of cowardice, or an exceſs of precaution, declined; ſo that this campaign was chiefly ſpent in vain projects. Hoſtilius was recalled, under pretence of aſſiſting at the elections, when Q. Marcius Philippus and Cn. Servilius Cæpio were choſen conſuls. Theſe, when the levies came to be made, found the Roman youth, through ſome unaccountable humour, very obſtinate in reſuſing to inliſt themſelves. Hereupon two laws were enacted by the people for regulating the inrolments. The firſt required all thoſe who were under forty-fix, to appear, in order to be incorporated in the legions; the ſecond ordered all thoſe who were come from Macedon within three years laſt paſt, to return to their duty. The publication of theſe laws had ſo good an effect, that, in the ſpace of eleven days, a ſufficient number of ſoldiers were raiſed to recruit the armies in Spain and Macedon, and to form four legions, which were to be ready to march any-where upon the firſt orders. The levies being made, the conſul Marcus, to whoſe lot Macedon fell, haſtened into Theſſaly, reſolving, in ſpite of all difficulties, to force a paſſage into Macedon. Perſes, which is very ſurpriſing, never once appeared to oppoſe his march, tho' the roads were ſo bad, the paſſes ſo narrow, and the mountains ſo ſteep and craggy, that, by Marcus's own confeſſion, the Macedonian might have deſtroyed the whole conſular army with a handful of men. The conſul, having entered Macedon, marched firſt to Dium, and afterwards to Heraclea, made himſelf maſter of both theſe places, and then returned towards the frontiers of Theſſaly, his army being greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions. As he had no account of the king's army, he turned his thoughts wholly to the making of roads from Theſſaly to Macedon, in order to facilitate the conveyance of proviſions from one country to the other. He erected magazines all along the road, fortified them, and built houſes for the convenient lodging of thoſe who guarded the convoys. By this means he opened for his ſucceſſors an eaſy entrance into a kingdom, which had hitherto been deemed inacceſſible. In the mean time Perſes continued inactive in his camp on the banks of the Enipeus, where he ſpent the greater part of the ſummer, without ſo much as offering to diſturb the conſul in the proſecution of a work, which ſecured to the Romans the conqueſt of Macedon. And now both armies being retired into their winter-quarters, Perſes, thinking it ſafeſt for him to ſue for a peace, engaged Prusias king of Bitbynia, and the Rhodians, to be his mediators. The former employed intreaties, and the latter menaces; but neither the one nor the other prevailed. As for the Rhodians, the ſenate threatened to chaſtiſe them for their insolence, as ſoon as the conqueſt of Macedon ſhould be finiſhed.

- a end to this war. The person they cast their eyes upon was Paulus Æmilius; a patrician of consummate virtue, bravery and prudence, who had been consul thirteen years before. He was the son of the consul Æmilius, who perished in the battle of Cannæ, and the father of the famous Scipio Æmilianus, who was afterwards known by the name of the Second Africanus. This latter was named Scipio, from his adoption into the Cornelean family by the son of the great Scipio. The person raised to the consulate with Æmilius, was Lucinius Crassus, a man of great probity, who thought himself obliged to yield the conduct of the war in Macedon to his colleague, without drawing lots. Early in the spring Æmilius set out for Macedon, and the prætor Anicius for Illyricum; Gentius, the king of that country, having openly declared for Perjes. The
- b prætor reduced all Illyricum in thirty days. Having first defeated the Illyrian fleet, The Romans conquer Illyricum. he marched his land forces to Scodra, the metropolis of the kingdom, whither Gentius had retired with an army of fourteen thousand men. Tho' the place was strong, and defended by such a numerous garison, yet the king was so terrified at the approach of the Roman army, that he submitted to the prætor at discretion, who committed him to the care of a legionary tribune. Some days after, the king, the two queens, his mother and his wife, with three princes of the royal family, were sent captives to Rome, to grace in due time the prætor's triumphs. As for the consul Æmilius, as soon as he arrived in Thessaly, where his army was incamped on the banks of the Enipeus, he detached five thousand men, under the conduct of his eldest son Fabius
- c Æmilianus, and of his son-in-law Scipio Nasica, to surprise Pythium on the top of mount Olympus. The king, who was incamped on the opposite side of the Enipeus, having notice of this motion, sent out a more numerous detachment to intercept that of the consul; but the Macedonians were defeated, and cut in pieces. This disaster, and the news the king received at the same time of the misfortunes of Gentius, so disheartened him, that he abandoned his camp, and retired in great haste into Macedon, under the walls of Pydna. Thither Æmilius followed him; but restrained the impetuosity of his men, who were eager to fight the very moment they arrived. He first formed a camp, and having finished his lines, made his troops retire within them to
- d repose themselves that night. As the enemy's forces were drawn up in battalia, Scipio Nasica took the liberty to tell the consul, That his declining an engagement would bring the reproach of cowardice upon him and the whole army; but the general made only this short reply, At your age I talked as you do; and you at mine will act as I do. The next day a mere accident brought on a general engagement. A horse, having got loose from a Roman who was leading him, ran pretty far into a river between the two camps. Two Thracians of the enemy's guard, posted on the other side, went into the water to seize the horse, and three Romans at the same time hastened to recover him. One of the Thracians being killed, his countrymen on guard, to the number of eight hundred, advanced to revenge his death. This put
- e the Romans in motion, and by degrees brought on a general engagement. The king's army consisted of forty-five thousand men, the finest troops that had been seen in Macedon since the time of Alexander the Great. However, the Romans, by the excellent conduct of their general, obtained a complete victory, tho' they were considerably inferior in number. The Macedonians lost near twenty-five thousand men in the battle, five thousand were taken prisoners in the plain, and six thousand more in Pydna. The Romans are said not to have lost above a hundred men. As for Perjes, he fled first to Pella, from thence with his family and his treasures to Amphipolis, and lastly, being abandoned by all his troops, to the island of Samothrace, which was dedicated to the mother of the gods, and on that account respected by all nations.
- f The fugitive prince took up his habitation in a temple dedicated to Castor and Pollux, and there waited for some favourable turn of fortune. In the mean time the consul, having sent orders to Octavius the Roman admiral to invest the island of Samothrace with his fleet, marched into the heart of Macedon, and made himself master of Pella, Thessalonica, and many other important places. When he arrived at Siræ, a town in the most easterly part of the kingdom, he was met there by ambassadors from Perjes, who presented him a letter from their master; but Æmilius no sooner read the direction of the letter, where Perjes styled himself king, than he turned his back upon the ambassadors, and dismissed them without an answer. Hereupon the unhappy prince changed his style, and wrote as a private person, Perjes to the consul Paulus Æmilius.

This letter was well received, and the consul, in compliance with the king's request, ^a sent three officers to confer with him. These demanded by way of preliminary, that Perfes should abdicate the title of king, and leave his fate to be determined by the senate and people of Rome. This Perfes would not by any means comply with, insisting, that a lawful sovereign could not lay down his sovereignty, but with his life. In the mean time Octavius, having landed his men in Samothrace, and invested the island with his fleet, pressed Perfes, in an amicable manner, to throw himself on the clemency of the Romans. But the king being inflexible on that head, Octavius tried all means possible to persuade the inhabitants to drive him out of their island. The king, apprehending they might be prevailed upon to drive him away, or deliver him up, ^b privately contracted with a Cretan merchant, whose ship lay at anchor under Demetrium, a promontory of Samothrace, to convey him and his effects into Thrace, to Cotys, his old friend and ally. He sent part of his treasures before him, and in the dead of the night set out himself, accompanied only by his eldest son Philip, and three men, in whom he could confide. His other children, his pages, who were the sons of the chief lords of the kingdom, and all his retinue, he left behind him to the mercy of the Romans. But when he came to the shore, to his great surprise, he found no ship there. The perfidious Cretan had set sail in the dead of the night, and carried off the treasure he had on board. Hereupon the king, having rambled about the shore for some time in great perplexity what to do, returned at last into the temple, and concealed himself in a corner of it. In the mean time Octavius, having caused ^c proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet, That all Macedonians in Perfes's retinue, who should surrender themselves voluntarily to the Romans, should have life and liberty, not one remained with Perfes, except his eldest son. The unhappy prince, seeing himself thus abandoned by his domestics, and even his children, surrendered himself at length ^d to Octavius, and consented to be carried with his eldest son, and the remains of his treasure, to Amphipolis, whither the consul came to meet him, and receive his submissions. Æmilius received him with great honour and respect, entertained him the first day at his own table, and then committed him and his children to the care of an officer, till the time he had fixed for transporting them to Italy. ^e Thus ended the second Macedonian war, and with it the Macedonian monarchy, after it had continued in splendor about an hundred and ninety-three years, reckoning only from Philip, the father of Alexander the Great.

Perfes surrenders himself to the Romans.

The kingdoms of Illyricum and Macedon changed into republics.

AND now the consular year being near expired, the comitia were held for the new elections, when Q. Ælius Patus, and M. Junius Pennus, were raised to the consulate. Liguria fell by lot to the latter, and Cisalpine Gaul to the former. Æmilius was continued in the command of the army in Macedon as proconsul, and Anicius and Octavius in their respective provinces in quality of proprætors. During this consulate, princes and ambassadors came to Rome from all parts of the Levant, some to be rewarded, others to return thanks, some with compliments and presents, and others to make apologies for their conduct. Prusias, king of Bithynia, came to Rome in person, and carried his flattery to a monstrous excess of meanness. The Rhodians, who had stood neuter, and shewed a great inclination to assist Perfes, were deprived of all dominion over Lycia and Caria formerly granted them. But the chief business of the senate was to settle the government of the two conquered countries, Illyricum and Macedon. Instead of reducing them to Roman provinces, it was determined to change them into republics. ^f Accordingly, ten commissioners were appointed to assist Paulus Æmilius in settling Macedon, and five to assist Anicius in Illyricum. When the affairs of Macedon and Illyricum were settled, and the proconsul was preparing to conduct his army back to Rome, he received positive orders from the senate to go into Epirus, and to plunder and demolish the cities of that country, for having assisted Perfes, after they had by repeated oaths promised to be faithful to the Romans. Æmilius executed his instructions with great prudence and severity, as we have related in the history of Epirus, and then set out for Italy. Anicius and Octavius arrived at Rome much about the same time, and they were all three honoured with triumphs. That of Æmilius was the finest Rome had ever seen. The city was so much enriched by the valuable spoils brought from Macedon, that she had no occasion to lay any tax on the people from this time to that of Augustus. Perfes sent from the common gaol, where he was kept, to intreat the victor to spare him the confusion of appearing in his triumphal procession. Æmilius

- a gave the messenger the following answer ; Tell Perses, that it long has been, and still is in his power to free himself from our chains. This was telling him, that death alone could deliver him from the disgrace he feared. But the cowardly king, preferring the most shameful of all indignities to what was then deemed an honourable death, was led in triumph with his sons, Philip and Alexander, his little daughter, and the chief nobility of Macedon. The triumph of Æmilius was followed the next day by that of the proprætor Octavius, admiral of the Roman fleet. The triumphal procession of Anicius, the conqueror of Illyricum, was postponed for three months. King Gentius with his wife, children, his brother Caraventius, and several lords of his court, were led before the triumphant victor's chariot. Gentius was sent with his family to Iguvium, a city of Umbria ; but Perses was shut up in a close prison in Alba, a city of the Marfi, where he died miserably, as we have related in the history of *Macedon*¹. Perses dies.
- b Philip his eldest son is said to have died before him ; but his second son, being put out to a turner, gained his livelihood, first by that profession, and afterwards by doing the business of a scribe. And thus ended the race of the kings of *Macedon*².

THE following year, when C. Sulpicius Gallus and M. Claudius Marcellus were consuls, proved barren of memorable events. In the succeeding consulship of T. Manlius Torquatus and Cn. Octavius Nepos, Terence, the famous dramatic poet, was in his highest reputation. The fasces were afterwards transferred to A. Manlius Torquatus, and Q. Cassius Longinus ; during whose administration a census was made, by which there appeared to be in Rome 337552 citizens fit to bear arms. Paulus Æmilius, who was at this time one of the censors, soon after the expiration of his censorship, fell sick of a lingering disease, which in the end carried him off. Notwithstanding the prodigious sums with which he had filled the treasury of the republic, he continued poor himself, and after his triumph led a private life. In the height of his glory, his two sons by a second marriage died, the elder five days before his triumph, and the younger three days after it. Just before his retreat he harangued the people, and taking notice of this severe stroke of fortune on himself, expressed an acquiescence to it, provided it might satisfy the gods, and avert any evils from the republic, which in so much prosperity she might have reason to expect³.

- c Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Juventius Thalna being raised to the consulate, the latter was obliged to sail with an army into Corfica to quell a rebellion there ; while the other marched against the Ligurians, who had taken arms anew. But these wars were in reality no more than an amusement. During this consulate, Antiochus Epiphanes died, and was succeeded by his son Antiochus Eupator, who was but nine years old. Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, the late king's elder brother, had an indisputable right to the crown of Syria. But the Romans, thinking it more for the interest of their republic to have a child upon the throne, excluded Demetrius, who had been twelve years a hostage at Rome, and, without the consent or privity of the Syrians, declared young Antiochus the ward of the republic, and appointed Cn. Octavius and two other Roman senators to govern, as his guardians, the kingdom of Syria, in the name and under the direction of the republic. Nor were the Romans satisfied with doing this injustice to Demetrius ; they gave instructions to Octavius and his colleagues to burn all the ships with decks belonging to their ward, disable his elephants, and, in a word, to weaken as much as possible, the forces of his kingdom. In the following consulship of P. Cornelius Lentulus and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, Octavius set out for Syria, and arriving at Laodicea, a maritime city between Tripolis and Antioch, began to put the severe orders of his republic in execution, under pretence, that in virtue of the treaty with Antiochus the Great, the Syrians were to build no more ships of war, nor tame more elephants. The Syrians were highly exasperated at this presumption, especially Lysias, the young king's guardian, who being encouraged by the rage of the people against Octavius, hired an African to assassinate him. When the news of his murder reached Rome, Demetrius, who was still there, applied once more to the senate for leave to go and take possession of the kingdom, which of right belonged to him. But being a second time refused, by the advice of his friend Polybius the historian, he made his escape from Italy, got safe into Syria, and was there received and proclaimed king. The year following, when M. Valerius Messala and C. Fannius Strabo were consuls, the new king of Syria, to ingratiate himself with the Romans, sent an embassy to Rome, with a rich present of a crown of gold, and at the same time delivered up the African, who had murdered Octavius. The senate accepted the present, but sent back the assassin, telling the deputies, that such a victim was not an adequate satisfaction to the republic for the affront she had received ^a.

The Romans enter into an alliance with the Jews.

THE consuls for the new year, L. Anicius Gallus and M. Cornelius Cethegus, went rather to incamp, than make war, one in Liguria, the other in Cisalpine Gaul. During their administration, the Romans entered into a treaty of confederacy with the Jews; and at the request of Judas Maccabæus, who implored their protection against Demetrius, wrote the following imperious letter to the Syrian: Why have you insulted and oppressed the Jewish nation? Know that the Jews are our allies. If you give them the trouble to send another embassy to complain of you, we will treat you as an enemy, and pursue you by sea and land ^b.

Of the two consuls for this year Cethegus only gained himself some reputation by drying up the Pomptine marshes, which infected the air of the whole neighbourhood, and reducing them to a fruitful plain, which however was afterwards drowned again by fresh overflowings of the rivers. The following consuls, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, signalized themselves yet less in their administration. In the consulate of their successors, M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Popillius Lænas, Demetrius drove Ariarathes king of Cappadocia from the throne for refusing to marry his sister, and placed upon it Orofernes, a supposititious son of the late Cappadocian king. Ariarathes fled to Rome for refuge, and pleaded his cause before the senate. But the Romans, pursuant to their common maxims of policy, ordered the kingdom to be divided between the two competitors ^c.

The next year, when Sextius Julius Cæsar and L. Aurelius Orestes were consuls, the Dalmatians, who bordered upon Illyricum, made incursions, and committed great robberies there, though it was a country tributary to the republic. Nay, they would scarce vouchsafe an audience to Fannius the Roman ambassador, who came to complain of these proceedings, and demand satisfaction. The senate therefore, upon the report which Fannius made of the haughty treatment he had met with, resolved to begin a war with Dalmatia.

The first occasion of the third Punic war.

Another embassy, sent this year into Africa, at the head of which was Cato the censor, paved the way for the third Punic war. Masiniſſa had invaded Tyſca, a rich province belonging to the Carthaginians, and the dispute being referred to the arbitration of the senate, ten commissioners were ordered to go into Africa, and determine it upon the spot. But when Cato and his colleagues arrived there, the Carthaginians refused to accept them for judges, saying, that Scipio had settled their limits by a treaty of peace, and that to alter his appointments, would be to reflect on the memory of the greatest of men. This declaration provoked the pride of Cato to the highest degree. However, he dissembled his resentment, and leaving Tyſca a prey to Masiniſſa's troops, went to Carthage, and there examined every thing with a malicious eye. When he returned to Rome, he reported, that Carthage was grown immensely rich, that her magazines were crowded with stores, her ports full of ships, and that the war she was making with Masiniſſa was only an introduction to a more important one with Rome. He concluded with a warm exhortation to the senate to lose ^e

no time, but immediately to send troops with orders utterly to destroy a city, which would ever be an obstacle to the progress of the Roman arms. From this time he was always inciting them to destroy Carthage. Whenever he gave his opinion in the senate, be the subject what it would, he never failed to conclude with these words; I am also of opinion, that Carthage should be destroyed. But Scipio Nasica, who after the death of Paulus Æmilius, had the chief sway in the senate, constantly opposed the too rigid censor in this particular. The two succeeding consuls, C. Marcus Figulus and L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, prevailed upon the senate to declare war with the Dalmatians, the conduct of which was committed to the former, who, crossing the Adriatic, landed in Illyricum, and marched thence against the enemy. The Dalmatians, who ^f were a savage, but brave people, surprised and defeated the consul. But Scipio Nasica, who was raised to the consulate the next year with C. Claudius Marcellus, being appointed to continue the war, laid siege to Delminium, the metropolis of Dalmatia, made himself master of it, and in one campaign brought the whole country under subjection. His colleague Marcellus gained likewise some advantages over the Ligurians ^g. The republic having chosen Q. Opimius Nepos and L. Posthumius Albinus consuls, she ordered the latter into Spain, and the former into Transalpine Gaul. The avarice and extortions of the Roman prætors in Spain had caused almost a general

- a revolt there. The legion commanded by the prætor Calpurnius Piso had been defeated by the Lusitanians, and he himself with his quæstor Torrentius Varro had been killed in the battle. Posthumus was therefore ordered thither. But his wife having given him, before he left Rome, a slow poison, he was taken so ill at sea, that he could not bear the motion of the ship; so that he was brought back to Rome, where he died in seven days after his return. Acilius Glabrio, who was chosen consul in his room, was not sent into Spain, the senate not judging him qualified to undertake the re-establishment of their affairs in that country. As for the consul Opimius, he penetrated into Transalpine Gaul to assist the inhabitants of Marseilles, the old friends of Rome, against the Ligurians, who had taken from them two cities, Nicæa and Antipolis, defeated not only the Ligurians, but also the Deceata, who came to their assistance, and reduced their whole country, which comprehended the present territories of Antibes and Grasse. Such was the first conquest the Romans made beyond the Alps 9.

- It had been long customary for the consuls not to enter upon their office till the ides, or fifteenth of March; but this year the necessity of sending a consul into Spain, made the Romans assemble the comitia for the elections before the usual time. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, and T. Annius Luscus, were promoted to the consulate, and entered upon their office the first day of January, their predecessors abdicating to make way for them. From this time to the end of the republic, the first of January was always the day for the consuls to take possession of the fasces. The elections being over, Fulvius was sent with a considerable army into Spain, above half that vast continent being in a flame. The consul landed at Tarracon, and from thence marched against the Segedani and Aravacæ, who had united their forces to the number of twenty-five thousand men under the command of a brave general named Carus. He having laid an ambush for the consul in a wood, surprised him, and killed six thousand of his legionaries; but pursuing the fugitives with too much ardor into the plain, he was there attacked by the Roman horde, and killed with six thousand of his men. The battle was fought on the feast of Vulcan, a day which the republic ordered to be ever after deemed unlucky, like those on which she had lost the battles of Allia, Cannæ, &c. This regulation was chiefly owing to an excessive resentment of the senate and people against Fulvius. The Spaniards, having assembled their forces near Numantia, and chosen two new leaders, came to a second engagement with the Romans; but were defeated by means of some elephants sent by Masimissa; the Spaniards of that country, who had never seen any of those huge beasts, being terrified at the sight of them. After this victory, the consul attempted to scale the walls of Numantia, whither the enemy had retired; but one of his elephants being wounded, the hideous noise it made so frightened the others, that they turned upon the Roman legions, and put them into disorder. The besieged took advantage of the accident, sallied out, totally defeated the consul's troops, and killed four thousand of them. Fulvius after this ill success, and some other disasters that followed it, not daring to separate his troops, even during the winter, incamped in the field, and the season proving very severe, great numbers of his men perished with cold, want, and fatigue. The campaign which the Roman prætor Mummius made in Lusitania, was not much more successful. Immediately after his arrival he offered the rebels battle, which they did not decline, being commanded by one Cæsar, a Lusitanian of great courage and experience in war. The Lusitanians, after a vigorous resistance, were put to flight; but the Romans pursuing them in disorder, they rallied again, returned to the charge, killed nine thousand of the prætor's men, took his camp, and plundered it. The Roman army, now reduced to five thousand men, waited in an advantageous post for an opportunity of retrieving their reputation. And indeed they gained soon after some small advantage over the enemy, cut a detachment of Lusitanians in pieces, and recovered the Roman standards. A poor comfort after so great a misfortune! But it raised the courage of the Romans, and kept them from despairing 1.

THE consuls for the new year, M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus, no sooner entered upon their office, than the former set out for Spain with eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse. On his arrival he was attacked by the enemy; but Marcellus, who was an officer of great experience, put them to flight, made a great slaughter of the fugitives, and committed dreadful ravages in their country. Hereupon the rebels sent one of their chief officers to sue for peace, which Marcellus readily granted them upon very reasonable terms. The consul was desirous of settling a general peace in Spain before his consulship expired, that he might on that account be honoured with a triumph on his return to Rome. But the senate seeing through his design, and being likewise advised by some deputies from two provinces in friendship with the Romans not to grant the peace desired, they not only refused to ratify the articles agreed upon between the consul and the rebels, but resolved to pursue the war with more vigor than ever¹.

Carthage provoked the Romans.

IN the mean time a war began to break out in Africa. The Carthaginians being continually harassed by the invasions of Masiniſſa, and tired out with the injustice and partiality of the Roman republic, entered into an alliance with Archobazanes, the grandson of Sypbax, and king of one part of Numidia, engaging him to march with a great army to the frontiers of Masiniſſa's dominions. Rome looked upon this step as a breach of the treaties between her and the states of Africa, none of which were to take arms without her privity and consent. Cato on this occasion displayed his hatred to the Carthaginians, and was for immediately declaring war with that republic. But Scipio Nasica, who bore a greater sway in the senate than Cato, prevailed upon the conscript fathers to have the war deferred, till an embassy should be sent to Carthage to examine without passion into the true state of affairs there. Nasica himself was appointed ambassador for the negotiation he had proposed. When he came into Africa, he conducted himself with great prudence and moderation, and taking upon him the office of mediator between Carthage and Masiniſſa, he prevailed on the latter to restore the lands which had occasioned the quarrel. Thus all commotions would have been quieted, had not a seditious Carthaginian, named Gisgo, a man in office and favour with the people, spoke in the public assemblies with great warmth against the peace, which had been just negotiated. He by his seditious harangues so inflamed the populace, that they would have offered violence to Nasica, if he had not saved himself by flight. Upon his retreat, those in the senate of Carthage, to the number of forty, who had approved the peace, were condemned to perpetual banishment. The Roman senate was highly incensed at the treatment their ambassador had met with, and Cato much rejoiced to find Nasica at his return agree with him thus far, that Carthage deserved to be destroyed. However, the vengeance of the republic was suspended for some time on account of the war with the revolted *Spaniards*².

WHEN the new consuls, L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Posthumius Albinus, were ordered to recruit the legions in Spain, none of the citizens would give in their names, protesting, that they would not serve under the consul to whose lot Spain should fall, even in quality of lieutenants or legionary tribunes. The accounts they had received of the hardships which the troops under Fulvius had suffered, by spending a whole winter in the field, discouraged them to such a degree, that not one of the Roman youth appeared to inroll themselves. To increase the misfortune, the tribunes of the people protected those who refused to inlist themselves, and even went so far as to order the two consuls to be carried to prison for forcing some young men into the service. While the senate and consuls were perplexed what methods to take, a young Roman, not above thirty years of age, extricated them out of their difficulties. This was Scipio Æmilianus, the son of Paulus Æmilius, and by adoption the grandson of Scipio Africanus. One day, when the people were assembled for the inrollments, he desired leave to speak to them; which being granted, he mounted the rostra, and made an harangue full of the true Roman spirit. The ardor he expressed for the service of his country, and his offering to go himself into Spain, in what capacity soever the consuls should think fit, had such an effect on the people, that they were now as eager as they had before been backward, to give in their names. Then the consuls drew lots for their provinces, when Spain fell to Lucullus, and Cisalpine Gaul to Posthumius. It is uncertain whether Scipio Æmilianus served under Lucullus as one of his lieutenants, or only as a legionary tribune; but whatever was his post, he gained all the glory that was acquired during the war. Both Lucullus, who commanded in Hither Spain, and the prætor Sulpicius Galba, who commanded in Lusitania, made themselves infamous by the basest treachery, cruelty, and avarice. The former, finding that his predecessor had granted the Celtiberians a peace, went of his own head to make war on the Turduli and Cantabri. These had not given the Romans the least provocation; but Lucullus, who was covetous to excess, wanted to reap some profits by his con-

a fulship. With this view he entered their territories, and committed every-where most dreadful ravages, putting the inhabitants of whole cities to the sword, without distinction of sex or age, even after they had submitted upon terms. Æmilianus on this occasion acquired a high reputation of probity even among the oppressed Spaniards; and as for his bravery, he not only slew in single combat a Spaniard of a gigantic size, who had challenged the boldest of the Romans; but was honoured with a mural and civic crown. Lucullus soon after sent him, probably out of jealousy, into Numidia, under pretence of demanding some elephants of Masinissa *. The prætor Galba, who was as covetous as Lucullus, and more cruel, penetrated into Lusitania, destroyed every thing with fire and sword, and glutted himself with the spoils of those unhappy people. We are told, that he cruelly massacred above thirty thousand Lusitanians, b after he had solemnly promised them both their life and liberty, and by that means prevailed upon them to deliver up their arms. Neither the consul Lucullus, nor the prætor Galba, were so much as accused before the senate or people for these unjust and inhuman proceedings. The Romans were so prejudiced against the Spaniards, that they seem to have authorized the cruelties and injustice of their generals *.

In the mean time Gulussa, the son of Masinissa, arriving at Rome, confirmed the accounts which the senate had received from several quarters, that preparations were making at Carthage for an open declaration of war with the republic. Cato immediately laid hold of this occasion to repeat the words he had so often uttered; There c is no safety for Rome, till Carthage is destroyed. But the advice of Scipio Nasica still prevailed; and at his motion deputies were sent into Africa to inform themselves upon the spot of the preparations the Carthaginians were making by sea and land. The deputies on their return reported, that Carthage had undoubtedly a design to make war in some other place than the continent of Africa; that her fleet was numerous, and well equipped; and that she had on foot a formidable army. But notwithstanding these appearances, and all the eloquence of Cato, Nasica had influence enough over the senate to suspend the decree against the Carthaginians *.

In the following consulate of T. Quinctius Flaminius and M. Acilius Balbus, a bloody war broke out between Carthage and Masinissa. The Numidian king, though now almost ninety years of age, to revenge an affront offered by the Carthaginians to his d two sons, Gulussa and Micipsa, put himself at the head of a powerful army, and laid siege to Oroscofa, a city subject to the Carthaginian republic. Hereupon Carthage sent out a considerable number of troops under the command of Asdrubal to relieve the place. In several skirmishes the Numidians had always the disadvantage; whereupon Masinissa, who had learnt the art of war under the great Scipio, pretending fear, retired before the enemy, and by degrees drew them into a place, where he had all the advantage he could wish for. Here he halted with a design to give the enemy battle. While he was preparing for a general engagement, news was brought him, that Scipio Æmilianus was come from Spain into Africa, to desire, in the name e of the consul Lucullus, some elephants to be employed against the revolted Spaniards. Though Æmilianus was only the grandson of Africanus by adoption, yet upon the bare name of Scipio, the old king's affection and gratitude for a family, to which he owed his grandeur, revived. He would have gone in person to meet the Roman, if he had not been engaged in preparing for the battle, which was to be fought the next day, the two armies, each of them above fifty thousand strong, being incamped over against each other. However, he sent his two sons, with all his cavalry, to receive and escort him. When he arrived in the camp, Masinissa ran to embrace him with great tenderness, and could not refrain from tears, in mentioning his old benefactor Scipio Africanus. He attended him all over the camp, acquainted him with the preparations he was making against the next day's engagement, and made the flower of f his troops pass in review before him. Æmilianus was highly pleased with this sight; but the chief object of his surprise and admiration was the king himself. His great age had neither abated the vigor of his mind, nor the strength of his body, so as to render him unable to sustain military labours. He mounted and dismounted his horse with the activity of a young man. He rid, after the Numidian manner, without a saddle, and continued all day, and sometimes all night, on horseback. He had no better provisions than the meanest of his soldiers. In short, Masinissa, as Æmilianus said on his return to Rome, was not old in any respect, but his long experience in business and arms. As Rome had not yet openly broken with Carthage, the next morning Æmilianus retired from Masinissa's camp, not thinking it lawful for him to have any share in the action, and posited himself on the top of an eminence, whence he saw very distinctly one of the greatest battles that had ever been fought in Africa. It lasted from the rising of the sun, till night; both parties performed great exploits, and the victory was long in suspense; but at length declared for Masinissa. Then Æmilianus came down from his eminence, returned to the camp of the conqueror, and congratulated him on his victory. Masinissa, on this joyful occasion, gave the Roman the sincerest proofs of an inviolable attachment to his republic, and esteem for his family, granted him the elephants he demanded, and kept him with him as long as he could. As this victory was not decisive, Æmilianus undertook to negotiate a peace between the two parties. But his mediation proving ineffectual, hostilities were renewed with more animosity than ever. After many slight battles, Masinissa so blocked up the Carthaginian camp, that no convoys could be brought to it, or detachments sent out without great difficulty. The Carthaginian army, which was very numerous, having now no communication with the country, was soon reduced to the last extremity. At first they lived upon the flesh of their horses, and then boiled the harnesses of their carriages, burning their bucklers, and the shafts of their spears for want of wood. The famine produced a plague, which carried off more men than they had lost in all the engagements. In this extremity Asdrubal yielded to all the conditions of peace, which the Numidian thought fit to impose upon him. Among other things Masinissa obliged all the Carthaginians to pass under the yoke unarmed, and half naked. These unhappy wretches, thus branded with ignominy, and so weak, that they could scarce stand, comforted themselves at least with hopes of seeing their native country again. But revenge inspired Gulussa with a very cruel resolution. The Carthaginians had formerly laid an ambush to surprise him and his brother Micipsa on their return from Carthage to Numidia, and falling upon them, had on that occasion killed some of their attendants. This Gulussa remembered; and to revenge one perfidious act with another, let loose the Numidian horse on the disarmed multitude. Whether Masinissa was privy to his son's treachery, was never known. But however that be, the Numidian horse coming up with those unhappy men, who, being exhausted with hunger and distempers, had neither courage enough to resist, nor strength to fly, butchered them like so many victims; so that of fifty-eight thousand men only Asdrubal, and some other officers of distinction, escaped the general massacre. The Romans had sent ambassadors into Africa, under pretence of putting an end to the differences between Carthage and Numidia, in an amicable manner. But they had private instructions to take upon them the office of mediators, only in case Masinissa was defeated. If that prince should happen to get the better, their directions were to encourage him to push the Carthaginians to the utmost extremity, which they did accordingly; and then taking advantage of the prodigious loss the Carthaginians had sustained, deferred no longer to declare war against them, though they sent an embassy to Rome, offering all kinds of submission, and even leaving it to the senate to propose their own terms.

The third
Punic war.

As soon as the new consuls, L. Marcius Censorinus and M. Manilius Nepos, entered upon their office, they caused the war with Carthage to be proclaimed in the comitia of the people, and then drew lots for their provinces, the command of the fleet falling to Marcius, and that of the land-forces to Manilius. When all things were ready for their expedition into Africa, ambassadors arrived at Rome from the people of Utica, offering to surrender up their city to the republic, and desiring to be admitted into an alliance with Rome. The Carthaginians, terrified at the defection of so powerful a city, and the great preparations which were making at Rome, resolved to avert the impending storm by yielding themselves and their dominions to the Romans by way of dedition, which was to give them an absolute authority over every thing in the country, their cities, lands, rivers, temples, &c. and likewise over all the inhabitants, of what rank soever, sex, or condition. The ambassadors, who came to Rome to make this absolute surrender, were well received by the senate, and told, that since they had done all that could be required of them, they should enjoy their lands, effects, laws and liberty as before, upon condition that they sent three hundred hostages to the consuls, who were now in Sicily, and put in execution what they should think fit to command them. The ambassadors, overjoyed at this unexpected

- a success, took their leave of the senate, and flew to Carthage with the good news. Most of the Carthaginian senators cried up the moderation of the Romans; but some began to suspect that Rome concealed some artifice under this appearance of clemency. However, a decree passed, commanding three hundred hostages to be sent to Lilybaeum, where the Roman fleet lay at anchor. The consuls, having sent them on board a squadron to Italy, immediately set sail for Utica, and there landed their troops to the number of seventy-four thousand men, horse and foot. As soon as the troops were landed, Mamilius went to take possession of the same ground, on which the great Scipio had incamped, when he invested Carthage. It is easy to judge of the consternation the Carthaginians were in, when they beheld so terrible an army in their neighbourhood, and were at the same time informed, that war had been declared against them, notwithstanding the submissions they had made. They sent deputies to the consuls to expostulate with them, and to learn their intentions. The Roman generals received them with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. They ordered all their soldiers to stand to their arms; and the deputies passed through two long lines of men drawn up on each side of them, colours flying, and were conducted by sound of military instruments from the gate of the camp to the consul's quarters. There the two colleagues received them, sitting upon two high thrones, and surrounded by their chief officers, who were divided from the croud by a bar, within which the ambassadors themselves were not suffered to enter. As soon as the noise of the trumpets ceased,
- c the head of the embassy made a long speech, in which he complained of Rome for sending an army into Africa after the Carthaginians had delivered up their estates, lands, and possessions, to the Roman senate at discretion. In the close of his speech, he desired the consuls, in a most submissive manner, to acquaint him with the real intentions of the senate. Marcus answered, that he would gradually communicate to them the orders he had received, beginning with that which required most dispatch; and then added, since you are under the protection of Rome, and sincerely desire peace, what occasion have you for that vast number of arms with which your magazines are filled? Bring them hither, and thereby give us a fresh proof, that your love of peace is not feigned. The ambassadors, stunned with this demand,
- d knew not at first what to answer. But at length recollecting themselves, remonstrated to the consul, that Carthage had other enemies to contend with besides the Romans; and therefore could not safely be without arms; that she was in danger of being attacked by Asdrubal, who being condemned to die for having offended Rome by his late war with Masinissa, had made his escape, and drawn together an army of twenty thousand men. To this the consul briskly replied, Be easy, Carthaginians; Rome will provide for your safety. Obey, and be in no concern about any thing else. What could they do but submit? Carthage wanted the necessary store of provisions to sustain a siege; and had neither auxiliaries nor mercenaries; all the flower of her youth had been destroyed in the late battle with Masinissa; her fleet was not
- e fitted out, and that of the Romans was stronger, and barred up the harbour. The Carthaginians therefore, without any fraud, delivered up their arms and engines of war to the Roman quaestors sent to Carthage for that purpose. The Romans were surprised, when they saw the long train of carts, loaded with arms, which were brought to the camp by the Carthaginians themselves. Some historians say, they were sufficient to have armed all Africa. At least it is certain, that there were put into the consul's hands two thousand catapultæ, two hundred thousand complete suits of armour, and an infinite number of swords, darts, javelins, arrows, and of beams armed with iron, which were thrown from the ramparts by the ballistæ. This convoy of arms was attended by the most venerable old men, and the priests in their sacred
- f attire, who were well qualified by their character and age to mollify the Romans. The consuls received them sitting on their tribunal; and Marcus, who had more eloquence than his colleague, putting on a serious and majestic air, addressed himself to them thus: We are well pleased with these first instances of your obedience, and therefore cannot help congratulating you upon them. I have now but one thing more to require of you in the name of the Roman people. I will therefore, without further preamble, plainly declare to you an order, on which the safety of your republic, the preservation of your goods, your lives and liberty depends. Rome requires that you abandon your city, which we are commanded to level with the ground. You may build yourselves another where you please, provided it be ten miles from the better of the affection, which attaches us to our old habitations, and is founded more in habit than in reason. At these words the Carthaginian deputies were thunderstruck. Some of them swooned away; others expressed their sorrow in cries and lamentations; and all were in the utmost consternation. Even the Roman soldiers were affected with so moving a sight; but the consuls, without shewing the least concern, These sudden fits, said they, wear off by degrees; time and necessity teach the most unfortunate to bear their calamities with patience. The Carthaginians, when they recover their senses, will chuse to obey. While the others, in the height of their grief, rage, and despair, were uttering imprecations against the Romans, one Hanno, a venerable old man, and more composed than the rest, endeavoured in a long speech to move the consuls to compassion, and concluded by earnestly intreating them at least to allow the Carthaginians time to make fresh applications to the senate of Rome. But the consuls were inflexible; they would neither recede from the sentence they had passed, nor suspend the execution of it. The deputies returned to Carthage, and made their report; and then the whole city was nothing but horror and confusion. The people, as actuated by so many furies, broke into the senate-house, and vented their rage on those who had advised the giving of hostages, and the delivering up the arms, which they now wanted for their defence. They did not spare even the deputies themselves; but dragged them through the streets with ignominy, as inauspicious messengers. However, among this great number of raving people, a few, less transported than the rest, acted with some appearance of reason. They took care to shut the gates of the city, and gathered together on the ramparts great heaps of stones to serve them instead of other arms in case of a surprise. At length, when the first commotion was a little abated, the senators assembled, and resolved to sustain a siege. They were stripped of their arms, and destitute of provisions; but despair raised their courage, and made them find out expedients. They began with taking the malefactors out of prison, giving the slaves their liberty, and incorporating them in the militia. Then a pardon was granted to Ajdrubal, who had been sentenced to die only to please the Romans; and he was invited to employ the twenty thousand men he had raised, in the defence of his country. Another Ajdrubal was appointed to command in Carthage; and all seemed resolute, either to save their city, or perish in its ruins. They wanted arms; but what cannot despair compass? By order of the senate, the temples, portico's, and all public buildings, were turned into work-houses, where men and women were continually employed in making arms. As they encouraged one another in their work, and lost no time in procuring to themselves the necessaries of life, which were brought to them at stated hours, they every day made a hundred and forty-four bucklers, three hundred swords, a thousand darts, and five hundred lances and javelins. As to balistæ and catapultæ, they wanted proper materials for them; but their industry supplied that defect. Where iron and brass were wanting, they made use of gold and silver, melting down the statues, vases, and even the utensils of private families; for on this occasion the most covetous became liberal. As tow and flax were wanting to make cords for working the machines, the women, even those of the first rank, freely cut off their hair, and joyfully dedicated to that use the finest ornament of their heads. Without the walls Ajdrubal employed the troops under his command in getting together provisions, and conveying them safe into Carthage; so that there was as great plenty there as in the Roman camp^a.

In the mean time the consuls delayed drawing near to Carthage, not doubting but the inhabitants, whom they imagined destitute of necessaries to sustain a siege, would upon cool reflection submit; and this delay cost the Romans many battles, and much blood. At length, finding themselves deceived in their expectation, they came before the place, and invested it. As they were still persuaded, that the Carthaginians had no arms, they flattered themselves that they should easily take the place by assault. Accordingly, they approached the walls, in order to plant their scaling ladders; and then, to their great surprise, they discovered a prodigious multitude of men on the ramparts, shining in the armour they had newly made. The legionaries were so terrified at this unexpected sight, that they drew back, and would have retired, if the consuls had not led them on to the attack; which however proved unsuccessful, the Romans, in spite of their utmost efforts, being obliged to give over the enterprise, and lay aside all thoughts of taking Carthage by assault. In the mean time

- a Asdrubal, having drawn together from all places subject to Carthage, a prodigious number of troops, came and incamped within reach of the Romans, and soon reduced them to great straits for want of provisions, their parties not daring to venture out of the camp to forage, for fear of the Carthaginian cavalry, which was superior to that of the Romans. As Marcus was posted near a marsh, for the two consuls incamped separately, the exhalations of the stagnating waters, and the heat of the season, infected the air, and caused a general sickness among his men. Marcus therefore ordered his fleet to draw as near the shore as possible to receive his troops, and transport them to a healthier place, but still within reach of Carthage. Asdrubal, who commanded in the city, having notice of this motion, ordered all the old barks in the harbour to be filled with faggots, tow, sulphur, bitumen, and other combustible materials; and then taking advantage of the wind, which blew towards the enemy, let them drive upon their ships, which were for the most part consumed. After this disaster, Marcus was called home to preside at the elections, and Manilius ordered to continue the war in Africa. The Carthaginians, looking upon the removal of one of the consuls as a happy presage of their speedy deliverance, made a brisk sally in the night, and would have surprised the consul's camp, had not Æmilianus, with some squadrons, marched out of the gate opposite to the place where the attack was made, and riding full speed round the camp, attacked the enemy, who expected nothing less, in the rear, and obliged them to return in disorder into the city. Asdrubal had posted himself under the walls of a city, named Nepheris, but twenty-four miles distant from Carthage, and situated on a high mountain, which seemed inaccessible on all sides. From thence the Carthaginian general made incursions into the neighbouring country, intercepted the Roman convoys, fell upon their detachments sent out to forage, and even ordered parties to insult the consular army in their camp. Hereupon the consul resolved to drive Asdrubal from this advantageous post, and, contrary to the opinion of Æmilianus, who was well apprised of the difficulty of the enterprise, set out on his march for Nepheris. As he drew near the hills, Asdrubal all on a sudden appeared at the head of his army in order of battle, and fell upon the Romans with incredible fury. The consular army sustained the attack with great resolution, and Asdrubal retired in good order to his former post, hoping the Romans would attack him there. But the consul, being now convinced, that his design could not be pursued without endangering the whole army, resolved to retire; and accordingly began to march back. This Asdrubal no sooner perceived, than he came down from the mountains, like a torrent, and falling upon the enemy's rear, cut a great many of them in pieces. All authors agree, that the whole army would have been lost, if it had not been for the bravery and prudent conduct of Scipio Æmilianus, who being at this time only a legionary tribune, renewed the famous exploit of Horatius Cocles. At the head of three hundred horse he sustained the attack of all the forces commanded by Asdrubal, and covered the legions, while they passed a river in their retreat before the enemy. Then he and his companions threw themselves into the stream, and swam across it. The Romans lost in this rash enterprise a great number of men, and among the rest three legionary tribunes, who had been the most sanguine in promoting it, contrary to the opinion of Æmilianus. When the Romans had crossed the river, they perceived that four manipuli were wanting, and were soon after informed, that these brave men, being surrounded on all sides by the enemy, had posted themselves on an eminence, resolved at least to sell their lives dear. This news raised the compassion of Æmilianus, who, taking with him a chosen body of horse and provisions for two days, returned across the river, and flew to the deliverance of his countrymen. He seized a hill over-against that on which the four manipuli were posted, and after some hours repose marched against the Carthaginians, who kept them invested, fell upon them at the head of his squadron with the boldness of a man who was determined to die or conquer, and in spite of all opposition opened a way for his fellow-citizens to escape. On his return to the camp, the soldiers, who had given him for lost, carried him to his quarters in a kind of triumph; and the manipuli he had saved gave him a crown of gramen, or grass, gathered on the spot where he had signalized his valor, which was deemed more honourable than the richest presents. By these and many other glorious exploits, Æmilianus in this unfortunate campaign gained such reputation, that Cato, who is said never to have commended any body before, could not refuse the young tribune the praises he deserved, which however he mixed, after his usual manner, with severe reflections on the other officers of the army in Africa. This rigid philosopher died soon after at the age of eighty-four or eighty-five: he is said to have foretold, ^a before he expired, that Carthage would never be reduced till Scipio Æmilianus was employed in that expedition ^b.

The Roman
arms unsuccessful in Spain.

IN Spain the Roman arms were yet more unsuccessful than in Africa. The prætor Vetilius, who commanded ten thousand in the further province, lost four thousand of them in a battle against the Lusitanians under the conduct of one Viriatbes, who was first a famous hunter, afterwards a captain of banditti, and at last commander in chief of the Lusitanian rebels. The prætor himself was taken prisoner; but the soldier who took him, seeing him old, and fancying no body would purchase him, killed him without knowing who he was. Upon the news of this disaster, the republic immediately sent C. Plautius into Spain with a reinforcement of ten thousand foot, ^b and thirteen hundred horse. These, being joined by great numbers of Spaniards, who continued faithful to the republic, made a formidable army. But Viriatbes, after having cut in pieces by a stratagem a detachment of four thousand Romans, ventured to engage them in a pitched battle, which he conducted with such dexterity, that the prætorian army was intirely defeated, and forced to shut themselves up all the summer in the neighbouring cities; so that the brave Lusitanian, being now master of the field, laid the whole country under contribution ^c.

THESE were not the only losses the republic sustained this year. In Macedon one Andriscus, who pretended to be the son of Perfes by one of his mistresses, and had taken the name of Philip, being assisted by the Thracians, obliged the Macedonians to ^c own him for their king, and conquered part of Thessaly. Scipio Nasica, whom the senate sent into Greece to learn the true state of affairs, by the assistance of the Achaïans, drove the false Philip out of Thessaly. But the prætor Juventius Thalna, who succeeded Nasica, having attempted to force his way through the narrow passes into Macedon, lost in that rash undertaking both his life and the legion he commanded. By this means Philip reduced all Thessaly, and settled himself on the throne of Macedon.

AT Rome Sp. Posthumius Albinus Magnus, and L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsonius, being chosen consuls for the new year, the conduct of the war in Africa fell by lot to the latter. But as he did not hasten to his province, Manilius, who continued to command ^d the army in quality of proconsul, endeavoured to repair the faults he had committed during his consulate. He frequently sent out Æmilianus with strong parties to pillage the neighbouring country, and intercept the enemy's convoys, and the tribune was always attended with uncommon success. He took several castles, and among the rest Tezaga, a place of great strength. In one of these expeditions he found means to have a private conference with one Phameas, general under Asdrubal of the Carthaginian cavalry, and brought him over together with two thousand two hundred of his horse to the Roman interest. Phameas was an able commander, who by his bravery and skill in war had exceedingly distressed the Roman army; so that the gaining of his friendship was reckoned an important acquisition. The proconsul sent ^e him soon after with Æmilianus to Rome to receive the honours and rewards he deserved from the republic. At the same time Manilius wrote a letter to the senate, wherein he acknowledged himself indebted to Æmilianus for whatever successes he had met with during the campaign ^d.

IN the mean time the consul Calpurnius Piso and the prætor Mancinus arrived in Africa, the former to command the land-forces, and the other the fleet. These two generals formed a very different plan for the campaign from that of Marcus and Manilius. For instead of pursuing the siege of the capital, they applied themselves wholly to the reducing of some other cities on the African coast, which they attacked both by sea and land. They first invested Clupea, but were obliged to abandon the ^f enterprise with shame and confusion, the inhabitants having in several sallies killed great numbers of their men. From Clupea the consul went to vent his rage on a city newly built, and thence called Neapolis, which professed a strict neutrality, and even had a safeguard from the Romans. However, the consul plundered the place, and stript the inhabitants of all their effects. After this he laid siege to Hippagreta, which employed the Roman fleet and army the whole summer. When the winter drew near, the consul raised the siege, and returned with his fleet and army to Utica, without having performed one valiant action during the whole campaign. In the mean

- a time the Carthaginians sent deputies to the new king of Macedon, encouraging him to continue the war against Rome. But the prætor Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who now commanded the Roman forces in Macedon, having defeated this mock king in two pitched battles, obliged him to shelter himself in the court of one of the petty kings of Macedon re-conquered. Tbrace, who afterwards delivered him up to the Romans. He was scarce reduced, when another impostor started up, who called himself Alexander, and pretended likewise to be the son of Perfes. But as his followers were rather a confused rabble than an army, they were easily dispersed, as we have related at length in the history of Macedon.

- AND now the time of the elections drawing near, the people considering that the republic wanted great generals, resolved to have regard to nothing but merit; and as Scipio Æmilianus was, in their opinion, the only man who could retrieve the reputation of the Roman arms in Africa, they dispensed with the Villian law in his favour, which required every candidate for the consulship to be forty-three years old, and raised him to the consular dignity at the age of thirty-seven. Neither would they suffer him to draw lots with his colleague, C. Livius Drusus, for the conduct of the Carthaginian war; but appointed him by a special decree to succeed Piso. The new consul immediately set sail for Sicily, taking on board with him Polybius the historian, for whom he had a great esteem, and Lælius, whom he appointed his lieutenant-general. This Æmilianus was the son of the other, whom Scipio Africanus had so tenderly loved, and Æmilianus in imitation of that hero entered into as strict a friendship with Lælius the son, as the first Scipio had done with the father. It is said, that Æmilianus and his friend Lælius were the authors of the comedies, which are commonly ascribed to the poet Terence. With Polybius and Lælius Æmilianus set sail from Sicily, and entered the port of Utica with his fleet under the command of the prætor Serranus, when three thousand five hundred of the Roman army were in imminent danger of being cut in pieces before Carthage. These, during Piso's absence, who had penetrated far into the inland country with his army, had seized Megalia, one of the suburbs of the city. But as they had not furnished themselves with provisions to subsist there, and could not retire, being closely invested on all sides by the enemy's troops, the prætor Mancinus, who commanded this detachment, seeing the danger, into which he had brought himself, dispatched in the dusk of the evening a light boat to Utica to acquaint the Romans there with his danger. The messenger delivered the prætor's letter to the new consul, who had landed his troops a few hours before. Æmilianus immediately flew to the relief of the invested Romans, obliged the Carthaginians to retire within their walls, and putting the three thousand five hundred men on board his ships, conveyed them safe to Utica. He then dispatched a messenger to Piso to inform him of his arrival, and to order him to draw near to Carthage with his army. The proconsul obeyed, and Æmilianus, having taken upon him the command of the troops, applied himself wholly to the taking of Carthage alone, as the only means to reduce at once the African republic. He first attack was upon Megalia, which he carried by assault, the Carthaginian garrison retiring into the citadel of Byrsa. Asdrubal, who had commanded the forces of the republic in the field, and was now governor of Carthage, was so enraged at the loss of Megalia, that he caused all the Roman captives, taken in the two years the war had lasted, to be brought upon the ramparts, and to be thrown headlong, in the sight of the Roman army, from the top of the wall, after having, with an excess of cruelty, commanded their hands and feet to be cut off, and their eyes and tongues to be tore out. As he was of a temper remarkably inhuman, he is said to have taken pleasure in seeing some of those unhappy men flayed alive. While Asdrubal was thus venting his rage on the Roman captives, the consul was busy in drawing lines of circumvallation and contravallation cross the neck of land, which joined the isthmus, whereon Carthage stood, to the continent. By this means all the avenues on the land-side to Carthage being shut up, the city could receive no provisions that way. His next care was to raise a mole in the sea in order to block up the old port, the new port being already shut up by the Roman fleet; and this great work he effected with immense labour. The mole reached from the western neck of land, of which the Romans were masters, to the entrance of the port, and was ninety foot broad at the bottom, and eighty at the top. The besieged, when the Romans first began this surprising work, laughed at the attempt; but were no less alarmed than surprised, when, contrary to their expectation, they beheld a vast mole appearing above water, the continent carried a great way into the sea, and by that means the port rendered inaccessible to ships, and quite useless. And now emulation

emulation and despair prompted the Carthaginians to attempt and execute what a seemed altogether impossible, and would appear utterly incredible, if it were not attested by the historian who has given us the most particular account of the siege of Carthage^c. With miraculous and incredible industry they in a short time dug a new basin, and cut a passage into the sea, by which they could receive the provisions that were sent them by their troops in the field. With the same diligence and expedition they built and fitted out a fleet of fifty triremes, which, to the great surprise of the Romans, appeared suddenly, advancing into the sea through this new canal, and even ventured to give the enemy battle. The action lasted the whole day, and was glorious both for the besieged and the besiegers, little advantage being gained on either side. The day after the engagement the consul attempted to make himself master of a terrace, which covered the city on the side next the sea; and on this occasion the besieged signalized their resolution in the most remarkable manner. Great numbers of them naked and unarmed went into the water in the dead of the night with unlighted torches in their hands, and having partly by swimming, partly by wading, got within reach of the Roman engines, they struck fire, lighted their torches, and threw them with fury against the machines. The sudden appearance of these naked men, who looked like so many monsters started up out of the sea, terrified the Romans, who guarded the machines, to such a degree, that they began to retire in the utmost confusion. The consul, who commanded this detachment in person, and had continued all night at the foot of the terrace, endeavoured to stop his men, and even ordered those who fled to be killed. But the Carthaginians, perceiving the confusion the Romans were in, threw themselves upon them like so many wild beasts, and having put them to flight only with their torches, they set fire to the machines, and intirely consumed them. This however did not discourage the consul; he renewed the attack a few days after, carried the terrace by assault, and lodged four thousand men upon it. As this was an important post, because it pent Carthage in on the sea-side, Æmilianus took great care to fortify and secure it against the sallies of the enemy; and then winter approaching, he suspended all further attacks upon the place, till the return of good weather^f.

Æmilianus did not continue idle in his trenches during the cold season. The Carthaginians had a very numerous army under the command of one Diogenes, strongly incamped near Nepheris, whence convoys of provisions were sent by sea to the besieged, and brought into the new basin. To take Nepheris therefore was to deprive Carthage of her chief magazine. This Æmilianus undertook, and succeeded in the attempt; for he first forced the enemy's intrenchments, put seventy thousand of them to the sword, and made ten thousand prisoners, all the inhabitants of the country, who could not retire to Carthage, having taken refuge in this camp. After this the consul laid siege to Nepheris, which was protracted longer than he expected. However, Æmilianus made himself master of this important place, after he had been twenty-two days before it. In this enterprize the Romans were greatly assisted by a body of Numidian horse under the command of Gulussa, who had succeeded his father Masinissa in the kingdom of Numidia. Masinissa himself had lent the Romans no assistance in this war, being justly piqued at their having undertaken it without imparting their design to him. Asdrubal, being disheartened by the defeat of the army, and touched with the misery of the besieged, now reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions, offered in the name of the Carthaginians to submit to what conditions the Romans pleased, provided they would only spare the city. But the consul absolutely refusing to recede from his instructions with regard to the demolition of Carthage, Asdrubal, assuming the air and gesture of a bully, No, said he, no, the sun shall never see Carthage destroyed, and Asdrubal alive^e.

In the mean time the consular year being expired, the republic chose G. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius consuls. But Æmilianus was continued general of the army in Africa, till such time as he should finish the great work he had undertaken. Early in the spring he renewed the siege of Carthage; and in order to open himself a way into the city, he ordered Lælius to attempt the reduction of Cotbo, a small island, which divided the two ports. The proconsul himself made a false attack on the citadel, in order to draw the enemy thither. This stratagem had the desired effect; for the citadel, known by the name of Byrsa, being a place of the utmost importance, most of the

- a Carthaginians hastened thither, and made their utmost efforts to repulse the aggressors. But in the mean time Lælius, having, with incredible expedition, built a wooden bridge over the channel, which divided Cotbo from the isthmus, entered the island, scaled the walls of the fortress which the Carthaginians had built there, and made himself master of that important post. The proconsul, who was engaged before Byrsa, no sooner understood by the great shout the Romans gave, that they had got possession of Cotbo, than he abandoned the false attack, and unexpectedly fell on the neighbouring gate of the city, which he broke down, notwithstanding the showers of darts that were incessantly discharged upon his men from the ramparts. As night coming on prevented the proconsul from proceeding farther, he made a lodgment within the gate, and waited there for the return of day, with a design to advance through the city to the citadel, and attack it on that side, which was but indifferently fortified. Pursuant to this design, at day-break he ordered four thousand fresh troops to be sent him from his camp; but did not think it lawful to proceed in the attempt, till he had performed a religious ceremony then practised by the Romans before the taking and sacking of great cities. This was to evocate the tutelary gods of the place, that is, to intreat them to abandon a place which was unworthy of their presence and protection. When this ceremony was over, the proconsul solemnly devoted the inhabitants of Carthage to death, and to the gods of hell, in these words: O formidable Pluto, and ye infernal manes, let loose against the Carthaginian people fear, terror and vengeance. Let the nations and cities, which have taken up arms against us, be overcome and destroyed. I devote and deliver up to you, furies, all the enemies of my republic, in my own name, and in the name of the senate and people of Rome. But as for our legions and auxiliary troops, guard them from death, and the accidents of war.
- b THE proconsul had no sooner performed this ceremony, than he began to advance at the head of his men through the streets of the city in order to attack the citadel. Polybius the historian, who marched by his side, advised him to throw caltrops and planks full of nails with the points upwards in the streets through which he passed, to prevent his being surprised in the rear. But the brave general replied, You are over cautious, Polybius; there is nothing to be feared from a city which is full of confusion, and already taken. This said, he advanced to the market-place, from whence three exceeding steep streets led to the citadel. The houses on both sides were very high, and filled with Carthaginians, who overwhelmed the Romans, as they advanced, with darts and stones; so that they could not proceed, till they had cleared them. To this end the proconsul in person at the head of a detachment attacked the first house, and made himself master of it sword in hand. His example was followed by the officers and soldiers, who went on from house to house, putting all to the sword they met with. As fast as the houses were cleared on both sides of the streets, the Romans advanced in order of battle towards the citadel, but met with a vigorous resistance from the Carthaginians, who on this occasion behaved with uncommon resolution. From the market-place to the citadel two bodies of men fought their way every step, one above, on the roofs of the houses, the other below in the streets. The slaughter was inexpressibly great and dreadful. The air rung with shrieks and lamentations. Some were cut in pieces, others threw themselves down from the tops of the houses; so that the streets were filled with dead and mangled bodies. But the destruction was yet greater, when by order of the proconsul fire was set to that quarter of the town, which lay next to the citadel. Incredible multitudes, who had escaped the swords of the enemy, perished in the flames, and by the fall of the houses. After the fire, which lasted six days, had demolished houses enough for the proconsul's purpose, he ordered the rubbish to be removed, and a large area to be made, where all his troops might have room to act. Then he appeared with his whole army before Byrsa, which so terrified the Carthaginians, who had fled thither for refuge, that first of all, twenty five thousand women, and soon after thirty thousand men, came out of the gates in such a condition as moved pity. They threw themselves prostrate before the Roman general, asking no favour, but life. This the proconsul readily granted, not only to them, but to all who were in Byrsa, except the Roman deserters, whose number amounted to nine hundred. The wife of Asdrubal earnestly intreated her husband to suffer her to join the suppliants, and carry with her to the proconsul her two sons, who were yet very young. But the barbarous governor denied her request, and rejected the remonstrances of his wife with menaces. The Roman deserters, seeing themselves excluded from mercy, resolved to die sword in hand, like brave men, rather than to deliver themselves up to the vengeance of Rome. Asdrubal, finding them all to a man determined to defend themselves to the last breath, committed to their care his wife and children, and then gave a most remarkable instance of cowardice, and Carthaginian inconstancy. This very governor, who had braved death, when it was at a distance, and protested that the sun should never see him survive Carthage; this fierce Asdrubal was so mean-spirited, as to come alone, and privately throw himself at the conqueror's feet. The general was well pleased to see his proud rival humbled, but granted him his life, and kept him to grace his triumph. The Carthaginians in the citadel no sooner understood that their commander had abandoned the place, than they threw open the gates, and put the proconsul in possession of Byrsa. The Romans had now no enemy to contend with but the nine hundred deserters, who, being reduced to despair, retired into the temple of Æsculapius, which was as a second citadel within the first. There the proconsul attacked them; and those unhappy wretches, finding there was no way to escape, set fire to the temple. As the flames spread, they retreated from one part to another, till they got to the roof of the building. There Asdrubal's wife appeared in her best apparel, as if the day of her death had been a day of triumph to her; and after having uttered the most bitter imprecations against her husband, whom she saw standing below with Æmilianus, Base coward, said she, the mean things thou hast done to save thy life, shall not avail thee; thou shalt die this instant, at least, in thy two children. Having thus spoke, she drew out a dagger, stabbed them both, and, while they were yet struggling for life, threw them from the top of the temple, and leaped down after them into the flames.

So many scenes of horror drew tears from the eyes of the Roman general, and cast him into a pensive silence, which he broke at length with two verses out of Homer, wherein the destruction of Troy was foretold: The day will come, when proud Troy shall fall a prey to the flames, and the sword shall mow down Priam and his people. As the proconsul sighed in repeating these lines, Polybius, who was always near him, took the liberty to ask him, What he meant by Troy, and the people of Priam? Æmilianus, without naming Rome, gave him sufficiently to understand, that he feared his own country would meet with the same fate as Troy and Carthage. The greatest states, said he, have their periods, after which fortune overturns what she took pleasure in raising. The proconsul delivered up the city to be plundered, but in the manner prescribed by the Roman military law. The soldiers were allowed to appropriate to themselves all the furniture, utensils, and brass-money they should find in private houses. But all the gold and silver, the statues, pictures, &c. were reserved to be put into the hands of the quæstors. On this occasion the cities of Sicily, which had been often plundered by the Carthaginian armies, recovered a great number of statues, pictures, and other valuable monuments; among the rest, the famous brazen bull, which Phalaris had ordered to be cast, and made use of as the instrument of his cruelty, was restored to the inhabitants of Agrigentum (S). The proconsul put part of the spoils on board a galley, which he dispatched to Rome to acquaint the senate, that Carthage was taken, and the war in Africa finished. At the same time he desired new instructions from the conscript fathers as to the demolition of the walls, temples, and houses of Carthage, his good-nature and compassion inclining him to spare what yet remained of that stately metropolis. The joy of the people at Rome was inexpressibly great on the news of the reduction of Carthage. They anticipated the decree of the senate, and meeting by tribes of their own accord, crowded to the temples to thank the gods for the success of their arms. Upon the report which the messenger sent by Æmilianus made to the senate, the conscript fathers, after having spent some time in deli-

(S) Among the curiosities which Æmilianus gave to his friends, and to several lords of Numidia, Salust mentions some libraries (30), which the general, who knew the value of so rich a treasure, preserved from the flames. He bestowed all the books on the sons of Micipsa, except twenty-eight volumes, which treated of agriculture, and were said to have been wrote by one Mago a Carthaginian. This work the

All the cities, that have lent Carthage any assistance, shall be dismantled. 3. The territories of those cities which have declared for the Romans, shall be enlarged with lands taken from the enemy. 4. All the lands between Carthage and Hippo shall be divided among the inhabitants of Utica. 5. All the Africans of the Carthaginian state, both men and women, shall pay an annual tribute to the Roman people at so much per head. 6. The whole country, which was subject to the Carthaginian state, shall be turned into a Roman province, and be governed by a prætor in the same manner as Sicily. Lastly, Rome shall send commissioners into Africa, there to settle jointly with the proconsul the state of the new province. This decree was carried by the ten commissioners, and strictly executed. But before the proconsul destroyed Carthage, he performed all those religious ceremonies which were required on such occasions : He first sacrificed victims to the gods, and then caused a plough to be drawn round the walls of the city. After this the towers, ramparts, walls, and all the works which the Carthaginians had raised in the course of many ages, and at a vast expence, were levelled with the ground. Lastly, fire was set to the edifices of this proud metropolis, which consumed them all, not a single house escaping the flames. Though the fire began in all quarters at the same time, and burnt with incredible fury, it continued for seventeen days together before all the buildings were consumed ; and hence we may judge of the vast extent of that metropolis. When the city was intirely demolished, and the affairs of the new province settled, the proconsul imbarqued his troops, and returned to Rome, where he was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and the glorious surname of the Second Africanus. After his triumph he deposited in the capitol an urn full of the ashes of the capital of Africa, which he thought an agreeable offering to Jupiter Capitolinus. Asdrubal and Bytbias the general of the Carthaginian horse, after having been led in chains before the triumphant victor's chariot, were, at the request of Emilianus, allowed to enjoy both life and liberty. Appian is the only author, who tells us, that Asdrubal killed himself to avoid the shame of being carried in triumph. The rest of the prisoners were sold to the best bidder, or perished in the various prisons, to which they were confinedⁱ. Thus ended one of the most renowned cities in the world, both for command and riches, after it had subsisted near seven hundred years, given law to many distant provinces, and for the space of a hundred years rivalled Rome herself, and reduced her once to the utmost extremity.

- Carthage* was not the only great and wealthy city which the Romans destroyed in this remarkable year. Corinth had the same fate, after it had flourished at least nine hundred years. But as we have given in our history of the Achæans a very particular account of this memorable event, we shall not trespass upon our readers patience by repeating the same transactions, but follow the victorious arms of the republic in the conquests they made after the reduction of Greece and Africa, which were both now become Roman provinces.

The history of Rome from the destruction of Carthage to the end of the sedition of the Gracchi.

AFTER the destruction of Carthage and Corinth Rome had no enemy to contend with either in Greece or Africa, the imperious republic having put it out of the power of the conquered people to raise new disturbances. However, she was not yet in a condition to lay down her arms, and suffer her citizens, after so many labours, to enjoy enjoy at home the sweets of peace. She had still a troublesome war to maintain in ^a Spain, where the brave Viriathus had gained great advantages over all the generals, who had been sent against him, during the late Punic war. After the defeat and death of Vitellius, of whom we have spoken above, the Lusitanian had augmented his forces, and defeated in three pitched battles the prætors Caius Plantius Hypsæus, and Claudius Unimanus, though they led against him very numerous armies. As he had been victorious for six years together, putting the Romans to flight where-ever he met them, he had drawn off whole nations from Rome, and laid waste the countries of her most faithful allies. The senate therefore thought it necessary to send a consul of reputation with a consular army, into Further Spain, and chose for that expedition Q. Fabius Æmilianus, who had been just raised to the consulate with L. Hostilius Mancinus. ^b The latter had commanded the Roman fleet in Africa, two years before, in quality of prætor; the former was brother to the second Africanus, and son to Paulus Æmilius, but adopted into the Fabian family, whence he had the name of Fabius, and the surname of Æmilianus. While he continued at Rome to raise two new legions, C. Lælius, the friend of the second Africanus, to whom Hither Spain had fallen by lot, imbarqued without delay, and passing from his own province into Further Spain, convinced the Lusitanian general, that he was not invincible; and this is all we learn from history of this expedition. Some months after Fabius arrived, but spent the whole summer in inuring his new troops to the toils of war and discipline. The next year, when Ser. Sulpicius Galba, and L. Aurel. Cotta, were consuls, Fabius, who was continued in the ^c command of the army in Spain, gained two victories over Viriathus, and made himself master of two important places, which had been long in the hands of the rebels. However, on his return to Rome the senate did not judge his victories worthy of a triumph, which at this time was granted to such generals only as had killed at least five thousand of the enemy in one battle ^d.

THE next year, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, were raised to the consulate, and the former with the prætor Q. Pompeius appointed to carry on the war against Viriathus. Pompeius reached Spain before Metellus, and attacked Viriathus with some success. But he was afterwards worsted by the Lusitanian, driven out of the field, and obliged to shut himself up in Corduba. Soon after Metellus arrived, and offered ^d the enemy battle, which Viriathus declined; and then the consul, entering the country of the Arevaca, who had lately revolted, obliged the whole nation to submit upon his own terms. Metellus was an officer of great experience and personal bravery, very severe in keeping the soldiers to their duty, and the author of the famous saying, since put into the mouths of many generals, If he thought that his coat could be privy to his designs, he would burn it ^e. While Metellus was signalising himself in Spain, his colleague, who commanded an army in Cisalpine Gaul, forced the Salassi into a rebellion. This nation inhabited a province near the head of the Po, and had frequent disputes with their neighbours the Insubres about the Druria, which watered their country before it reached the borders of Insubria. This river then brought down ^e gold mixed with its sand, and the Salassi used several arts to gather the particles of this precious metal, before they were carried by the stream into the country of the Insubres. Of this the Insubres complained to the consul, who hereupon immediately entered the country of the Salassi in a hostile manner, and obliged them, contrary to their inclinations, to have recourse to arms in their own defence. The consul was defeated in a pitched battle, and lost five thousand of his men. Upon the news of this defeat the Sibylline books being consulted, the decemvirs declared, that all the forms of religion had not been observed in this hasty war with the Salassi. Hereupon the general was ordered to offer a sacrifice on the borders of the enemy's country. He obeyed, and then, the prejudices of religion giving the superstitious soldiery new courage, ^f he fought a second battle, defeated the Salassi, and killed five thousand of them in his turn. As soon as the campaign was ended, the consul returned to Rome, and demanded a triumph for having killed five thousand of the enemy in a pitched battle, which was the present rule: But as he had lost five thousand legionaries in a former battle, his petition was rejected. Hereupon the consul decreed himself that honour, and was the first who entered Rome triumphantly in spite of the senate and people. As he was advancing towards the capitol, a tribune of the people attempted to bring the victor down from his chariot. But his daughter Claudia, a vestal, whom he car-

THE following year, when Q. Fabius Servilianus, and L. Cæcilius Metellus, were consuls, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who was continued in Spain in quality of proconsul, pursued the war there, and displayed his strict regard to discipline among his own troops, and his humanity to the conquered, in so glorious a manner, that it is not easy to decide which did him most honour. As he could not bring Viriathus to a battle, he applied himself to the recovering of those places, which had sided with the Lusitanian.

- b He first laid siege to Contrebia, and having made a breach in the wall, appointed five manipuli to mount it. These were repulsed; but the general ordered them to renew the attack, without being reinforced; and then the shame of their former cowardice inspired them with such resolution, that they fought like lions, and in spite of all opposition carried the place. He then invested Nertobrigia, where he gave a remarkable instance of his humanity and good nature. A chief lord of the country, named Rhetogenes, came out of the place, and surrendered himself to the Romans. But as he had left in the city his wife and children, the inhabitants, enraged at his desertion, placed them in the breach, which the legionaries were to mount. Hereupon the good-natured general, finding he could not attack the city without spilling their blood, abandoned a certain conquest, and raised the siege. The fame of an act of

- c such humanity being soon spread through all Tarragonian Spain, the inhabitants of the revolted cities strove who should first submit to him. Metellus received them, and among the rest the Nertobrigians, into an alliance with Rome; and at length recovered the whole country except Termantia and *Numantia*ⁿ, of which cities we shall speak hereafter. Metellus recovers all Tarragonian Spain.

- ON the other hand, the consul Servilianus, who was engaged with Viriathus in Further Spain, gained at first some advantages over that brave commander; but in the end was defeated by him with the loss of three thousand legionaries. The Lusitanian would have taken the Roman camp, if he had not been prevented by a young Roman, The consul Servilianus defeated by Viriathus.
d named Caius Fannius, son-in-law to Caius Lælius, who putting himself at the head of the legionaries, sustained the attack of the enemy, till night coming on put an end to the conflict ^o.

- WHEN the time came for the great elections, Q. Pompeius, a man of a mean, if not of an infamous birth, was raised to the consulate in preference to Caius Lælius, though supported by the interest of his inseparable friend Scipio Æmilianus. The colleague given him was Cn. Servilius Cæpio, a patrician. In the same comitia Servilianus was appointed to continue the war in Spain as proconsul; whereas Metellus was only Metellus recalled.
e allowed to command in Hisber Spain till the arrival of his successor, though he earnestly solicited the favour, formerly granted to others, of finishing the war, which he had so happily begun. When he understood that Pompey, a man of no birth or merit, and besides, his personal enemy, was to succeed him, he resolved to make the best use of his time, and signalize himself by some great action before the arrival of his worthless successor. With this view he marched out of his quarters in the depth of the winter, entered the further province, and taking his rout towards Lusitania, where Viriathus had cantoned his troops, endeavoured, before he left Spain, to draw that His success in Spain.
f famous commander to a battle. But Viriathus, though proud and enterprising against others, kept himself wholly upon the defensive against Metellus, who thereupon overran great part of the country, and brought back Escadia, Gemella, Obolcula (T), and many other considerable cities to their duty. Some of the heads of the revolt were punished with death, and the rest, to the number of nine thousand five hundred, sold to the best bidder. Thus Metellus shewed what he could do, and would have done, had he been continued in his province; which was the chief point he had in view.

(T) All we know of Escadia is, that it stood in the neighbourhood of Bætica and Lusitania. Gemella, called by Pliny Tucci and Gemella Augusta, stood, according to Ambrosius Morales, in the place where Marior, a small city of Andalusia, now stands. Obolcula, which Antoninus and Ptolemy call Obolcula, was a city of Turdetania, a province of Bætica. Rodericus Carus is of opinion, that it stood on the spot, where Castillo de la Monclova was afterwards built, that is, forty-two miles east of Seville. This situation agrees with Antoninus's itinerary.

His resentment.

But in the height of his success, news was brought him, that his successor had left ^a Rome; and then his resentment revived; he vented his passion, first, in rash expressions, and then in actions, which were much more blameable. In the height of his passion, he resolved to weaken the army he was to deliver up. With this view he disbanded the flower of his troops, exhausted the magazines, let his elephants die, broke in pieces the arrows which were provided for the Cretan archers, and threw them into the river. Thus Metellus, famous for the conquest of Macedon, whence he had the glorious surname of Macedonicus, and one of the best commanders Rome had, sacrificed the good of his country to his own private ambition. On his return he was refused a triumph; the slightest punishment the republic could inflict upon him. But after all the army, which Metellus surrendered up to Pompey, consisted of thirty thousand ^b foot, and two thousand horse, a sufficient force to have subdued all Celtiberia, if the new general had had the conduct and experience of his predecessor. He no sooner appeared in the field, than the Termantians and Numantines, who had kept themselves in a state of independency, offered him very advantageous terms of peace.

The occasion of the Numantine war.

The Numantines and Termantians gain considerable advantages over the Romans.

But the presumptuous consul imprudently and obstinately insisted upon their delivering up their arms, and thereby kindled a war, which cost the Romans a great deal of blood. The consul, full of confidence, drew near Numantia, and invested it; but the Numantines having first surrounded and cut in pieces a party of Romans, fell afterwards upon the main body of the army; and so galled them from the neighbouring eminences with showers of darts and arrows, that the consul thought it adviseable to ^c retire. Accordingly, he removed to Termantia; but was not attended with better success before this city, than before the other. The very first day the Termantians killed seven hundred of his legionaries, took a great convoy, which was coming to the Roman camp, after having put to flight the tribune who escorted it, and not only defeated a considerable body of Roman horse, but forced them to retire from post to post, till they came to the edge of a precipice, where they pushed both men and horses down over one another; so that they were all dashed to pieces among the rocks. The Termantians continued in the field all night, in order to engage the rest of the Roman cavalry the next day; which they did accordingly; but the enemy being far superior to them in numbers, they were forced to quit the field, after having kept their ground ^d from break of day to sun-set. The number of the slain was equal on both sides; but the loss, which was a very considerable one to a small nation, was scarce felt by the Romans. However, the consul did not think fit to besiege the city; but marched to Malia, a small town, whose inhabitants surrendered to the Romans, after having massacred the Numantine garison. From thence the consul advanced to Lanci, or, as others call it, Lagni, which covered the country of the Numantines. The Numantine garison, finding that the inhabitants had privately agreed with the consul to sacrifice them, entered their houses in the night, and made a dreadful slaughter of them. The consul, taking advantage of this intestine war, gave orders for the assault, and made himself, without opposition, master of the defenceless city. Pompey, seeing ^e himself in possession of the place, thought it necessary to signalize his clemency and severity: but unluckily he misapplied them both; for he put the Lancians to the sword, and gave quarter to the Numantian garison. Such were the exploits of Pompey, after having kindled the Numantian war, and exasperated a brave people, whom he might have reduced upon terms very advantageous for his republic.

IN Further Spain the proconsul Servilianus opened the campaign with success, having obliged Viriathus to raise the siege of Baccia, and taken some castles in that neighbourhood. This encouraged the consul to lay siege to Erisana, a strong city in Lusitania. But Viriathus having by long marches reached the place, and got into it with a strong detachment in the night, before the lines of circumvallation were finished, ^f made a vigorous sally upon the Romans, and drove them to a place where the rest of his army lay in ambush. There they were surrounded on all sides, and so hemmed in, that the only choice they had left was death or slavery. The brave Lusitanian, having now the proconsul and the whole Roman army in his power, instead of putting them all to the sword, as he might have easily done, sent a deputation to Servilianus, offering to conclude a peace with him on this single condition; That he should continue master of the country now in his power, and that the Romans should remain possessed of the rest of Spain. The proconsul, who expected nothing less than

- a death or slavery, thought these very favourable and moderate terms; and therefore without hesitation concluded a peace, signed it, and got it soon after ratified by the Roman senate and people. Thus Viriathus at length put in execution the glorious design he had always had in view, which was to erect himself a kingdom in the vast country he conquered from the republic.^a And indeed, had it not been for the treachery of the Romans, he would have become, as an ancient author calls him, the Romulus of Spain.^c He would have founded a monarchy capable of counterbalancing the power of Rome, or at least of setting bounds to her conquests in those parts.
- THE next year C. Lælius was promoted to the consulate with Q. Servilius Cæpio. The latter was a man of no probity or honor; but however, it fell to his lot to command in Further Spain, while Lælius, a general of experienced wisdom, equity and valor, continued inactive in Rome. Pompey was continued general in Hither Spain; but the republic sent a certain number of senators to regulate his conduct, and temper his fire. Before they arrived, he undertook the mad project of reducing Numantia, by turning the stream of the Durius, which supplied it with water. This gave the inhabitants an opportunity of harassing his troops, and cutting off such numbers of them, that he was at length obliged to abandon the enterprize, and retire from before the place. And now the great army he had received from Metellus, being reduced to a very small number of troops, he began to reflect seriously on his misconduct; and in order to screen himself from censures, very artfully brought about a peace with the Numantians on worse terms than they had before offered him; for they only agreed to deliver up the Roman deserters, and pay the republic thirty talents at different times. However, this peace was approved of, and signed both by Pompey and the senators, who had been sent from Rome to be of his council. In the mean time Q. Servilius Cæpio, to whose lot Further Spain had fallen, being desirous to revenge the disgrace the Romans had suffered the last year before Erisana, pressed the senate to order him to break the peace with Viriathus. The letters he wrote after his arrival in Spain, and his continual remonstrances, made such impressions on the senate, that they basely directed him to exasperate the Lusitanian by mean artifices, and force him by repeated affronts to commit the first acts of hostility. Pursuant to this order, which was so unworthy of a great and powerful people, the consul did all he could to pick a quarrel with Viriathus; but he overlooked the affronts offered him, protesting, that he would inviolably observe the conditions of the peace granted him by the Roman senate and people. The consul, finding he could not by any means stir up the Lusitanian to an open breach, made fresh applications to the senate; and the conscript fathers, to the eternal shame of their republic, ordered him to declare war; and proclaimed Viriathus, who had not given them the least provocation, an enemy to Rome. The consul was no sooner impowered to begin the war, than he put his troops in motion, and having made himself master of Arsa, a city of Bætica, he pursued Viriathus into the country of the Carpetani, and there reduced him to great straits.
- c But the Lusitanian made a most glorious retreat, and though the consul believed him shut in among the hills and rocks on all sides, he disappeared with his troops so suddenly, that the Romans, when they returned to their camp, turned the affair into ridicule, and were very severe in their jests on their general. Cæpio seeing himself thus deluded by the enemy, entered the country of the Vestones, and committed there most dreadful devastations. He then marched in quest of Viriathus, whom he reduced so low, having an army far superior in number to his, that the Lusitanian was forced to sue again for peace, and even to comply with the hard preliminary imposed upon him, which was to sacrifice all those who had caused any cities to revolt from the Romans, among whom was his wife's father. He put some of them to death in his own camp, and the rest he delivered up to the severity of the consul, who cut off their right hands. He hoped, that this blind obedience would soften the consul. But to his great surprise, the next order he received was to disarm his troops; this the whole army rejected with great indignation, and hostilities were renewed, during which Viriathus continued his negotiations with the consul, being wholly bent on founding a new kingdom in Spain, and settling himself on the throne. The persons he employed to treat with Cæpio were Audax, Ditalco, and Minur, in whom he reposed an intire confidence. But the consul finding them, after some private conferences, to be men wholly devoted to their own interest, and capable of any crime, by which they could promote it, engaged them by rich presents and great promises basely and treacherously to murder their general and their friend in his sleep. Thus the Romans now began to have no regard to the law of nations, to public faith, or to humanity itself. The assassins, after they had committed the execrable murder, fled to the consul's camp, informed him, that they had dispatched his rival, and demanded the promised reward. But they found by experience, that traitors are hated even by those who profit by their treachery. For the consul told them, that all he would do for them was to give them protection, adding with a reproachful air, that the Roman magistrates were not very ready to reward those who murdered their own generals. The Lusitanian troops were inconsolable for the loss of their commander, who was, without all doubt, the greatest man Spain ever bred, and deemed invincible by Rome herself. After his death the Lusitanians appointed one Tantalus to command them, who having rashly undertaken the siege of Saguntum, was surprised by Cæpio, defeated, and forced to surrender himself and his whole army at discretion. And thus an end was put to this troublesome war, after it had lasted fourteen years. However, the senate had still so much honour left, as to refuse a triumph to the infamous consul, though they enjoyed the fruits of his villainy, and even continued him in the command of the army another year in Further Spain with the title of proconsul.

The war in
ended.

THE next year, when Lucius Calpurnius Piso, and M. Popilius Lænas, were consuls, the republic basely and unjustly broke the treaty, which Pompey had concluded with the Numantians, though the proconsul had received from those unfortunate people the deserters, hostages, and money stipulated. The following year, P. Scipio Nasica, and D. Junius Brutus, were advanced to the consulate, and the latter appointed to govern Further Spain, where he executed the orders he brought from Rome, of settling some of the veterans in a colony with Viriatus's soldiers. This new colony he called Valentia, which in process of time became a place of great renown. After this he attacked the banditti, who ravaged his province, in their own country, which not only the men, but likewise the women, defended with unparalleled bravery. However, the consul at length reduced, and in regard of their courage, pardoned them. In the mean time Popilius, now proconsul, pursuant to the orders he received from the senate, broke the treaty of peace with Numantia, and marched against that city. But he no sooner appeared before it, than the Numantians, sallying out, put the whole Roman army to flight, and made such a slaughter of them, that they were not in a condition to make any further attempts, during the whole campaign. In the following consulate of M. Æmilius Lepidus, and C. Hostilius Mancinus, Brutus passed the Minus in Further Spain, and entered the country of the Bracarini, where the women, intermixed with all their troops, fought with astonishing bravery. They engaged the legionaries without betraying the least fear, killed many of them, and were themselves cut in pieces without a shriek. Nevertheless Talabrisia and other cities surrendered; and the consul, rather by his clemency, than by his sword, gained over the whole country to the interest of Rome.

The Romans
defeated before Numantia.

DURING these expeditions of Brutus in Further Spain, the consul Mancinus took upon him the command of the army, which was delivered up to him by Popilius in Hiber Spain, and drew near to Numantia. But as those brave legionaries, who were the terror of the whole world, trembled at the very sight, nay, at the bare name of a Numantine, the consul thought it adviseable to decamp, and move farther off in the night. But the Numantines, being informed of their motions, pursued them, and having first seized the camp, which they had abandoned, came up with the flying legions, and made a dreadful havock of them. The consular army consisted of at least thirty thousand, whereas the Numantines were not above four thousand. Nevertheless, this small body, as strange as it may appear, killed in the pursuit twenty thousand of the Romans, and put the rest to a disorderly flight. At the return of light the consul saw himself surrounded by heaps of dead bodies, and shut in on all sides by the enemy in a rough and mountainous country. But in this sad situation, instead of giving himself up to despair, he acted as prudence and the present necessity seemed to require. As there was no way left for him and the poor remains of his army to escape, the prudent consul began a negotiation with the enemy, offering to conclude a peace with them upon reasonable terms. This was what the Numantines had long desired; but nevertheless, the bad success of their agreement with the consul

- a Pompeius deterred them from entering into a treaty with a Roman general. They therefore desired to treat only with Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, who was then quæstor in the consular army, and greatly esteemed for his probity even by the enemy. With him the conferences were begun, and a peace concluded upon these terms: 1. That the Numantines should suffer the Romans to retire unmolested: 2. That the inhabitants of Numantia should maintain their independence, and be reckoned among the friends of the Roman people. The consul, the quæstor, and all the chief officers of the Roman army, bound themselves by a solemn oath inviolably to observe the second article. By this means the lives of ten thousand citizens were saved to the republic; so that the quæstor hoped to make a merit of his negotiation with the Roman people.
- b The Numantines, soon after the treaty was concluded, gave an instance of the sincerity of their intentions. When they plundered the Roman camp, they had taken among other things the quæstor's books of accòmpts; and Gracchus went into the city to demand them. The Numantines received him with great civility and politeness, restored him his books, and even offered him all the booty they had taken in the camp. But the quæstor, charmed with the generosity and good-nature of the Numantines, rejected the offer, and accepted only of a small box, which belonged to him, and was full of the incense which he used to burn in honour of his domestic gods.

a peace with
the Romans.

- WHEN news of the peace concluded with the Numantines was brought to Rome, the shocking injustice and baseness of the Romans towards so generous an enemy appeared anew. The Numantines had saved the lives of ten thousand Romans, who were in their power, when the peace was concluded; but though the senate and people were glad to reap this advantage from the treaty, yet they resolved to break it; and therefore would not admit the Numantine ambassadors, on their first arrival, within the walls of the city. 'Tis true, that when the new consuls, P. Furius Philus, and Sex. Atilius Serranus were chosen, they granted them an audience, when one of the ambassadors made a speech in the senate, which would have affected them, if they had had any sense of justice or humanity. But as these virtues had now forsaken Rome, the senate and people basely and unjustly resolved to break the peace, and extirpate that generous and innocent people, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the consul, the quæstor, and all the officers of the army who had served in Spain. They pretended to make the injured Numantines satisfaction, by ordering the consul Mancinus to be carried, bound hand and foot, to one of the gates of Numantia, and be there delivered up to the enemy, stripped of his arms and cloaths.

and injustice of
the Romans.

- DURING these transactions at Rome, M. Æmilius Lepidus, who had been sent to succeed Mancinus in Hither Spain, began an unjust war with the Vaccæi, purely for the sake of finding himself work. But while he was preparing to besiege Palantia, their capital, deputies came from Rome with a decree of the senate, ordering him to desist. However, Æmilius persisted in his design, till the Vaccæi, by intercepting his convoy, obliged him to decamp for want of provisions. The Romans left their camp in the night, and the Vaccæi, knowing in what confusion they retired, pursued them, and in the pursuit put six thousand legionaries to the sword. Nevertheless, Æmilius, on his return to Rome, was treated with more lenity than he expected, being condemned only to pay a fine. And now the consul, P. Furius Philus, being arrived in Spain with orders to renew the war with the Numantines, thought it necessary in the first place to deliver up to them the victim he had brought from Rome. It was an affecting sight to see a consular man, who had lately appeared guarded by lictors, at the head of a flourishing army, now deprived of all the marks of a Roman citizen, stripped naked to the waist, and formally committed to the care of a secialis, who was to put him into the hands of the enemy, for having, as was pretended, imposed upon them by a false peace, and an unlawful oath. But the Numantines, not thinking the blood of one man a sufficient atonement for the breach of the most solemn engagements, shut their gates, declaring that they would not accept of Mancinus, unless they had the whole army with him. So that after he had lain a whole day at the gate of the city, the consul Furius, agreeable to the equity of the Romans of that time, thinking this a sufficient satisfaction to the injured people, brought him back to his camp, entertained him with respect, and restored him to all the rights of a Roman citizen; nay, he was afterwards admitted to his place in the senate. The war with the Numantines, though already declared, was not renewed while Furius continued in Spain, his commission being, it seems, confined to the delivering up of Mancinus. But the next year, a Q. Calpurnius Piso, who was chosen consul with Ser. Fulvius Flaccus, was ordered to carry on the war with vigor against the Numantines. But he not caring to engage so brave and resolute an enemy, contented himself with besieging Palantia in the country of the Vaccæi, and did not so much as appear before Numantia. But Brutus made great conquests in Lusitania, and penetrated into the country of the Callaici or Gallaci, where he engaged an army of sixty thousand Spaniards, killed fifty thousand of them on the spot, made six thousand prisoners, and almost extirpated the whole nation.

Hence he acquired the surname of Callaicus, and was continued in his government, till the war should be ended. This year the Vardæi, a people of Illyricum, rebelled, and rejected all amicable measures. Whereupon the consul Flaccus was sent with an b army to reduce them; which he did so effectually, that Rome at his return honoured him with a triumph *.

Scipio Africanus sent against the Numantines.

IN the mean while the time for the elections being come, Scipio Africanus offered his nephew Fabius Buteo as a candidate for the questorship, when to his great surprise the tribes demanded to have Scipio himself for their consul, saying, that he only could destroy Numantia, who had destroyed Carthage. A law had been made some years before, enacting, that the same person should not be twice promoted to the consular dignity. The tribunes of the people therefore, in order to honour Scipio with the fasces a second time with the approbation of the senate, proposed to the comitia, that Scipio should have a special privilege granted him for his promotion, and that this privilege c should not be made a precedent. The people accepted the proposal with joy, and nominated him consul for the next year with C. Fulvius Flaccus. Scipio was ordered, without drawing lots, to carry on the war against the Numantines, but was not allowed to raise any new levies, the senate telling him that there were soldiers enough in Spain, and that they only wanted a good general. However, he drew together a body of about five hundred volunteers, all horsemen, whom he called the squadron of his friends, and borrowed about four thousand men of the cities in Italy. In the number of the former, was, according to Velleius Paterculus, the famous poet Lucilius.
He also wrote to Micipsa, king of Numidia, to send him succours, and then made all haste to his province, where he wisely spent the first summer in reforming his troops, d till he had altered them to his wish; and frugality, vigilance, and a love of duty, had taken place of effeminacy, laziness, and indolence, which had long prevailed among the officers as well as the soldiers. Neither did he spare, but rather increase their labours, during the winter. He obliged every man that went out of the camp, to carry his tools, and bring back some stakes with him. When the soldiers complained of this hardship, he told them, that he would oblige them to bring palisades to fortify the camp, till they had learnt to fortify it with their swords †. At this time he received a reinforcement of cavalry, elephants, and slingers from Numidia. They were a choice body, but what most distinguished them was the young prince, who commanded them, by name Jugurtha, a prince with whom the Romans will be but e too well acquainted hereafter. Young Marius made on this occasion his first campaign, and the brave prince entered into so strict a friendship with him, that he was inseparable from him, little suspecting that Marius would one day become his most cruel enemy, and his conqueror.

AND now Scipio's consulship expired; but he was continued in the command of the Roman army in Spain, till such time as Numantia should be reduced. The new consuls chosen were P. Mucius Scævola (U), and L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi. Sicily fell by lot to the latter, where he was to make war with the revolted slaves; and Italy to the former, who continued in the capital to calm, if possible, the spirit of sedition, which began to appear there. Scipio, as soon as the season would permit, sent out f large detachments to ravage the country round Numantia; for his scheme was to reduce the place, not by force, which would have cost Rome much blood, but by famine. After he had found that his troops were no longer afraid of the enemy, but boldly faced them, and even put them to flight, he began to put some confidence in a his legionaries, and resolved to begin the siege, or rather, the blockade, without delay.

Numantia stood on a hill of a difficult access, and had large fields within its walls, Numantia besieged. which were about three miles in compass. The inhabitants, able to bear arms, are said to have been only four thousand men, at least when the place was first invested by Scipio, whose army consisted of three-score thousand well disciplined troops, Romans and Spaniards. These the proconsul divided into two bodies, the one commanded by himself, the other by his brother Q. Fabius, and drawing near to the city, began his works. The Numantines, alarmed at the sight of so formidable an army, made again proposals of peace; but the proconsul insisting upon their delivering up, by way

b of preliminary, their city, their persons, and their arms, to be disposed of at pleasure, they resolved to prefer a glorious death to an ignominious slavery. After they had taken this resolution, they marched out of the city in good order, insulted the Romans in their trenches, and with a boldness, which despair alone could inspire, offered the Roman general battle. But he declined it, saying to his soldiers, who began to complain of his conduct, that an able general ought never to hazard a battle, unless necessity compels him, or such an opportunity offers as makes the victory certain. The Numantines, said he, are actuated by despair; their ruin is inevitable; to engage them would be only giving them the pleasure of shedding your blood. Scipio, having thus restrained the impetuosity of his troops, surrounded the place with a wide and deep

c ditch, six miles in compass. Without this he drew another; and behind that raised a rampart, which he secured with palisades, and supported with a wall eight foot broad, and ten foot high, with towers at proper distances. Then to prevent any communication with the city by water, he stopped the navigation of the Durius, which washed the walls of the city, with a kind of steccado, which was flanked with two wooden castles on the two banks. When the works were finished, he guarded them carefully night and day. The ramparts were lined with legionaries, the towers filled with archers and slingers, and men posted all the way from the circumvallation to his camp, with orders to give notice by shouts on which side the alarm was given. When any of the works were attacked by the besieged, the commander on the post attacked, d hung out a red standard by day, and made a great fire by night; upon which notice the general, who kept always twenty thousand men in a readiness to march, sent them immediately strong reinforcements to drive back the enemy. Scipio gave no rest to the besieged, nor relaxation to his own troops. He visited each post every day, and took a view of all the parts of this vast circumvallation. But notwithstanding all the precaution he could use, six of the besieged made their way through his camp, and eluding the vigilance of the centries, got safe to the neighbouring cities, which they endeavoured to stir up against the Romans. But Lulia was the only place, which did more than pity the unfortunate Numantines. The youth of this city, touched with concern for their distressed countrymen, resolved to march to their relief. But the old men in the place, having more at heart their own safety, than that of the Numantines, acquainted Scipio with the resolution and designs of their youth. Hereupon the general, without delay, flew to Lulia in person with some light-armed troops, marched three hundred furlongs in eight hours, and arriving, when least expected, at Lulia, demanded the rash young men to be delivered up to him. The inhabitants, unwilling to comply with his request, and part with their children, concealed them, and pretended they had made their escape. But Scipio, threatening to pillage the city, they thought it adviseable to obey, and delivered up to him four hundred of the young men, who had been the chief promoters of the late resolution. The proconsul no sooner had them in his power, than he caused their right hands to be

f cut off, and returned to his camp by sun-rising.

AND now famine and despair increasing together in the besieged city, five embassadors came out to Scipio, intreating him in the name of their countrymen, either to let them end their days, like brave men, in a general action, or save their liberty by an honourable capitulation. Abarus, who was at the head of the embassy, suggested to Scipio, that it was for his honour, either to shew clemency to a people, who had so bravely signalized their love for liberty, or at least not to destroy them otherwise than with the sword. But they received this short answer; I will hearken to no proposals, till you have absolutely surrendered up to me your city, your persons, and your arms, without any reserve. Then the fury of the besieged first vented itself on the deputies, whom they cut in pieces for bringing them nothing but ill news. Afterwards, being pressed by want, they resolved to make a last effort in order to break through the barriers, which confined them; accordingly, they marched out in good order by two gates, and fell upon the works with a fury not to be expressed. Their fixed resolution to die or escape, made them insensible of the many wounds they received. In spite of the continual showers of stones, darts, and arrows, which were discharged upon them from the ramparts and towers, they would have forced their way through the enemy's camp, had not Scipio himself, at the head of twenty thousand men, hastened to the relief of the troops that defended the posts attacked by the enemy. They were then, after a sharp dispute, forced to give way to numbers, and retire, which they did in good order. But their returning into the city was only changing one kind of death for another. For they were now reduced to such straits as to feed first on the flesh of their horses, afterwards on that of their dead companions, and lastly, to kill and devour one another. Thus did these poor citizens, who were formerly so firmly united in carrying on their common interest, make war on themselves in a much more cruel manner, than any common enemy could have done. In this deplorable condition they held a consultation, wherein it was resolved, that they should have recourse to the proconsul, and make an absolute surrender, since they could by no means hold out any longer. However, this resolution was not universally approved. Great numbers chose rather to die, than to give up their liberty; and shutting themselves up in their houses, there calmly waited for the fate, which hunger soon brought upon them. The rest sent a deputation to Scipio, who was touched with compassion at the sight of those unhappy men. There was something inexpressibly wild in their air, and a savageness even in the manner they addressed him. As soon as they mentioned the word surrender, the proconsul received them graciously, and ordered them to bring all their arms to a place appointed the next day. But they demanded a longer time, which being granted, they set fire to their houses, as some historians tell us, reduced their city to ashes, and either killed one another, or perished in the flames; inasmuch, that not one of them remained alive to grace the proconsul's triumph. But Appian^a assures us, that two days after the time allotted, a considerable number of those unhappy wretches came to the place appointed, and surrendered their arms, and that Scipio, having reserved fifty of them for his triumph, sold the rest to the best bidder. Be that as it will, thus much may be said in honour of those brave Spaniards, that though they were few in number, no other people so long resisted the Roman forces, so often defeated the consular armies, or brought so much disgrace both on the generals and senate of Rome. Numantia, though infinitely inferior both to Carthage and Corinth, was much more glorious in her fall, than either of these proud cities. Scipio took Carthage sword in hand; but did not think it possible to reduce Numantia otherwise than by famine. With this city fell all the hopes of the revolted Spaniards; so that the whole country immediately submitted to the Roman yoke. Then the senate sent ten of their body to settle the new province. But the Spaniards were too great lovers of liberty to continue long quiet. We shall see them often taking up arms, and renewing the war, till the emperor Augustus intirely reduced them, and settled them in Spain, as well as the rest of the then known world, in peace and tranquillity. Scipio on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph; and on this occasion the Roman people added the surname of Numantinus to that of Africanus.

Numantia, while in being, had brought numberless disasters upon Rome; but in some sense, proved still more fatal to her after her destruction. Her ashes, if we may be allowed the expression, stirred up the first sedition, which polluted the capitol with blood, and was a prelude to those cruel civil wars, which afterwards broke out successively in the republic, and cost her the lives of more citizens than the conquest of the world. We mean the sedition raised by Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, which it may not be improper to trace up to its first source. The Sempronian family, from which Tib. Gracchus was descended, was, though plebeian, one of the most illustrious in the commonwealth. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, the father of this Gracchus, had been twice raised to the consulate, was a great general, and had been honoured with two triumphs. But he was still more renowned for his domestic virtues and probity, than for his birth or valor. He married the daughter of the first Africanus, that famous Cornelia, who

- a was the pattern of her sex, and the prodigy of her age, and had by her several children, of whom three only arrived to maturity of age, Tiberius Gracchus, Caius Gracchus, and a daughter, named Sempronia, who was married to the Second Africanus. Tiberius the eldest was deemed the most accomplished youth in Rome, with respect to the qualities both of body and mind. His extraordinary talents were heightened by a noble air, an engaging countenance, and all those winning graces of nature which recommend merit. He made his first campaigns under his brother-in-law, and distinguished himself on all occasions by his courage, and the prudence of his conduct. When he returned to Rome, he applied himself to the study of eloquence, and at thirty years old was accounted the best orator of his age. He married the daughter
- b of Appius Claudius, who had been formerly consul and censor, and was then prince of the senate. He continued for some time in the sentiments both of his own and his wife's family, and supported the interest of the patricians; but without openly attacking the popular faction. We have observed above, that he discharged the office of quæstor in Spain, whither he attended the consul Mancinus, and shared with him the misfortunes of that unhappy campaign. He was the chief author and negotiator of that shameful, but necessary peace with the Numantines. The senate, with the utmost injustice, disannulled the treaty, and condemned the consul, the quæstor, and all the officers, who had signed it, to be delivered up to the Numantines. The people indeed, out of esteem for Gracchus, would not suffer him to be sacrificed; but however, he
- c had just reason to complain both of the senate and people for passing so scandalous a decree against his general and himself, and breaking a treaty, whereby the lives of so many citizens had been saved. But as the senate had chiefly promoted such base and iniquitous proceedings, he resolved in due time to shew his resentment against the party which had most contributed to his disgrace. In order to this, he stood for the tribuneship of the people, which he no sooner obtained, than he resolved to attack the nobility in the most tender part. They had usurped lands unjustly; cultivated them by slaves to the great detriment of the public, and had lived for about two hundred and fifty years in open defiance to the Licinian law, by which it was enacted, that no citizen should possess more than five hundred acres. This law
- d Tib. Gracchus resolved to revive, and by that means revenge himself on the patricians. But it was not revenge alone which prompted him to imbarque in so dangerous an attempt. It is pretended, that his mother Cornelia animated him to undertake something worthy both of his and her family. I am commonly called, said she, by way of honour, the mother-in-law of the Second Africanus. Why don't they style me the mother of Gracchus? It is because your name is not so illustrious as to reflect any honour upon me. For your own sake then, and for your mother's, make yourself famous by some great attempt. These reproaches of his mother, the authority of some great men, namely of his father-in-law Appius Claudius, of P. Crassus the Pontifex Maximus, and of Mucius Scævola, the most learned civilian in Rome, and his natural thirst after glory, joined
- e with an eager desire of revenge, conspired to draw him into this most unfortunate scheme. The law, as he first drew it up, was very mild; for it only enacted, that those who possessed more than five hundred acres of land, should part with the overplus, and that the full value of the said lands should be paid them out of the public treasury. The lands, thus purchased by the public, were to be divided among the poor citizens, and cultivated either by themselves, or by freemen, who were upon the spot. Tiberius allowed every child of a family to hold two hundred and fifty acres in his own name, over and above what was allowed to the father. Nothing could be more mild than this new law; since by the Licinian he might have absolutely deprived the rich of the lands they unjustly possessed, and made them accountable for the profits
- f they had received from them during their long possession. But the rich patricians could not so much as bear the name of the Licinian law, though thus qualified. Those chiefly of the senatorial and equestrian order exclaimed against it, and were continually mounting the rostra one after another in order to dissuade the people from accepting a law, which, they said, would raise disturbances, that might prove more dangerous than the evils which Tiberius pretended to redress by the promulgation of it. Thus the zealous tribune was obliged day after day to enter the lists with fresh adversaries; but he ever got the better of them both in point of eloquence and argument. He often intermixed with his solid arguments such topics as were most proper to make impressions on the multitude. The wild beasts, said he, have dens and caverns to retire to; while the citizens of Rome have not so much as a roof or a cottage to shelter them from the inclemency of the weather ; nay, not so much as ground enough to serve them for a grave. ^a

 On the other hand, the rich insisted on the length of their possession, on the debts they had contracted by purchasing these lands, and on the strange confusion which such a change would occasion in families, since these estates were settled on their wives and children. But Gracchus answered all their objections so clearly and fully as left no room for any reply. Cicero, who read the speeches of Gracchus, tells us, that he admitted them more for the ingenious turns and solid reasons he found in them, than for the purity of the language, which was not yet in its perfection ^b. The people were charmed to hear him maintain the cause of the unfortunate with so much success, and bestowed on him the highest commendations. The rich therefore had recourse to violence and calumny, in order to destroy, or at least to discredit, the tribune. ^b
 It is said, they hired assassins to dispatch him ; but they could not put their wicked design in execution, Gracchus being always attended to and from the rostra, by a guard of about four thousand men. His adversaries therefore endeavoured to ruin his reputation by the blackest calumnies. They gave out, that he aimed at monarchy, and published pretended plots laid for crowning him king. But the people, without giving ear to such groundless reports, made it their whole business to encourage their tribune, who was hazarding both his life and reputation for their sake ^c.

WHEN the day came on which this law was to be accepted or rejected by the people assembled in the comitium, Gracchus began with haranguing the mighty croud, which an affair of such importance had brought together both from the city and country. ^c
 In his speech he shewed the justice of the law with so much eloquence, made so moving a description of the miseries of the meaner sort of people, and at the same time set forth in such odious colours the usurpation of the public lands, and the immense riches which the avarice and rapaciousness of the great had raked together, that the people, transported with fury, demanded with loud cries the billets, that they might give their suffrages. Then Gracchus, finding the minds of the citizens in that warmth and emotion, which was necessary for the success of his design, ordered the law to be read.

But unluckily, one of the tribunes, by name Marcus Octavius Cæcina, who had always professed a great friendship for Gracchus, having been gained over by the patricians, declared against the proceedings of his friend and colleague, and pronounced the word ^d which had been always awful in the mouth of a tribune of the people, Veto, I forbid it. As Octavius was a man of an unblamable character, and had hitherto been very zealous for the publication of the law, Gracchus was greatly surpris'd at this unexpected opposition from his friend. However, he kept his temper, and only desired the people to assemble again the next day, to hear their two tribunes, one in defence of, the other in opposition to, the law proposed. The people met at the time appointed, when Gracchus, addressing himself to his colleague, conjured him by the mutual duties of their function, and by the bonds of their ancient friendship, not to oppose the good of the people, whom they were bound in honour to protect against the usurpations of the great : nay, taking his colleague aside, he addressed him thus ; ^e
Perhaps you are personally concerned to oppose this law ; if so, I mean, if you have more than the five hundred acres allowed, I myself, poor as I am, engage to pay you in money what you will lose in land. But Octavius, either out of shame, or from a principle of honour, continued immoveable in the party he had embraced. Gracchus therefore had recourse to another expedient, which was to suspend all the magistrates in Rome from the execution of their offices. It was lawful for any tribune to take this step, when the passing of the law, which he proposed, was prevented by mere chicanery. After this he assembled the people anew, and made a second attempt to succeed in his design. When all things were got ready for collecting the suffrages, the rich privately conveyed away the urns, in which the tablets were kept. This kindled the ^f tribunes indignation, and the rage of the people. A thousand confused noises arose in the assembly. The comitium was like to become a field of battle, when two venerable senators, Manlius and Fulvius, very seasonably interposed, and throwing themselves at the tribune's feet, prevailed upon him to submit his law to the judgment of the conscript fathers. This was making the senators judges in their own cause ; but Gracchus thought the law so undeniably just, that he could not persuade himself that they would reject it ; and if they did, he knew that the incensed multitude would no longer keep any measures with them ^g.

- a THE senate, who wanted nothing but to gain time, affected delays, and came to no resolution. There were indeed some among them, who, out of a principle of equity, were for paying some regard to the complaints of the tribune, and for sacrificing their own interest to the relief of the distressed. But the far greater part would not hear of any composition whatsoever. Hereupon Gracchus brought the affair anew before the people, and earnestly intreated his colleague Octavius to drop his opposition in compassion to the many unfortunate people, for whom he interceded. Brings it again before the people. He put him in mind of their ancient friendship, took him by the hand, and affectionately embraced him. But still Octavius was inflexible. Hereupon Gracchus took an unjust, say some authors, but a necessary step to remove all opposition, and leave the people at liberty to vote. He resolved to deprive Octavius of his tribuneship, since he alone obstinately withstood the desires of the whole body of so great a people. Having therefore assembled the people, he told them, that since his colleague and he were divided in opinion, and the republic suffered by their division, it was the province of the tribes assembled in comitia to re-establish concord among their tribunes. If the cause I maintain, said he, be, in your opinion, unjust, I am ready to give up my seat in the college. On the contrary, if you judge me worthy of being continued in your service in this station, deprive him of the tribuneship, who alone obstructs my wishes. As soon as you shall have nominated one to succeed him, the law will pass without opposition. Having thus spoke, he dismissed the assembly, after having summoned them to meet again the next day.
- c AND now Gracchus, being foured with the opposition he had met with from the rich, and from his obstinate colleague, and being well apprised that the law would pass in any form, in which he should think fit to propose it, resolved to revive it, as it was at first passed, without abating any thing of its severity. There was no exception in favour of the children in families; or reimbursement promised to those who should part with the lands they possessed above five hundred acres. The next day the people being assembled in vast crowds on this extraordinary occasion, Gracchus made fresh applications to Octavius; but to no purpose; he obstinately persisted in his opposition. Then Gracchus, turning to the people, Judge you, said he, which of us deserves to be deprived of his office. At these words the first tribe voted, and declared for the deposition of Octavius. Upon which Gracchus, suspending the ardor of the tribes, made another effort to bring over his opponent by gentle methods. But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, the other tribes went on to vote in their turns, and followed the example of the first. Of five-and-thirty tribes, seventeen had already declared against Octavius, and the eighteenth was just going to determine the affair, when Gracchus, being willing to try once more whether he could reclaim his colleague, suspended the collecting of the suffrages; and addressing Octavius in the most pressing terms, conjured him not to expose himself, by his obstinacy, to so great a disgrace, nor to give him the grief of having cast a blemish upon his colleague and friend, which neither time nor merit would ever wipe off. Hearken, dear Octavius, said he, hearken rather to the advice of a faithful friend, than to a factious cabal, who are interested to seduce you. Be persuaded to follow the inclinations of the Roman people. It is still in your power to reconcile yourself to them, and gain their affections for ever. Octavius could not hear these words without concern. He is said to have wept, and to have continued some time in suspense. But having unluckily cast his eyes on the senators there present, he was ashamed to break his word with them; and therefore resuming his former steadiness, he boldly answered Tiberius, that he might go on with the work he had begun. At these words, the eighteenth tribe voted, Octavius was deposed, and the law passed, as Gracchus had proposed it the last time. The deposed tribune was dragged from the rostra by the incensed multitude, who would have insulted him further, had not the senators and his friends facilitated his escape^e. Octavius deposed, and the law passed.
- f

THE Lacian law being thus revived with one consent both by the city and country tribes, Gracchus caused the people to appoint triumvirs, or three commissioners to hasten its execution. In this commission the people gave Gracchus the first place, and he had interest enough to get his father-in-law Appius Claudius and his brother Caius Gracchus appointed to be his colleagues. These three spent the whole summer in travelling through all the Italian provinces, to examine what lands were held by any person above five hundred acres, in order to divide them among the poor citizens. When

Gracchus returned from his progress, he found by the death of his chief agent, that his absence had not abated either the hatred of the rich, or the love of the poor, toward him. As it plainly appeared, that the deceased had been poisoned, the tribune took this occasion to apply himself again to his protectors, and implore their assistance against the violence and treachery of his enemies. The populace more attached, after this accident, to their hero, than ever, declared they would stand by him to the last drop of their blood; and this their zeal encouraged him to add a new clause to the law, viz. that the commissioners should likewise inquire, what lands had been usurped from the republic. This was touching the senators in a most tender point, for most of them had appropriated to themselves lands belonging to the public. But after all, the tribune, upon a strict inquiry, found that the lands taken from the rich would not be enough to content all the poor citizens. But the following accident eased him of this difficulty, and enabled him to stop the murmurs of the malecontents among the people. Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamus, having bequeathed his dominions and effects to the Romans, Eudemus the Pergamean brought his treasures to Rome at this time; and Gracchus immediately got a new law passed, enacting, that this money should be divided among the poor citizens, who could not have lands; and that the disposal of the revenues of Pergamus should not be in the senate, but in the comitia. By these steps Gracchus most effectually humbled the senate, who, in order to discredit him among the people, gave out, that Eudemus, who had brought the king's will to Rome, had left with Gracchus the royal diadem and mantle of Attalus, which the law-making tribune was to use when he should be proclaimed king of Rome. But these reports only served to make Gracchus be more upon his guard, and to inspire the people with an implacable hatred against the rich, who were the authors of them. Gracchus, being now, by his power over the minds of the multitude, absolute master of their suffrages, formed a design of raising his father-in-law Appius Claudius to the consulate the next year, of promoting his brother Caius to the tribuneship, and getting himself continued in the same office. The last was what most nearly concerned him, his person, so long as he was in the office, being sacred and inviolable. As the senate was very active in endeavouring to get such only elected into the college of tribunes, as were enemies to Gracchus and his faction, the tribune left no stone unturned to secure his election. He told the people, that the rich had resolved to assassinate him as soon as he was out of his office; he appeared in mourning, as was the custom in the greatest calamities; and bringing his children yet young into the forum, recommended them to the people in such terms, as shewed that he despaired of his own preservation. At this sight the populace returned no answer but by outcries and menaces against the rich. When the day appointed for the election of new tribunes came, the people were ordered to assemble in the capitol in the great court before the temple of Jupiter. The tribes being met, Gracchus proposed his petition, intreating the people to continue him one year longer in the office of tribune, in consideration of the great danger to which he was exposed, the rich having vowed his destruction as soon as his person should be no more sacred. This was indeed an unusual request, it having been long customary not to continue any tribune in his office above a year. However, the tribes began to vote, and the two first declared for Gracchus. Hereupon the rich made great clamours, and some of their faction, who were posted in different places, cried out, Justice, justice! these men are going to overturn all the laws. No man can hold the office of tribune two years together. These clamours terrified Rubrius Varro, who presided in the college of tribunes that day, to such a degree, that he resigned his place to Q. Mummius, who offered to preside in his room. But this raised a tumult among the tribunes themselves, some pretending that the president had no right to dispose of his place, which it belonged to the whole college to do by a majority of votes. As the tribunes began to dispute the legality of this act with great warmth among themselves, Gracchus wisely dismissed the assembly, and ordered them to meet again the next day.

In the mean time the people, being sensible of what importance it was to them to preserve the life of so powerful a protector, not only conducted him home, but watched by turns all night at his door. Next morning by break of day, Gracchus, having assembled his friends, led them from his house, and posted one half of them in the comitium, while he went up himself with the other to the capitol. As soon as he appeared, the people saluted him with loud acclamations of joy. But scarce was he placed in his tribunal, when Fulvius Flaccus a senator, and friend to Gracchus,

- a Gracchus, breaking through the croud, came up to him, and gave him notice, that the senators, who were assembled in the temple of Faith, which almost touched that of Jupiter Capitolinus, had conspired against his life, and were resolved to attack him openly on his very tribunal. Hereupon Gracchus tucked up his robe, as it were, to prepare for a battle; and after his example, some of his party, seizing the staves of the apparitors, prepared to defend themselves, and to repel force by force. These preparations terrified the other tribunes, who immediately abandoned their places in a cowardly manner, and mixed with the croud; while the priests ran to shut the gates of the temple for fear of its being profaned. On the other hand, the friends of Gracchus, who were dispersed by parties in different places, cried out, We are ready:
- b What must we do? Gracchus, whose voice could not be heard by all his adherents on account of the tumult, the clamours, and the confused cries of the different parties, put his hand to his head; which was the signal agreed on to prepare for a battle. But some of his enemies, putting a malicious construction upon that gesture, immediately flew to the senate, and told the fathers, that the seditious tribune had called for the crown to be put upon his head. Hereupon the senators, fancying they already saw the king of Pergamus's diadem on the tribune's head, and the royal mantle on his shoulders, resolved to give the consul leave to arm his legions, treat the friends of Gracchus as enemies, and turn the comitium into a field of battle. But the consul Mucius Scaevola, who was a prudent and moderate man, refused to be the instrument
- c of their rash revenge, and to dishonour his consulate with the massacre of a disarmed people. As Calpurnius Piso, the other consul, was then in Sicily, the most turbulent among the senators cried out, Since one of our consuls is absent, and the other betrays the republic, let us do ourselves justice; let us immediately go and demolish with our own hands this idol of the people. Scipio Nasica, who had been all along for violent measures, inveighed bitterly against the consul for refusing to succour the republic in her greatest distress. Scipio Nasica was the great grandson of Cneius Scipio the uncle of the first Africanus, and consequently cousin to the Gracchi by their mother Cornelia. But nevertheless not one of the senators betrayed a more irreconcilable hatred against the tribune
- d than he. When the prudent consul refused to arm his legions, and put the adherents of Gracchus to death contrary to the usual forms of justice, he set no bounds to his fury, but rising up from his place, cried out like a mad-man; Since our consul betrays us, let those who love the republic follow me. Having uttered these words, he immediately walked out of the temple, attended by a great number of senators. Nasica threw his robe over his shoulders, and having covered his head with it, advanced with his followers into the croud, where he was joined by a company of the clients and friends of the patricians, armed with staves and clubs. These falling indifferently upon all who stood in their way, dispersed the croud. Many of Gracchus's party took to their heels, and in that tumult all the seats being overturned and broken,
- e Nasica, armed with the leg of a broken bench, knocked down all who opposed him, and at length reached Gracchus. One of his party seized the tribune by the lappet of his robe; but he quitting his gown, fled in his tunic, and as he was in that hurry of spirits, which is inseparable from fear, leaping over the broken benches, he had the misfortune to slip and fall. As he was getting up again, he received a blow on the head, which stunned him; then his adversaries rushing in upon him with repeated blows, put an end to his life. Some historians pretend, that Nasica with his own hand completed the work which had been begun by his advice, and under his conduct. Others say, that Publius Satureius and Lucius Rubrius, or, as Plutarch calls him, Lucius Rufus, two of his colleagues, secretly jealous of his glory, gave him the two
- f blows that dispatched him. However that be, Rome was by his death delivered, according to Cicero, from a domestic enemy, who was more formidable to her, than even that Numantia which had first kindled his resentments. Perhaps no man was ever born with greater talents, or more capable of aggrandizing himself, and doing honour to his country. But his great mind, his manly courage, his lively, easy, and powerful eloquence, were, says Cicero, like a sword in the hands of a madman. Gracchus abused them, not in supporting an unjust cause, but in conducting a good one with too much violence. He went so far as to make some believe, that he had really something in view besides the interest of the people, whom he pretended to relieve; and therefore some historians have represented him as a tyrant. But the most judicious writers clear him from this imputation, and ascribe his first design of reviving the Licinian law to an eager desire of being revenged on the senators for the affront they had very unjustly put upon him and the consul Mancinus, as we have hinted above. The law he attempted to revive had an air of justice, which gave a sanction to his revenge, without casting any blemish on his reputation. The death of Gracchus did not put an end to the tumult. Above three hundred of the tribune's friends lost their lives in the fray, and their bodies were thrown with that of Gracchus into the Tiber. Nay, the senate carried their revenge beyond the fatal day, which had stained the capital with Roman blood. They sought for all the friends of the late tribune, and without any form of law assassinated some, and forced others into banishment. Caius Billius, one of the most zealous defenders of the people, was seized by his enemies, and shut up in a cask with snakes and vipers, where he miserably perished. Though the laws prohibited any citizen to take away the life of another before he had been legally condemned, Nasica and his followers were acquitted by the senate, who enacted a decree, justifying all the cruelties committed against Gracchus and his adherents¹.

IN the mean time the people, being recovered from their fear, reproached themselves with the death of their tribune, as not having defended him with sufficient courage. They inveighed chiefly against Scipio Nasica, the author of the tumult, upbraiding him publicly with murder and sacrilege. Some threatened to murder him; others were for summoning him before the assembly of the people, and trying him for his life. The senate therefore, fearing lest his presence might raise a new sedition, thought proper to remove him; and accordingly sent him, under pretence of an embassy, into Asia, though his office of pontifex maximus obliged him not to go out of Italy. He rambled about a great while in different parts of the Levant, till at length, worn out with trouble, he died at Pergamus. By his absence the fire of sedition was rather stifled, than extinguished. The people still maintained the law, which Gracchus had passed in their favour, and nominated a new commissioner in his room to finish the distribution of the lands which he had begun. The person they pitched upon was, P. Crassus, whose daughter Caius Gracchus, brother to Tiberius, had lately married. On the other hand the patricians, to keep off the execution of the law, found means to bring into the college of tribunes a creature of their own, Q. Pompeius Rufus, one of Gracchus's most violent enemies. In the mean time the consular year being near expired, the election was made without any disturbance in the usual place, and the supreme magistracy conferred on Publius Popilius Lanas, and P. Rupilius. It fell to the lot of Popilius to continue in Italy, and keep the citizens of Rome in awe, while his colleague set out for Sicily to make war with the revolted slaves in that island. We shall follow him thither, and take a view of the origin and progress of this rebellion, which brought more calamities on the Sicilians, than all the ravages and devastations of their old enemies the Carthaginians.

The war of the slaves in Sicily.

IN Sicily the great men of the island, or the Roman knights, who had the management of the public revenues, having, by degrees, engrossed all the great estates to themselves, out of avarice employed in the culture of their lands slaves instead of freemen, to whom they scarce allowed necessaries; so that those unfortunate men, being obliged to provide for themselves, learnt to live by rapine. As they frequently met together in companies to plunder the houses in the country, or to rob the travellers on the great roads, they came at length to deliberate how to deliver themselves from slavery. They were almost as numerous as the natives themselves, and therefore wanted only a leader to appear at their head, and conduct the conspiracy. A Sicilian lord, named Antigines, had amongst his slaves one by name Eunus, who was very fit for this purpose. He was a native of Apamea in Syria, and having been taken prisoner in war, had passed through the hands of several masters, till at length he was brought into Sicily. He was a vigilant, active man, full of fire, and pretending to have a constant intercourse with the gods by dreams and apparitions, was consulted by his fellow slaves as an oracle. The Sicilians in general exercised a kind of tyranny over their slaves; but a citizen of Enna, a city in the center of the island, by name Damophilus, had made himself more odious than the rest by his cruelties, to a great number of those unhappy wretches who cultivated his immense possessions. They were all marked with a hot iron in their foreheads, shut up every night in close prisons, and led out early in the morning to their daily labour in the fields, though at the same time they were scarce allowed the necessary provisions to support themselves. On the other hand, Megallis, the wife of Damophilus, was no less cruel towards the slaves of her sex, exact-

- a ing their tasks with insupportable rigor, and causing them to be unmercifully whipt for the least fault. These two tyrants had a daughter, who was very different from themselves; though she was very young, she had good-nature enough to pity the afflicted; she often alleviated their sufferings, appealed her furious mother, supplied, as far as she was able, the wants of the necessitous, and, in short, was the only refuge of those unhappy men. We are sorry history has not transmitted to us the name of this humane and virtuous young woman. The oppressed slaves, not being able to bear any longer the unspeakable miseries they groaned under, entered into a plot against the authors of them. But in order to secure themselves success, they first went to consult Eunus, who with a solemn prophetic tone, pronounced, that the enterprise
- b was agreeable to the gods, and that it would be attended with success, provided they did not delay the execution of it. He offered to conduct it himself; and the slaves, overjoyed to have such a man at their head, assembled in great haste to the number of four hundred on Damophilus's estate, armed with forks, hooks, and other instruments of husbandry, and marching directly to Enna, surprised and pillaged it. The slaves in the city joined their comrades, and committed barbarities not to be expressed. The men were massacred, the women dishonoured, and even the children at the breast dashed on the ground, and trod under foot. As Damophilus was gone with his wife and daughter to take the air in a garden near the city, Eunus, who had taken upon him the office of general, sent a party to seize them, which was done with circumstances of great barbarity. However, they treated the daughter with all the respect which was due to her virtue. So true it is, that good-nature commands regard even from the most furious.

- Eunus*, being now master of Enna, assembled the slaves he commanded in the public theatre; and having erected there a kind of tribunal, ordered Damophilus and his wife to be brought before him, in order to be tried. Some of the slaves were accusers, others witnesses, and the multitude judges. Eunus presided, and gave the accused leave to speak in their defence. But while Damophilus was endeavouring to raise compassion, and some began to shew pity for him, Hermias and Zeuxis, two of his slaves, whom he had treated with great cruelty, came up to him, and with repeated blows dispatched him. His wife Megallis was sentenced to be delivered up to the slaves of her own sex, whom she had treated without mercy. These furies set no bounds to their cruelty, inflicted on their mistress every torment, which revenge could invent; and at length after having satiated their rage, threw her down a precipice, which put an end to her unhappy life. As for the daughter, she was treated with the utmost respect, conducted with the unanimous consent of all to Catana, and there delivered untouched into the hands of her relations. In the mean time Eunus, finding he could not pretend to assume a perfect authority over such untractable people, without being invested with sovereign power, prevailed upon the multitude to proclaim him king. The first orders the new king gave were very cruel; for he caused all the inhabitants of Enna to be barbarously murdered, saying, that there could never be any real concord between freemen and slaves.
- c After this, having got into his power Antigines and Pitbon, who had successively been his masters, he put them to death with his own hand. He then assumed all the ensigns of royalty, changed his name of Eunus into that of Antiochus, gave the title of queen to his wife, who was a Syrian, and a slave as well as himself, and applied himself to settle a kind of government among his new subjects. His regulations drew above six thousand slaves to Enna in less than three days, armed with such weapons as came first to their hands, viz. spits, axes, saws, poles, &c. At the head of these Eunus took the field, and committed every-where most dreadful ravages. The people, whose houses were burnt, and lands laid waste, came in flocks to the Roman prætor, who governed the island, imploring his assistance. Manlius, who was governor of Sicily in the year of Rome 615, when this sedition first broke out, marched against the rebels with one legion, the usual army of prætors, who resided in peaceable provinces; but he was defeated, and his camp taken and plundered. The same misfortune happened to the prætors P. Cornelius Lentulus and Caius Calpurnius Piso, whom the republic sent into the island the two following years. The news of these advantages being spread all over the island, the new king's forces daily increased. Among the rest, one Cleon, a native of Cilicia, joined him with five thousand men; others came from the most distant parts of the island at the head of considerable bodies to ^a support, under the banners of Eunus, the common cause : infomuch, that when the prætor L. Plautius Hypsæus landed in Sicily, he found above seventy thousand slaves in arms under the command of Eunus, besides those who had assembled under other leaders in different places ; so that the whole number of armed slaves in the island amounted to two hundred thousand. As Hypsæus had only eight thousand men in his army, he no sooner appeared in the field, than he was attacked, and intirely defeated. The rebels, elated with this victory, laid siege to Taurominium, a city of great strength, and having soon reduced it, made it their magazine of arms, and place of refuge. At length the republic, alarmed at the progress the rebels made in the beginning of the year 619, ordered C. Fulvius, colleague in the consulate to the second ^b Africanus, into Sicily, to suppress this conspiracy, which began now to be formidable. But whether he gained any advantages over the rebels, history has not informed us. In the following year 620, the consul L. Calpurnius Piso (W), to whose lot Sicily fell, attacked the Syrians, for so the rebellious slaves were commonly called, under the walls of Messana, which city they had invested, put them to the rout for the first time, obliged them to raise the siege, and killed above six thousand of them on the spot. But though Piso conquered the rebels, he had not the glory of intirely reducing them. This was reserved for P. Rupilius, who was chosen consul for the present year. He opened the campaign with the siege of Taurominium. As this city was situated on a high and steep hill, and difficult of access on all sides, the consul resolved to ^c reduce it by famine. With this view he drew a line of circumvallation round the mountain, and by that means cut off all communication with the neighbouring country. As the garison was very numerous, provisions soon began to fail them ; and then want added to their obstinacy produced many tragical events. They killed and devoured one another, but, as they could expect no pardon, still persisted obstinate. At length the city was betrayed to the Romans by a Syrian slave, named Sarapion ; and the governor with all his garison were, by the consul's orders, thrown down headlong from the top of a rock. From Taurominium the consul led his army to Enna, where the pretended king had shut himself up with Cleon, and the flower of his troops. This place likewise Rupilius resolved to reduce by famine ; and accordingly invested ^d it on all sides. The besieged, being soon reduced to great streights, made several sallies, attempting to break through the enemy ; but though they fought like men in despair, they were constantly repulsed by the Romans. In one of these sallies, Cleon fell alive into the consul's hands, covered with wounds and blood, but did not long survive his captivity. His empaled body was exposed to the view of the besieged to increase their terror. At length Enna likewise was treacherously delivered up to the consul, whose troops put all the slaves they found in the place to the sword. We are told, that at the taking of these two cities above twenty thousand of the rebels lost their lives. As for Eunus, when he saw the Romans masters of the walls, he put himself at the head of his guards, consisting of about six hundred men, forced his way ^e through the legionaries, fled for refuge to a steep rock, and there prepared to sell his life dear. He was pursued close, and surrounded in his retreat by the consular troops ; and then it appeared, that there was more ostentation than true courage in his servile soul. The soldiers of his guard agreed to kill one another. But their king concealed himself among the rocks, and was at last taken alive out of a cave with four of his domestics, and delivered up to the consul, who sent them to Murgantia, to be strictly guarded there, till the departure of the Roman army. Rupilius reserved Eunus, not so much to grace his triumph, as to shew the Romans the chief they had so much dreaded with so little reason. But he fell sick, and died in prison, wore out with grief, and devoured with vermin ^f. Rupilius continued some time in Sicily in

(W) This Calpurnius Piso is said to have been the author of the famous law De repetundis against the avarice of magistrates, who robbed the public. While he was prætor in Sicily, there being a great scarcity of corn at Rome, the senate charged him to buy up a great quantity all over that island ; which he did with such disinterestedness as acquired him the glorious surname of Frugi, that is, The Honest. He remitted to the public treasury a considerable part of the money which had been sent him for this purpose, and managed the rest with such prudence and frugality, as to provide with it for the wants of the public (31).

- a quality of proconsul; retook the cities which were still in the hands of the rebels; restored the fugitive slaves to their masters; and lastly, drew up a new code of laws for the Sicilians, which were ever after observed to the great satisfaction of the whole island. Having settled his province in peace, he returned to Rome; but refused a triumph, being ashamed to have it recorded in the triumphal tables, that he had overcome slaves. He was one of those great and disinterested men, who had the virtue of the first ages of Rome. The only glory he sought was, that of promoting the public good; and the only reward he desired was, the consciousness of having served his country¹.

- DURING the war in Sicily, Andronicus, the illegitimate son of Eumenes, laid claim b to the kingdom of Pergamus, which Attalus was said to have bequeathed to the Romans; and having seized it, put himself in a condition to maintain a war with Rome, which we have described at length in our history of the kingdom of Pergamus. The next year, P. Licinius Crassus and Valerius Flaccus were chosen consuls; the former was pontifex maximus, and the latter flamen Martialis, that is, high-priest of Mars; so that Rome was now for the first time governed by two persons devoted to the service of the gods. This same year two plebeians, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, surnamed Macedonicus, and Q. Pompeius, were chosen censors. It had been an invariable custom in Rome for two hundred and twenty years to chuse one of the censors out of the patricians, and the other out of the plebeians. But now the patricians, probably to soften the people, suffered them to raise two of their body to this eminent dignity, which had never happened before. In the census, which these two plebeians took of the citizens of Rome, they found 317823 men able to bear arms; and their censorship was famous for a law, which they got passed, obliging all Romans to marry at a certain age.

Two plebeians

- In the mean time the disturbances about the Sempronian law were continued by the tribune Carbo, who was continually complaining to the people of the chicaneries of the rich in opposing the execution of it. One day he publicly asked the great Scipio Africanus what he thought of the murder of Sempronius Gracchus his brother-in-law, not doubting but he would condemn the authors of his death? But to his great surprise, Scipio answered, that if Gracchus had endeavoured to sow discord in the republic, he thought him lawfully put to death. Upon this unexpected answer, the tribune stirred up the people to insult the most venerable man in Rome. But Scipio assuming an ascendant over the multitude; Be silent, said he, ye untractable people. Think ye that I am afraid of your murmurs, who have been so often unconcerned at the fury of your enemies? At these words the unruly multitude began to hiss him, which that brave commander not being able to bear, Miserable wretches, said he, exalting his voice, What would have become of you, had it not been for my father Paulus Æmilius, and myself? You would have been enslaved by your enemies, and spent your unhappy lives in a state of subjection. And is this the respect you owe your deliverers? Is this your gratitude? These words, uttered with that authority, which the long command of armies gives a general, silenced the multitude, and made the most seditious tremble like slaves. The comitia were immediately dissolved, and every one returned home with more esteem, but less affection, for the great Scipio. After this the illustrious Roman retired to one of his country-houses at Gaieta with his dear Lælius. There these two inseparable friends, who had discharged with glory the highest offices in the republic, amused themselves with the same little innocent pleasures which had diverted them when children. They walked by the sea-side, entertained themselves with picking up smooth flat stones, and throwing them on the surface of the water, and enjoyed more pleasure in this sweet retirement, than they had done at the head of the republic f and her armies².

New disturbances about the Sempronian law.

In the mean time Carbo, more active than ever in supporting the interests of the people, having prevailed upon them to continue him in his office another year, proposed a law, enacting, that the same persons should hold the tribuneship during the pleasure of the people, without coming to an annual election. But Scipio and Lælius, upon the report of this new storm, hastening to Rome, opposed the law with all their interest, and got it rejected. In the following consulate of Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perperna, a soldier of fortune, and not so much as a Roman citizen, the disturbances in Rome were daily increased by the tribunes. Caius Atinius Labeo, who was at the head of the college, seized Q. Cæcilius Metellus the censor, who had refused a him a place in the senate, at noon-day, and immediately pronounced sentence of death upon him, commanding his attendants to throw him headlong from the Tarpeian rock. The officers took hold of that venerable magistrate by the throat, and treated him with the utmost barbarity. One of his slaves flew to acquaint his master's relations with the violence offered him. They all came and found the censor half dead wallowing in his blood. As it was not lawful to take even a relation, no not a father, out of the hands of a tribune, they flew with all possible speed, and brought one of Labeo's colleagues, who opposed the unjust sentence, and saved the remains of Metellus's life. Without this timely assistance, the most considerable magistrate in Rome after the consul, the triumphant victor, and conqueror of Macedon, whence he had the glorious surname of Macedonicus, would have been executed like a common criminal. Labeo was so far from being punished for this cruel insult on Metellus, that he had interest enough to get a law passed, enacting, that for the future the tribunes should all have votes in the senate. This law being passed, he went in state to the forum, and there by sound of trumpet ordered all the effects of the great Macedonicus to be sold to the best bidder. Such acts of violence were to all discerning men the forerunners of those civil wars which not long after broke out¹.

IN the next consulate of C. Sempronius Tuditanus and M. Aquilius, fresh troubles were raised on account of the Sempronian law. The commissioners for putting it in execution, were continually stirring up the people against the rich by their complaints; and the allies of the republic complained as much of the injustice of the commissioners, who in the distribution of the lands were more favourable to the inhabitants of Rome, whose votes might be of service to them, than to the people of the provinces. Scipio therefore took the latter under his protection, and having spoke warmly in favour of these poor allies, got the execution of the law transferred from the three commissioners to the consul Sempronius. But the consul, dreading the consequences of civil broils at home, as much as he loved the glory of arms abroad, set out for Japidia, one of the western provinces of Illyricum, which had fallen to him by lot, to quell some disturbances lately raised there. Scipio, thus left alone to stand the hatred of the three commissioners, for the other consul was then settling the kingdom of Pergamus in peace, was charged by them with the most odious designs. That indeed of aspiring to the dictatorship was probably true; but it was no manner of just reproach to him, though he was greatly calumniated for it by the commissioners, and their adherents. C. Gracchus his brother-in-law told him to his face, That he ought to be put to death as a tyrant. Scipio calmly replied; There is scarce any man, who is not an enemy to his country, that desires it. Marcus Fulvius Flaccus, one of the triumvirs, cast the most bitter reflections rage could suggest upon Scipio, censured both his public and private conduct, and warmly insisted, that the dictatorship was his point in view, and that he desired this dignity only in order to usurp a perpetual tyranny. But nevertheless, both the senate and people seemed inclined to favour Scipio's motion, the partiality of the triumvirs in the distribution of the lands being very palpable. All the senators in a body, and vast crouds both of Roman citizens and allies, attended him to his house. In short, Rome seemed determined to nominate him dictator the next day. But in the morning, to the great grief and surprise of all well-wishers to their country, he was found dead in his bed. Those who viewed his body more narrowly, discovered the marks of a violent death about his neck, as if he had been strangled. His death was, upon good grounds, imputed to the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, and to his wife Sempronia, the sister of the Gracchi, who is said to have conveyed in the night the triumvirs into his room. The authors of the crime took great pains to spread a report, that Scipio, finding he could not obtain for the allies the advantages he had promised them, had out of grief and despair laid violent hands on himself. Thus died this illustrious hero, whose talents and exploits were so equal to those of the first Africanus, that Rome herself could not determine which was superior in merit. Their characters, their conduct, their tempers, and their honours, were equally great; and to the eternal reproach of their country, one died with grief in a kind of exile, and the other a violent death in Rome. The second Africanus died possessed of very little else but the glory of his exploits. For he left to Quintus Fabius Maximus, his nephew and heir, having no children himself, scarce

a thirty-two pounds weight of silver, and two pounds and a half of gold. Surprising poverty in a general, who might have enriched himself with the spoils of Carthage! The patricians wept for him as for a father. When Metellus, who had been all his life-time his rival for glory, heard the news of his death, he shewed the utmost concern, and turning to his two sons, Go, said he, attend the funeral of the greatest man Rome ever bred; you will never see his equal. The people too lamented his death, and attended in great crouds his body to the funeral pile; but they would not suffer any inquiries to be made after the authors of his death, for fear of finding C. Gracchus, who now began to be their darling, concerned in so base and treacherous a murder^r.

WHILE these things were transacting at Rome, the consul Tuditanus was making war in Japidia, where he was attended with such success, that in one campaign he quieted the whole country, and upon his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, as was likewise his colleague Aquilius three years after for reducing the kingdom of Pergamus, though he did it by poisoning the springs, which supplied the several towns with water; which was a most execrable and inhuman breach of the law of nations. And now there was not the least disturbance or commotion in any of the provinces subject to the Roman republic. Cisalpine Gaul, Spain, Africa, Istria, Illyricum, Macedon, and Greece, bore the yoke with great submission; so that there was no expedition for the new consuls, Cn. Octavius, and T. Annius, to undertake within or without Italy. The people gave themselves wholly up to pleasures and luxury in this time of tranquillity; which licentiousness greatly increased in the succeeding consulate of L. Cassius Longinus, and L. Cornelius Cinna. But when M. Aemilius Lepidus, and L. Aurelius Orestes were raised to the consular dignity, this general tranquillity was a little interrupted by a revolt in Sardinia, which province fell to the lot of Aurelius; and Caius Gracchus was his quæstor. This young Roman was become the idol of the people, who after the death of his brother looked upon him as their chief patron and protector. He had indeed some very eminent qualities, and was deemed the best orator in Rome. The multitude adored him on account of his favouring the citizens of Rome more than the allies in the partition of the lands. He had for some time retired from public life, and applied himself wholly to the study of eloquence. During his

d retirement, the republic enjoyed a profound tranquillity; and it was commonly said, that he had resolved to bury his talents in obscurity for fear of his brother's fate. But after two years retirement, he unexpectedly appeared upon the stage, and stood for the quæstorship, which he obtained, and in that quality attended the consul Aurelius into Sardinia, where he signalized his courage, and obliged all who depended upon him in the discharge of his office. He gained the affection of his general by his punctuality, ready obedience, and the great services he rendered him in supplying the army with cloaths and provisions by the interest he had among the Sardinians, who were greatly taken with his temperance, modesty, and obliging carriage. But the senate in the mean time, growing jealous of the popularity Gracchus acquired in the army, and dreading the consequences of it, ordered all the troops in Sardinia to be recalled, and fresh ones to be sent in their room. The next year the patricians had the mortification to see Fulvius Flaccus, who had been one of the triumvirs for the partition of the lands, raised to the consulate. His colleague was Plautius Hypsæus, a patrician of a mild and pacific disposition. The plebeian consul was no sooner entered upon his office, than he proposed a law, enacting, that the right of Roman citizenship should be granted to all the Italian allies, to whom the triumvirs had not been able to assign any share in the divided lands. He had, when one of the triumvirs, exasperated the people in the provinces, by not admitting them to an equal share of lands with the inhabitants of Rome; and now by this law he endeavoured f to reconcile himself to them. He supported it with a fury, which shewed him determined to exasperate the senate. The patricians earnestly intreated him to drop the law, which would not fail to be attended with dangerous consequences, and might kindle a war in the bowels of Italy. But the imperious consul did not even vouchsafe to give them an answer; so that there was reason to fear an immediate rupture. But a new incident intervened, which kept the republic for some time in tranquillity. Embassadors came from Maffilia, desiring the assistance of the Romans against the Salves, who had ravaged their country. This gave the senate an opportunity of sending Enrius beyond the Alps; and he, being greedy of glory, readily accepted the commission. His absence, and that of Gracchus, might have given the republic an interval of rest, if the seditious consul had not, before he left Rome, sown the seeds of a rebellion, which broke out as soon as he was gone. For the Italian allies having by his departure lost all hopes of obtaining the right of citizenship, with which he had flattered them, began to enter into cabals against the republic. Fregellæ, a city of the Volsci on the Liris, was the first that openly revolted. But Numitorius Pullus, the chief author of the rebellion, being cited before the prætor, and frightened into a discovery of the whole plot, a Roman army was sent against the city, which by the advice of Numitorius submitted; but nevertheless was immediately razed. Numitorius himself was pardoned, but all his accomplices condemned to die, and executed. The exemplary punishment of the Fregellani checked the boldness of the malecontents, and stifled the sedition for some time ^a.

Sardinia.

ALL seemed quiet, when C. Cassius Longinus and C. Sextius Calvinus were raised to the consulate; but this calm was of short duration. C. Gracchus, who had been continued, much against his inclination, in Sardinia, with the character of pro-quæstor, being weary of his long stay in an island where his talents were buried, and fearing the affections of the people might cool by so long an absence, resolved to run all the hazards of a very bold step. In open defiance to all law, he imbarqued unknown to the consul, left Sardinia, and when least expected, appeared at Rome. He was therefore accused before the censors, but so far imposed upon his judges by his eloquence, that he was acquitted. The high esteem and great concern which the multitude shewed for him on this occasion, encouraged him to stand for the tribuneship. He flattered himself, that if he could once get possession of this important office, he should easily find means to maintain himself in it, and to execute all his schemes of revenge at leisure. He therefore put himself among the candidates, and solicited the office with the utmost diligence and application. This roused the senate to be more active in opposing him; and his excellent mother Cornelia was very pressing with him to desist. She wrote to him from one of her country-houses in Campania near cape Misenum, whither she had retired after the melancholy death of her eldest son, two very affecting letters upon this subject (X); in which she labours to divert him from his design with such tenderness both for him and her country, as shews her worthy of the statue which

(X) Two of these letters have reached our times, and sufficiently shew us the spirit and sentiments of that heroine, in whose praises the ancients often expatiate. In one of them she expresses herself thus: "Son, you have now no partner in the affliction of your mother. Tiberius is no more. All my joys and fears now centre wholly in you. The death of your elder brother was owing to his desire of revenge; and will you suffer yourself to be hurried on to your destruction by the impetuosity of the same passion? Avert, ye gods, so fatal a pretage! It will be a satisfaction, you will say, to revenge his murder. I allow it, dear child. I have as strong a sense as you, of the pleasure of revenge. But I can, by force of reason, suppress the first furies which passion raises in my breast. And at present, my concern for the welfare of the public has a greater influence upon me, than my grief at the loss of my son. Ah, Gracchus! remember, that with the same blow which wounds your country, you will strike deep into your mother's breast. But what am I saying! You will yourself sink under the weight of this rash attempt. I shall lose you; but your enemies will remain. Unfortunate mother! let what will happen, the ill effects of the civil broils, in which you are preparing to engage, will fall upon me, and be more than I shall be able to bear (32)".

Gracchus paid no regard to the representations of his mother, his rage against the senate getting the better of her wholesome advice. This drew from her a second letter in the following words: "Un- dutiful child! next to the murderers of Tiberius,

"I have not a more cruel enemy in the world than you. Have I had any reason to expect, that my only surviving son should bring me nothing but bitterness in my old age? To what can I impute this disobedience, but to my continual indulgence, and too great compliance with your inclinations? And is it too much to desire an equal return of deference and respect? Impious wretch! will you never be at rest till you have destroyed the republic? Shall I have the mortification, before I die, to see that you have overturned it? Do not, Gracchus, do not act over again the tragical scenes of my unfortunate family! Wait at least till my eyes are closed, before you stand for the tribuneship; and then my ashes will not feel the misfortunes which you will bring upon yourself. In the midst of your distress you will perhaps invoke the manes of your father and mother: but will they then be affected with your tears? The time to believe and obey them, is while they live. O great Jupiter! suffer not my son to persist in a design, which must be the destruction of himself, his country, and his mother (33)". From these small remains we may judge whether this incomparable matron could have any hand in the base assassination of the second Africanus, which some writers have, without any grounds, laid to her charge. She loved her children, but had at the same time a tender regard for her country; and therefore the senate, notwithstanding their resentment against her two sons, suffered the people to erect a statue to her with this inscription on the base; To Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi.

- a the senate permitted the people to erect to her memory. But neither her intreaties nor commands could prevail; he pursued his point, and succeeded. There was this circumstance peculiar to his election, that for want of room in the campus Martius, ^{is chosen tribune.} a great number of citizens got up on the roofs of the houses round it, and from thence voted for Gracchus with shouts and acclamations. His graceful person, noble air, fine features, and modest deportment, prepossessioned every spectator in his favour before he spoke; and when he did speak, their ears were no less charmed; for a more complete orator had never ascended the rostra (Y) ². Soon after the election of Gracchus to the tribuneship, his fellow triumvir Fulvius Flaccus returned from Gaul to second him in his attempts. He was a furious plebeian, a declared enemy to the senate and the rich, and ready to imbarque in any bold and desperate undertaking. Gracchus procured him a triumph for an expedition of little importance, in order to bring new honour and strength to his party by the addition of a consular man, and a triumphant victor ³.

- THUS all things seemed to tend to a sedition in Rome, when Q. Cæcilius Metellus and T. Quinctius Flaminius were chosen consuls. The former was sent into the Balearic islands to quell an insurrection there, and the latter continued at Rome, where Gracchus was daily inventing new schemes to depress the senate, and exalt the people. He got his brother's law confirmed, relating to the division of the lands of Italy between the citizens of Rome, and the indigent allies; and for the more speedy execution of it, he caused himself to be nominated one of the commissioners for the said partition, in conjunction with Fulvius Flaccus, and Licinius Crassus, who seems to have been the brother of his wife Licinia. With the assistance of these he undertook and performed several works in favour of the people. For the convenience of travellers, he repaired the great roads, built a great many bridges, erected the first military columns, or columns at the end of each mile, and placed stones at proper distances for the ease of travellers in mounting their horses. These public works gained him the hearts of the people; but the two following laws, which he got passed in spite of the senate, were far more agreeable to the multitude than any public works. The first was, that public granaries should be built at Rome, and filled with corn at the public expence; the second, that monthly distributions should be made from thence to every citizen who wanted corn, at a very low price. In order to enable the treasury to bear this expence, he got duties laid on all the goods imported into Asia at the ports devised to the republic by king Attalus. He passed several other laws relating to the service and cloathing of the troops, which were so agreeable to the people, that the tribune gained an absolute ascendant over them, and became in a manner despotic master of Rome. This could not but raise the hatred and jealousy of the patricians, who united all their interest to crush him as soon as his office should expire. To prevent this, Flaccus pressed him to solicit the tribuneship a second time; ^{His new laws.} which he did accordingly, and succeeded in spite of the utmost efforts of the senate, and the whole body of the nobility ⁴.

WHILE Gracchus was thus humbling the senate, the consul Metellus, landing in the Balearic islands, subdued them, and treated those poor helpless barbarians with such cruelty, that out of thirty thousand, he scarce left one thousand of them alive. After this bloody and easy victory, the consul built two cities in the larger island, one to the east, called Palma, now Majorca; the other to the west, named Pollentia, now no longer in being. To people these two places, the consul brought three thousand

(Y) Cicero, a good judge in point of oratory, tells us, that a more complete orator than Caius Gracchus never appeared in the rostra. His graceful person, noble air, fine features, and expressive action, charmed all who saw or heard him. His voice, which was strong and melodious, reached and affected the most distant auditors. The only fault imputed to him was too much vehemence, when he suffered passion to transport him. The orator, who was himself well apprised of this defect, chose out from among his slaves an excellent musician, whom he kept constantly behind him, when he was speaking. If in a fit of passion the orator happened to raise his voice too much, the slave with a sort of flageolet brought him back to his proper key. So much care did the Romans take, when they spoke in public, to give their speeches all possible graces. But Gracchus never appeared more eloquent, than when he lamented the tragical end of his brother. As he was affected with it himself, his descriptions were so strong and lively, that they drew tears from every eye (34).

Romans from the colonies on the continent of Spain. After this the consul returned a to Rome, where he triumphed, and was honoured with the surname of Balearicus, as his father had been with that of Macedonicus. At the same time the proconsul Sextius, who had been continued in Transalpine Gaul, having gained a complete victory over the Salves, found no difficulty in subduing the whole nation. He besieged their capital, which stood at a small distance from Maffilia or Marseilles, took it, and reduced the inhabitants to slavery. When the conquered came to be sold, the proconsul, being informed that one of them, by name Crato, had suffered much from his countrymen on account of his affection to the Romans, not only gave him his liberty, and restored to him all his effects; but allowed him to chuse out nine hundred among his countrymen, who were, at his request, set at liberty r. After this the proconsul, to b secure his new conquest, founded a colony in the place where he had gained his victory, chusing a spot of ground for this purpose, which abounded both with hot and cold springs. Here he built a new city, which, from the springs and his own name, he called Aquæ Sextiæ. This place, now known by the name of Aix in Provence, he peopled with a colony, which Rome had formerly planted at Fabrateria, in the country of the Volsci. Sextius, having thus settled the Romans in Transalpine Gaul, returned to Rome, and triumphed; an honour which he better deserved than his predecessor Fulvius Flaccus had done.

THE consul, on his return to Rome, found the republic in great confusion on account of the innovations of Gracchus. The seditious tribune saw with concern, that the c Roman knights, who were the most wealthy of the citizens, inclined more to the side of the nobility, than to his; so that the plebeian party was made up only of the indigent populace. The knights were indeed reckoned a part of the plebeian body; but as they were the richest of that order, they made alliances with the patricians, and, upon a division, generally sided with them. Gracchus therefore, in order to draw them off from the senate, and bring them into his measures, drew up a law for making six hundred of them senators; but this law the crafty tribune proposed only to pave the way for another, which was in appearance more moderate, but in effect raised the knights above the senators. This was, to transfer from the senators to the knights the cognizance of all private causes, civil and criminal. The senators used d their utmost efforts to get this law rejected; but Gracchus was absolute master of the suffrages of the people, so that the following plebiscitum passed by a vast majority, Let the judging of all private causes belong to the knights, exclusive of the senators. The tribune was so elated with this success, that he cried out in a transport of joy, I have at length humbled the senate. The favour which the people shewed him on this occasion, emboldened him to proceed so far, as to solicit for the consulship, in such terms as led the people to conclude, that he intended to appear for it himself; but when the day of the elections came, he entered the campus Martius, leading his friend C. Fannius Strabo by the hand, whom he recommended to the favour of the people, saying, with a very engaging air, which he knew how to assume when he pleased, If you confer the consulship on my friend, it is the same thing as if you conferred it upon me. This was enough, Fannius was declared consul with Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus. It fell to the lot of the latter to carry on the war beyond the Alps, and to the former to continue in Italy. And now Gracchus, being raised to such a pitch of power and authority over the people of Rome, as the most absolute monarchs have over their subjects, in order to shew his contempt for the senate, caused the seats in the comitium to be changed. The plebeians had hitherto been so placed, that the orators who harangued them, at the same time faced the senate, and addressed themselves to that venerable body as well as to the people; but Gracchus, by altering the situation of the plebeians, contrived it so, that, when he harangued the people, he turned his back to the senators. This f was a glaring proof, that he acknowledged no aristocratical power in the republic, but thought the whole authority lodged solely in the people. This last outrage roused the senators, and put them upon contriving expedients to check the insolence of the daring tribune. As the consul Domitius was absent, they applied themselves to his colleague C. Fannius, whom, to their great joy and surprize, they found to be in his heart a steady republican, and a sincere friend to his country, not to be corrupted, and determined not to sacrifice the interest of the public to his private gratitude. Soon after his election, the popular tribune revived a prohibition formerly given to the

- a judges, Not to put in execution a capital sentence on a Roman citizen, without the consent and order of the people. This law met with no opposition; but when he proposed the following edict, That the allies should be upon the same foot with the citizens of Rome as to a right of suffrage, even in the acceptance or refusal of laws, the consul Fannius, thinking this a monstrous innovation, to the great surprize of his benefactor, openly declared against him, and mounting the rostra, harangued the people with great zeal, expatiating on the evil consequences that would infallibly attend the passing of the law proposed by the tribune. By this means the republic was divided between her two chief magistrates, and the debates grew every day warmer and warmer. One was supported by the senate, the other by the multitude, and both carried matters to great extremities.
- b Gracchus was for giving the right of citizenship and suffrage to all the Italian allies of Rome, from the most eastern parts of Italy to the foot of the Alps, which drew vast crouds of those people to the capital. The senate, alarmed at this prodigious concourse of strangers, engaged the consul to forbid all those, who had not yet a right of suffrage, to continue in the city, or within five miles of it. This order gave rise to a warm dispute between the consul and the tribune in point of jurisdiction. Fannius insisted, that these new-comers should leave Rome; Gracchus encouraged them not to obey an order, which the consul had no right to publish. On one side were enacted consular edicts; and on the other ordinances of the tribune directly contrary to them. At length the boldest man succeeded: Fannius, who was a better
- c soldier than orator, thinking it necessary to make use of force, sent his lictors to seize some of those pretenders to the citizenship of Rome, and caused them to be dragged through the streets, and driven out of the city. Gracchus, either out of cowardice, or, as he said, for fear of giving rise to a civil war, suffered his friends to be thus treated, without offering to assist them; and this too great tameness was the first thing that lessened his credit, and made his partizans somewhat diffident.

- BUT it was not enough for the senate to have thus checked the exorbitant power of the tribune; they aimed at nothing less than his destruction: but as they could not compass their design without gaining over one of his brother tribunes, they applied themselves to Livius Drusus, judging him the most proper person in the college for their purpose. He was in the flower of his age, of an illustrious family, tho' plebeian, in point of manners blameless, skilled in business, a good orator, and capable of a laudable emulation. As he had nothing more at heart than the welfare of his country, and the service of his fellow citizens, he came readily into the measures of the conscript fathers; but they, remembering the misfortunes of Octavius, who had opposed the attempts of Tiberius, directed Livius to pursue quite different measures from those which that tribune had taken, and taught him a conduct so refined, and so well-judged, that historians commend it as a master-piece of policy. They did not desire him to oppose the novelties which Gracchus daily introduced, but, on the contrary, to court the favour of the people, by attempting to surpass Gracchus himself in popularity; a
- d scheme finely laid, and executed with still more address. If Gracchus proposed any law agreeable to the people, and displeasing to the senate, Livius immediately proposed another which was more so, and by that means brought himself into great favour with the multitude. This game was so artfully played, as not to be suspected even by the most sagacious of the adverse party. Gracchus could not see without concern the good-will of the people divided between him and Livius; and being sensible that his interest was daily lessened among the multitude, he began to shew some respect to the fathers, who returned it with great civilities, and pretended to be upon very good terms with him. But their master-piece was yet behind: they prevailed on Rubrius, another tribune, to propose a law for raising six thousand Romans to rebuild and re-
- e people Carthage. The law being passed, Rubrius, under pretence of doing honour to Gracchus, named him in the first place to be the leader of the colony, his seditious friend Fulvius Flaccus in the second place, and himself in the third. Gracchus fell into the snare, and crossing the sea, spent some months in Africa, and began to build there a new city on the ruins of Carthage, which he called Junonia, from the name of the goddess, who had always been the protectress of the old city. At the end of two months, Gracchus returned to Rome, where he met with a very indifferent reception even from the most zealous of his party. Livius, during his absence, had got the ascendant, and gained the affections of the people to such a degree, that Gracchus was now almost quite forgot by the unsteady multitude. The popular tribune was so sensible of this, that his friends had much-ado to keep up his drooping spirits. However, he took some steps to prevail on the people to elect him tribune the third time, which was his last game; but at the same time he very imprudently affronted the rest of his colleagues, by ordering a scaffold to be pulled down, which they had erected to see more conveniently a shew of gladiators (Z). Gracchus pretended, that the scaffold

(Z) The combats of gladiators passed from Greece, or, as others will have it, from the Asiatic provinces, to Hetruria, and from thence to Rome. This cruel custom was first introduced into the world to supply the room of human victims, which the pagans offered at the funeral piles, or near the tombs of their ancestors, from a superstitious notion, that the souls or manes of the deceased were rendered propitious and highly pleased with human blood. This monstrous persuasion prevailed even among the more civilized nations. They generally believed, that the effusion of human blood was a tribute which the dead required of the living; but, to disguise their impious barbarity with the specious shew of pleasure and voluntary combat, they introduced gladiators; that is, men destined by the state to cut one another's throats. These combats were, in their first rise, confined to the funerals of great men; but in a short time became common at the obsequies of private persons. Those who could afford it, never failed to allot in their wills a certain sum for a combat of gladiators, this being a sure way of drawing a great concourse of people together, and having their obsequies performed with great solemnity. The first shew of gladiators, called by the Latins munus gladiatorum, was exhibited at Rome, according to Valerius Maximus (35), by M. and D. Brutus upon the death of their father, in the year of the city 490. Several years after, that is, in the year of Rome 537, upon the death of Marcus Æmilius Lepidus the augur, who had been thrice honoured with the consulate, his three sons, Lucius, Marcus and Quintus, entertained the people with the cruel pleasure of seeing twenty-two couple of gladiators fight in the forum. In the year of Rome 547, the first Africanus diverted his army at New Carthage with a shew of gladiators, which he exhibited in honour of his father and uncle, who had begun the reduction of Spain. On this occasion two young Spaniards, of an illustrious birth, and cousin-germans, who contended for the sovereignty of a city named Lacilis, obtained leave of Scipio to end their quarrel by single combat; which they did accordingly, and their example was followed by several other Spaniards of distinction, who fought either to end their personal quarrels by duels, or purely to gain some glory by conquering. In process of time the Romans grew so fond of these bloody entertainments, that not only the heir of any great and rich citizen lately deceased, but all the principal magistrates, presented the people with shews of this nature, to procure their esteem and affection. The ædiles, prætors, consuls, and above all, the candidates for offices, made their court to the people, by entertaining them frequently with these fights. As for the emperors, it was so much their interest to ingratiate themselves with the populace, that they obliged them with combats of gladiators almost upon all occasions. As these bloody solemnities were increased, so was the number of the combatants. At the first shew exhibited by the Brutii, only three couple of gladiators fought; but Julius Cæsar, in his ædileship, diverted the people with three hundred and twenty couple (36). Titus exhibited a shew of gladiators, wild beasts, and representations of sea-fights, which lasted a hundred days; and Trajan continued a solemnity of this nature a hundred and twenty-three days, during which time he brought out a thousand couple of gladiators. The number of gladiators was so great even in the time of the republic, that when the conspiracy of Cataline broke out, the senate ordered them to be dispersed about the strong-holds, and secured, lest they should join the disaffected party. The famous Spartacus, who put Rome under no small apprehension, was himself a gladiator, and of the same condition were the greater part of his troops, with which he defeated the two Roman generals Claudius and Vatinus. As to the condition of the gladiators, they were commonly slaves, or captives purchased by the lanista, that is, by persons who made it their profession to teach them how to manage their arms, and brought them up for public shews. The lanista hired them out at a great price to the person who was at the expence of the shew, and led them armed to the amphitheatre like so many victims. Before they entered the lists, their masters, or the lanista, engaged them, by the most dreadful oaths, never to give ground, but to fight to the last extremity. The form of this oath is still preserved in the fragments of Petrone. When brought to the place set apart for these bloody shews, they were ranged into classes, and divided into couples; so that each had his adversary. They fought with the utmost fury, and pursued one another without mercy, their masters sparing neither threatenings nor blows to stir up the cowardly. If either of the two combatants, exhausted with fatigue and loss of blood, or struck with horror at the approach of death, begged quarter, he held up his finger, and laid down his arms, to shew that he had recourse to the mercy of the people present, from whom he expected the decision of his fate. It often happened, that the spectator took a cruel pleasure in giving up the suppliant to the fury of his adversary; and then, Recipio ferrum, Stab him, stab him, was the cry from all parts of the theatre. Sometimes the multitude declared their pleasure, by holding up, or, as others will have it, by bending back their thumbs, which was the fatal sign of condemnation. The cowardly scarce ever met with any favour from the populace, who were deaf to their cries and prayers. On the other hand, those who shewed a generous contempt of death, were generally favoured by the people, and saved.

As soon as the mournful sound of the trumpets proclaimed the death of one of the gladiators, his body, covered with wounds and blood, was ignominiously dragged with a crook, through one of the gates of the amphitheatre to a place adjoining, called Spoliarium, where the conquerors stripped the dead of their cloaths and arms, and inhumanly dispatched them, if they still breathed. Pliny tells us (37), that many of the common people often crowded round the dying, and clapping their mouths, without the least concern, to their trembling limbs, drank their warm blood, as it streamed from their wounds, out of a persuasion, that it was a sovereign remedy for the falling-sickness. If the people shewed an inclination to favour the vanquished, the lanista still retained his right to them, and kept them for other combats. The reward of the conqueror was only a crown of mastie, and a palm branch, which he received

- a scaffold raised by the tribunes left no room for the common people to see the shew. By this bold action he ingratiated himself with the mob, but provoked the whole col-

received from the hands of the magistrates, to which was added sometimes, but very rarely, a small sum of money.

The greatest of all the advantages the gladiators ever gained by their victories, and after many years of service, was the recovery of their liberty. In this case, the prætor declared them for ever free from the hard fate of being subjected to an avaricious and merciless master. A kind of foyl, called by the Latins rudis, was put into their hands, as a pledge of their enfranchisement, and on their heads a sort of bonnet, named pileus, which was given to all those, who from slaves became free. When they were thus set at liberty, they consecrated their arms to Hercules, the tutelary god of the gymnasia, or military schools.

The gladiators were, as we have hinted above, commonly prisoners taken in war, or refractory and ungovernable slaves; for it was a common custom for masters to sell such servants to the lanistæ, or the instructors of the gladiator; but in process of time free men often fought for hire as gladiators; whence they had the name of auctorati. Some young persons, of good families, after they had spent their estates in debauchery, were not ashamed to hire themselves out as gladiators; nay, the knights and noblemen, and even the senators themselves, often took up this infamous profession, to keep themselves from starving, after they had squandered away their patrimony; insomuch that Augustus was obliged to publish an edict, forbidding any of the senatorial order to turn gladiators. Not long after, he laid the same restraint on the knights (38). But these prohibitions were so little regarded by the following princes, that, in one shew exhibited by Nero, four hundred senators, if the numbers in Suetonius are not corrupted, and six hundred of the equestrian order, fought in the arena as common gladiators (39). Nay, even women of distinction frequently engaged in these public encounters, particularly under Nero and Domitian, and are on that account elegantly exposed by Juvenal in the following verses:

*Quale decus verum, si conjugis auctio fiat,
Buteus, & manica, & crista, crurisque sinistræ
Dimidium tegmen? vel si diversa movebit
Prælia, tu felix, ocreas vendente puella.
Hæ sunt quæ tenui sudant in cyclade, quarum
Delicias & panniculus bombycinus urit.
Apice quo fremis monstratos perferas ictus;
Et quanto galea curvetur pondere; quantum
Poplitibus sedas, quam densa fuscina libro (40)!*

Thus englished by Mr. Dryden:

*Oh! what a decent sight 'tis to behold
All thy wife's magazine by auction sold!
The belt, the crested plume, the several suits
Of armour, and the Spanish-leather boots:
Yes these are they that cannot bear the heat
Of figur'd silks, and under sarfenes sweat.
Behold the strutting Amazonian whore,
She stands in guard, with her right-foot before,
Her coats suck'd up, and all her motions just,
She stamps, and then cries, Hah! as every thrust.*

But the most ridiculous set of combatants were the dwarfs, who encountering one another, or engaging with the women, afforded the people great diversion. They are described with a great deal of humour by Statius (41), to whom we refer our readers.

There were several kinds of gladiators, distinguished by different appellations, which they took from their country, their arms, their way of fighting, or from such-like circumstances. The most famous and most frequently mentioned by the ancients, are the Retiarii, the Secutores, the Myrmillones, the Thracians, the Samnites, the Pinnirapi, the Essedarii, and the Andabata. The Retiarius was dressed in a short coat, having a fusina or trident in his left-hand, and a net in his right, with which he endeavoured to entangle his adversary, that he might the more easily dispatch him with his trident. The Secutor, who was always matched with the Retiarius, was armed with a buckler and a helmet, on which was engraved a fish, in allusion to the net. If the Retiarius failed in casting the net, he fled round the place of combat, till he had got it ready for a second throw. In the meantime his antagonist pursued him to prevent his design; and from thence was called Secutor, or Follower. In the several motions, which the Retiarius made while he was attempting to catch the head of his adversary in his net, he repeated the following words, recorded by Festus: Non te peto, piscem peto; quid me fugis, Galle? Why do you fly from me, Gaul? my aim is not at you, but at your fish. The Secutor's weapon was a falx supina, or kind of scymiter. Juvenal gives us a very particular account of this sort of combat, in speaking of a young nobleman, who scandalously took up the profession of a Retiarius in the reign of Nero (42). The Myrmillo was, as is pretty plain from Juvenal, the same as the Secutor. However, Lipsius will have the Myrmillones to be a distinct order of gladiators, who fought completely armed. The Thracians used a sica, or dagger, and a parma, or little round shield. Some writers think they were called Thracians, because they were natives of Thrace; others pretend they were so named from their weapons, which were peculiar to the Thracians. As to the Samnite gladiators, Livy tells us, that the Campanians, bearing a great hatred to the Samnites, armed some of their gladiators after the fashion of that country, and called them Samnites. Such was their original. What their arms were, he tells us in another place; they wore, says he, a shield, broad at the top to defend their breasts, and narrow at the bottom, that it might be moved with greater ease; they wore a belt over their shoulders, a greave on their left-foot, and a crested helmet on their heads. Hence it is plain, that the Amazonian combatant described above by Juvenal, had assumed the armour and duty of a Samnite gladiator. The Pinnirapi, who always entered the lists against the Samnites, were so called, from the pinna or crest, which adorned the Samnite's helmet. These pinna they used to catch at, and carry them off in triumph, as marks of their victory; and hence the name of Pinnirapi, made up of the two Latin words pinna and rapiere. The Essedarii engaged one another in chariots, called essedæ. The Andabata fought on horseback, armed with a helmet, which covered their face, and even their eyes, so that they struck at a venture; and hence Andabatarum more pugnare is, among the Latins, to fight blind-fold.

We shall take our leave of the gladiators, with an observation out of Petronius Arbitr, who tells us, that the combats of gladiators were introduced out of superstition, but maintained out of policy; a cruel policy indeed! but the republic found her account in it. The Roman youth being accustomed to look on blood and slaughter as matter of diversion, learned to despise death, which was become familiar to them, and to brave the greatest dangers.

lege of the tribunes, who soon found an opportunity to shew their resentment; for a few days after, when the election came on, the old tribunes, whose business it was to collect the votes, so counted them, that the majority was declared to be against Gracchus, tho', in all likelihood, the greatest number of suffrages was for him. To complete his misfortune, his professed enemy, L. Opimius, was chosen consul, with Q. Fabius Maximus Æmilianus, nephew to the second Africanus. It fell to the lot of Fabius to make war in Gaul, where Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had continued there with the character of proconsul, had gained great advantages, which we shall take notice of hereafter. As for Opimius, he continued in Italy, and made it his business to humble in his turn the great adversary of the senate, and his own personal enemy; for Gracchus had got him formerly excluded from the consular dignity, because he would not come into his measures. The idol of the people, being thus reduced to the condition of a private man, and consequently exposed to the persecutions of his enemies, had recourse to the law for rebuilding Carthage, and, together with Fulvius Flaccus, his inseparable friend, raised six thousand men for that purpose. When they had made the necessary preparations for passing over into Africa, they were informed, that the law would be repealed. This news brought them back to Rome; for they were then busied in getting together on the sea-coast a sufficient number of vessels for the transporting of their men. Upon their arrival, they found, that the senate had given the tribune M. Minucius instructions for that purpose; and that his chief argument to the people was built on some pretended prodigies, which were said to have happened at Carthage, when the workmen first began to mark out the circumference of the new city. To disprove this pretence, Gracchus mounted the rostra once more, but both spoke and acted like a madman. Among other things he said, That, if the senate reported, that heaven obstructed the rebuilding of Carthage by prodigies, the senate lied. Gracchus, who was naturally of a mild disposition, would never have carried things to this extremity, if he had not been led to it by the advice of his friend Fulvius, who, tho' advanced in years, still retained all the fire of youth. On the day appointed for the comitia to meet about the confirming or repealing of the law, Fulvius, early in the morning, posted some of his faction in the area of the capitol, where the assembly was to be held; and Gracchus, with a numerous guard, took possession of one of the porticoes of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, there to wait for the result of the comitia. In the mean time the consul Opimius, having offered a sacrifice to Jupiter in his temple on the capitol, one of the consul's lictors, by name Antillius, as he was bringing out the intrails of the victim, after they had been presented on the altar, insulted Gracchus and his friends, crying out, Take care, rioters; make way for the faithful servant of the republic. Upon this one of Gracchus's domestics drew a dagger, and laid Antillius dead at his feet. This unhappy accident, together with a violent storm, dispersed the croud, every one retiring in great consternation to his own house. As the author of the murder was not known, the greater part imputed it to Gracchus himself, tho' no one, even of the adverse party, was more affected with it than he; for he knew, that his enemies waited for an opportunity to lay on him the blame of a civil war, which they were resolved to begin. He passed the night in great uneasiness, dreading the evil consequences of that rash action; but Fulvius, who, from his earliest years, had been bred up in a camp, behaved in a very different manner. He retired to his house attended with a strong guard, and there made a great entertainment for his friends, drinking hard, and causing wine to be freely distributed among those who attended him. He did not retire till it was very late, and then slept sound, till the outcries of his guard, and the noise that was heard in all the streets of Rome, awakened him. The consul Opimius had taken possession of the capitol with his consular troops before day, and thereby made himself master of a post which commanded the city. After this, he had assembled the senate at break of day in the temple of Castor and Pollux, and caused the dead body of Antillius to be exposed to public view, in order to stir up the multitude against Gracchus and his adherents. The senate in great haste drew up a decree, empowering the consul to do whatever he should judge proper for the public good; which was in effect creating him dictator. Hereupon Opimius, resolving to repay his old enemy all the evils the republic and himself had suffered from him, ordered the Roman knights to take up arms, and each to bring with him two domestics well armed. On the other hand Fulvius, upon the first notice of these extraordinary proceedings, ran like a madman about the streets; and having raised the mob, flew, with his two sons, and a confused multitude, to take possession of

- a of mount Aventine; so that the two extremities of Rome to the east and west were like two camps, whence two armies were ready to march against each other. Gracchus, foreseeing that much blood would be shed in this quarrel, shewed a great reluctance to follow Fulvius to mount Aventine. However, he resolved at length to go and join his friend; but left his house more like a magistrate, who was going to put an end to a civil contest, than a warrior who was marching to battle. He neither changed the habit, which he usually wore in the city, nor took any other arms than a dagger under his robe, to defend himself in case he was attacked. As he was just going out of his house, his wife, who tenderly loved both her husband and her country, ran, all in tears, to stop him. She seized him by his robe, and holding in her arms his son, the only pledge of their mutual affections; Whither are you going, said she, so early? Can you be ignorant, that the murderers of your brother are preparing the same fate for you? You are going to put yourself at the head of a vile rabble, who will basely abandon you at the sight of the least danger. If you have any affection either for me or your dear child, take care of a life which is to us so dear. She was going on, when Gracchus, pierced to the heart with grief, and not having power to answer her, broke away from between her arms; but she, holding him by the robe, followed him, till at length, bore down with the weight of her grief, she fainted, and fell down in the street, whence she was carried to the house of Licinius Crassus her brother, who had intirely devoted himself to Gracchus's party. Gracchus, at his arrival on mount Aventine, found there a confused multitude of people, no-ways in a condition to withstand the consular troops, and the whole body of the nobility, who, with their clients and domestics, formed a very powerful party. He therefore summoned the chief men of his party to a council of war, when they unanimously resolved to fortify the temple of Diana, to invite the slaves to join them, with a promise of granting them their liberty, and lastly, to offer a treaty before they began hostilities. Gracchus prevailed on Fulvius to send to the consul his youngest son, a child scarce twelve years old, but of extraordinary beauty, and admired by all for his understanding, which was much above his years. When young Fulvius appeared before Opimius with a caduceus, the symbol of peace, in his hand, the consul, in derision to the embassy, received the young ambassador with great pomp and ceremony, and then ordered him to return to mount Aventine, and inform those who had sent him, that, if they would obtain peace, they must come themselves, and submit to the judgment of the senate. Take care, child, said the consul, after he had returned that answer, take care you don't appear here a second time. Their sending an ambassador of your age can be done only to insult us. Hereupon young Fulvius withdrew, and returning to mount Aventine, made his report. Then Gracchus himself, to prevent the spilling of Roman blood, offered to come down from the hill in person, to hear the proposals of the senate; but the multitude would not suffer him, fearing to be deprived of their leader. As nobody else cared to charge themselves with this commission, Fulvius had the imprudence to send his son a second time to the consul, who, without so much as hearing him, tho' he appeared before him with a great air of modesty, cried out in a violent rage, It is too much to insult us in this manner. Let the child be carried to prison, not so much to punish the son, as to chastise the insolence of the father. The order was immediately put in execution, and no further mention made of treaties. The consul resolved, without loss of time, to fall upon the rebels, and force them from their post. Accordingly he marched down the capitol, and arriving at the foot of mount Aventine, began the attack with the prudence of an experienced officer. Fulvius, whose bravery had been honoured with a triumph, made a vigorous resistance. And now Romans engaged for the first time with Romans, and consuls with consuls, within the very walls of Rome. There had been, before this time, several frays; but this was a formal battle, both parties being commanded by generals of great experience. Opimius ordered a body of archers, armed with bows and arrows, after the Cretan manner, to march up the hill, under the command of Decimus Brutus, and charge the rebels. On the other hand, Fulvius came down the hill like a torrent, and fell upon the archers with incredible fury. In this first attack Lentulus, the prince of the senate, was dangerously wounded, and many persons of distinction lost their lives; for in the engagement the senators and knights were confounded with the common soldiers, and the people with their magistrates. The consul, meeting with a more vigorous opposition than he expected, proclaimed an amnesty for all those, who should lay down their arms, and at the same time set a price on the heads of Gracchus and Fulvius, promising

ing to give their weight in gold to any one who should bring them to him. This a proclamation had the desired effect; the populace slipped away one by one, and, deserting their leaders, returned silently to their own houses. Fulvius, seeing himself thus abandoned all on a sudden, fled for refuge, with his eldest son, to a friend's house, and concealed himself in an old bathing-room, which was very private, and no longer in use. In the mean while his enemies, greedy of the reward set upon his head, made a diligent search after him, and not finding him, tho' they knew he could not be far off, threatened to burn down the whole neighbourhood. This terrified the owner of the house, to which Fulvius and his son had retired; however, he would not betray his friend himself, but directed another to shew where he was. Hereupon armed men entered the house, and killing both the father and the son, cut off their heads, with b a design to present them to the consul when the action was over *.

In the mean time Gracchus, who had not engaged in the battle, for fear of imbruing his hands in Roman blood, fled for refuge to the temple of Diana; but Licinius Crassus, his brother-in-law, and Pomponius, a Roman knight, who attended him, advised him to make his escape through the gate Tergemina. He followed their advice, and passing through the centre of the city, got to the bridge Sublicius, where his enemies, who pursued him close, would have overtaken and seized him, if his two friends, Licinius and Pomponius, with as much intrepidity and resolution, as Horatius Cocles had formerly exerted in the same place, had not opposed their fury. They defended the bridge against all the consular troops, till Gracchus was out of their reach; c but at length, being overpowered by numbers, and covered with wounds, they both expired on the bridge, which they had so valiantly defended. In the mean while Gracchus fled to a sacred wood, dedicated to the Furies, and there ordered a generous slave, by name Euphorus, or, as others call him, Philostratus, who had attended him, to put an end to his life. The faithful slave, resolving not to outlive his master, stabbed himself with the same dagger, which he had plunged into the breast of Gracchus, and expired with him. Others tell us, that Gracchus being overtaken by those who pursued him, Euphorus, embracing his master, covered him with his body; so that his enemies could not hurt him, without first killing the faithful slave, who, after receiving many wounds, breathed his last over Gracchus, whom the rabble soon dispatched. d As soon as he was dead, one of the multitude cut off his head; but as he was carrying it like a trophy to the consul, Lucius Septimuleius, who had always professed a strict friendship for Gracchus, snatched it out of his hand, and basely went with it to the consul, to get the reward set upon it, which was its weight in gold; but first he privately poured melted lead into the skull, and then delivered it to Opimius, who was so taken with the present, that he paid seventeen pounds and a half for it, without discovering the cheat. The body of Gracchus was first thrown into the Tiber, and afterwards carried to his mother Cornelia, who paid it all funeral honours. It is not agreed, whether Caius Gracchus had any thing in view prejudicial to the public liberty in courting the favour of the people, and publishing so many e laws to the disadvantage of the senate. Some are of opinion, that he aimed at the sovereign power; others, that his design was only to establish an equilibrium in the republic, and deliver the common people from the oppressions of the rich. His whole conduct seems to confirm the latter opinion; but thus much however must be allowed, that the methods he took were seditious, and that ambition and desire of revenge carried him beyond the bounds of justice. He so far altered the constitution of the commonwealth, and disturbed the public peace, particularly by the disunion of patrons and clients, that the Roman state became very unsettled, and liable to any new revolution. Tho' his intentions might have been upright, yet there was room to fear, that ruin would be the effect of such disturbances in so corrupted a commonwealth. f The people, instead of supporting their protector, deserted him in his greatest danger, and were not sensible of their loss, till it was too late to retrieve it; but afterwards they erected statues to the Gracchi, worshipped them as gods, and instituted festivals in their honour *.

Cruelty of Opimius.

ON the other hand, the consul Opimius, not satisfied with the death of Gracchus, of Fulvius, and of above three thousand of their party, who had been slain in the engagement on mount Aventine, imprisoned and condemned to die all the friends and adherents of the Gracchi whom he could discover. His severity towards

- a young Fulvius was highly blameable, and deservedly condemned even by those of his own party. The child had, notwithstanding the consul's prohibition, thought it his duty to obey his father, and return a second time with terms of accommodation. This act of obedience and filial duty the brutish consul looked upon as a great crime, and accordingly sent a lictor to the young Roman in prison, to acquaint him, that he must die, and to offer him in his name the liberty of chusing what kind of death he thought the easiest. The innocent youth, at this unexpected message, burst out into tears; which an Ætrurian aruspex observing, who was shut up in the same prison, Why all this bustle, said he, in parting with life? I will shew you how easy a thing it is to die. He had scarce uttered these words, when he took a leap, and dashed
- b his head against one of the lintels of the door with such violence, that he died upon the spot. Young Fulvius followed his example, and, by a like death, put the inhuman consul's orders in execution. After this, Opimius commanded the bodies of those who had been killed on the Aventine, to the number of three thousand, to be thrown into the Tiber, confiscated their goods, and published an edict, forbidding their widows and relations to put on mourning for them. Licinia, the wife of Gracchus, was even deprived of her dowry. The cruel consul, after having shed so much blood, was not ashamed to build a temple to Concord, as if he had, by pacific measures, brought his fellow citizens to an union. The people never saw this temple but with horror, and looked upon it as a monument of the cruelty of Opimius. As
- c for the senate, they made it their chief business to extinguish even the memory of the laws published by the Gracchi. With this view they gained over one of the commissioners, and prevailed upon him to represent in the assembly of the people, that he met with unsurmountable difficulties in the inquiry after, and partition of, the lands; but that, to relieve the people, he would take care that every proprietor of such lands should pay a certain rent, proportionable to the quantity he possessed; and that the money arising from these rents should be distributed among the poor citizens, who enjoyed no share of those public lands. He added, that, in consideration of this payment, he was of opinion, that those who possessed such lands, should be acknowledged the lawful proprietors of them, with a discharge from all claims for the future; and that they should be allowed afterwards to alienate and dispose of these inheritances as they pleased; but the said lands should be always subject to the rent that should be agreed upon. The people, seduced with the hopes of this advantage, passed the law, which absolutely destroyed that of the Gracchi. Soon after, the rents, which the owners of the lands were to pay to the people, were suppressed, one of the tribunes of the people pretending, that the rich paid a sufficient tribute to the public, by being at the charge of supporting the dignity of the commonwealth in the magistracies, with which they were invested. Thus the people were again reduced to their former wants, and subjected to the authority of the senate, and the oppressions of the rich; a just punishment for their inconstancy, and ingratitude to their benefactors, whom they basely abandoned in their greatest danger *.
- e DURING these troubles at home, the late consul Domitius was spreading with great success the terror of the Roman arms in Transalpine Gaul. He had, during his consulship, intirely settled the country of the Salyes in peace; a work happily begun by C. Sextius Calvinus three years before; but the Allobroges, whose country bordered on that of the Salyes, being uneasy at the settlements of the Romans in their neighbourhood, began to rise, with a design to fall upon the Roman colony at Aquæ Sextiæ. Hereupon Domitius, who was now only proconsul, having been succeeded by Q. Fabius Maximus the colleague of Opimius, to prevent the Arverni, a powerful people, from joining the Allobroges, entered into an alliance with their neighbours the Ædui, one of the most considerable nations in Transalpine Gaul. Upon this the Arverni began
- f hostilities with the Ædui, who complained to Domitius; and the Roman general took occasion from thence to force himself a passage into the country of the Arverni. He had scarce entered it, when the king of the Arverni, named Bituitus, or, according to the Celtic orthography, Bitultick, sent a deputation to the proconsul, which was quite a new scene to the Romans. The head of the embassy was very richly dressed, and followed by a great number of attendants; but his chief guard consisted of a company of huge dogs, that followed him in good order, like regular troops. By his side walked a bard, that is, according to Festus, a priest, who being a skilful versifier in the language of his country, sung the praises of his king, his people, and the ambassador. The proconsul received the ambassador with great civility, who assuming an imperious air, commanded him, in the name of his master, to forbear molesting the Allobroges, and to retire forthwith from all Gaul. Domitius, who was not a man to be terrified by such rhodomontades, turned his back upon the ambassador and his bard, without deigning to give them an answer, and immediately led his troops into the fruitful plains of the Cavari. While he was incamped there near a village called Vindasia, not far from the place where the Sulga, now the Sorgue, falls into the Rhone, an innumerable multitude of Allobroges came to attack him; but were easily routed by the proconsul's regular and well-disciplined troops. We are told, that twenty thousand Gauls were killed on the spot, and three thousand made prisoners of war.

THE defeat of the Allobroges put the powerful nation of the Arverni in motion. Bitultick raised an army of two hundred thousand men, and marched against the Romans, whom they found incamped in the country of the Cavari. The Roman army, thirty thousand strong, was commanded by Q. Fabius Maximus, who came from Rome during the troubles raised by Gracchus, but was now become proconsul, P. Manilius and C. Papirius Carbo having been raised to the consulato. Domitius had surrendered the command to Fabius, but still continued in the camp to assist the general with his advice. Bitultick, who placed too great confidence in his numbers, when he saw the Roman camp, despised so weak an enemy, and turning to those who attended him, This handful of men, said he, will scarce be sufficient to feed the dogs that follow me. When he began the attack, the proconsul Fabius, who had a quartan ague, was in the height of one of his fits; however, he drew up the legions himself, and being carried through the ranks, encouraged his soldiers to behave like true Romans. The Gauls, who were utterly undisciplined, and without experience, were soon put to the rout, and vast numbers of them slain. And then Domitius, desirous to share the glory of the day with Fabius, sent to invite the king of the Arverni, who had not yet left the field of battle, to an interview. The credulous Gaul accepted the invitation, and came to meet Domitius with a small attendance at the place appointed; but, to his great surprize, saw himself all on a sudden surrounded by Domitius's guards. The betrayed king called for vengeance from the gods, protectors of faith, but in vain; the base Roman telling him, that he must go to Rome, to give an account of his conduct to the senate. Accordingly he was sent under a strong guard to Marseilles, and there put on board a vessel, which conveyed him to Rome. The Allobroges, upon the news of the victory gained by Fabius over their friends the Arverni, immediately submitted. As for the Arverni, the captivity of their king, and the loss they had sustained in the battle, which is said to have amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand men either killed or drowned in the Rhone, so disheartened them, that they sent ambassadors to solicit a peace; which was granted them upon very reasonable terms, the proconsul only requiring of them, that they should continue at home, and not disturb the Ædui, or any of the neighbouring nations. Fabius and Domitius, having thus settled the eastern part of Gaul in peace, returned to Rome, where the senate approved of the baseness of Domitius, and not only detained the injured Bitultick, and exposed him in the triumphs of his conquerors, but, by a fresh act of injustice, ordered the consul, P. Manilius, who was then setting out for Gaul, to send Congeniatius, the son of Bitultick, to Rome. The young prince indeed was entertained and educated at Rome in a manner suitable to his rank; and therefore, when returned to his dominions, maintained to the last a great friendship and esteem for the Romans, by whom he had been educated. As for the unhappy Bitultick, after he had been basely obliged by the senate to grace the triumphs of Domitius and Fabius, he was confined to the city of Alba, where he spent the rest of his days, the senate being afraid lest he should renew the war, if they allowed him to return to his own dominions. Thus were all rules of equity, and even the law of nations, shamefully neglected and trod under foot by the senate, when they came in competition with the interest of their republic.

- a tia. The crimes laid to his charge were, his having put to death a great number of citizens on the Aventine, and afterwards sentenced others to die, and caused them to be executed, before the people had condemned them; a cause of the utmost importance to both parties, and debated with great warmth. Decius, no mean orator, maintained, that Opimius had transgressed the law, enacting, that no citizen should be put to death, but by a decree of the people; and pretended, that if the people gave up their right in this instance, the defenders of the people would undergo the fate of the Gracchi, whenever the senate should think fit. They will declare them, said he, dangerous citizens, and then death will be the reward of their zeal for the interest of the people. On the other hand, the consul Papirius Carbo undertook the defence of Opimius, and
- b by shewing to the multitude how dangerous it was, and inconsistent with reason, that seditious men and rebels should have no other judges or avengers but themselves, prevailed upon them to acquit Opimius, and thereby declare, that it was lawful for a consul, when empowered by the senate, to deliver the republic from a dangerous citizen, without waiting for the consent of the people assembled in comitia. Thus was tranquillity restored to the city. The senate recovered their ancient ascendant over the people, who bore their mild government without complaints; but this tranquillity was soon disturbed by new commotions, which greatly shook the consular state, and paved the way for an absolute monarchy. These civil disturbances, and some foreign wars, together with the rise, progress, declension and total ruin of the imperial state, sinking
- c under the weight of its own greatness, will be the subject of the first chapters of the following volume.
